It may be said to have two banks, of which the inner marks the ordinary height of the stream; and the outer, its ancient elevation during the rainy season, or the melting of the snows on the summits of Lebanon. In the days of Joshua, and, it is probable, for many ages after his time, the harvest was one of the seasons when the Jordan overflowed his banks, Josh. 3: 15. This happens in the first month of the Jewish year, which corresponds with March, 1 Chron. 12: 15. But in modern times, whether the rapidity of the current has worn the channel deeper than formerly, or whether its waters have taken some other direction, the river seems to have forgotten his ancient greatness. When Maundrell visited Jordan, on the thirtieth of March, the proper time for these inundations, it ran at least two yards below the brink of its channel. After having descended the outer bank, he went about a furlong upon the level strand, before he came to the immediate bank of the river. This inner bank was so thickly covered with bushes and trees, among which he observed the tamarisk, the willow, and the oleander, that he could see no water till he had made his way through them.

In this entangled thicket, so conveniently planted near the cooling stream, and remote from the habitations of men, several kinds of wild beasts were accustomed to repose, till the swelling of the river drove them from their retreats. This circumstance gave occasion to that beautiful allusion of the prophet: "He shall come up like a lion, from the swelling of Jordan, against the habitation of the strong," Jer. 49: 19. The figure is highly poetical and striking. It is not easy to present a more terrible image to the mind, than a lion roused from his den by the roar of the swelling river, and chafed and irritated by its rapid and successive encroachments on his chosen haunts, till, forced to quit his last retreat, he ascends to the higher grounds and the open country, and turns the fierceness of his rage against the helpless sheep-cots, or the unsuspecting villages. A destroyer equally fierce, and cruel, and irresistible, the devoted Edomites were to find in Nebuchadnezzar and his armies.

The rapidity and depth of the river, which are admitted by every traveller, although the volume of water seems now to be much diminished, illustrate those parts of Scripture which mention the fords and passages of Jordan. It no longer, indeed, rolls down into the Salt sea so majestic a stream as in the days of Joshua; yet its ordinary depth is still about ten or twelve feet, so that it cannot even at present be passed but at certain places, Judg. 3: 28. 12: 6.

The regular passages over the Jordan were, (1.) Jacob's bridge, between the lakes Semechon and Gennesareth, said to be the place where Jacob met his brother Esau, and where he wrestled with an angel.—(2.) A bridge at Chammath, at the issue of the river from the lake of Gennesareth.—(3.) A ferry at Beth-abara, 2 Sam. 19: 18. 2 Kings 2: 8. John 1: 28.—(4.) It is probable that there was another at Bethshan, or Scythopolis.

The difficulty, felt by Mr. Maundrell, will be completely removed, by supposing, that it does not, like the Nile, overflow every year, but, like the Euphrates, only in some particular years; but when it does, it is in the time of harvest. Even the Nile, however, sometimes (though rarely) fails; and it may be so with the Jordan. If it did not in ancient times annually overflow its banks, the majesty of God in dividing its waters to make way for Joshua and the armies of Israel, was certainly the more striking to the Canaanites; who, when they looked upon themselves as defended in an extraordinary manner by the casual swelling of the river, its breadth and rapidity being both so extremely increased, yet, found it in these circumstances part asunder, and leave a way on dry land for the people of Jehovah.

The phrase "beyond Jordan," in the early books of Moses and in Joshua, means the west of the river; but subsequently, that is, when the Hebrews had taken possession of the country, the term has the opposite meaning, denoting the country east of the river.

The Talmudists say, that "the waters of the Jordan are not fit to sprinkle the unclean, because they are mixed waters;" meaning, mixed with the waters of other rivers and brooks, which empty themselves into it. The reader will compare with this the opinion of Naaman the Syrian, (2 Kings 5: 11, 12.) who probably had received the same notion. Perhaps, too, this their inferiority was well understood, and not forgotten by the prophet of Israel. Robinson on Baptism.—Watson; Calmet; Robinson's Bible Dic.

JORTIN, (Dr. JOHN,) an eminent theologian and scholar, and the son of a French refugee, was born, in 1698, in London; was educated at the Charter house, and Jesus college, Oxford; and held, successively, the livings of Swavesey, St. Dunstan's in the East, and Kensington. He was also a prebendary of St. Paul's, and archdeacon of London. He died, at Kensington, in 1770, as much beloved for his private virtues as admired for his piety, learning, abilities, liberality of mind, and contempt of subserviency. Among his works are, Discourses concerning the Truth of the Christian Religion; Lusus Poetici; a Life of Erasmus; Remarks on Ecclesiastical History; Sermons; and Six Dissertations on different subjects. His "Remarks on Ecclesiastical History" is a work universally allowed to be curious, interesting, and impartial; full of manly sense, acuteness, and profound erudition. Few will be found whose names stand higher in the esteem of the judicious than Dr. Jortin's.—Davenport; Jones' Chris. Biog.

JOSEPH; son of Jacob and Rachel, and brother to Benjamin, Gen. 30: 22, 24. The history of Joseph is so fully and consecutively given by Moses, that it is not necessary to abridge so familiar an account. In place of this, the following beautiful argument by Mr. Blunt for the veracity of the account, drawn from the identity of Joseph's character, will be read with pleasure.

"I have already found an argument for the veracity of Moses in the identity of Jacob's character; I now find another in the identity of that of Joseph. There is one quality, as it has been often observed, though with a different view from mine, which runs like a thread through his whole history—his affection for his father. Israel loved him, we read, more than all his children; he was the child of his age; his mother died whilst he was yet young, and a double care of him consequently devolved upon his surviving parent. He made him a coat of many colors; he kept him at home when his other sons were sent to feed the flocks. When the bloody garment was brought in, Jacob, in his affection for him, that same affection which, on a subsequent occasion, when it was told him that after all Joseph was alive, made him as slow to believe the good tidings as he was now quick to apprehend the sad; in this his affection for him, I say, Jacob at once concluded the worst, and 'he rent his clothes and put sackcloth upon his loins, and mourned for his son many days, and all his daughters rose up to comfort him; but he refused to be comforted, and he said, For I will go down into the grave unto my son mourning.'

"Now, what were the feelings in Joseph which responded to these? When the sons of Jacob went down to Egypt, and Joseph knew them, though they knew not him; for they, it may be remarked, were of an age not to be greatly changed by the lapse of years, and were still sustaining the character in which Joseph had always seen them; whilst he himself had meanwhile grown out of the strippling into the man, and from a shepherd-boy was become the ruler of a kingdom; when his brethren thus came before him, his question was, 'Is your father yet alive?' Gen. 43: 7. They went down a second time, and again the question was, 'Is your father well, the old man of whom ye spake, is he yet alive?' More he could not venture to ask, whilst he was yet in his disguise. By a stratagem he now detains Benjamin, leaving the others, if they would, to go their way. But Judah came near unto him, and entreated him for his brother, telling him how that he had been surety to his father to bring him back; how that his father was an old man, and that this was the child of his old age, and that he loved him; how it would come to pass that if he should not see the lad with him he would die, and his gray hairs be brought with sorrow to the grave; for 'how shall I go to my father, and the lad be not with me, lest, peradventure, I see the evil that shall come on my father?' Here, without knowing it, he had struck the string that was the tenderest of all. Joseph's firmness forsook him at this repeated mention of his father, and in terms so touching: he could not refrain himself any longer; and, causing every man to go out, he made himself known to his brethren. Then, even in the paroxysm which came on him, (for he wept aloud, so that the Egyptians heard,) still his first words uttered from the fulness of his heart were, 'Doth my father yet live?' He now bids them hasten and bring the old man down, bearing to him tokens of his love and tidings of his glory. He goes to meet him; he presents himself unto him, and falls on his neck, and weeps on his neck a good while; he provides for him and his household out of the fat of the land; he sets him before Pharaoh. By and by he hears that he is sick, and hastens to visit him; he receives his blessing; watches his death-bed; embalms his body; mourns for him threescore and ten days; and then carries him, as he had desired, into Canaan to bury him, taking with him, as an escort to do him honor, 'all the elders of Israel, and all the servants of Pharaoh, and all his house, and the house of his brethren, chariots and horsemen, a very great company.' How natural was it now for his brethren to think that the tie by which alone they could imagine Joseph to be held to them was dissolved; that any respect he might have felt or feigned for them must have been buried in the cave of Machpelah, and that he would now requite to them the evil they had done! 'And they sent a messenger unto Joseph, saying, Thy father did command before he died, saying, So shall ye say unto Joseph, Forgive, I pray thee now, the trespass of thy brethren, and their sin; for they did unto thee evil.' And then they add of themselves, as if well aware of the surest road to their brother's heart, 'Forgive, we pray thee, the trespass of the servants of the God of thy father.' In every thing the father's name is still put foremost: it is his memory which they count upon as their shield and buckler.

"It is not the singular beauty of these scenes, or the moral lesson they teach, excellent as it is, with which I am now concerned, but simply the perfect artless considteny which prevails through them all. It is not the constancy with which the son's strong affection for his father had lived through an interval of twenty years' absence, and, what is more, through the temptation of sudden promotion to the highest estate; it is not the noble-minded frankness with which he still acknowledges his kindred, and makes way for them, 'shepherds' as they were, to the throne of Pharaoh himself; it is not the simplicity and singleness of heart which allow him to give all the first-born of Egypt, men over whom he bore absolute rule, an opportunity of observing his own comparatively humble origin, by leading them in attendance upon his father's corpse to the valleys of Canaan and the modest cradle of his race; it is not, in a word, the grace, but the identity, of Joseph's character, the light in which it is exhibited by himself, and the light in which it is regarded by his brethren, to which I now point as stamping it with marks of reality not to be gainsayed."

Some writers have considered Joseph as a type of Christ; and it requires not much ingenuity to find out some resemblances, as his being hated by his brethren, sold for money, plunged into deep affliction, and then raised to power and honor, &c.; but as we have no intimation in any part of Scripture that Joseph was constituted a figure of our Lord, and that this was one design of recording his history at length, all such applications want authority, and cannot safely be indulged. The account seems rather to have been left for its moral uses, and that it should afford, by its inimitable simplicity and truth to nature, a point of irresistible internal evidence of the truth of the Mosaic narrative.

2. JOSEPH, the pious husband of Mary, and reputed father of Jesus, was the son of Jacob and grandson of Mathan, Matt. 1: 15, 16, 19. 13: 55.

It is probable that Joseph died before Christ entered upon his public ministry; for upon any other supposition we are at a loss to account for the reason why Mary, the mother of Jesus, is frequently mentioned in the evangelic narrative, while no allusion is made to Joseph; and, above all, why the dying Savior should recommend his mother to the care of the beloved disciple John, if her husband had been then living, John 19: 25—27.

3. JOSEPH OF ARIMATHEA; a Jewish senator, and a believer in the divine mission of Jesus Christ, John 19: 38. St. Luke calls him a counsellor, and also informs us that he was a good and just man, who did not give his consent to the crucifixion of Christ, Luke 23: 50, 51. And though unable to restrain the sanhedrim from their wicked purposes, he went to Pilate by night, and solicited from him the body of Jesus, and laid it in his own new and unoccupied tomb, Matt. 27: 57—60. John 19: 38—42.—Watson.

JOSEPHUS, (FLAVIUS;) born thirty-seven years after Christ, at Jerusalem, of the sect of the Pharisees, and, for a long time, the governor of Galilee. He afterwards obtained the command of the Jewish army, and supported with skill, courage, and resolution, a siege of seven weeks, in the fortified town of Jotapha, where he was attacked by Vespasian and Titus. The town was betrayed to the enemy; forty thousand of the inhabitants were cut to pieces, and twelve hundred made prisoners. Josephus was discovered in a cave in which he had concealed himself, and was given up to the Roman general, who was about to send him to Nero, when, as it is related, he predicted that Vespasian would one day enjoy the imperial dignity, and thereupon obtained both freedom and favor. This induced him, when he went with Titus to Jerusalem, to advise his countrymen to submission.

After the conquest of Jerusalem, he went with Titus to Rome, and wrote his "History of the Jewish War," of which he had been an eye-witness, in seven books, both in the Hebrew and Greek languages—a work which resembles the writings of Livy more than any other history. His "Jewish Antiquities," in twenty books, is likewise an excellent work. It contains the history of the Jews, from the earliest times till near the end of the reign of Nero. His two books on the "Antiquity of the Jewish People" contain valuable extracts from old historians, and are written against Appion, an Alexandrian grammarian, and a declared enemy of the Jews. The best edition of his works is that of Havercamp, Amsterdam, 1729, in two volumes, folio, Greek and Latin. The last edition, by Oberther, Leipsic, 1781—5, is in octavo.—Hend. Buck.

JOSHUA, the heroic son of Nun. He was of the tribe of Ephraim, and born A. M. 2460. He devoted himself to the service of Moses, and in Scripture he is commonly called the servant of Moses, Exod. 24: 13. 33: 11. Deut. 1: 38, &c. His first name was Hoseah, or Oseha; Hoseah signifying Savior; Jehoshua, the salvation of Jehovah, or Jehovah will save.

Joshua succeeded Moses in the government of Israel, about the year of the world 2553, and died at Timnath-serah, in the hundred and tenth year of his age, A. M. 2570.

His piety, courage, and disinterested integrity are conspicuous throughout his whole history; and, exclusive of the inspiration which enlightened his mind and writings, he derived divine information, sometimes by immediate revelation from God, (Josh. 3: 7. 5: 13—15.) at others, from the sanctuary, through the medium of Eleazer, the high-priest, the son of Aaron, who, having on the breast-plate, presented himself before the mercy-seat, on which the Shechinah, or visible symbol of the divine presence, rested, and there consulted Jehovah by the Urim and Thummim, to which an answer was returned by an audible voice.

2. The book of JOSHUA continues the sacred history from the period of the death of Moses to that of the death of Joshua and of Eleazer; a space of about thirty years. It contains an account of the conquest and division of the land of Canaan, the renewal of the covenant with the Israelites, and the death of Joshua. There are two passages in this book which show that it was written by a person contemporary with the events it records, Josh. 5: 1. 6: 25.

Upon the miracle wrought at the word of Joshua, recorded in Josh. 10: 12—14, much has been written. Objectors have urged that the language of Joshua, in correspondence with which the miracle is said to have occurred, is not in accordance with the ascertained economy of the universe; and that if even this objection could be disposed of, an unanswerable one against the fact would remain, because such an occurrence must have involved the whole system in a common ruin. To these objections it has been replied, (1.) That the Hebrew general expressed himself in popular language, as, indeed, he was compelled to do, unless he would have incurred the charge of insanity; and, (2.) That the miracle consisted in an extraordinary refraction of the solar and lunar rays, and did not imply any cessation of the motion of the heavenly bodies.

Though there is not a perfect agreement among the learned concerning the author of this book, yet by far the most general opinion is, that it was written by Joshua himself; and, indeed, in the last chapter it is said that "Joshua wrote these words in the book of the law of God;" which expression seems to imply that he subjoined this history to that written by Moses. The last five verses, giving an account of the death of Joshua, were added by one of his successors; probably by Eleazer, Phinehas, or Samuel.—Watson; Calmet.

JOSIAH, king of Judah, deserves particular mention on account of his wisdom and piety, and some memorable events that occurred in the course of his reign.

He succeeded to the throne, upon the assassination of his father Amon, at the age of eight years, B. C. 640; and at a period when idolatry and wickedness, encouraged by his father's profligate example, very generally prevailed. Josiah, who manifested the influence of pious and virtuous principles at a very early age, began in his sixteenth year to project the reformation of the kingdom, and to adopt means for restoring the worship of the true God. At the age of twenty years he vigorously pursued the execution of the plans which he had meditated. He began with abolishing idolatry, first at Jerusalem, and then through different parts of the kingdom; destroying the altars which had been erected, and the idols which had been the objects of veneration and worship. He then proceeded, in his twenty-sixth year, to a complete restoration of the worship of God, and the regular service of the temple. Whilst he was prosecuting this pious work, and repairing the temple, which had been long neglected, and which had sunk into a state of dilapidation, the book of the law, which had been concealed in the temple, was happily discovered. This was, probably, a copy of the Pentateuch, which had been lodged there for security by some pious priest in the reign of Ahaz or Manasseh. Josiah, desirous of averting from himself and the kingdom threatened judgments, determined to adhere to the directions of the law, in the business of reformation which he had undertaken; and to observe the festivals enjoined by Moses, which had been shamefully neglected.

But, in pursuing his laudable plans of reformation, he was resisted by the inveterate habits of the Israelites; so that his zealous and persevering efforts were ineffectual. Their degeneracy was so invincible, that the Almighty Sovereign was provoked to inflict upon them those calamities which were denounced by the prophet Zephaniah. Josiah was slain at Megiddo, in the thirty-ninth year of his age, B. C. 609. His death was greatly lamented by all his subjects; and an elegy was written on the occasion by the prophet Jeremiah, which is not now extant, 2 Kings 22, 23. 2 Chron. 34, 35.—Watson.

JOT, a shortened form of the Greek letter Iota, and the Hebrew Yod or Jod. It is the smallest letter in each of these alphabets, and is therefore used emphatically to denote the smallest part, or least particle. This also is its meaning in English, Matt. 5: 18. Robinson's Bib. Dict.

JOTBATHAH; an encampment of Israel, in the wilderness, between Gidgad and Ebronah, (Numb. 33: 34.) which Mr. Taylor takes to be the same as the graves of lust; Je-taabatha, signifying a heap of lust.—Calmet.

JOURNEY. A day's journey is reckoned about sixteen or twenty miles. To this distance around the Hebrew camp were the quails scattered for food for the people, Numb. 11: 31. Shaw computes the eleven days' journey from Sinai to Kadesh-barnea to be about one hundred and ten miles, Deut. 1: 2. A Sabbath day's journey is reckoned by the Hebrews at about seven furlongs, or one mile and three quarters; (Matt. 24: 20.) and it is said that if any Jew travelled above this from the city on the Sabbath he was beaten; but it is probable they were allowed to travel as far to the synagogue as was necessary, Acts. 1: 12. 2 Kings 4: 23. The Hebrews seem to have had fifty-two journeys or marches from Rameses to Gilgal, Numb. 33.—Brown.

JOY; a delight of the mind, arising from the consideration of a present or assured approaching possession of a future good. When it is moderate, it is called gladness; when raised on a sudden to the highest degree, it is then exultation or transport; when we limit our desires by our possessions, it is contentment; when our desires are raised high, and yet accomplished, this is called satisfaction; when our joy is derived from some comical occasion or amusement, it is mirth; if it arise from considerable opposition that is vanquished in the pursuit of the good we desire, it is then called triumph; when joy has so long possessed the mind that it is settled into a temper, we call it cheerfulness; when we rejoice upon the account of any good which others obtain, it may be called sympathy, or congratulation.

This is natural joy; but there is,—2. A moral joy, which is a self-approbation, or that which arises from the performance of any good actions; this is called peace, or serenity of conscience: if the action be honorable, and the joy rise high, it may be called glory.

3. There is also a spiritual joy, which the Scripture calls a "fruit of the Spirit," (Gal. 5: 22.) "the joy of faith," (Phil. 1: 25.) and "the rejoicing of hope," Heb. 3: 6. The objects of it are, 1. God himself, Ps. 43: 4. Is. 61: 10. 2. Christ, Phil. 3: 3. 1 Pet. 1: 8. 3. The promises, Ps. 119: 162. 4. The administration of the gospel, and gospel ordinances, Ps. 89: 15. 5. The prosperity of the interest of Christ, Acts. 15: 3. Rev. 11: 15, 17. 6. The happiness of a future state, Rom. 5: 2. Matt. 25: 21. The nature and properties of this joy: 1. It is or should be constant, Phil. 4: 4. 2. It is unknown to the men of the world, 1 Cor. 2: 14. 3. It is unspeakable, 1 Pet. 1: 8. 4. It is permanent, John 16: 22. Watts on Pass., sect. 11; Gill's Body of Div., vol. iii. p. 111, 8vo. edit.; Grave's Mor. Phil., vol. i. p. 356; Dwight's Theology.—Hend. Buck.

JOVINIANISTS; the followers of Jovinian, an Italian monk, who, towards the end of the fourth century, according to Dr. Mosheim, wrote against the growing superstitions of the age, which was enough to gain him a place in Augustine's list of heretics, and to procure him persecution both from church and state. The emperor Honorius cruelly ordered him, and his accomplices, to be whipped with scourges armed with lead, and then to be banished to different islands; himself to the isle of Boas, where he died, about A. D. 406. The church of Rome charges upon these good people several heresies, for which there appears no good foundation; "to which they added," says Jerome, "this shocking doctrine, that a virgin is no better than a married woman! Mosheim's E. H. vol. i. p. 388, 389; Hieronymus, epist. 50.—Williams.

JUBILEE; a public festivity. Among the Jews, it denotes every fiftieth year; being that following the revolution of seven weeks of years; at which time all the slaves were made free, and all lands reverted to their ancient owners. The jubilees were not regarded after the Babylonish captivity. The political design of the law of the jubilee was to prevent the too great oppression of the poor, as well as their being liable to perpetual slavery. By this means the rich were prevented from accumulating lands for perpetuity, and a kind of equality was preserved through all the families of Israel. The distinction of tribes was also preserved, in respect both to their families and possessions; that they might be able, when there was occasion, on the jubilee year, to prove their right to the inheritance of their ancestors. Thus, also, it would be known with certainty of what tribe or family the Messiah sprung. It served, also, like the Olympiads of the Greeks, and the Lustra of the Romans, for the readier computation of time. The jubilee has also been supposed to be typical of the gospel state and dispensation, described by Is. 61: 1, 2, in reference to this period, as "the acceptable year of the Lord."

The word jubilee, in a more modern sense, denotes a grand church solemnity or ceremony celebrated at Rome, in which the pope grants a plenary indulgence to all sinners; at least, to as many as visit the churches of St. Peter and St. Paul at Rome. The jubilee was first established by Boniface VII., in 1300, which was only to return every hundred years; but the first celebration brought in such store of wealth, that Clement VI., in 1343, reduced it to the period of fifty years. Urban VI., in 1389, appointed it to be held every thirty-five years, that being the age of our Savior; and Paul II. and Sixtus IV., in 1475, brought it down to every twenty-five, that every person might have the benefit of it once in his life. Boniface IX. granted the privilege of holding jubilees to several princes and monasteries; for instance, to the monks of Canterbury, who had a jubilee every fifty years; when people flocked from all parts, to visit the tomb of Thomas-a-Becket. Afterwards, jubilees became more frequent: there is generally one at the inauguration of a new pope; and he grants them as often as the church or himself have occasion for them. To be entitled to the privileges of the jubilee, the bull enjoins fasting, alms, and prayers. It gives the priests a full power to absolve in all cases, even those otherwise reserved to the pope; to make commutations of vows, &c.; in which it differs from a plenary indulgence. During the time of jubilee, all other indulgences are suspended.—Watson; Hend. Buck.

JUDAH; the son of Jacob and Leah, who was born in Mesopotamia, Gen. 29: 35. It was he who advised his brethren to sell Joseph to the Ishmaelite merchants, rather than stain their hands with his blood, Gen. 37: 26. There is little said of his life, and the little that is recorded does not raise him high in our estimation. In the last prophetic blessing pronounced on him by his father Jacob, (Gen. 49: 8, 9.) there is a promise of the regal power; and that it should not depart from his family before the coming of the Messiah. The whole southern part of Palestine fell to Judah's lot; but the tribes of Simeon and Dan possessed many cities which at first were given to Judah. This tribe was so numerous, that at the departure out of Egypt it contained seventy-four thousand six hundred men capable of bearing arms, Numb. 1: 26, 27. The crown passed from the tribe of Benjamin, of which Saul and his sons were, to that of Judah, which was David's tribe, and the tribe of the kings, his successors, until the Babylonish captivity.—Watson.

JUDAISING CHRISTIANS; those who attempted to mingle Judaism and Christianity together. This was done to some extent in the apostles' days, which gave occasion to the council recorded in the fifteenth of the Acts. But the origin of the sect of this name, is placed under the reign of Adrian; for when this emperor had at length razed Jerusalem, entirely destroyed its very foundations, and enacted laws of the severest kind against the whole body of the Jewish people, the greatest part of the Christians who lived in Palestine, to prevent their being confounded with the Jews, abandoned entirely the Mosaic rites, and chose a bishop, namely, Mark, a foreigner by nation, and an alien from the commonwealth of Israel. Those who were strongly attached to the Mosaic rites separated from their brethren, and founded at Pera, a country of Palestine, and in the neighboring parts, particular assemblies, in which the law of Moses maintained its primitive dignity, authority, and lustre. The body of judaising Christians, which set Moses and Christ upon an equal footing in point of authority, were afterwards divided into two sects, extremely different both in their rites and opinions, and distinguished by the names of NAZARENES and EBIONITES; which see.—Hend. Buck.

JUDAISM; the religious doctrines and rites of the Jews, the descendants of Abraham. The religion of the ancestors of the Jews, before the time of Moses, from Abraham downward, consisted in the worship of the one living and true God, under whose immediate direction they were; in the hope of a Redeemer; in a firm reliance on his promises under all difficulties and dangers; and in a thankful acknowledgment for all his blessings and deliverances. In that early age, we read of altars, pillars, and monuments raised, and sacrifices offered to God. They used circumcision as a seal of the covenant which God had made with Abraham. As to the mode and circumstances of divine worship, they were much at liberty till the time of Moses; but that legislator, by the direction and appointment of God himself, prescribed an instituted form of religion, and regulated ceremonies, feasts, days, priests, and sacrifices, with the utmost exactness. Ancient Judaism, compared with all religions except the Christian, was distinguished for its superior purity and spirituality; and the whole Mosaic ritual was of a typical nature. (See HEBREWS.) Judaism was but a temporary dispensation, and was to give way, at least the ceremonial part of it, at the coming of the Messiah.

The principal sects among the Jews were the Pharisees, who placed religion in external ceremony; the Sadducees, who were remarkable for their incredulity; and the Essenes, who were distinguished for their austere sanctity.

At present, the Jews have two sects; the Karaites, who admit no rule of religion but the law of Moses; and the Rabbinites, who add to the law the traditions of the Talmud. See those articles, and books recommended under article Jews, in this work.—Hend. Buck.

JUDAS GAULANITIS, or the Gaulanite, opposed the enrolment of the people made by Cyrenius in Judea; (see CYRENIUS;) and raised a very great rebellion, pretending that the Jews, being free, ought to acknowledge no dominion besides that of God. His followers chose rather to suffer extreme torments than to call any power on earth lord or master. The same Judas is named Judas the Galilean, (Acts 5: 37.) because he was a native of the city of Gamala, in the Gaulanitis, which was comprised in Galilee. Calmet believes that the Herodians were the followers of Judas.—Calmet.

JUDAS ISCARIOT, or, as he is usually called, the Traitor, and betrayer of our Lord.

"The treachery of Judas Iscariot," says Dr. Hales, "his remorse, and suicide, are occurrences altogether so strange and extraordinary, that the motives by which he was actuated require to be developed, as far as may be dooe, where the evangelists are, in a great measure, silent concerning them, from the circumstances of the history itself, and from the feelings of human nature. Judas, the leading trait in whose character was covetousness, was probably induced to follow Jesus at first with a view to the riches, honors, and other temporal advantages, which he, in common with the rest, expected the Messiah's friends would enjoy. The astonishing miracles he saw him perform left no room to doubt of the reality of his Master's pretensions, who had, indeed, himself in private actually accepted the title from his apostles; and Judas must have been much disappointed when Jesus repeatedly refused the proffered royalty from the people in Galilee, after the miracle of feeding the five thousand, and again after his public procession to Jerusalem. He might naturally have grown impatient under the delay, and dissatisfied also with Jesus, for openly discouraging all ambitions views among his disciples; and, therefore, he might have devised the scheme of delivering him up to the sanhedrim, or great council of the nation, (composed of the chief priests, scribes, and elders,) in order to compel him to avow himself openly as the Messiah before them; and to work such miracles, or to give them the sign which they so often required, as would convince and induce them to elect him in due form, and by that means enable him to reward his followers. Even the rebukes of Jesus for his covetousness, and the detection of his treacherous scheme, although they unquestionably offended Judas, might only serve to stimulate him to the speedier execution of his plot, during the feast of the passover, while the great concourse of the Jews, from all parts assembled, might powerfully support the sanhedrim and their Messiah against the Romans. The success of this measure, though against his Master's will, would be likely to procure him pardon, and even to recommend him to favor afterwards. Such might have been the plausible suggestions by which Satan tempted him to the commission of this crime.

"But when Judas, who attended the whole trial, saw that it turned out quite contrary to his expectations, that Jesus was capitally convicted by the council as a false Christ and false prophet, notwithstanding he had openly avowed himself, and that he wrought no miracle, either for their conviction or for his own deliverance, as Judas well knew he could, even from the circumstance of healing Malchus, after he was apprehended; when he further reflected, like Peter, on his master's merciful forewarnings of his treachery, and mild and gentle rebuke at the commission of it; he was seized with remorse, and offered to return the paltry bribe of thirty pieces of silver to the chief priests and elders instantly on the spot, saying, 'I sinned in delivering up innocent blood;' and expected that on this they would have desisted from the prosecution. But they were obstinate, and not only would not relent, but threw the whole load of guilt upon him, refusing to take their own share; for they said, 'What is that to us? see thou to that;' thus, according to the aphorism, loving the treason, but hating the traitor, after he had served their wicked turn. Stung to the quick at their refusal to take back the money, while they condemned himself, he went to the temple, cast down the whole sum in the treasury, or place for receiving the offerings of the people; and, after he had thus returned the wages of iniquity, he retired to some lonely place, not far, perhaps, from the scene of Peter's repentance; and, in the frenzy of despair, and at the instigation of the devil, hanged himself; crowning with suicide the murder of his master and his friend; rejecting his compassionate Savior, and plunging his own soul into perdition! In another place it is said that, 'falling headlong, he burst asunder, and all his bowels gushed out.' Acts 1: 18. Both these accounts might be true: he might first have hanged himself from some tree on the edge of a precipice; and, the rope or branch breaking, he might be dashed to pieces by the fall."

It will, however, be recollected, that the only key which the evangelic narrative affords, is, Judas' covetousness; which passion was, in him, a growing one. It was this which destroyed whatever of honest intention he might at first have in following Jesus; and when fully under its influence he would be blinded by it to all but the glittering object of the reward of iniquity. In such a mind there could be no true faith, and no love; what wonder then, when avarice was in him a ruling and unrestrained passion, that he should betray his Lord? Still it may be admitted that the knowledge which Judas had of our Lord's miraculous power, might lead him the more readily to put him into the hands of the chief priests. He might suppose that he would deliver himself out of their hands; and thus Judas attempted to play a double villainy, against Christ and against his employers.

It has been disputed whether Judas was present at the Lord's supper; but there is really no ground to suppose it. He went out during the paschal supper, but the eucharist was not instituted till after the paschal supper had been concluded; and the last action of that supper was what gave opportunity to the institution of the new rite. To suppose that Jesus would give to Judas the sacramental cup in token of his blood "shed for the remission of sins"—of sins which Judas had traitorously committed, or which he designed traitorously to commit, is to trifle with this most solemn of subjects.

Some of the fathers seem to speak favorably of Judas' repentance; others justly think it defective and unprofitable, since it only led him to despair. Origen and Theophylact, writing on Matthew, say, that Judas, seeing his master was condemned, and that he could not obtain pardon from him in this life, made haste to get the start of him, and wait for him in the other world, in order to beg mercy of him there! Some in our day seem to adopt this Origenian fancy, in the very face of the Scriptures which affirm that he was "the son of perdition," and "went to his own place," and that "it had been good for him that he had not been born." The original term employed is not the one used to designate true evangelical repentance. See Campbell's Sixth Dissertation.—Watson; Calmet.

JUDAS, or JUDE, surnamed Barsabas, was sent from Jerusalem, with Paul and Barnabas, to the church at Antioch, to report the resolution of the apostles at Jerusalem, concerning the non-observance of the law by the Gentiles, (Acts 15: 22, 23.) A. D. 54. Some think, that this Judas was the brother of Joseph, surnamed also Barsabas, who was proposed, with Matthias, to fill up the place of the traitor Judas, Acts 1: 23. Luke says that Judas Barsabas was a prophet, and one of the chief among the brethren; and it is also believed that he was one of the seventy disciples.—Calmet.

JUDE, (EPISTLE OF;) a canonical book of the New Testament, written against the heretics, who, by their impious doctrines and disorderly lives, corrupted the faith and good morals of Christians. The author of this epistle, called Judas, and also Thaddeus and Lebheus, was one of the twelve apostles; he was the son of Alpheus, brother of James the Less, and one of those who were called our Lord's brethren. We are not informed when, or how, he was called to be an apostle; but it has been conjectured, that, before his vocation to the apostleship, he was an husbandman, that he was married, and that he had children. The only account we have of him in particular, is that which occurs in John 14: 21—23. It is not unreasonable to suppose that, after having received, in common with other apostles, extraordinary gifts at the Pentecost, he preached the gospel for some time in several parts of the land of Israel, and wrought miracles in the name of Christ. And, as his life seems to have been prolonged, it is probable that he afterwards left Judea, and went abroad preaching the gospel to Jews and Gentiles in other countries. Some have said that he preached in Arabia, Syria, Mesopotamia, and Persia; and that he suffered martyrdom in the last-mentioned country. But we have no account of his travels upon which we can rely; and it may be questioned whether he was a martyr.

In the early ages of Christianity, several rejected the epistle of St. Jude, supposing the apocryphal books of Enoch, and the ascension of Moses, are quoted in it. Nevertheless, it is to be found in all the ancient catalogues of the sacred writings; and Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, and Origen quote it as written by Jude, and reckon it among the books of sacred Scripture. In the time of Eusebius it was generally received. As to the objections that have been urged against its authority, Dr. Lardner suggests, that there is no necessity for supposing that St. Jude quoted a book called Enoch, or Enoch's prophecies; and even allowing that he did quote it, he gives it no authority; it was no canonical book of the Jews; and if such a book existed among the Jews, it was apocryphal, and yet there might be in it some right things.

Instead of referring to a book called the "Assumption or Ascension of Moses," which probably was a forgery much later than his time, it is much more credible that St. Jude refers to the vision in Zech. 3: 1—3. It has been the opinion of several writers, and, among others, of Hammond and Benson, that St. Jude addressed his epistle to the Jewish Christians; but Dr. Lardner infers, from the words of the inscription of the epistle, (verses 1, 3.) that it was designed for the use of all in general who had embraced the Christian religion. The last-mentioned author supposes that this epistle was written A. D. 64, 65, or 66.—Calmet; Watson.

JUDEA; a province of Asia, successively called Canaan, Palestine, the Land of Promise, the Land of Israel, and Judea, after the Jews returned from the Babylonish captivity; because then the tribe of Judah was the principal; the territories belonging to the other tribes being possessed by the Samaritans, Idumeans, Arabians, and Philistines. (See CANAAN.) The Jews, when returned from the captivity, settled about Jerusalem, and in Judah, from whence they spread over the whole country.

Judea may be considered as divided into four parts: (1.) The western district, Palestine, inhabited by the Philistines; on the east of this, (2.) The mountainous district, called the hill country, (Josh. 21: 11. Luke 1: 39.) which the rabbins affect to call the king's mountain; whether, because on the northern part of this ridge Jerusalem is situated, or for any other reason, is not known. East of these mountains was, (3.) The wilderness of Judea, along the shore of the Dead sea; (4.) The valleys, &c. west of Jerusalem, towards the Mediterranean. Judea no doubt derived its name from Judah, which tribe was settled in the south of the land, and maintained its kingdom after the northern tribes had been expatriated. This circumstance, together with that of Judah being principally peopled with the Israelites, after the return from the captivity, and being first settled, on account of the temple being established in it, accounts for the general name of Jews being given to the Hebrew nation. Judea was one of the principal divisions of the Holy Land in the days of Christ: it included from the Mediterranean sea west, to the Dead sea east, and was bounded north by Samaria, and south by Edom, or the Desert. It is extremely mountainous in some parts, as from Hebron to Jerusalem. West of these mountains is the principal extent of country; but this has many hills. East of them running along the course of the Jordan, is

THE WILDERNESS OF JUDEA. Here John Baptist first taught, (Matt. 3: 1.) and Christ was tempted; probably towards the north of it, not far from Jericho. Some parts of it were not absolutely barren or uninhabited; of other parts the following descriptions are, we believe, very accurate. Dr. Carlyle, who visited the monastery of St. Saba, which stands in this wilderness, says, "The valley of St. Saba is an immense chasm in a rided mountain of marble. It is not only destitute of trees, but of every other species of vegetation; and its sole inhabitants, except the wretched monks in the convent, are eagles, tigers, and wild Arabs."

Chateaubriand says, "I doubt whether any convent can be situated in a more dreary and desolate spot than the monastery of St. Saba. As we advanced, the aspect of the mountains continued the same; that is, white, dusty, without shade, without tree, without herbage, without moss." Mr. Buckingham, who visited the same part in 1816, says, "As we proceeded to the northward, we had on our left a lofty peak of the range of hills which border the plain of the Jordan on the west, and ended in this direction the mountains of Judea. This peak is considered to be that to which Jesus was transported by the devil during his fast of forty days in the wilderness: 'after which he was an hungered.' Nothing can be more forbidding than the aspect of these hills; not a blade of verdure is to be seen over all their surface, and not the sound of any living being is to be heard throughout all their extent." A most appropriate scene for the temptation of the Son of God, where he is said to have dwelt with the wild beasts, and where also "the angels ministered unto him."

There are several medals of Judea extant, representing a woman (the daughter of Zion) sitting under a palm-tree, in a mournful attitude; and having around her a heap of arms, shields, &c. on which she is seated. The inscription is, JUDEA CAPTA. S. C.

This may remind us of the captives in Babylon, who "sat down and wept." "But what is more remarkable," says Mr. Addison, "we find Judea represented as a woman in sorrow, sitting on the ground, in a passage of the prophet which foretells the very captivity recorded on these medals." See Isa. 3: 26. 47: 1.—Watson, Calnet.

JUDGES, (shopetim.) governed the Israelites from Joshua to Saul. The Carthaginians, a colony of the Tyrians, had likewise governors, whom they called Suffetes, or Sopherim, with authority like those of the Hebrews, almost equal to that of kings. Some are of opinion, that the archontes among the Athenians, and dictators among the Romans, were similar to the judges among the Hebrews. Grotius compares the government of the Hebrews under the judges, to that of Gaul, Germany, and Britain, before the Romans changed it. This office was not hereditary among the Israelites; they were no more than God's vicegerents. When the Hebrews desired a king, God said to Samuel, "They have not rejected thee, but they have rejected me, that I should not reign over them," 1 Sam. 8: 7. See also Judg. 8: 23.

Salian remarks seven points wherein they differed from kings: 1. They were not hereditary. 2. They had no absolute power of life and death, but only according to the laws, and dependently upon them. 3. They never undertook war at their own pleasure, but only when they were commanded by God, or called to it by the people. 4. They exacted no tribute. 5. They did not succeed each other immediately, but after the death of one there was frequently an interval of several years before a successor was appointed. 6. They did not use the ensigns of sovereignty, the sceptre or diadem. 7. They had no authority to make any laws, but were only to take care of the observance of those of Moses. Godwin, in his "Moses and Aaron," compares them to the Roman dictators, who were appointed only on extraordinary emergencies, as in case of war abroad, or conspiracies at home, and whose power, while they continued in office, was great, and even absolute. Thus the Hebrew judges seem to have been appointed only in cases of national trouble and danger. This was the case particularly with respect to Othniel, Ehud, and Gideon. The power of the judges, while in office, was very great: nor does it seem to have been limited to a certain time, like that of the Roman dictators, which continued for half a year; nevertheless, it is reasonable to suppose, that, when they had performed the business for which they were appointed, they retired to a private life. This Godwin infers from Gideon's refusing to take upon him the perpetual government of Israel, as being inconsistent with the theocracy. (See GOVERNMENT, &c.)

Besides these superior judges, every city in the commonwealth had its elders, who formed a court of judicature, with a power of determining lesser matters in their respective districts. (See JUSTICE, ADMINISTRATION OF.)—Calnet; Watson.

JUDGES, (THE BOOK OF,) is by some ascribed to Phinehas, by others to Ezra, or to Hezekiah, and by others to Samuel, or to all the judges, who wrote each the history of his time and judicature. But it appears to be the work of one author, who lived after the time of the judges; and he is generally thought to be Samuel, for the following reasons:—(1.) The author lived at a time when the Jebusites were masters of Jerusalem, and consequently before David, Judg. 1: 21. (2.) It appears that the Hebrew commonwealth was then governed by kings, since the author observes, in several places, that at such a time there was no king in Israel.

There are considerable difficulties, however, against this opinion, as Judg. 18: 30, 31. "And the children of Dan made Jonathan and his sons priests in the tribe of Dan, until the day of the captivity of the land. And they set them up Micah's graven image, which he made, all the time that the house of God was in Shiloh." Now, the tabernacle or house of God was not at Shiloh till about the time of Samuel's first appearance as a prophet; for then it was brought from Shiloh and carried to the camp, where it was taken by the Philistines: and after this time it was sent back to Kirjath-jearim, 1 Sam. 4: 4, 5, &c. 6: 21. As to the captivity of the tribe of Dan, it can scarcely, one would think, be understood of any other than that under Tiglath-pileser, many hundred years after Samuel, and consequently he could not write this book; unless it be supposed that this passage has been added since, perhaps under the inspired hand of Ezra.—Calnet.

JUDGE; to try and determine a cause, Exod. 18: 13. Christ does not judge according to the seeing of the eye, or hearing of the ear; that is, does not esteem persons or things, or give sentence merely according to outward appearances, Isa. 11: 3. Saints judge the world—judge angels; they now condemn the wickedness of the world, by their holy profession and practice; at the last day, they shall assent to the sentences of damnation pronounced against wicked angels and men, 1 Cor. 6: 2. The saints are judged according to men in the flesh, and live according to God in the spirit, when they are outwardly corrected for their sins, or persecuted by wicked men, and yet inwardly live a life of fellowship with God, 1 Pet. 4: 6. Men become judges of evil thoughts when, in a partial manner, they prefer one person to another, Jam. 2: 4.—Brown.

JUDGING, (Rasu); the act of carelessly, precipitately, wantonly, or maliciously censuring others.

This is an evil which abounds too much among almost all classes of men. "Not contented with being in the right ourselves, we must find all others in the wrong. We claim an exclusive possession of goodness and wisdom; and from approving warmly of those who join us, we proceed to condemn, with much acrimony, not only the principles, but the characters of those from whom we differ. We rashly extend to every individual the severe opinion which we have unwarrantably conceived of a whole body. This man is of a party whose principles we reckon slavish; and therefore his whole sentiments are corrupted. That man belongs to a religious sect, which we are accustomed to deem bigoted, and therefore he is incapable of any generous and liberal thought. Another is connected with a sect, which we have been taught to account relaxed, and therefore he can have no sanctity."

We should do well to consider, 1. That this practice of rash judging is absolutely forbidden in the sacred Scriptures, Matt. 7: 1.—2. We thereby authorize others to re-quire us in the same kind.—3. It often evidences our pride, envy, and bigotry.—4. It argues a want of charity, the distinguishing feature of the Christian religion.—5. They who are most forward in censuring others are often most defective themselves. Barrow's Works, vol. i. ser. 20; Blair's Ser., vol. ii. ser. 10; Saurin's Ser., vol. v. ser. 4. (See EVIL SPEAKING.)—Hend. Buck.

JUDGMENT, is that act of the mind whereby one thing is affirmed or denied of another; or that power of the soul which passes sentence on things proposed to its examination, and determines what is right or wrong; and thus it approves or disapproves of an action, or an object considered as true or false, fit or unfit, good or evil.

Dr. Watts gives us the following directions to assist us in judging right. 1. We should examine all our old opinions afresh, and inquire what was the ground of them, and whether our assent were built on just evidence; and then we should cast off all those judgments which were formed heretofore without due examination. 2. All our ideas of objects concerning which we pass judgment, should be clear, distinct, complete, comprehensive, extensive, and orderly. 3. When we have obtained as-clear ideas as we can, both of the subject and predicate of a proposition, then we must compare those ideas of the subject and predicate together with the utmost attention, and observe how far they agree, and wherein they differ. 4. We must search for evidence of truth with diligence and honesty, and be heartily ready to receive evidence, whether for the agreement or disagreement of ideas. 5. We must suspend our judgment, and neither affirm nor deny until this evidence appear. 6. We must judge of every proposition by those proper and peculiar means or mediums whereby the evidence of it is to be obtained, whether it be sense, consciousness, intelligence, reason, or testimony. 7. It is very useful to have some general principles of truth settled in the mind, whose evidence is great and obvious, that they may be always ready at hand to assist us in judging of the great variety of things which occur. 8. Let the degrees of our assent to every proposition bear an exact proportion to the different degrees of evidence. 9. We should keep our minds always open to receive truth, and never set limits to our own improvements. Watts' Logic, ch. iv. p. 231; Locke on the Understanding, vol. i. pp. 222, 256; vol. ii. pp. 271, 278; Hedge and Duncan's Logic; Reid on the Intellectual Powers, p. 497, &c.; Gambier on Moral Evidence; Upham's Philosophy.—*Hend. JUDGMENT, (DAY OF,) is that important period which shall terminate the present dispensation of grace towards the fallen race of Adam, put an end to time, and introduce the eternal destinies of men and angels, Acts 16: 31. 1 Cor. 15: 24—26. 1 Thess. 4: 14—17. Matt. 25: 31—46. It is in reference to this solemn period that the apostle Peter says, "The heavens and the earth which now exist are by the word of God reserved in store unto fire, against the day of judgment, and perdition of ungodly men," 2 Pet. 3: 7. (See PETER, EPISTLES OF.)

Some commentators understand this prophecy as a prediction of the destruction of Jerusalem. In support of their interpretation, they appeal to the ancient Jewish prophecies, where, as they contend, the revolutions in the political state of empires and nations are foretold in the same forms of expression with those introduced in Peter's prediction. The following are the prophecies to which they appeal:—Isaiah 34: 4, where the destruction of Idumea is foretold under the figures of dissolving the host of heaven, and of rolling the heaven together as a scroll, and of the falling down of all their host as the leaf falleth off from the vine. Ezek. 32: 7, where the destruction of Egypt is described by the figures of covering the heaven, and making the stars thereof dark; and of covering the sun with a cloud, and of hindering the moon from giving her light. In Joel 2: 10, the invasion of Judea by foreign armies is thus foretold: "The earth shall quake before them; the heavens shall tremble; the sun and the moon shall be dark, and the stars shall withdraw their shining." And in verses 30, 31, the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans is thus predicted: "I will show wonders in the heavens and in the earth, blood, and fire, and pillars of smoke. The sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood, before the great and terrible day of the Lord come." God, threatening the Jews, is introduced saying, "In that day I will cause the sun to go down at noon, and I will darken the earth in the clear day," Amos 8: 9. The overthrow of Judaism and heathenism is thus foretold: "Yet once and I will shake the heavens and the earth, and the sea and the dry land," Haggai 2: 6. Lastly: our Lord, in his prophecy of the destruction of Jerusalem, has the following expressions: "After the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of heaven shall be shaken," Matt. 24: 29.

Now it is remarkable that, in these prophecies, none of the prophets have spoken, as Peter has done, of the entire destruction of this mundane system, nor of the destruction of any part thereof. They mention only the rolling of the heavens together as a scroll, the obscuring of the light of the sun and of the moon, the shaking of the heavens and the earth, and the falling down of the stars: whereas Peter speaks of the utter destruction of all the parts of this mundane system by fire. This difference affords room for believing that the events foretold by the prophets are different in their nature from those foretold by the apostle; and that they are to be figuratively understood, while those predicted by the apostle are to be understood literally. To this conclusion, likewise, the phraseology of the prophets, compared with that of the apostle, evidently leads: for the prophetic phraseology, literally interpreted, exhibits impossibilities; such as the rolling of the heavens together as a scroll; the turning of the moon into blood, and the falling down of the stars from heaven as the leaf of a tree. Not so the apostolic phraseology: for the burning of the heavens, or atmosphere, and its passing away with a great noise; and the burning of the earth and the works thereon, together with the burning and melting of the elements, that is, the constituent parts of which this terrene globe is composed; are all things possible, and therefore may be literally understood; while the things mentioned by the prophets can only be taken figuratively. This, however, is not all. There are things in the apostle's prophecy which show that he intended it to be taken literally. As, 1. He begins with an account of the perishing of the old world, to demonstrate against the scoffers the possibility of the perishing of the present heavens and earth. But that example would not have suited his purpose, unless by the burning of the present heavens and earth, he had meant the destruction of the material fabric. Wherefore, the opposition stated in this prophecy between the perishing of the old world by water, and the perishing of the present world by fire, shows that the latter is to be as real a destruction of the material fabric as the former was. 2. The circumstance of the present heavens and earth being treasured up and kept, ever since the first deluge, from all after deluges, in order to their being destroyed by fire at the day of judgment, shows, we think, that the apostle is speaking of a real, and not of a metaphorical, destruction of the heavens and earth. 3. This appears, likewise, from the apostle's foretelling that, after the present heavens and earth are burned, new heavens and a new earth are to appear, in which the righteous are forever to dwell. 4. The time fixed by the apostle for the burning of the heavens and the earth, namely, the day of judgment, and punishment of ungodly men, shows that the apostle is speaking, not of the destruction of a single city or nation during the subsistence of the world, but of the earth itself, with all the wicked who have dwelt thereon. These circumstances persuade us that this prophecy, as well as the one recorded in 2 Thess. 1: 9, is not to be interpreted metaphorically of the destruction of Jerusalem; but should be understood literally of the general judgment, and of the destruction of our mundane system.

I. The proofs of a general judgment are these:—
1. The justice of God requires it; for it is evident that this attribute is not clearly displayed in the dispensation of things in the present state, 2 Thess. 1: 6, 7. Luke 14: 26. 2. The accusations of natural conscience are testimonies in favor of this belief, Rom. 2: 1—15. Dan. 5: 5, 6. Acts 24: 25. 3. It may be concluded, from the relation men stand in to God, as creatures to a Creator. He has a right to give them a law, and to make them accountable for the breach of it, Rom. 14: 12. 4. The resurrection of Christ is a certain proof of it. See Acts 17: 31. Rom. 14: 9. 5. The Scripture, in a variety of places, sets it beyond all doubt, Jude 14, 15. 2 Cor. 5: 10. Matt. 25. Rom. 14: 10, 11. 2 Thess. 1: 7, 10. 1 Thess. 4: 16, 17. Rom. 2: 1—16. 3: 6. Acts 24: 25.

II. As to the Judge.—The Bible declares that God will judge the world by Jesus Christ, Acts 17: 31. The triune God will be the Judge, as to original authority, power, and right of judgment; but, according to the economy settled between the three divine persons, the work is assigned to the Son, (Rom. 14: 9, 10.) who will appear in his human nature; (John 5: 27. Acts 17: 31.) with great power and glory; (1 Thess. 4: 16, 17.) visible to every eye; (Rev. 1: 7.) penetrating every heart; (1 Cor. 4: 5. Rom. 2: 16.) with full authority over all; (Matt. 28: 18.) and acting with strict justice, 2 Tim. 4: 8. As for the concern of others in the judgment, angels will be no otherwise concerned than as attendants, gathering the elect, raising the dead, &c., but not as advising or judging. Saints are said to judge the world, not as co-judges with Christ, but as approvers of his sentence, and as their holy lives and conversations will rise up in judgment against their wicked neighbors.

III. As to the beings that will be judged; these will be men and devils. The righteous, probably, will be tried first, as represented in Matt. 25. They will be raised first, though not a thousand years before the rest, as Dr. Gill supposes; since the resurrection of all the bodies of the saints is spoken of as in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump, in order to their meeting the Lord in the air, and being with him, not on earth, but forever in heaven, 1 Cor. 15: 52. 1 Thess. 4: 16, 17.

Here we may take notice of a question which is proposed by some, viz. Whether the sins of God's people shall be published in the great day, though it is certain they shall not be alleged against them to their condemnation? The objections urged against this are of little weight. It seems indispensable that the sins of believers, though forgiven, should be made manifest, that so the glory of that grace which has pardoned them may appear more illustrious, and their obligation to God for this farther enhanced. 2. The justice of the proceedings of that day requires it, since it is presumed and known by the whole world that they were prone to sin, as well as others; and, before conversion, as great sinners as any, and after it their sins had a peculiar aggravation. Therefore, why should they not be made public, as a glory due to the justice and boliness of God, whose nature is opposite to all sin? And, 3. This is necessary, because their sins are often connected with those of others. Moreover, 4. Since God, by recording the sins of his saints in Scripture, has perpetuated the knowledge thereof; and if it is to their honor that the sins there mentioned were repented of, as well as forgiven, why may it not be supposed that the sins of believers shall be made known in the great day? And, Lastly, this alone seems agreeable to those expressions of every word, every work, and every secret thing, being brought into judgment, whether it be good or whether it be bad, 2 Cor. 4: 10, 11. 1 Cor. 4: 1—5.

As to the wicked, they also shall be judged, and all their thoughts, words, and deeds be brought into judgment, Eccl. 12: 14. The fallen angels, also, are said to be reserved unto the judgment of the great day, Jude 6. They shall then receive their final sentence, and be shut up in the prison of hell, Rev. 20: 10. Matt. 8: 29.

IV. As to the rule of judgment:—we are informed the books will be opened, Rev. 20: 12. 1. The book of divine omniscience, (Mal. 3: 5.) or remembrance, Mal. 3: 16. 2. The book of conscience, Rom. 1: 15. 3. The book of Providence, Rom. 2: 4, 5. 4. The book of Revelation, law, and gospel, John 12: 48. Rom. 2: 16. 2: 12. 5. The book of Life, in which the names of the justified are enrolled, Luke 10: 20. Rev. 3: 5. 20: 12, 15.

V. As to the time of judgment:—the soul will be either happy or miserable immediately after death, but the general judgment will not be till after the resurrection, Heb. 6: 2. 9: 27. 2 Tim. 4: 1. There is a day appointed, (Acts 17: 31.) but it is unknown to men, 2 Thes. 2: 1—14.

VI. As to the place:—this is of no consequence, when compared with the state in which we shall appear. And as the Scriptures represent it as certain; (Eccl. 11: 9.) universal; (2 Cor. 5: 11.) righteous; (Rom. 2: 5.) decisive; (1 Cor. 15: 52.) and eternal as to its consequences; (Heb. 6: 2.) let us be concerned for the welfare of our immortal interests, flee to the refuge set before us, improve our precious time, depend on the merits of the Redeemer, and adhere to the dictates of the divine word, that we may be found of him in peace, 2 Pet. 3: 14.

“It is appointed unto men once to die, and after this the judgment.” These two events are inseparably linked together in the divine decree, and they reciprocally reflect importance on each other. Death is, indeed, the terror of our nature. Men may contrive to keep it from their thoughts, but they cannot think of it without fearful apprehensions of its consequences. It was justly to be dreaded by man in his state of innocence; and to the un-renewed man it ever was, and ever will be, a just object of abhorrence. The gospel of Jesus Christ, which has brought life and immortality to light, is the only sovereign antidote against this universal evil. To the believer in Christ, its rough aspect is smoothed, and its terrors cease to be alarming. To him it is the messenger of peace; its sting is plucked out; its dark valley is the road to perfect bliss and life immortal. To him, “to live is Christ, and to die is gain,” Phil. 1: 21. To die! Speaking properly, he cannot die, John 6: 47—58. 8: 51. 11: 26. Rev. 2: 11. He has already died in Christ, and with him: his “life is hid with Christ in God,” Rom. 6: 8. Col. 3: 3.

With this conquest of the fear of death is nearly allied another glorious privilege resulting from union with the Redeemer; that, when he shall appear, we may have confidence, and “not be ashamed before him at his coming,” 1 John 2: 28. 4: 16. Were death all that we have to dread, death might be braved. But after death there is a judgment, a judgment attended with circumstances so tremendous, as to shake the hearts of the boldest of the sons of nature. Then “men shall seek death, and shall not find it; and shall desire to die, and death shall flee from them,” Rev. 9: 6. Then shall come indeed an awful day; a day to which all that have preceded it are intended to be subservient; when the Lord shall appear in the united splendor of creating, of governing, and of judicial majesty, to finish his purposes respecting man and earth, and to pronounce the final, irreversible sentence, “It is done!” Rev. 21: 6. Nothing of terror or magnificence hitherto beheld,—no glory of the rising sun after a night of darkness and of storm,—no convulsions of the earth,—no wide irruption of waters,—no flaming comet dragging its burning train over half the heaven, can convey to us an adequate conception of that day of terrible brightness and irresistible devastation. Creation then shall be uncreated. “The heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat; the earth, also, and the works that are therein, shall be burnt up,” 2 Pet. 3: 10. The Lord shall be revealed from heaven in flaming fire, (2 Thess. 1: 7, 8.) arrayed in all the glory of his Godhead, and attended by his mighty angels, Matt. 16: 27. 25: 31. All that are in the grave shall hear his voice, and shall come forth, John 5: 28, 29. Earth and sea shall give up the dead which are in them. All that ever lived shall appear before him, Rev. 20: 12, 13. The judgment shall sit; and the books shall be opened, Dan. 7: 10. The eye of Omniscience detects every concealment by which they would screen from observation themselves, or their iniquity. The last reluctant sinner is finally separated from the congregation of the righteous; (Ps. 1: 5.) and inflexible justice, so often disregarded, derided, and defied, gives forth their eternal doom! But to the saints this shall be a day of glory and honor. They shall be publicly acknowledged by God as his people; publicly justified from the slanders of the world; invested with immortal bodies; presented by Christ to the Father; and admitted into the highest felicity in the immediate presence of God forever. These are the elevating, the transporting views, which made the apostle Paul speak with so much desire and earnest expectation of “the day of Christ.” Bates’ Works, p. 449; Bishop Hopkins and Stoddard on the Last Judgment; Gill’s Body of Divinity, vol. ii. p. 467, 8vo.; Boston’s Fourfold State; Davies’ Sermons; Paley’s Works; Herey’s Works; Faller’s Works, vol. ii. pp. 78, 106, 152, 211, 367, 392, 437, 841, 859, 871, 883, 906; Dwight’s Theology; Irvine’s Argument for Judgment to come; Payson’s Sermons; Massillon’s do.; Saurin’s do.; *Nat. JUDGMENTS OF GOD, are the punishments inflicted by him for particular crimes. The Scriptures give us many awful instances of the display of divine justice in the punishment of nations, families, and individuals, for their iniquities. See Gen. 7: 19—25. Exod. 15. Judg. 1: 6, 7. Acts 12: 23. Esther 5: 14, with chap. 7: 10. 2 Kings 11. Lev. 10: 1, 2. Acts 5: 1—10. Is. 30: 1—5. 1 Sam. 15: 9. 1 Kings 12: 25, 33. It becomes us, however, to be exceedingly cautious how we interpret the severe and afflictive dispensations of Providence, in the present world.

Dr. Jortin justly observes, that there is usually much rashness and presumption in pronouncing that the calamities of sinners are particular judgments of God; yet, saith he, if from sacred and profane, from ancient and modern historians, a collection were made of all the cruel, persecuting tyrants, who delighted in tormenting their fellow-creatures, and who died not the common death of all men, but whose plagues were horrible and strange, even a sceptic would be moved at the evidence, and would be apt to suspect that it was thicon ti, that the hand of God was in it. As Dr. Jortin was no enthusiast, and one who would not overstrain the point, we shall here principally follow him in his enumeration of some of the most remarkable instances.

Herod the Great was the first persecutor of Christianity. He attempted to destroy Jesus Christ himself, while he was yet but a child, and for that wicked purpose slew all the male children that were in and about Bethlehem. What was the consequence? Josephus hath told us: he had long and grievous sufferings, a burning fever, a vora-scious appetite, a difficulty of breathing, swellings of his limbs, loathsome ulcers within and without, breeding vermin, violent torments and convulsions, so that he endeavored to kill himself, but was restrained by his friends. The Jews thought these evils to be divine judgments upon him for his wickedness. And what is still more remarkable in his case is, he left a numerous family of children and grandchildren, though he had put some to death; and yet, in about the space of one hundred years, the whole family was extinct.

Herod Antipas, who beheaded John the Baptist, and treated Christ contemptuously when he was brought before him, was defeated by Aretas, an Arabian king, and afterwards had his dominions taken from him, and was sent into banishment along with his infamous wife, Herodias, by the emperor Caius.

Herod Agrippa killed James, the brother of John, and put Peter in prison. The angel of the Lord soon after smote him, and he was eaten of worms, and gave up the ghost.

Judas, that betrayed our Lord, died, by his own hands, the most ignominious of all deaths.

Pontius Pilate, who condemned our blessed Savior to death, was not long afterwards deposed from his office, banished from his country, and died by his own hands; the divine vengeance overtaking him soon after his crime.

The high-priest Caiaphas was deposed by Vitellius, three years after the death of Christ. Thus this wicked man, who condemned Christ for fear of disobliging the Romans, was ignominiously turned out of his office by the Roman governor, whom he had sought to oblige.

Ananias, the high-priest, persecuted Paul, and insolently ordered the by-standers to smite him on the mouth. Upon which the apostle said, "God shall smite thee, thou whited wall." Whether he spake this prophetically or not, let the event determine; for certain it is, that some time after he was slain, together with his brother, by the hands of his own son.

Ananus, the high-priest, slew James the Less; for which and other outrages he was deposed by king Agrippa the younger, and probably perished in the last destruction of Jerusalem.

Nero, in the year 64, turned his rage upon the Christians, and put to death Peter and Paul, with many others. Four years after, in his great distress, he attempted to kill himself; but being as mean-spirited and dastardly as he was wicked and cruel, he had not the resolution to do that piece of justice to the world, and was forced to beg assistance.

Domitian persecuted the Christians also. It is said he threw John into a caldron of boiling oil, and afterwards banished him into the isle of Patmos. In the following year this monster of wickedness was murdered by his own people.

The Jewish nation persecuted, rejected, and crucified the Lord of Glory. Within a few years after, their nation was destroyed, and the Lord made their plagues wonderful.

Flaccus was governor of Egypt near the time of our Savior's death, and a violent persecutor of the Jews. The wrath of God, however, ere long overtook him, and he died by the hands of violence.

Catullus was governor of Lybia, about the year 73. He was also a cruel persecutor of the Jews, and he died miserably. For though he was only turned out of his office by the Romans, yet he fell into a complicated and incurable disease, being sorely tormented both in body and mind. He was dreadfully terrified, and continually crying out that he was haunted by the ghosts of those whom he had murdered; and, not being able to contain himself, he leaped out of his bed, as if he were tortured with fire and put to the rack. His distemper increased till his entrails were all corrupted, and came out of his body; and thus he perished, as signal an example as ever was known of the divine justice rendering to the wicked according to their deeds.

Caius, the Roman emperor, was a great persecutor of the Jews and Christians, and a blasphemer of the God of heaven. Soon after his atrocities, however, he was murdered by one of his own people.

Severus, emperor of Rome, was a violent and cruel persecutor of the followers of Christ. He also, and all his family, perished miserably, about the year 200 after our Savior.

About the same time, Saturninus, governor of Africa, persecuted the Christians, and put several of them to death. Soon after, he went blind.

Heliogabalus, the emperor, brought a new god to Rome, and would needs compel all his subjects to worship him. This was sure to have ended in a persecution of the Christians. But, soon after, this vile monster was slain by his own soldiers, about the year 222.

Claudius Herminianus was a cruel persecutor of the Christians in the second century, and he was eaten of worms while he lived.

Decius persecuted the church about the year 250: he was soon after killed in battle.

Gallus succeeded and continued the persecution. He, too, was killed the year following.

Valerian, the emperor, had many good qualities; but yet he was an implacable enemy to the Lord Jesus Christ and his gospel. Some time after he came to the throne, he was taken prisoner by Sapor, king of Persia, and used like a slave and a dog; for the Persian monarch, from time to time, obliged this unhappy emperor to bow himself down, and offer him his back, on which to set his foot, in order to mount his chariot or his horse. He died in this miserable state of captivity.

Æmilian, governor of Egypt, about 263, was a virulent persecutor of the church of Christ. He was soon after strangled by order of the emperor.

Aurelian, the emperor, just intending to begin a persecution against the followers of Christ, was killed in the year 274.

Maximinus was a persecutor of the church. He reigned only three years, and then fell under the hands of violence.

About the year 300, was the greatest possible contest between Christ and the Roman emperors, which should have the dominion. These illustrious wretches seemed determined to blot out the Christian race and name from under heaven. The persecution was far more fierce and brutal than it had ever been. It was time, therefore, for the Lord Jesus Christ, the great Head of the church, to arise and plead his own cause; and so, indeed, he did. The examples we have mentioned are dreadful: those that follow are not less astonishing, and they are all delivered upon the best authorities.

Diocletian persecuted the church in 303. After this nothing ever prospered with him. He underwent many troubles: his senses became impaired; and he quitted the empire.

Severus, another persecuting emperor, was overthrown and put to death in the year 307.

About the same time Urbanus, governor of Palestine, who had signalized himself by tormenting and destroying the disciples of Jesus, met with his due reward; for almost immediately after the cruelties committed, the divine vengeance overtook him. He was unexpectedly degraded and deprived of all his honors; and, dejected, dispirited, and meanly begging for mercy, was put to death by the same hand that raised him.

Firmilianus, another persecuting governor, met with the same fate.

Maximianus Herculeus, another of the wretched persecuting emperors, was compelled to hang himself, in the year 310.

Maximianus Galerius, of all the tyrants of his time the most cruel, was seized with a grievous and horrible disease, and tormented with worms and ulcers to such a degree, that they who were ordered to attend him could not bear the stench. Worms proceeded from his body in a most fearful manner; and several of his physicians were put to death because they could not endure the smell, and others because they could not cure him. This happened in the year of our Lord 311.

Maxentius, another of the inhuman monsters, was overthrown in battle by Constantine; and in his flight he fell into the Tiber, and was drowned in the year 312.

Maximianus put out the eyes of many thousands of Christians. Soon after the commission of his cruelties, a disease arose among his people, which greatly affected their eyes, and took away their sight. He himself died miserably, and upon the rack, his eyes starting out of his head through the violence of his distemper, in the year 313. All his family likewise were destroyed, his wife and children put to death, together with most of his friends and dependents, who had been the instruments of his cruelty.

A Roman officer, to oblige this Maximinus, greatly oppressed the church at Damascus: not long after, he destroyed himself.

Licinius, the last of these persecuting emperors before Constantine, was conquered and put to death in the year 323. He was equally an enemy to religion, liberty, and learning.

Cyril, the deacon, was murdered by some pagans, at Heliopolis, for his opposition to their images. They ripped open his belly, and ate his liver: the divine vengeance, however, pursued all those who had been guilty of this crime; and their teeth came out, their tongues rotted, and they lost their sight.

Valens was made emperor in 364; and though an Arian Christian himself, he is said to have caused fourscore presbyters, who differed from him in opinion, to be put to sea, and burnt alive in a ship. Afterwards, in a battle with the Goths, he was defeated and wounded, and fled to a cottage, where he was burnt alive, as most historians relate: all agree that he perished.

The last pagan prince, who was a formidable enemy to Christianity, was Radagaisus, a king of the Goths. He invaded the Roman empire with an army of four hundred thousand men, about the year 405, and vowed to sacrifice all the Romans to his gods. The Romans, however, fought him, and obtained a complete victory, taking him and his sons prisoners, whom they put to death.

Hueneric, the Vandal, though a Christian, was a most cruel persecutor of those who differed from him in opinion, about the year of our Lord 484. He spared not even those of his own persuasion, neither his friends nor his kindred. He reigned, however, not quite eight years, and died with all the marks of divine indignation upon him.

Julian the apostate greatly oppressed the Christians: and he perished soon after, in his rash expedition against the Persians.

Several of those who were employed or permitted by Julian to persecute the Christians, are said to have perished miserably and remarkably. I will here relate the fate of a few of those unhappy wretches in the words of Tilletmont, who faithfully collected the account from the ancients. We have observed, says that learned man, that count Julian, with Felix, superintendent of the finances, and Elpidius, treasurer to the emperor, apostates all three, had received orders to go and seize the effects of the church at Antioch, and carry them to the treasury. They did it on the day of the martyrdom of St. Theodoret, and drew up an account of what they had seized. But count Julian was not content with taking away the sacred vessels of the church, and profaning them by his impure hands: carrying to greater lengths the outrage he was doing to Jesus Christ, he overturned and flung them down on the ground, and sat upon them in a most criminal manner; adding to this all the banter and blasphemies that he could devise against Christ, and against the Christians, who, he said, were abandoned of God.

Felix, the superintendent, signalized himself also by another impity; for as he was viewing the rich and magnificent vessels which the emperors Constantine and Constantius had given to the church, "Behold," said he, "with what plate the son of Mary is served!" It is said, too, that count Julian and he made it the subject of banter, that God should let them thus profane his temple, without interposing by visible miracles.

But these impieties remained not long unpunished, and Julian had no sooner profaned the sacred utensils than he felt the effects of divine vengeance. He fell into a grievous and unknown disease; and his inward parts being corrupted, he cast out his liver and his excrements, not from the ordinary passages, but from his miserable mouth which had uttered so many blasphemies. His secret parts, and all the flesh round about them, corrupted also, and bred worms; and to show that it was a divine punishment, all the art of physicians could give him no relief. In this condition he continued forty days, without speech or sense, preyed on by worms. At length he came to himself again. The imposthumes, however, all over his body, and the worms which gnawed him continually, reduced him to the utmost extremity. He threw them up, without ceasing, the last three days of his life, with a stench which he himself could not bear.

The disease with which God visited Felix was not so long. He burst suddenly in the middle of his body, and died of an effusion of blood in the course of one day.

Elpidius was stripped of his effects in 366, and shut up in prison, where, after having continued for some time, he died without reputation and honor, cursed of all the world, and surnamed the Apostate.

To these instances many more might be added nearer our own times, did our room permit. These, however, are sufficient to show us what a fearful thing it is to fall into the hands of the living God, and how fruitless and awful it is to oppose his designs, and to attempt to stop the progress of his gospel. "Why do the heathen rage, and the people imagine a vain thing? He that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh; the Lord shall have them in derision. Thou shalt break them with a rod of iron; thou shalt dash them to pieces as a potter's vessel. Be wise now, therefore, O ye kings; be instructed, ye judges of the earth. Serve the Lord with fear, and rejoice with trembling." JUDICIUM DEI, or Judgment of God, was a term anciently applied to all extraordinary trials of secret crimes; as those by arms and single combat; and the ordeals, or those by fire, or red hot plough-shares, by plunging the arm in boiling water, or the whole body in cold water, in hopes that God would work a miracle, rather than suffer truth and innocence to perish. These customs were a long time kept up even among Christians, and they are still in use in some nations. Trials of this sort were usually held in churches, in the presence of the bishop, priest, and secular judges, after three days' fasting, confession, communion, and many adjurations and ceremonies, described at large by Du Cange.—Hend. Buck.

JUDSON, (ANN H.,) first female missionary to Burmah, was the daughter of John and Rebecca Hasseltine, of Bradford, Mass., and was born December 22, 1789. In early life she was gay, enterprising, active, and eager for the acquisition of knowledge. At the age of sixteen, she became pious. She was educated at the academy of her native town, where she was adjudged to be the best scholar in the school. She was then remarkably beautiful, and was among many well educated young ladies, of highly respectable families; but she bore her honors so meekly that she was the general favorite. She often adjusted those little disputes which spring up in every seminary, and sometimes, if not settled at once, produce lasting effects.

She married the Rev. Adoniram Judson, appointed a missionary to India, February 5, 1812. In his letter to her father, asking his consent to the marriage, Mr. Judson said—"I have now to ask, whether you can consent to her departure for a heathen land; whether you can consent to her exposure to the dangers of the ocean; to every kind of want and distress; to degradation, insult, persecution, and perhaps a violent death? Can you consent to all this for the sake of Him, who left his heavenly home and died for her and you?"

She was the first American female, who made up her mind to go to India as a missionary. She sailed from Salem, February 19, with Mrs. Harriet Newell, and arrived in June at Calcutta. While there, she and her husband, having on their passage embraced the principles of the Baptists, were baptized, Sept. 6, 1812. As the missionaries were ordered to quit India, she sailed to the isle of France, where, on her arrival, January 17, 1813, she was informed of the death of Mrs. Newell. She proceeded in July to Rangoon, in Burmah. After studying the language several years, Mr. Judson began to preach and to publish tracts in the Burman language. He was also joined by the missionaries, Hough, Colman, and Wheelock. In January, 1820, Mr. Judson made a fruitless visit to the emperor to obtain permission to propagate the Christian religion. In consequence of this refusal, Mr. Colman was induced to remove to Chittagong, near which place he died, July 4, 1822. Mr. Wheelock was also deceased, and Mr. Hough had departed, so that in March, 1820, Mr. and Mrs. Judson were left alone at Rangoon. Several converts, however, were baptized in 1820.

In consequence of alarming illness, Mrs. Judson left Rangoon in August, 1821, and repaired to Calcutta, and thence to England. In September, 1822, she arrived at New York. After visiting her friends at Bradford for a few weeks, she was induced, on account of her health, to pass the winter in the milder climate of Baltimore, where Dr. Elnathan Judson, an only brother of her husband, resided. Here she lived in retirement, and wrote an interesting work, a History of the Burmaa Mission, in a series of letters to Mr. Butterworth, a member of parliament, in whose house she was received while in England.

She sailed on her return June 22, 1823, from Boston, with the missionaries Mr. and Mrs. Wade, and arrived at Calcutta in October, and in December proceeded to Rangoon. In the same month she accompanied her husband to Ava, the capital. Just as they were getting under way in their missionary labors, the Burmese war broke out. The Bengal government invaded Burmah, in the spring of 1824. The war was a bloody one to the Burmese. June 8th, Mr. Judson was seized and imprisoned, with Dr. Price, and others. During his imprisonment of more than a year and a half; nine months in three pair of fetters, two months in five pair, amidst indescribable sufferings, Mrs. Judson repaired every day two miles to the prison, prepared food for her husband, and administered to the wants of the prisoners, and made constant application to the government for their lives and their deliverance. But for her they must have perished.

"O woman—
When pain and anguish wring the brow,
A ministering angel thou!"

Her appeals, written in elegant Burmese, were given to the king when no one of his officers dared mention the subject to him. At length he directed her with her husband, to go to the English army, then marching on victoriously under general Sir Archibald Campbell, and prepare the way for a treaty of peace. She was sent with all the honors of an ambassador, and the British commander-in-chief received her in this character. She came to every point in the business with great singleness of heart and clearness of understanding. She gave the English a better account of the court of the king of Ava, than they had ever had from any other source. The treaty was made through her influence, and even that proud monarch did not hesitate to acknowledge her merits, though her own narrative modestly conceals them.

Mr. and Mrs. Judson now settled in the new town of Amherst, on the Salween river. But after a few months, and during the absence of Mr. Judson, she died there of a fever, October 24, 1826, aged thirty-six. This fatal event is to be ascribed to her sufferings at Ava. In a few months her only surviving child, Maria, died. Her little son, Roger Williams, had died at Rangoon, and was buried there. Her grave, which is under a large tree, called the Hopia, or hope-tree, will be hereafter visited by Christian missionaries, as a place made sacred by the ashes of a woman of no ordinary character.

For beauty, talents, piety, dignity of demeanor, and perseverance of mind, Mrs. Judson has had but few equals. She acquired languages with great facility, and used her acquirements to the best purposes of her calling. She wrote with ease and elegance. She was a pattern of conjugal affection and missionary ardor. She was chivalrous and romantic without being giddy or vain. She was engaged in a great work, and she went fearlessly on to death. She shrunk from no danger, nor turned back from any peril. She saw martyrdom before her, but it was surrounded by beatific visions. She saw the seeds of the gospel planted in a heathen land, and she believed, that, if it was long in springing up, it would in time flourish, and break asunder the chains of superstition and sin. Every day confirms the wisdom of her anticipations.

No female missionary ever passed through such scenes of suffering, or made such efforts of benevolence in sickness and amidst perils and difficulties of every kind. When, at a future time, the gospel shall fully triumph over the superstitions of the East, her name will be honored throughout Burmah, as it is already honored throughout the Christian and civilized world. A very interesting Memoir of the Life of Mrs. Judson, was published by James D. Knowles, Boston, 1829. N. Y. Mirror, 1834.

JUGGERNAUT, or JAGANATH; (i. e. The Lord of the World;) the most celebrated and sacred temple in Hin-dostan, in the district of Cuttack, on the coast of Orissa. It stands near the shore, not far from the Chilka lake, in a waste, sandy tract, and appears like a huge, shapeless mass of stone. The idol is a carved block of wood, with a hideous face, painted black, and a distended, blood-red mouth. See Sutton's Orissa Mission, Boston, 1833.

On festival days the throne of the idol is placed on a tower sixty feet high, moving on wheels, accompanied by two other idols, that likewise sit on their separate thrones. Six long ropes are attached to the tower, by which the people draw it along. The priests and their attendants stand round the throne on the tower, and occasionally turn to the worshippers with indecent and disgusting songs and gestures. The walls of the temple and the sides of the car are also covered with obscene images, in large, durable sculpture. While the tower moves along, numbers of devout worshippers throw themselves on the ground in order to be crushed by the wheels; and the multitude shout in approbation of the act, as a pleasing sacrifice to the idol.

In the temple itself, a number of prostitutes are kept for the pilgrims who frequent it, the number of which latter, it is calculated, amounts to at least one million two hundred thousand annually; of whom it is said, nine out of ten die on the road of famine and sickness; at any rate, it is a well-known fact, that the country for miles round the sacred place is covered with human bones. Not far from the temple is a place called by Europeans Golghata, where the corpses are thrown, and dogs and vultures are always feeding on the carrion. The whole scene presents one of the most revolting and harrowing spectacles of the cruelties and abominations of idolatry to be met with on the face of the globe; yet, from the contributions of the poor deluded pilgrims, the East India company receive an annual revenue of twelve thousand pounds, deducting the expenses of the temple, repairs of roads, &c. Since 1810, a road has been made to the place from Calcutta, to which a wealthy Hindoo, Rajah Sukmoy Roy, contributed sixteen thousand pounds, on condition of its being called by his name.—Hend. Buck.

JULITTA, a martyr of the fourth century, under Diocletian, was a Lyconian lady of royal descent, but more celebrated for her Christian virtues than her noble blood. To avoid the bigoted rage of the pagan governor, she withdrew from Iconium, her native city, to Tarsus. But here, with her young son Cyricus, she was seized, and confessing herself a Christian was ordered to the rack. Her beautiful boy for repeating his mother's words, "I am a Christian," was dashed in pieces on the pavement before her eyes; for which the dying mother gave thanks to God. After patiently suffering various torments, she was beheaded, April 16, A. D. 305.—Fox, p. 55.

JULITTA, of Cappadocia; a lady of distinguished capacity, virtue and courage, who having had part of her estate unjustly seized by a pagan, made an appeal to the protection of the laws. This was refused, unless she would sacrifice to idols. On her nobly declaring that she would not, for the sake of her property or life, renounce her God and Savior, she was condemned to be burnt, which sentence was executed, A. D. 305.—Fox, 55.

JULIAN, THE APOSTATE; a Roman emperor, son of Julius Constantine, (brother of Constantine the Great,) born at Constantinople in the year 331. With his younger brother Gallus he was intrusted for his education to Eusebius of Nicomedia, who gave them Mardonius for their tutor. They were brought up in the Christian religion, and compelled to enter the order of priests, which appears to have disgusted Julian, who, at the age of twenty-four, repaired to Athens, where he enjoyed the instruction of some renowned heathen philosophers, and embraced their religion.

On his coming to the throne, he sought to restore the pagan worship in all its splendor; opposed the Christians; took from the churches their riches, which were often very great; and after failing in the attempt to induce the Christians, by flattery, to renounce their faith, he did all in his power to make their situation disagreeable, forbidding them to plead before a court of justice, or to receive offices under the state. He did not even permit them publicly to profess their religion; and to falsify the prophecy of Christ with regard to the temple at Jerusalem, he encouraged the Jews to rebuild it, about three hundred years after its destruction. In this, however, he was completely foiled, for flames of fire belching forth from subterraneous caverns slew many of the workmen, and caused the undertaking to be entirely abandoned.

Julian died in 365, in the thirty-fourth year of his age. His last words were, "O Galilean, thou hast conquered!" (See GALILEAN.) His character was full of contradictions: while, on the one hand, he was learned, magnanimous, moderate, temperate, and humane, he was, on the other, fickle, inconsistent, eccentric, fanatical and superstitious in the highest degree; and at the bottom of all these features of his character there appears to have lain a sarcastic, sophistic coldness, and dissimulation.—Hend. Buck.

JULIANO; a Spanish Roman Catholic of the seventeenth century, who on travelling into Germany became a convert to the Protestant faith. His zeal for the diffusion of the word of God, led him to undertake the dangerous enterprise of conveying into Spain a large quantity of Bibles, concealed in casks, and packed up as Rhenish wine. A pretended Protestant betrayed him. He was seized by the Inquisition, and together with eight hundred purchasers of his precious treasure, was condemned to the torture and to death.—Fox, p. 136.

JULIUS CÆSAR, the first Roman emperor, had some connexion with Jewish affairs. He was the son of Lucius Cæsar and Aurelia, daughter of Cotta, and born in the year of Rome 651; ninety-eight years before Jesus Christ. After having passed through the offices of tribune, quaestor, ædile, high-priest, and prætor or governor of Spain, he obtained the consulship, in the year of Rome 695, and chose the government of Gaul, which he reduced into the form of a province, after nine or ten years of government. After the death of his daughter Julia, he went to war with Pompey; but when he entered Italy with his victorious army, he so terrified his enemies, that they fled. Passing into Egypt, Cæsar was shut up in Alexandria, with some troops, where he was very much embarrassed, and pressed by the Egyptian army. Antipater induced the Jews to declare for Cæsar, who obtained a complete victory, and thus became master of Egypt. Cæsar always preserved a grateful recollection of the important service which Antipater had rendered him. He confirmed all the privileges of the Jews in Egypt, and caused a pillar to be erected, on which he ordered them all to be engraved, with the decree which confirmed them. In his fifth and last consulship, Cæsar permitted Hyrcanus to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem, which Pompey had demolished. He was assassinated, March 15, B. C. 54.—Calmet.

JULIUS; a centurion of the cohort of Augustus, to whom Festus, governor of Judea, committed Paul, to be conveyed to Rome. Julius had great regard for Paul, Acts 27: 1, &c. He suffered him to land at Sidon, and to visit his friends there; and in a subsequent part of the voyage he opposed the violence of the soldiers directed against the prisoners, generally; in order to save the apostle. When he delivered his charge to the custody of the chief captain of the guard, there can be no doubt, but that his favorable report of the apostle contributed essentially to the indulgence he afterwards met with, and by which his imprisonment was greatly moderated.—Calmet.

JULIUS; a Roman senator of the second century, who becoming a convert to Christianity, was ordered by the emperor to sacrifice to him as Hercules. This Julius absolutely refused to do, at the same time avowing himself a Christian. After a long imprisonment, pursuant to his sentence, he was beat to death with clubs, which he patiently suffered for his Savior's sake.—Fox, p. 22.

JUMPERS; persons so called from the practice of jumping during the time allotted for religious worship. This singular practice began, it is said, in the western part of Wales, about the year 1760.—Hend. Buck.

JUNIUS, (FRANCIS, S. T. P.) This extraordinary man was born at Bourges, in France, in 1543. Under a kind and learned father he received the rudiments of his education; and though feeble in health, gave such striking indications of wisdom as led his mother to remark that he would be second Socrates. At Lyons, however, where he was sent to complete his education, he found many temptations, and at length became a complete and avowed atheist. His father being informed of the state of his mind, sent for him, and with the utmost tenderness requested him to read the New Testament with attention. He obeyed, and God appeared for him, while reading the first chapter of John. "I was so impressed," he observes, "with what I read, that I could not but perceive the divinity of the subject, and the authority and majesty of the Scriptures, to surpass greatly all human eloquence. I shuddered in my body with horror at myself; my soul was astonished; and I was so strongly affected all that day, that I scarce knew who, or what, or where I was." From this time he became a Christian indeed, and gave up the study of law for theology. In 1565, he became minister of Antwerp, then at Lunbourg, and in 1581, professor of divinity at Heidelberg. In 1592, he was called to the same office in Leyden, which he filled till his much lamented death, in 1602. Junius, though he suffered much from persecution, was by universal acknowledgment one of the greatest and best of men. His learning and judgment, transparent probity, his pacific temper, deep humility, and ardent piety, have rarely been surpassed. His last hours were rich in Christian consolation, drawn from the free grace and faithfulness of God in Christ. His Latin works fill two vols. folio. His Latin Translation of the Old Testament, in which he was aided by Tremellius, is in high esteem.—Middleton, vol. ii. p. 309.

JUNIPER, (Heb. retem.) It is very questionable whether this shrub is mentioned in Scripture, though it is found in our translation, 1 Kings 19: 4. Job 30: 3, 4.

The Psalmist (120: 4.) mentions the coals of the juniper as affording the fiercest fire of any combustible matter that he found in the desert, and therefore the fittest punishment for a deceitful tongue: "What shall be given unto thee, or what shall be done unto thee, thou false tongue? Sharp arrows of the mighty, with coals of juniper." That is, the wrath of God, like a keen and barbed arrow from the bow of the mighty, shall pierce the strongest armor, and strike deep into the hardest heart, and, like the fierce and protracted flame of the juniper, shall torment the liar with unutterable anguish.—Abbott.

JUPITER; the supreme god of the Roman and Greek mythology, whom the people of Lystra supposed to have descended from heaven in the form of Barnabas, Acts 14: 12. (See Gods.)

JUST; conformed to the principles of right and equity; acquitted of the charge of guilt, and according to the divine law entitled to the rewards of righteousness. This may take place either on legal or evangelical principles. (See Justice of God; and Justification.)

JUSTICE, consists in an exact and scrupulous regard to the rights of others, with a deliberate purpose to preserve them on all occasions sacred and inviolate. It is often divided into commutative and retributive justice. The former consists in an equal exchange of benefits; the latter in an equal distribution of rewards and punishments. Dr. Watts gives the following rules respecting justice.—"1. It is just that we honor, reverence, and respect those who are superiors in any kind, Eph. 6: 1, 3. 1 Pet. 2: 17. 1 Tim. 5: 17.—2. That we show particular kindness to near relations, Prov. 17: 17.—3. That we love those who love us, and show gratitude to those who have done us good, Gal. 4: 15.—4. That we pay the full due to those whom we bargain or deal with, Rom. 13. Deut. 24: 14.—5. That we help our fellow-creatures in cases of great necessity, Exod. 22: 4.—6. Reparation to those whom we have wilfully injured." Watts' Sermon. ser. 24, 26, vol. ii.; Berry Street Lect. ser. iv.; Grove's Mor. Phil. p. 332, vol. ii.; Wollaston's Relig. of Nature, pp. 137, 141; Jay's Sermon. vol. ii. p. 131; Dwight's Theology; Payson's Sermons.—Hend. Buck.

JUSTICE, (ADMINISTRATION OF.) According to the Mosaic law, there were to be judges in all the cities, whose duty it was likewise to exercise judicial authority in the neighboring villages; but weighty causes and appeals went up to the supreme judge or ruler of the commonwealth, and, in case of a failure here, to the high-priest, Deut. 17: 8, 9. In the time of the monarchy, weighty causes and appeals went up, of course, to the king, who, in very difficult cases, seems to have consulted the high-priest, as is customary at the present day among the Persians and Ottomans. The judicial establishment was reorganized after the captivity, and two classes of judges, the inferior and superior, were appointed, Ezra 7: 25. The more difficult cases, nevertheless, and appeals, were either brought before the ruler of the state, called Pahhah, or before the high-priest; until, in the age of the Maccabees, a supreme, judicial tribunal was instituted, which is first mentioned under Hyrcanus II. This tribunal is not to be confounded with the seventy-two counsellors, who were appointed to assist Moses in the civil administration of the government, but who never filled the office of judges. (See SANHEDRIM.)

Josephus states, that in every city there was a tribunal of seven judges, with two Levites as apparitors, and that it was a Mosaic institution. That there existed such an institution in his time, there is no reason to doubt; but he probably erred in referring its origin to so early a period as the days of Moses. (See JUDGES.) This tribunal, which decided causes of less moment, is once alluded to by our Lord, by the name of the judgment, Matt. 5: 22. The Talmudists mention a tribunal of twenty-three judges, and another of three judges; but Josephus is silent in respect to them. The courts of twenty-three judges were the same with the synagogue tribunals, mentioned in John 18: 2, which merely tried questions of a religious nature, and sentenced to no other punishment than "forty stripes save one," 2 Cor. 11: 21. The court of three judges was merely a session of referees, which was allowed to the Jews by the Roman laws; for the Talmudists themselves, in describing this court, go on to observe, that one judge was chosen by the accuser, another by the accused, and a third by the two parties conjointly; which shows at once the nature of the tribunal.

The time at which courts were held, and causes were brought before them for trial, was in the morning, Jer. 21: 12. Ps. 101: 8. According to the Talmudists, it was not lawful to try causes of a capital nature in the night, and it was equally unlawful to examine a cause, pass sentence, and put it in execution on the same day. The last particular was very strenuously insisted on. It is worthy of remark, that all of these practices, which were observed in other trials, were neglected in the tumultuous trial of Jesus, Matt. 26: 37. John 18: 13—18. The places for judicial trials were in very ancient times the gates of cities, which were well adapted to this purpose. (See GATES.) Originally, trials were everywhere very summary, excepting in Egypt; where the accuser committed the charge to writing, the accused replied in writing, the accuser repeated the charge, and the accused answered again, &c., Job 14: 17. It was customary in Egypt for the judge to have the code of laws placed before him; a practice which still prevails in the East. Moses interdicted, in the most express and decided manner, gifts or bribes, which were intended to corrupt the judges, Exod. 22: 20, 21. 23: 1—9. Lev. 19: 15. Deut. 24: 14, 15. Moses also, by legal precautions, prevented capital punishments, and corporal punishments which were not capital, from being extended, as was done in other nations, both to parents and their children, and thus involving the innocent and the guilty in that misery which was justly due only to the latter, Exod. 23: 7. Deut. 24: 15. Dan. 6: 21.

The ceremonies which were observed in conducting a judicial trial, were as follows: 1. The accuser and the accused both made their appearance before the judge or judges, (Deut. 25: 1.) who sat with legs crossed upon the floor, which was furnished for their accommodation with carpet and cushions. A secretary was present, at least in more modern times, who wrote down the sentence, and, indeed, every thing in relation to the trial; for instance, the articles of agreement that might be entered into previous to the commencement of the judicial proceedings, Isa. 10: 1, 2. Jer. 32: 1—14. The Jews assert that there were two secretaries, the one being seated to the right of the judge, who wrote the sentence of not guilty, the other to the left, who wrote the sentence of condemnation, Matt. 25: 33—46. That an apparitor or beadle was present, is apparent from other sources. 2. The accuser was denominated in Hebrew satan, or the adversary, Zech. 3: 1—3. Ps. 109: 6. (See ADVERSARY.) The judge or judges were seated, but both of the parties implicated stood up, the accuser standing to the right hand of the accused: the latter, at least after the captivity, when the cause was one of great consequence, appeared with hair dishevelled, and in a garment of mourning. 3. The witnesses were sworn, and, in capital cases, the parties concerned, 1 Sam. 14: 37—40. Matt. 26: 63. In order to establish the charges alleged, two witnesses were necessary, and, including the accuser, three. The witnesses were examined separately, but the person accused had the liberty to be present when their testimony was given in, Num. 35: 30. Deut. 17: 1—15. Matt. 26: 59. Proofs might be brought from other sources: for instance, from written contracts, or from papers in evidence of any thing purchased or sold, of which there were commonly taken two copies, the one to be sealed, the other to be left open, as was customary in the time of Jerome, Jer. 32: 10—13. 4. The parties sometimes, as may be inferred from Prov. 18: 18, made use of the lot in determining the points of difficulty between them, but not without a mutual agreement. The sacred lot of Urim and Thummim was anciently resorted to, in order to detect the guilty, (Josh. 7: 14—24. 1 Sam. 14.) but the determination of a case of right or wrong in this way was not commanded by Moses. 5. The sentence, very soon after the completion of the examination, was pronounced; and the criminal, without any delay, even if the offence were a capital one, was hastened away to the place of punishment, Josh. 7: 22, &c. 1 Sam. 22: 18. 1 Kings 2: 23.

A few additional remarks will cast some light upon some passages of Scripture. The station of the accused was in an eminent place in the court, that the people might see them, and hear what was alleged against them, and the proofs of it, together with the defence made by the criminals. This explains the reason of the remark by the evangelist Matthew, concerning the posture of our Lord at his trial: "Jesus stood before the governor;" and that, in a mock trial, many ages before the birth of Christ, in which some attention was also paid to public forms, Naboth was set on high among the people, 1 Kings 21: 9. The accusers and the witnesses also stood, unless they were allowed to sit by the indulgence of the judges, when they stated the accusation, or gave their testimony. To this custom of the accusers rising from their seats, when called by the court to read the indictment, our Lord alludes in his answer to the scribes and Pharisees, who expressed a wish to see him perform some miracle: "The queen of the South shall rise up in the judgment with this generation, and shall condemn it," Matt. 12: 42. According to this rule, which seems to have been invariably observed, the Jews who accused the apostle Paul at the bar of Festus the Roman governor, "stood round about," while they stated the crimes which they had to lay to his charge, Acts 25: 7. They were compelled to stand as well as the prisoner, by the established usage of the courts of justice in the East.

The Romans often put criminals to the question, or endeavored to extort a confession from them by torture. Agreeably to this cruel and unjust custom, "the chief captain commanded Paul to be brought into the castle, and bade that he should be examined by scourging," Acts 22: 24.

It was usual, especially among the Romans, when a man was charged with a capital crime, and during his arraignment, to let down his hair, suffer his beard to grow long, to wear filthy, ragged garments, and appear in a very dirty and sordid habit; on account of which they were called sordidati. When the person accused was brought into court to be tried, even his near relations, friends and acquaintances, before the court voted, appeared with dishevelled hair, and clothed with garments foul and out of fashion, weeping, crying, and deprecating punishment. The accused sometimes appeared before the judges clothed in black, and his head covered with dust. In allusion to this ancient custom, the prophet Zechariah represents Joshua, the high-priest, when he appeared before the Lord, and Satan stood at his right hand to accuse him, as clothed with filthy garments, Zech. 3: 3.

After the cause was carefully examined, and all parties impartially heard, the public crier, by command of the presiding magistrate, ordered the judges to bring in their verdict. The most ancient way of giving sentence, was by white and black sea-shells, or pebbles. This custom has been mentioned by Ovid in these lines:—

*Mos erat antiquis, nireis atrisque lapidis
His damnare reos, illis absolvere culpa.*

"It was a custom among the ancients, to give their votes by white or black stones; with these they condemned the guilty, with those acquitted the innocent." In allusion to this ancient custom, our Lord promises to give the spiritual conqueror "a white stone," (Rev. 2: 17.) the white stone of absolution or approbation.

When sentence of condemnation was pronounced, if the case was capital, the witnesses put their hands on the head of the criminal, and said, "Thy blood be upon thine own head!" To this custom the Jews alluded, when they cried out at the trial of Christ, "His blood be on us and on our children." Then was the malefactor led to execution, and none were allowed openly to lament his misfortune. His hands were secured with cords, and his feet with fetters; a custom which furnished David with an affecting allusion, in his lamentation over the dust of Abner: "Thy hands were not bound, nor thy feet put in fetters;" (2 Sam. 3: 31.) that is, he was put treacherously to death, without form of justice.

2. Executions in the East are often very prompt and arbitrary, when resulting from royal authority. In many cases the suspicion is no sooner entertained, or the cause of offence given, than the fatal order is issued; the messenger of death hurries to the unsuspecting victim, shows his warrant, and executes his orders that instant in silence and solitude. Instances of this kind are continually occurring in the Turkish and Persian histories. To such silent and hasty executioners the royal preacher seems to refer in that proverb, "The wrath of a king is as messengers of death; but a wise man will pacify it;" (Prov. 16: 14.) his displeasure exposes the unhappy offender to immediate death, and may fill the unsuspecting bosom with terror and dismay, like the appearance of a capidagi, or executioner; but by wise and prudent conduct a man may sometimes escape the danger. From the dreadful promptitude with which Benaiah executed the commands of Solomon on Adonijah and Joab, it may be concluded that the executioner of the court was as little ceremonious, and the ancient Jews, under their kings, nearly as passive, as the Turks or Persians. The prophet Elisha is the only person on the inspired record who ventured to resist the bloody mandate of the sovereign, 2 Kings 6: 32.

Criminals were at other times executed in public; and then commonly without the city. To such executions without the gate, the Psalmist undoubtedly refers in his complaint: "The dead bodies of thy saints have they given to be meat unto the fowls of the heaven; the flesh of thy saints unto the beasts of the earth; their blood have they shed like water round about Jerusalem, and there was none to bury them," Ps. 79: 2, 3. The last clause admits of two senses: 1. There was no friend or relation left to bury them. 2. None were allowed to perform this last office. The despotism of Eastern princes often proceeds to a degree of extravagance which is apt to fill the mind with astonishment and horror. It has been thought, from time immemorial, therefore, highly criminal to bury those who had lost their lives by the hand of an executioner, without permission. To such a degree of savage barbarity it is probable the enemies of God's people carried their opposition, that no person dared to bury the dead bodies of their innocent victims.

In ancient times, persons of the highest rank and station were employed to execute the sentence of the law. They had not then, as we have at present, public executioners; but the prince laid his commands on any of his courtiers whom he chose, and probably selected the person for whom he had the greatest favor. Sometimes the chief magistrate executed the sentence of the law with his own hands; for when Jether shrunk from the duty which his father required, Gideon, at that time the supreme magistrate in Israel, did not hesitate to do it himself. In these times such a command would be reckoned equally barbarous and unbecoming; but the ideas which were entertained in those primitive ages of honor and propriety, were in many respects extremely different from ours. In Homer, the exasperated Ulysses commanded his son Telemachus to put to death the suitors of Penelope, which was immediately done. The custom of employing persons of high rank to execute the sentence of the law, is still retained in the principality of Senaar, where the public executioner is one of the principal nobility; and, by virtue of his office, resides in the royal palace.—Watson.

JUSTICE OF GOD, is that perfection whereby he is infinitely righteous and just, in his principles and in all his proceedings with his creatures. Mr. Ryland defines it thus: "The ardent inclination of his will to prescribe equal laws as the supreme governor, and to dispense equal rewards and punishments as the supreme judge," Rev. 16: 5. Ps. 145: 7. 97: 1, 2. It is distinguished into remunerative and punitive justice. Remunerative justice is a distribution of rewards, the rule of which is not the merit of the creature, but his own gracious promise, Jam. 1: 12. 2 Tim. 4: 8. Punitive or vindictive justice, is the infliction of punishment for any sin committed by men, 2 Thes. 1: 6. That God will not let sin go unpunished is evident,—1. From the word of God, Exod. 34: 6, 7. Num. 14: 18. Neh. 1: 3.—2. From the character of God, Isa. 1: 13, 14. Ps. 5: 6. Heb. 12: 29.—3. From sin being punished in Christ, the surety of his people, 1 Pet. 3: 18.—4. From all the various natural evils which men feel in the present state. The use we should make of this doctrine is this:—1. We should learn the dreadful nature of sin, and the inevitable ruin of impenitent sinners, Ps. 9: 17.—2. We should highly appreciate the Lord Jesus Christ, in whom justice is satisfied, 1 Pet. 3: 18.—3. We should imitate the justice of God, by cherishing an ardent regard to the rights of God and to the rights of mankind.—4. We should abhor all sin, as it strikes directly at the justice of God.—5. We should derive comfort from the consideration that the judge of all the earth will do right, as it regards ourselves, the church, and the world at large, Ps. 97: 1, 2. Ryland's Contemp., vol. ii. p. 439; Witsius' Economy, lib. xi. chap. 8. § 11; Dr. Owen on the Justice of God; Gill's Body of Divinity, vol. i. p. 155, 8vo.; Elisha Cole on the Righteousness of God; Maclaurin's Sermons; Dwight's Theology; Fuller's Works.—Hend. Buck.

JUSTIFICATION; a forensic term, which signifies the declaring or the pronouncing a person righteous according to law. It stands opposed to condemnation; and this is the idea of the word whenever it is used in an evangelical sense, Rom. 5: 18. Deut. 25: 1. Prov. 17: 15. Matt. 12: 37. It does not signify to make men holy, but the holding and declaring them to be free from punishment. It has been defined, "An act of God's free grace, in which he pardoneth all our sins, and accepteth us as righteous in his sight only for the righteousness of Christ imputed to us, and received by faith alone."

The doctrine of justification was styled by Luther, the article of a standing or falling church. It is a capital article of that faith which was once delivered to the saints. Far from being a merely speculative point, it spreads its vital influence through the whole body of theology, runs through all Christian experience, and operates in every part of practical godliness. Such is its grand importance, that a mistake about it has a malignant efficacy, and is attended with a long train of dangerous consequences. Nor can this appear strange, when it is considered, that the doctrine of justification is no other than the way of a sinner's acceptance with God. Being of such peculiar moment, it is inseparably connected with many other evangelical truths, the harmony and beauty of which we cannot behold while this is misunderstood. It is, if any thing may be so called, an essential and fundamental truth of Christianity; and as our very salvation depends on it through eternity, it deserves and demands our most serious consideration. (See ACCEPTANCE WITH GOD.)

Justification, in a theological sense, is either legal or evangelical. If any person could be found that had never broken the divine law, he might be justified by it in a manner strictly legal. But in this way none of the human race can be justified, or stand acquitted before God. For all have sinned; there is none righteous; no, not one, Rom. 3. As sinners, they are under the sentence of death by his righteous law, and excluded from all hope and mercy. That justification, therefore, about which the Scriptures principally treat, and which reaches the case of a sinner, is not by a personal, but an imputed righteousness; a righteousness without the law, (Rom. 3: 21.) provided by grace and revealed in the gospel; for which reason, that obedience by which a sinner is justified, and his justification itself, are called evangelical. In this affair there is the most wonderful display of divine justice and boundless grace. Of divine justice, if we regard the meritorious cause and ground on which the Justifier proceeds in absolving the condemned sinner, and in pronouncing him righteous. Of boundless grace, if we consider the state and character of those persons to whom the blessing is granted. Justification may be further distinguished as being either at the bar of God, and in the court of conscience; or in the sight of the world, and before our fellow-creatures. The former is by mere grace through faith; and the latter is by works.

To justify, is evidently a divine prerogative. It is God that justifieth, Rom. 8: 33. That sovereign Being, against whom we have so greatly offended, whose law we have broken by ten thousand acts of rebellion against him, has, in the way of his own appointment, the sole right of acquitting the guilty, and of pronouncing them righteous. He appoints the way, provides the means, and imputes the righteousness; and all in perfect agreement with the demands of his offended law, and the rights of his violated justice. But although this act is in some places of the infallible word more particularly appropriated personally to the Father, yet it is manifest that all the Three Persons are concerned in this grand affair, and each performs a distinct part in this particular, as also in the whole economy of salvation. The eternal Father is represented as appointing the way, and as giving his own Son to perform the conditions of our acceptance before him; (Rom. 8: 32.) the divine Son as engaged to sustain the curse and make the atonement; to fulfil the terms, and provide the righteousness by which we are justified; (Tit. 2: 14.) and the Holy Spirit as revealing to sinners the perfection, suitableness, and freeness of the Savior's work, enabling them to receive it as exhibited in the gospel of sovereign grace; and testifying to their consciences complete justification by it in the court of heaven, John 16: 8, 14.

As to the objects of justification, the Scripture says, they are sinners, and ungodly. For thus runs the divine declaration: To him that worketh is the reward (of justification, and of eternal life as connected with it), not reckoned of grace, but of debt. But to him that worketh not, but believeth on Him that justifieth—whom? the righteous? the holy? the eminently pious? nay, verily, but the ungodly; his faith, or that in which he believes, is counted unto him for righteousness, Rom. 4: 4, 5. Gal. 2: 17. Here, then, we learn, that the subjects of justification, considered in themselves, are not only destitute of a perfect righteousness, but have performed no good works at all. They are denominated and considered as the ungodly, when the blessing is bestowed upon them. Not that we are to understand that such remain ungodly. "All," says Dr. Owen, "that are justified, were before ungodly: but all that are justified, are at the same instant made godly." That the mere sinner, however, is the subject of justification appears from hence. The Spirit of God, speaking in the Scripture, repeatedly declares that we are justified by grace. But grace stands in direct opposition to works. Whoever, therefore, is justified by grace is considered as absolutely unworthy in that very instant when the blessing is vouchsafed to him, Rom. 3: 24. The person, therefore, that is justified, is accepted without any cause in himself. Hence it appears, that if we regard the persons who are justified, and their state prior to the enjoyment of the immensely glorious privilege, divine grace appears, and reigns in all its glory.

As to the way and manner in which sinners are justified, it may be observed that the Divine Being can acquit none without a complete righteousness. Justification, as before observed, is evidently a forensic term, and the thing intended by it a judicial act. So that, were a person to be justified without a righteousness, the judgment would not be according to truth; it would be a false and unrighteous sentence. That righteousness by which we are justified must be equal to the demands of that law according to which the Sovereign Judge proceeds in our justification. Many persons talk of conditions of justification; (see article CONTRITION;) but the only condition is that of perfect righteousness: this the law requires, nor does the gospel substitute another. But where shall we find, or how shall we obtain a justifying righteousness? Shall we flee to the law for relief? Shall we apply with diligence and zeal to the performance of duty, in order to attain the desired end? The apostle positively affirms, that there is no acceptance with God by the works of the law; and the reasons are evident. Our righteousness is imperfect, and consequently cannot justify. If justification were by the works of men, it could not be by grace: it would not be a righteousness without works; there would be no need of the righteousness of Christ. And, lastly, if justification were by the law, then boasting would be encouraged; whereas God's design, in the whole scheme of salvation, is to exclude it, Rom. 3: 27. Eph. 2: 8, 9. Nor is faith itself our righteousness, or that for the sake of which we are justified; for, though believers are said to be justified by faith, yet not for faith; faith can only be considered as the instrument, and not the cause. That faith is not our righteousness, is evident from the following consideration: No man's faith is perfect; and, if it were, it would not be equal to the demands of the divine law. It could not, therefore, without an error in judgment, be accounted a complete righteousness. But the judgment of God, as before proved, is according to truth, and according to the rights of the law. That obedience by which a sinner is justified is called the righteousness of faith, righteousness by faith, and is represented as revealed to faith; consequently it cannot be faith itself. Faith, in the business of justification, stands opposed to all works; "to him that worketh not, but believeth." Now, if it were our justifying righteousness, to consider it in such a light would be highly improper. For in such a connexion it falls under the consideration of a work; a condition, on the performance of which our acceptance with God is manifestly suspended. If faith itself be that on account of which we are accepted, then some believers are justified by a more, and some by a less perfect righteousness, in exact proportion to the strength or weakness of their faith. That which is the end of the law is our righteousness, which certainly is not faith, but the obedience of our exalted Substitute, Rom. 10: 4. Were faith itself our justifying righteousness, we might depend upon it before God, and rejoice in it: so that according to this hypothesis not Christ, but faith is the capital thing; the object to which we must look; which is absurd. When the apostle says, "faith was imputed to him for righteousness," his main design was to prove that the eternal Sovereign justifies freely, without any meritorious cause in the believer.

Nor is man's obedience to the gospel, as to a new and milder law, the matter of his justification before God. It was a notion that some years ago obtained, that a relaxation of the law, and the severities of it, has been obtained by Christ; and a new law, a remedial law, a law of milder terms, has been introduced by him, which is the gospel; the terms of which are faith, repentance, and obedience; and though these are imperfect, yet, being sincere, they are accepted of by God in the room of a perfect righteousness. But every part of this scheme is wrong, for the law is not relaxed, nor any of its severities abated; there is no alteration made in it, either with respect to its precepts or penalty: besides the scheme is absurd, for it supposes that the law which a man is now under requires only an imperfect obedience; but an imperfect righteousness cannot answer its demands; for every law requires perfect obedience to its own precepts and prohibitions.

Nor is a profession of religion, nor sincerity, nor good works, at all the ground of our acceptance with God, for all our righteousness is imperfect, and must therefore be entirely excluded. By grace, saith the apostle, ye are saved, not of works, lest any man should boast, Eph. 2: 8, 9. Besides, the works of sanctification and justification are two distinct things: the one is a work of grace within men; the other an act of grace for or towards men; the one is imperfect, the other complete; the one carried on gradually, the other done at once. (See SANCTIFICATION.)

If, then, we cannot possibly be justified by any of our own performances, nor by faith itself, nor even by the graces of the Holy Spirit, where then shall we find a righteousness by which we can be justified? The Scripture furnishes us with an answer—"By Jesus Christ all that believe are justified from all things from which they could not be justified by the law of Moses," Acts 13: 38, 39. "He was delivered for our offences, and raised again for our justification," Rom. 4: 25. "Being justified by his blood, we shall be saved from wrath through him," Rom. 5: 9. The spotless obedience, therefore, the bitter sufferings, and the accursed death of our heavenly Surety, constitute that very righteousness by which sinners are justified before God. That this righteousness is imputed to us, and that we are not justified by a personal righteousness, appears from the Scriptures with superior evidence. "By the obedience of one shall many be made righteous," Rom. 5: 19. "He hath made him to be sin for us, who knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him," 2 Cor. 5: 21. "And be found in him, not having mine own righteousness, which is of the law, but that which is through the faith of Christ; the righteousness which is of God by faith," Phil. 3: 9. See also Jer. 23: 6. Dan. 9: 24, and the whole of chaps. 2 and

3 of Galatians. (See articles RECONCILIATION; RIGHT-EOUSNESS.)

As to the properties of justification: 1. It is an act of God's free grace, without any merit whatever in the creature, Rom. 3: 24.—2. It is an act of justice as well as grace: the law being perfectly fulfilled in Christ, and divine justice satisfied, Rom. 3: 26. Ps. 85: 10.—3. It is an individual and instantaneous act, done at once, admitting of no degrees, John 19: 30.—4. It is an irreversible, and unalterable act, Mal. 3: 6. Rom. 5: 17. 8: 30.

As to the time of justification, divines are not agreed. Some have distinguished it into decretive, virtual, and actual. 1. Decretive, is God's eternal purpose to justify sinners in time by Jesus Christ. 2. Virtual justification has a reference to the satisfaction made by Christ. 3. Actual, is when we are enabled to believe in Christ, and by faith are united to him. Others say that it is eternal, because his purpose respecting it was from everlasting; and that, as the Almighty viewed his people in Christ, they were, of consequence, justified in his sight. But the principle on which the advocates for this doctrine have proceeded is most absurd. They have confounded the design with the execution; for if this distinction be not kept up, the utmost perplexity will follow the consideration of every subject which relates to the decrees of God; nor shall we be able to form any clear ideas of his moral government whatever. To say, as one does, that the eternal will of God to justify men is the justification of them, is not to the purpose; for, upon the same ground, we might as well say that the eternal will of God to convert and glorify his people is the real conversion and glorification of them. That it was eternally determined that there should be a people who should believe in Christ, and that his righteousness should be imputed to them, is not to be disputed; but to say that these things were really done from eternity, (which we must say if we believe eternal justification,) this would be absurd. It is more consistent to believe, that God from eternity laid the plan of justification; that this plan was executed by the life and death of Christ; and that the blessing is only manifested, received, and enjoyed, when we are regenerated; so that no man can say, or has any reason to conclude, he is justified, until he believes in Christ, Rom. 5: 1. 8: 1.

The effects or blessings of justification, are, 1. An entire freedom from all penal evils in this life, and that which is to come, 1 Cor. 3: 22.—2. Peace with God, Rom. 5: 1.—3. Access to God, through Christ, Eph. 3: 12.—4. Acceptance with God, Eph. 5: 27.—5. Holy confidence and security under all the difficulties and troubles of the present state, 2 Tim. 1: 1, 12.—6. Finally, eternal salvation, Rom. 8: 30. 5: 18.

Thus we have given as comprehensive a view of the doctrine of justification as the nature of this work will admit; a doctrine which is founded upon the sacred Scriptures, and which so far from leading to licentiousness, as some suppose, is of all others the most replete with motives to love, dependence, and obedience, Rom. 6: 1, 2. A doctrine which the primitive Christians held as constituting the very essence of their system; which the reformers considered as the most important point; which the venerable martyrs gloried in, and sealed with their blood; and which, as the church of England observes, is a "very wholesome doctrine, and full of comfort." See Booth's Reign of Grace; Luther on Galatians; Dr. Owen on Justification; Ravelston on Justification; *Pres. JUSTIN, surnamed the MARTYR, one of the fathers of the church, was born at Neapolis, anciently Sichem, in Palestine; and was a philosopher of the Platonic school. He is believed to have preached the gospel in Italy, Asia Minor, and Egypt. He was beheaded at Rome, in 165. Of his works the principal are, two Apologies for the Christians.—Davenport; Spirit of the Pilgrims.

JUSTINIAN I., emperor of the East, was born, in 483, of an obscure family, at Tauresium, in Dardania, oa the Illyrian and Thracian frontier ; was associated in the government of the empire by his uncle Justin ; and, on the death of that monarch, succeeded to the sole autho-

ry. Personally, Justinian was a bigot, and a man of a weak mind ; yet, in some points of view, his reign was a glorious one. He died in 565.—Davenport.

KAABA ; originally a temple at Mecca, in great esteem among the heathen Arabs, who, before they embraced Mohammedanism, called a small building of stone in the same temple kaaba, which has in its turn become an object of the highest reverence with the Mohammedans. They say it was built by Abraham and Ishmael. On the side of it is a black stone, surrounded with silver, called braktan, set in the wall, about four feet from the ground. This stone has served, since the second year of the Hegira, as the kibla, or point towards which the Mohammedan turns his face during prayer. The hadjis or pilgrims touch and kiss this stone seven times, after which they enter the kaaba, and offer up their prayers. At first the Mohammedans turned their face towards Jerusalem, until their leader ordered the present direction. It appears from Burekhardt, that this same holy kaaba is the scene of such indecencies as cannot with propriety be particularized : indecencies which are practised not only with impunity, but publicly and without a blush.—Hend. Buck.

KADESH, (holy or holiness) ; the name of a wilderness, (Gen. 20: 1. Num. 20: 22.) which appears to be the same as that called the wilderness of Paran in Num. 13: 26, and in chap. 33: 36, the desert of Tziu. Simon thinks that Kadesh implies a sacred place, or asylum ; and he refers it to two cities : (1.) In the desert of Paran, (Num. 13: 26.) which he thinks is the same as Kadesh-Barnea, Num. 34: 4. Deut. 1: 2, 19. 2: 14. Judith 5: 14. (2.) A place on the confines of Edom, (Num. 20: 16.) in the desert of Tziu, Num. 27: 14. 33: 36. Kadesh-Barnea was eight leagues south from Hebron.—Calmet.

KADESH-BARNEA. (See KADESH.)

KADMONITES ; (Gen. 15: 19.) a tribe of people who inhabited the promised land east of the Jordan, about mount Hermon. They were descended from Canaan, the son of Ham. Cadmus, the founder of Thebes in Bœotia, has been conjectured to have been originally a Kadmonite, and his wife Hermione to have been so named from mount Hermon. The Kadmonites, says Calmet, were Hivites ; the word Hivites is derived from a root which signifies a serpent ; and fable says, that Cadmus sowed serpent's teeth, from which sprung up armed men ; because he settled at Thebes his Hivites, or Kadmonites, who were valiant and martial.—Calmet.

KANAH ; a brook on the borders of Ephraim and Manasse, (Josh. 16: 8. 17: 9.) which falls into the Mediterranean a few miles south of Cesarea.—Calmet.

KANT, (IMMANUEL), a celebrated metaphysician, and founder of a new sect, was born, in 1724, at Königsberg, in Prussia, and was the son of a saddler. He was educated at the Frederician college, on leaving which he became a private tutor. At a later period he gave lectures on mathematics. He commenced as an author in his twenty-third year ; but it was not till 1781, that he began to publish the works which have excited so much admiration and controversy, especially in Germany. In that year, he published his Critique of pure Reason, which contains his system of philosophy, commonly called the critical philosophy. A second part of it, published in 1783, bore the title of Prolegomena for future Metaphysics. The principles contained in them he had, however, long been promulgating from the chair of logic and metaphysics at Königsberg, to which he was appointed in 1770. In 1786 and 1788, he was chosen rector of the university. He died in 1804, having for some years been in a state of gradual decay. Kant was a man of talent, an acute thinker, but more fond of abstraction, than of experiment. His fame is consequently on the decline, and must sink lower as the inductive philosophy of Bacon advances in the study of the mind. His religious system is little better than deism in disguise. Robinson's Bibl. Repos. for 1831.—Davenport.

KARAITES, (Heb. Karoin ; ) i. e. Scripturists, a Jewish sect residing chiefly in Poland and the Crimea, but to be found also in different parts of Lithuania, Austria, the Caucasus, Turkey, Egypt, Abyssinia, India, and the Holy Land. They principally differ from the Rabbinites in their rejection of the oral law, and their rigid appeal to the text of Scripture as the exclusive source and test of religious truth. It is on this account that they are called Scripturists. Not that they never consult the Talmud, but they will not allow that it has any binding authority over their consciences. They also differ from them in the interpretation of Scripture itself. While the Talmudist chiefly applies the cabalistical art to bring out recondite and mysterious meanings from the sacred text, the Karaites maintains that the Scripture is its own interpreter, and that the sense of a passage is to be determined by the grammatical meaning of the words, the scope and connexion, and a comparison of parallel passages. They are very strict in their adherence to the letter of the law, are free from many of the superstitions common among the Jews in general, correct and exemplary in their domestic habits and arrangements, and characterized in their dealings by probity and integrity. They are scarcely ever known to be embroiled in a lawsuit, or to become the subject of legal prosecution.

This sect claims a very high antiquity, and seems originally to have been the same with that of the Sadducees, from whom, however, it is supposed they separated when the latter adopted the errors by which they were distinguished in the time of our Lord. They were afterwards reformed by rabbi Anan, about the middle of the eighth century. According to accounts current among them, the first place where a Karaite synagogue was established after the destruction of Jerusalem was Grand Cairo, where they exist to this day. The number of the Karaites is not great, probably not much above eight thousand. Those in the south of Russia possess a translation of the Hebrew Bible in the Tartar language, which is vernacular among them.—Hend. Buck.

KATTATH ; the limit of the tribe of Zebulun, Josh. 19: 15 ; in Judg. 1: 30. called Kithron, which is the same in sense.—Calmet.

KEDAR ; a region in the desert of the Agarænes, Gen. 25: 13. 1 Chron. 1: 29.—2. A city, as some think, called by Josephus, Canala, Isa. 42: 11. 60: 7. Ezek. 27: 21. Ps. 120: 5. Jer. 2: 10. 49: 28.—3. A son of Ishmael, (Gen. 25: 13.) the father of the Kedareniens, mentioned by Pliny, who dwelt in the neighborhood of the Nabathæans, in Arabia Deserta. These people living in tents, it is not possible to show the place of their habitation, because they often changed it. Arabia Deserta is sometimes called Kedar ; but the Kedareniens dwelt principally in the south of Arabia Deserta, or in the north of Arabia Petrea : there were some as far as the Red sea, Cant. 1: 5. Ps. 42: 11.—Calmet.

KEDRON. (See CEDRON.)

KEACH, (BENJAMIN), the famous author of the "Scripture Metaphors," the "Travels of True Golliness," &c. was a Baptist minister of Winslow, Bucks, Eng. in the latter part of the seventeenth century. Being a bold and zealous preacher during the reign of Charles II., he was frequently seized and committed to prison, where he was sometimes bound, but often released by bail. On one occasion four dragoons determined to trample him to death with their horses. They had already bound him, and laid him on the ground, and were just putting spurs to their horses to accomplish their horrid design, when an officer rode up, and interposed his authority. In 1695, he was prosecuted before lord Clarendon, the great patron of persecuting power, and sentenced to the pillory for publishing a work entitled The Child's Instructor, or a New and Easy Primer. While in the pillory he said, "Good people, I am not ashamed to stand here this day with this paper on my head. My Lord Jesus was not ashamed to suffer on the cross for me, and it is for his cause that I am made a gazingstock. You that are acquainted with the Scriptures know the way to the crown is by the cross. The cause for which I stand here, will plead its own innocence, when the strongest of its opposers shall be ashamed. I do sincerely desire that the Lord would convert them, and convince them of their errors, that their souls may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus." He added, "This is one yoke of Christ's which I experience is easy to me, and a burden which he doth make light. Oh, did you but experience the great love of God, and the excellences that are in him, it would make you willing to go through any sufferings for his sake. I do account this the greatest honor that ever the Lord was pleased to confer on me."

Mr. Keach was the author of eighteen practical, sixteen polemical, and nine poetical works, in all forty-three; besides a number of prefaces and recommendations for the works of others.—Benedict, i. 215; Ivimey, i. 338.

KEEP. To keep God's word, statutes, or laws, is to believe them firmly as indeed the word of God; to love, esteem, and delight in them; and diligently endeavor to have our whole life exactly conformed thereto, Ps. 119: 17, 34. God keeps covenant and mercy: according to the tenor of his covenant, he is ever ready to forgive his people's sins, and to grant free favors to them, 1 Kings 8: 23. He keeps the door of men's lips, in preserving them from vain, imprudent and sinful words, Ps. 141: 3. Ministers are keepers of the vineyard; they watch over and labor in the church, and preserve the truths, ordinances, and members thereof from spiritual injuries, Sol. Song 8: 11. The saints are made slavish keepers of the vineyard to the neglect of their own, when, by administering public offices, intermeddling too much with carnal business, or by oppression from the impositions of men, they are made to neglect the due management of their own hearts and lives, Sol. Song 1: 6. To keep the heart with all diligence, is watchfully to observe its inclinations and motions, that it comply with no temptation, no appearance of evil; and earnestly to study that its whole temper, thoughts, and the words and works proceeding therefrom, correspond with the unerring law of God, Prov. 4: 23.—Brown.

KEHELATHAH; an encampment of Israel in the wilderness, Numb. 33: 22. As it appears to denote "the place of assembly," some have thought the gathering and revolt of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram happened here. It is probably the same as Keilah, a town in the south of Judah.—Calmet.

KEILAH; a town of Judah, (Josh. 15: 44.) which Eusebius places seventeen miles from Eleutheropolis, on the side of Hebron; and Jerome eight miles from the late city. It is said that the prophet Habakkuk's tomb was shown there.—Calmet.

KEITHIANS; a party which separated from the Quakers in Pennsylvania in the year 1691. They were headed by the famous George Keith, from whom they derived their name. Those who persisted in their separation, after their leader deserted them, adopted Baptist views, practised immersion, and received the Lord's supper. This party were also called Quaker Baptists, because they retained the language, dress, and manner of the Quakers. See Benedict's History of the Baptists.—Hend. Buck.

KEMPIS, (THOMAS A.) whose real name was Hammerlein, was born, in 1388, at Kempen, in the diocese of Cologne, and died, in 1471, superior of the monastery of mount Agnes, at Zwoll. He was born of poor, but pious parents, who early devoted him to the church. His character was distinguished for apostolic simplicity and purity. Much of his time was spent in transcribing the Bible, and other works, which he performed in a very beautiful manner. His original works are all in Latin, and consist of sermons, hymns, prayers, lives and ascetic treatises. The treatise on the Imitation of Christ is his masterpiece, and has gone through more than a thousand editions. It has been said, perhaps without solid ground, that it was written by Gerson.—Davenport; Ency. Am.

KEMUEL; the third son of Nahor. Kemuel may have given name to the Kamilites, a people of Syria, lying west of the Euphrates.—Calmet.

KEN, (THOMAS, D. D.) a pious prelate and poet, was born in 1637, at Berkhamstead; was educated at Winchester, and at New College, Oxford; was made bishop of Bath and Wells by Charles II.; was one of the seven bishops who were tried for petitioning James II.; declined taking the oaths to William III., for which he was deprived of his see; was pensioned by queen Anne; and died in 1711. His Sermons, Poems, and other works, were published in four volumes 8vo. Bp. Ken was a learned and excellent man, immovable in what he deemed to be right, but of a pacific temper, and generally honored and beloved. Several of his hymns are very fine.—Davenport.

KENI; a region of the Philistine country, 1 Sam. 27: 10. Judg. 1: 16. "The children of the Kenite," should be, according to the LXX, "of Jethro the Kenite."—Calmet.

KENITES; a people who dwelt west of the Dead sea, and extended themselves far into Arabia Petraea. Jethro, the father-in-law of Moses, was a Kenite, and out of regard to him all of this tribe who submitted to the Hebrews, were suffered to live in their own country. The rest fled, in all probability, to the Edomites and Amalekites. See 1 Sam. 15: 6. The lands of the Kenites were in Judah's lot, Num. 24: 21. They were carried into captivity by Nebuchadnezzar.—Calmet.

KENIZZITES; an ancient people of Canaan, whose land God promised to the descendants of Abraham, (Gen. 15: 19.) and who dwelt, it is thought, in Idumea. Kenaz, son of Eliphaz, probably took his name from the Kenizzites, among whom he settled.—Calmet.

KENNICOTT, (BENJAMIN, D. D.) well known in the literary world for his elaborate edition of the Hebrew Bible, and other publications, was born at Totnes, in Devonshire, A. D. 1718. His early display of talents recommended him to some gentlemen, who sent him to Oxford, and there supported him while he went through his academical studies. He had not been long at Oxford before he distinguished himself by the publication of two dissertations, one on the Tree of Life, the other on the Oblations of Cain and Abel, on account of which the degree of bachelor of arts was conferred upon him gratis a year before the statutable time. He soon after acquired additional fame by the publication of several occasional sermons, which were well received. In the year 1753, he laid the foundation of his great work, and spent a long time in searching out and examining Hebrew manuscripts, with a view to the elucidation of his subjects. He appealed to the Jews themselves regarding the state of the Hebrew text, and gave a compendious history of it from the close of the Hebrew canon to the time of the invention of printing, with an account of one hundred and three Hebrew manuscripts. In 1760 he published his proposals for collecting all the Hebrew MSS. prior to the invention of the art of printing, that could be found in Great Britain and, at the same time, for procuring as many collections of foreign MSS. as his time and money would permit.

The utility of the proposed collation being very generally admitted, a subscription was made to defray the expense of it, amounting to nearly ten thousand pounds. Various persons were employed, both at home and abroad; but of the foreign literati the principal was professor Brons, of the university of Helmstadt, who not only collated Hebrew MSS. in Germany, but went for that purpose into Switzerland and Italy. In consequence of these efforts, more than six hundred Hebrew MSS., and sixteen MSS. of the Samaritan Pentateuch were discovered in different libraries in England, and on the continent; many of which were wholly collated, and others consulted in important passages.

During the progress of his work he was rewarded with the canony of Christ church. His first volume was published in 1776, and the whole was completed in 1780, at Oxford, in two vols. folio, entitled "Vetus Testamentum Hebraicum, cum Variis Lectionibus." The text of Van der Hooght was adopted; but it was printed without the points. The poetical portions are divided into stanzas according to the nature of the poetry; and the various readings are printed at the bottom of the page.

When we contemplate his diligence and learning, it must be confessed that Hebrew literature and sacred criticism are more indebted to him than to any scholar of the age in which he lived. He was a good and conscientious man; and, in the decline of life, resigned a valuable living, because he was unable to discharge the duties which it imposed upon him. He died at Oxford, in 1783, and, at the time of his death, was employed in printing remarks on sundry passages of the Old Testament, which were afterwards published from his papers. Dr. Kennicott was also keeper of the Radcliffe library, and maintained a correspondence for several years with some of the most eminent literary men in Europe, particularly the celebrated professor Michaelis, to whom he addressed a Latin epistle, in 1777, in defence of his great work. Watts' Bib. Brit.; Jones's Christ. Biog.; and Ep. Marsh's Lect., lect. 11; Ency. Amer.—Hend. Buck.

KERCHEIFS, an article of dress used by the false prophetesses, are thought to have been headtires, or veils bound to the head, so as to cover most, if not all of the face. "They make kerchiefs on the head of every statue to hunt souls;" they put them on the head of the idolatrous statues; or they put them on the head of those they spoke to, as if a divine token of their protection; or it may mean that they blindfolded people with their delusive speeches, Ezek. 13: 18.—Brown.

KETT, (HENRY,) a divine and scholar, was born, in 1761, at Norwich; was educated at Trinity college, Oxford; became perpetual curate of Hykeham, in Lincolnshire; and was drowned, in 1825, while bathing. He wrote Juvenile Poems; History the Interpreter of Prophecy; a Tour to the Lakes; Emily, a moral tale; and Logic made easy; edited the Flowers of Wit, and Headley's Beauties; and contributed to the Olla Podrida.—Davenport.

KETTLEWELL, (JOHN,) a divine of the church of England, distinguished by his piety and learning, was born at North Allerton, in Yorkshire, on the 10th of March, 1653, and educated at Oxford, where he became eminent as a tutor. While a youth he wrote his celebrated book, entitled "Measures of Christian Obedience," which occasioned him to be much noticed. Lord Digby presented him, July, 1682, to the vicarage of Coleshill, in Warwickshire. When he had been about seven years at this place, a great change for the worse took place in his circumstances; for soon after the revolution, he was deprived of his living, in consequence of his refusing to take the oaths of supremacy to king William and queen Mary. He now came to London, and occupied himself in literary pursuits. He had the happiness to become acquainted with Mr. Nelson, whose friendship was valuable to him, and with whom he concerted the "Model of a fund of charity for the needy, suffering, that is, the non-juring Clergy." He was naturally of a delicate constitution, and inclined to consumption, of which he died at the age of forty-two, on the 12th of April, 1695.

Mr. Nelson, who must have known him well, gives the following great and noble character of him, in a preface to his "Five Discourses," a volume printed after his death: "He was learned without pride; wise and judicious without cunning; he served at the altar without either covetousness or ambition; he was devout without affectation; sincerely religious without moroseness; courteous and affable without flattery or mean compliances; just without rigor; charitable without vanity; and heartily zealous for the interest of religion without faction." His works were collected and printed in 1718, in two volumes folio.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

KETURAH; the name of Abraham's second wife. (See ABRAHAM.) It seems evident from the whole tenor of the history, that Abraham was childless until the birth of Ishmael, (Gen. 15: 2, 3.) that he had no other son than Ishmael when he received the promise of Isaac, (Gen. 17: 18.) and that Isaac and Ishmael jointly, as his eldest sons, celebrated his funeral, Gen. 25: 9. His second marriage, at the age of one hundred and forty years, shows his faith in the divine promise, that he should be "a father of many nations;" for which purpose his constitution might be miraculously renewed as Sarah's was. Besides, Abraham himself was born when his father Terah was one hundred and thirty years of age. Abraham settled the sons of Keturah in the east country of Arabia, near the residence of Ishmael.—Watson.

KEY; the grand instrument and symbol of complete authority. "And the key of the house of David will I lay upon his shoulder: so he shall open, and none shall shut; and he shall shut, and none shall open," Isa. 22: 22. The keys of the ancients were very different from ours; because their doors and trunks were closed generally with bands, and the key served only to loosen or fasten these bands in a certain manner.

The rabbins say, that God has reserved to himself four keys; the key of rain, the key of the grave, the key of fruitfulness, and the key of barrenness. Christ reproaches the scribes and Pharisees with having taken away the key of knowledge; (Luke 11: 52.) that is, with putting such false glosses on the Scriptures, that they read them without advantage to themselves, and without discovering to others the truth; which in this way they suppressed in unrighteousness, Rom. 1: 18.

Christ promised to Peter, that he should first open the gate of his kingdom, both to Jew and Gentile, in making the first converts among them, Matt. 16: 19. It is observable that no supremacy is here given to Peter; as the power of binding and loosing belonged equally to all the apostles, Matt. 18: 18. The term binding and loosing was customarily applied by the Jews to a decision respecting doctrines or rites, establishing which were lawful and which unlawful. (See BIND.) And it may also denote, to bind with sickness, and to loose by restoring to health. Jesus Christ says that he has the key of David, and also, the keys of death and Hades; (see HABES;) (Rev. 1: 18.) that is, it is in his power to bring to the grave, or to deliver from it; to appoint to life or to death; to summon to the state of departed spirits, or to release from that state at the resurrection of the last day, Rev. 20: 13—15.—Watson; Calmet.

KEYS, (POWER OF THE;) a term made use of in reference to ecclesiastical jurisdiction, denoting the power of excommunicating and absolving. The Romanists say that the pope has the power of the keys, and can open and shut paradise as he pleases; grounding their opinion on that expression of Jesus Christ to Peter—"I will give thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven," Matt. 16: 19. But every one must see that this is an absolute perversion of Scripture. (See KEY, and ABSOLUTION.)

In St. Gregory we read that it was the custom for the popes to send a golden key to princes, wherein they inclosed a little of the filings of St. Peter's chain, kept with such devotion at Rome; and that these keys were worn in the bosom, as being supposed to contain some wonderful virtues. Such has been the superstition of past ages.—Hend. Buck.

KIBROTH-HATTAVAH, (the graves of lust;) was one of the encampments of Israel in the wilderness, where they desired of God flesh for their sustenance, declaring they were tired with manna, Num. 11: 34, 35. Quails were sent in great quantities, but while the meat was in their mouths, (Ps. 78: 30.) God smote so great a number of them, that the place was called the graves of those who lusted. A most monitory example! 1 Cor. 10: 6.—Calmet.

KICK; a metaphor taken from a fed horse, or like animal, kicking with his heels at his owner when he gives him provision, pricks him forward, or the like. To kick against God is wantonly and stubbornly to rebel against him, and make his benefits an occasion of rebelling against him, Deut. 32: 15. 1 Sam. 2: 19. Acts 9: 5.—Brown.

KID, (gedi;) the young of the goat. Among the Hebrews the kid was reckoned a great delicacy; and appears to have been served for food in preference to the lamb. (See GOAT.) It continues to be a choice dish in the neighboring countries.—Watson.

KIDDER, (RICHARD,) bishop of Bath and Wells, was born in Sussex or Suffolk, and educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge, of which he became a member in 1649. Succeeding to fellowship, he took holy orders, and obtained from the college the benefice of Stanground, Huntingdonshire, of which, however, he was deprived in 1662, for refusing episcopal ordination. His firmness on his conviction appears eventually to have given way, and on his conforming, he was presented to the living of Rayne, in Essex, 1; the earl of Essex. In 1674, he was collated to St. Mary Outwick, in the city of London; seven years after which he obtained a stall in Norwich cathedral, and in 1684 was farther promoted to the deanery of Peterborough. In 1691, bishop Ken being deprived of the see of Bath and Wells, on account of his adherence to the cause of James the Second, dean Kidder was selected by king William as his successor, and he was in consequence raised to the episcopal bench. Two years after his elevation, he preached the lecture founded by Mr. Boyle, and continued to preside over his diocese for more than twelve years, till the memorable storm which passed over most parts of the west of England, on the night of the 26th November, 1703, when he fell a victim to its fury. The bishop and his wife had retired to rest, when they were overwhelmed by the sudden fall of a stack of chimneys in the episcopal palace at Wells, and were not extricated till life in both had become extinct.

Many of the bishop's works, however, survive him, the principal of which are, "A Demonstration of the Messiah," in three parts; "A Commentary on the Pentateuch," in two volumes, octavo; and an octavo volume, comprising twelve sermons. He was a very clear, elegant, learned writer; and one of the best divines of his time.—Watts' Bib. Brit.; Jones' Chris. Biog.

KIDNEYS; metaphorically, the inmost powers, thoughts, and desires of the soul, and which are sometimes called reins, Ps. 16: 7.—Brown.

KIFFIN (WILLIAM;) one of the most distinguished ministers among the English Baptists of the seventeenth century, and one of the very few on whom the great Disposer of all events saw fit to bestow much of the perilous riches and honors of this world. He was personally known to both Charles II., and James II., his successor. Crosby informs us, that on one occasion when Charles wanted money, he sent to Mr. Kiffin to borrow of him forty thousand pounds. Mr. Kiffin, knowing the unprincipled character of the monarch, replied that he could not command so much, but that if it could be of any service to his majesty he would present him with ten thousand pounds, that is, upwards of forty thousand dollars. This the king accepted, and Mr. Kiffin afterwards remarked that he thereby saved thirty thousand pounds. Mr. Kiffin had great influence at court, and was hence enabled to render great service to his brethren. By his means the false and scurrilous pamphlet, entitled Baxter baptized in Blood, was examined and condemned; and by his intercession also, twelve Baptists, who had been condemned to death at Aylesbury, received the king's pardon. But with all his wealth and influence, he was a meek and modest man.

In 1683, two of his grandsons, Benjamin and William Hewling, young gentlemen of great fortunes, accomplished education, and eminent piety, were concerned in the ill-fated expedition of the duke of Monmouth, which terminated in the destruction of almost all who had any hand in it. These interesting young men, the last male descendants of their house, the one twenty-one years of age and the other not quite twenty, who added uncommon beauty and gracfulness of person to spotless morals, high talent, devoted love of the Protestant cause, and ardent courage in the field, were taken prisoners, and condemned to death. Large ransoms and earnest petitions were offered for their lives, but the cruel James was inexorable. The scene at their execution was so affecting, yet so bright with the heavenly joy and sweetness of their behavior, that even the soldiers declared they scarcely knew how to bear it, and many others present said it both broke and rejoiced their hearts. A full account of it may be found in the first volume of Ivimey's History of the English Baptists.

Mr. Kiffin, in 1688, was nominated by James II. one of the aldermen of the city of London in his new charter. This was an honor the venerable minister by no means desired. Waiting on the king by his request, he said, "Sire, I am an old man, and have withdrawn myself from all kinds of business for some years past, and am incapable of doing any service in such an affair to your majesty, in the city. Besides, sire," the old man went on, fixing his eyes steadfastly upon the king, while the tears ran down his cheeks, "the death of my grandsons gave a wound to my heart, which is still bleeding, and never will close but in the grave."

The king was deeply struck by the manner, the freedom, and the spirit of the rebuke. A total silence ensued, while the galled countenance of James seemed to shrink from the horrid remembrance. In a minute or two, however, he recovered himself sufficiently to say, "Mr. Kiffin, I shall find a balsam for that sore," and immediately turned to other business.

Mr. Kiffin was compelled, with three or four others of his Baptist brethren, to accept the office, till by the coming of the prince of Orange, in about six months, he was permitted to retire from its burdens and snares. He died a few years after, not far from eighty years of age, leaving behind him a character of rare excellence, tried alike by the fires of prosperity and adversity, in the most eventful times.

KILLEN; an Irish bishop, missionary, and martyr of the seventh century. He received from his parents a pious education, and having deeply imbibed the truth of the Scriptures, took unwearied delight in diffusing the gospel. With eleven others he crossed to the continent, and by his evangelical labors in Germany, was instrumental of converting to Christianity Gozbert, governor of the city of Wurtzburg, with many others. As a last proof of Gozbert's sincerity, Killien required him to dissolve his incestuous marriage with his brother's widow, Guilana. Gozbert complied, but Guilana in revenge put all the missionaries to the sword, A. D. 689.—Fox. p. 81.

KILL. The desire of the slothful kills them; their delight in ease hurts their constitution, and exposes them to great straits and poverty; or their desire after things, for which they care not to labor, leads them to methods that bring them to an unhappy end, Prov. 21: 25. The letter, or covenant of works kills; it is the strength of sin, and condemns men to death, spiritual, temporal, and eternal. The letter or external part of ceremonies, without regard to the gospel signification killed men and hindered them from Christ and salvation, and cleaving thereto hastened ruin on the Jewish nation. The letter or unsanctified head-knowledge of divine truth kills; it encourages pride, and makes men esteem themselves, and condemn Christ, and to their own ruin refuse the offers of the gospel, 2 Cor. 3: 6.—Brown.

KIMCHI, (DAVID,) a learned rabbi, was born at Narbonne, about the end of the twelfth century; and died, in Provence, in 1240. His contemporaries regarded him with almost superstitious reverence. He is the author of a Hebrew Grammar; a Treatise on Hebrew Roots; Dictionary Talmudicum; and Commentaries on the Psalms and several other books of the Scriptures.—Davenport.

KINDNESS; the spirit of love, favorable treatment, or a constant and habitual practice of friendly offices and benevolent actions. (See BENEFICENCE; CHARITY; GENEROSITY.)—Hend. Buck.

KINDRED; a number of people related to one another by blood or marriage. The kindreds of the earth that still mourn at Christ's second appearing, are the vast multitudes of wicked and worldly men, Rev. 1: 7. The kindreds over which Antichrist rules, are vast multitudes of different nations, sexes, and conditions, Rev. 13: 7, and 11: 9.—Brown.

KING, (PETER,) lord chancellor of England, and famous for his ecclesiastical learning, as well as his knowledge in the law, was born in 1669, at Exeter, in Devonshire. His father was an eminent grocer and salter, in that city; and, though possessed of considerable property, and descended from a good family, determined to bring up his son to his own business. With this view he gave him only the common rudiments of education, and took him into the shop, where he kept him for some years. The son's inclination, however, being strongly bent on learning, he took all opportunities of gratifying his thirst after knowledge. He laid out all the money he could muster in books, and devoted every moment of his leisure hours to study. His acquaintance with Mr. Locke, who was his maternal uncle, and who, at his death, left him half his library, was of vast advantage to him. That gentleman availed himself of an opportunity to examine his nephew, and being greatly surprised and pleased with his prodigious rious attainments in literature, prevailed upon his father to send him to the university of Leyden, where he prosecuted his studies with great success. He appears to have turned his attention chiefly to divinity; and when only twenty-two years of age, gave good proof of his acquirements, by publishing the first part of his celebrated "Inquiry into the Constitution, Discipline, Unity, and Worship of the primitive Church, that flourished within the first three hundred years after Christ, faithfully collected out of the extant writings of those ages," 1691, octavo. In the preface to this work, the author modestly requested to be shown, either publicly or privately, any mistakes he might have fallen into, in handling the subject; and his request was first complied with by Mr. Edmund Elys, between whom and the author there passed several letters in 1692, which were published by Mr. Elys, in 1694, in octavo, under the title of "Letters on several Subjects."

On his return from Leyden, Mr. King, and it is said to have been by the advice of Mr. Locke, entered himself a student at the Inner Temple, and applied himself to the law; in which profession his great parts and indefatigable industry, for both of which he was remarkable, soon made him eminent. He had not been many years at the Temple, when he had acquired as high a reputation for his knowledge in law, as he previously had for his theological attainments. In 1702, he published "The History of the Apostles' Creed, with Critical Observations on its several Articles," octavo. This treatise displayed extraordinary learning and judgment, and established the author's literary fame. On the accession of George the First, he was appointed lord chief justice of the court of common pleas, and soon after sworn of the privy council. He was created a peer, the 25th of May, 1725, by the title of lord King, baron of Oakham, in Sarry; and the great seal being taken from lord Macclesfield, was delivered to him. He continued in the office of lord high chancellor, till the 26th of November, 1733, when he resigned the seals, and on the 22d of July, 1734, his life also.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

KING. It appears to have been a maxim of the Hebrew law, that the person of the king was inviolable, whatever his character may have been, 1 Sam. 24: 5—8. 2 Sam. 1: 14. We have already seen, that by the law of Moses the Israelitish monarchy was to be hereditary, and the history of the Jews shows that this law was strictly attended to. Nevertheless, it appears from the history of David, that the succession did not necessarily go by the right of primogeniture, for he appointed Solomon as his successor, in preference to Adonijah, his elder brother.

The inauguration of the king next demands our attention. There can be little doubt, that all the kings were anointed; hence king and anointed seem to have been used as synonymous terms, 1 Sam. 2: 10. 2 Sam. 1: 14, 21. This anointing was sometimes performed privately by a prophet, (1 Sam. 10: 1. 16: 1—13. 1 Kings 19: 16. 2 Kings 9: 1—6,) and was a symbolical prediction that the person so anointed would, at some future period, ascend the throne. After the monarchy was established, this unction was performed by a priest, (1 Kings 1: 39.) at first in some public place, (1 Kings 1: 32—34.) and afterwards, in the temple, the monarch elect being surrounded by his guards, 2 Kings 11: 12, 13. 2 Chron. 13. Some are of opinion that he was at the same time girded with a sword, Ps. 45: 3. The next step was to place the diadem or crown upon the sovereign's head, and the sceptre in his hand. To the former of these there is an allusion in Ps. 21: 3, and also in Ezek. 21: 26, and to the latter in Ps. 45: 6. When the diadem was placed on the head of the monarch, he entered into a solemn covenant with his subjects, that he would govern according to the law; (2 Sam. 5: 3. 1 Chron. 11: 3.) after which the nobles pledged themselves to obedience, and confirmed the pledge with the kiss of homage, or, as the Jews call it, the kiss of majesty, 1 Sam. 10: 1. This ceremony is probably alluded to in the following passage of the Psalmist: "Kiss the Son, lest he be angry," &c.; (Ps. 2: 12.) that is, acknowledge him as your king, pay him homage, and yield him subjection. Loud acclamations, accompanied with music, then followed, after which the king entered the city, 1 Kings 1: 39, 40. 2 Kings 11: 12, 19. 2 Chron. 23: 11. To this practice there are numerous allusions both in the Old Testament (Ps. 47: 2—9. 97: 1. 99: 9, &c.) as well as in the New; (Matt. 21: 9, 10. Mark 11: 9, 10. Luke 19: 35, 38.) in which last cited passages the Jews, by welcoming our Savior in the same manner as their kings were formerly, manifestly acknowledged him to be the Messiah whom they expected.

In noticing the state and grandeur of the Jewish monarchs, we must not omit mentioning their attendants and guards; particularly the Cherethites and Pelethites, of whom there is frequent mention in the histories of David and Solomon, 2 Sam. 15: 18. 20: 7. 8: 16, 18. They seem to have been the king's body-guard, like the prætorian band among the Romans. Their number may probably be gathered from the targets and shields of gold, which Solomon made for his guards; which were five hundred, 1 Kings 10: 16, 17, compared with 2 Chron. 12: 9—11. Yet, notwithstanding all this royal state and grandeur, they were only God's viceroys, bound to govern according to the statute-law of the land, which they, as well as their subjects, were required to obey. (See GOVERNMENT OF THE HEBREWS; HABITS; HORSES; JUSTICE, ADMINISTRATION OF; REVENUE; TRIBUTE.)—Calmet.

KINGDOM OF GOD, in Scripture, is a term of frequent occurrence, and variously applied to the providential, moral, and evangelical government of JEHOVAH. Thus we read of the kingdom of God, (Ps. 103: 19. Dan. 4: 3.) or his universal empire and dominion over all creatures; in reference to which it is said, "Jehovah is a great God, and a great King above all gods," Ps. 95: 3. "His throne is established in the heavens, and his kingdom ruleth over all."

Again: we frequently read in the evangelists of the kingdom of heaven; a phrase, says Dr. Campbell, in which there is a manifest allusion to the predictions in which the dispensation of the Messiah was revealed by the prophets in the Old Testament, particularly by Daniel, who mentions it as "a kingdom which the God of heaven would set up, and which should never be destroyed," Dan. 2: 44. The same prophet also speaks of it as a kingdom to be given, with glory and dominion over all people, nations, and languages, to one like unto the Son of man, Dan. 7: 13, 14. See also Micah 4: 6, 7. The Jews, accustomed to this way of speaking, expected the kingdom of the Messiah to resemble that of a temporal king, exercising power on his enemies, restoring the Hebrew monarchy, and the throne of David to all its splendor; subduing the nations, and rewarding his friends and faithful servants, in proportion to their fidelity and services. Hence the early contests among the apostles about precedence in his kingdom; and hence the sons of Zebedee desired the two chief places in it.

According to the prophecy of Daniel, this kingdom was to take place during the existence of the Roman empire, the last of the four great monarchies that had succeeded each other, Dan. 2: 44. And as it was set up by the God of heaven, it is, in the New Testament, termed "the kingdom of God," or "the kingdom of heaven." It was typified by the Jewish theocracy, and declared to be at hand by John the Baptist, and by Christ and his apostles also in the days of his flesh; but it did not come with power till Jesus rose from the dead and sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high, Acts 2: 32—37. Then was he most solemnly inaugurated, and proclaimed King of the universe, and especially of the New Testament church, amidst adorning myriads of attendant angels, and "the spirits of just men made perfect." Then were fulfilled the words of Jehovah by David, "I have set my King upon my holy hill of Zion," Ps. 2: 6. This is that spiritual, evangelical, and eternal empire to which he himself referred when interrogated before Pontius Pilate, and in reference to which he said, "My kingdom is not of this world," John 18: 36, 37. His empire, indeed, extends to every creature; for "all authority is committed into his hands, both in heaven and on earth," and he is "head over all things to the church;" but his kingdom primarily imports the gospel Church, which is the subject of his laws, the seat of his government, and the object of his care; and, being surrounded with powerful opposers, he is represented as ruling in the midst of his enemies.

This kingdom is not of a worldly origin, or nature, nor has it this world for its end or object, Rom. 14: 17. 1 Cor. 4: 20. It can neither be promoted nor defended by worldly power, influence, or carnal weapons, but by bearing witness unto the truth, or by the preaching of the gospel with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven, 2 Cor. 10: 4, 5. Its establishment among men is progressive, but it is destined at last to fill the whole earth, Dan. 2. Rev. 11: 15. Its real subjects are only those who are of the truth, and hear Christ's voice; for none can enter it but such as are born from above; (John 3: 3—5. Matt. 18: 3. 19: 14. Mark 10: 15.) nor can any be visible subjects of it, but such as appear to be regenerated, by a credible profession of faith and obedience, Luke 16: 16. Matt. 20: 28—44. Its privileges and immunities are not of this world, but such as are spiritual and heavenly; they are all spiritual blessings in heavenly things in Christ Jesus, Eph. 1: 3. Over this glorious kingdom death has no power; it extends as well to the future as the present world; and though entered here by renewing grace, (Col. 1: 13.) it is inherited in its perfection in the world of glory, Matt. 25: 34. 1 Cor. 15: 50. 2 Pet. 1: 11. Hypocrites and false brethren may indeed insinuate themselves into it here; but they will have no possible place in it hereafter, Matt. 13: 41, 47—50. 22: 11—14. Luke 13: 28, 29. 1 Cor. 6: 9, 10. Gal. 5: 21. Rev. 21: 27.—Watson; Calmet.

KINGDOM OF HEAVEN, is an expression used in the New Testament, to signify the reign, or administration, of Jesus Christ on earth and in heaven, Matt. 4: 17. 5: 3, 10, 12, 20. 6: 10, 33. 7: 21. (See KINGDOM OF GOD.)

KINGS, Books or. The first book of Kings commences with an account of the death of David, and contains a period of a hundred and twenty-six years, to the death of Jehoshaphat; and the second book of Kings continues the history of the kings of Israel and Judah through a period of three hundred years, to the destruction of the city and temple of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar. These two books formed only one in the Hebrew canon, and they were probably compiled by Ezra from the records which were regularly kept, both in Jerusalem and Samaria, of all public transactions. These records appear to have been made by the contemporary prophets, and frequently derived their names from the kings whose history they contained. They are mentioned in many parts of Scripture; thus, (1 Kings 11: 41.) we read of the Book of the Acts of Solomon, which is supposed to have been written by Nathan, Ahijah, and Iddo, 2 Chron. 9: 29. We elsewhere read that Shemaiah the prophet, and Iddo the seer, wrote the Acts of Rehoboam, (2 Chron. 12: 15.) that Jehu wrote the Acts of Jehoshaphat, (2 Chron. 20: 34.) and Isaiah those of Uzziah and Hezekiah, 2 Chron. 26: 22. 32: 32. We may therefore conclude, that from these public records, and other authentic documents, were composed the two books of Kings; and the uniformity of their style favors the opinion of their being put into their present shape by the same inspired person.—Watson.

KING'S MOTHER. That "king's mother" was a title of dignity, is obvious by 1 Kings 2: 19.

From the travels of Bruce we learn, (1.) That the title and place of Iteghé, or, "king's mother," is of great consequence; we find her interfering much in public affairs, keeping a separate palace and court, possessing great influence and authority. (2.) That while any Iteghé is living, it is contrary to law to crown another; which accounts at once for Asa's Iteghé, or king's mother, being his grandmother, the same person as held that dignity before he came to the crown. (3.) That this title occurs also in other parts of the East; and is given without consideration of natural maternity. (4.) It should seem, that "Queen," in our sense of the word, is a title and station unknown in the royal harem throughout the East. If it be taken at all, it is by that wife who brings a son after the king's coronation; such son being presumptive heir to the crown, his mother is sometimes entitled "Sultana Queen," or "prime Sultana;" but not with the English ideas annexed to the title queen. (5.) That this person is called indifferently, "Queen," or "Iteghé," or "King's Mother," even by Bruce; whence arises the very same ambiguity in him, as has been remarked in Scripture, 1 Kings 15: 1—10. 2 Chron. 13: 4, 16. 2 Kings 24: 12, 15, comp. with Jer. 29: 2. This illustration also sets in its proper light the interference of the "queen," in the story of Belshazzar, Dan. 5: 10. In order to determine who was this "queen," which has been a desideratum among learned men, it is not enough to know who might be Belshazzar's wife, or wives, at the time; but also who was Iteghé, or king's mother, before he came to the crown; and who, therefore, being well acquainted with former events, and continuing in the same dignity, might naturally allude to them on this occasion. Had inquiry into this matter been conducted on these principles, in all probability, it had been more conformable to the manners of the East, and had superseded many ineffectual conjectures.—Calmet.

KIPPIS, (ANDREW,) a dissenting divine, biographer, and miscellaneous writer, the son of a silk mercer, was born, in 1725, at Nottingham; was educated by Dr. Doddridge; and, after having been minister at Boston and at Dorking, was appointed, in 1753, pastor to a congregation in Prince's street, Westminster. In 1763, he was chosen classical and philological tutor to the academy founded by Mr. Coward; and this office he held for more than a quarter of a century. He was subsequently connected with the Hackney Institution. Dr. Kippis was a member of the Royal and Antiquarian societies. He died in 1795, leaving behind him a well-earned reputation for learning, character, and talents. Kippis contributed to the Monthly Review, and other periodicals; projected and wrote in the New Annual Register; and produced, besides various occasional pamphlets, Lives of Cook, Pringle, Doddridge, and Lardner; but his great work was the new edition of the Biographical Britannica, of which only five volumes were published. It was conducted on a plan so elaborate, that no termination of it on the same scale is ever likely to be attempted.—Davenport.

KIR; a city of Moab, Isa. 15: 1. 2. Part of Albania and Media, where the river Kyrus flows, 2 Kings 16: 9. Isa. 22: 6. Amos 1: 5. 9: 7.—Calmet.

KIRJATH-HUZOTH, (the city of squares), was the royal seat of Balak, king of Moab; and therefore may well be supposed to have had handsome streets, &c. Num. 22: 39.—Calmet.

KIRJATH-JEARIM. (See DEBIR.)

KIRJATH-SEPHER, (the city of books), otherwise Debir, Kirjath-debir, the city of words; a city in the tribe of Judah, afterwards given to Caleb. It was taken by Othniel, to whom Caleb for his reward gave his daughter Achsah in marriage, Josh. 15: 15. Judg. 1: 11, &c. This city was so called long before Moses; at least it would seem so by the manner of mentioning it, which proves that books were known before that legislator, and that he is not the oldest writer, as the fathers have asserted; a character which it is to be observed he never assumes. It is possible that the Canaanites might lodge their records in this city, and those few monuments of antiquity which they had preserved; or it might be something like the cities of the priests in Israel, the residence of the learned; a kind of college. This idea receives confirmation from its other name, Debir, which designates an oracle; and seems to hint at a seat of learning, a college, or university; an establishment, probably, of priests, for the purpose of educating the younger members of their body. The circumstance is very remarkable, because it occurs so early as the days of Joshua; and is evidently an establishment by the Canaanites, previous to the Hebrew invasion. It contributes, therefore, greatly to prove that the origin of letters was not the revelation of them to Moses on mount Sinai, as some have imagined; since, beside the silence of Moses on that matter, we find indications of their being already in use elsewhere.—Calmet.

KIRK SESSIONS, the name of a petty ecclesiastical judicatory in Scotland. Each parish, according to its extent, is divided into several particular districts, every one of which has its own elders and deacons to oversee it. A consistory of the minister, elders, and deacon of a parish, form a kirk session. These meet once a week, the minister being their moderator, but without a negative voice. It regulates matters relative to public worship, elections, catechising, visitations, &c. It judges in matters of less scandal; but greater, as adultery, are left to the presbytery, and in all cases an appeal lies from it to the presbytery. Kirk sessions have likewise the care of the poor, and poor's funds. (See CHURCH OF SCOTLAND, and PRESBYTERIANISM.)—Hend. Buck.

KIRKLAND, (SAMUEL,) a missionary among the Indians. His father was minister of Norwich, Con. He was graduated at the college in New Jersey, in 1765. While at school he had learned the language of the Mohawks; and he commenced a journey to the Seneca Indians in order to acquire their language, Nov. 20, 1764, and did not return till May, 1766. He was ordained at Lebanon, June 19th, as a missionary to the Indians. He removed his wife to Oneida castle in 1769. In the spring following he went to the house of his friend, general Herkimer, at Little Falls; and there his twin children were born, Aug. 17, 1770, of whom one is Dr. Kirkland, late president of Harvard college. For more than forty years his attention was directed to the Oneida tribe in New York, and he died at Paris, in that state, the place of his residence, in the neighborhood of Oneida, March 28, 1808, aged sixty-six.

Mr. Kirkland was instrumental in the conversion of Shenandoah, the famous Oneida chief, whose subsequent life illustrated the power of the gospel, and whose last words were, "Bury me by the side of my minister and friend, that I may go up with him at the great resurrection!" Wheelock's Narratives; Panoplist, iii. 536; Christian Orator.—Allen.

KIRWAN, (WALTER BLAKE,) an eloquent Irish divine, born about 1754, at Galway; was educated at St. Omer's and Louvain; took orders as a Catholic priest; and, in 1778, was appointed chaplain to the Neapolitan ambassador. In 1787, becoming a Protestant, he conformed to the established church of England, and, after having held the living of St. Nicholas, in Dublin, was promoted to the deanery of Killala. He died in 1805. As a pulpit orator, Kirwan had no rival among his contemporaries; and his powers were often exerted with astonishing success in favor of charitable institutions. The collection on one occasion was not less than thirteen hundred pounds. A volume of his Sermons was published after his decease. Of Kirwan it was being fluently said, that "he came to rouse one world with the thunders of another." London Chris. Observer, 1814.—Davenport.

KISHON. "That ancient river, the river Kishon," falls into the bay of Acre, and has its source in the hills to the east of the plain of Esdraelon, which it intersects. Being enlarged by several small streams, it passes between mount Carmel and the hills to the north, and then falls into the sea at this point. In the condition we saw it, says Maundrell, its waters were low and inconsiderable; but in passing along the side of the plain, we discerned the tracks of many lesser torrents, falling down into it from the mountains, which must needs make it swell exceedingly upon sudden rains, as doubtless it actually did at the destruction of Siser's host. (See ESRAELON.) Robinson's Bib. Repos. for 1831.—Watson.

KISS; a mode of salutation, and token of respect, which has been practised in all nations. It was also in ordinary use among the Jews; hence Judas in this way saluted his master. But there was also the kiss of homage, as one of the ceremonies performed at the inauguration of the kings of Israel. The Jews called it the kiss of majesty. Ps. 2: 12. seems to be an allusion to this. (See KINGS.) St. Paul speaks frequently of the kiss of peace, which was in use among believers, and was given by them to one another as a token of charity and union, Rom. 16: 16. 1 Cor. 16: 20. 2 Cor. 13: 12. 1 Thess. 5: 26. 1 Peter 5: 14. Acts 20: 37. Kissing the feet is in Eastern countries expressive of exuberant gratitude or reverence, Luke 7: 45.

Catholics kiss the bishop's hand, or rather the ring which he wears in virtue of his episcopal office. Kissing the foot or toe has been required by the popes as a sign of respect from the secular power since the eighth century. The first who received this honor was pope Constantine I. It was paid him by the emperor Justinian II, on his entry into Constantinople, in 710. Valentine I., about 827, required every one to kiss his foot; and, from that time, this mark of reverence appears to have been expected by all popes. When the ceremony takes place, the pope wears a slipper with a cross, which is kissed. In more recent times, Protestants have not been obliged to kiss the pope's foot, but merely to bend the knee slightly.

The kiss of peace forms part of one of the Catholic rites. It is given immediately before the communion; the clergyman who celebrates mass kissing the altar, and embracing the deacon, saying, "Pax tibi, frater, et ecclesie sancta Dei;" the deacon does the same to the sub-deacon, saying "Pax tecum;" the latter salutes the other clergy.

The kiss of charity, which still obtains among certain sects as an ordinance to be observed in public, is only the same custom under a different form. That such a practice obtained in the church at a very early period cannot be denied, as it is mentioned by Justin, Tertullian, and other fathers, when referring to the Agape; a practice on which the pagans founded the calumny of promiscuous embraces; but it is without any warrant from Scripture; the salutation there called the "holy kiss," and the "kiss of charity," not being enjoined as a public rite, or church observance, but simply an occasional greeting of Christian kindness, as circumstances of meeting afforded an opportunity. It should be remembered also, that in both Jewish and Christian assemblies, the two sexes sat apart.—Watson; Hend. Buck.

KITE, (ajah;) Lev. 11: 14. Deut. 14: 13. Job 28: 7. Bochart supposes this to be the bird which the Arabians call the ja-jao, from its note; and which the ancients named asalon, "the merlin," a bird celebrated for its sharp-sightedness. This faculty is referred to in Job 28: 7, where the word is rendered "vulture." As a noun masculine plural, ajim, in Isa. 13: 22. 34: 14, and Jer. 1: 39, Bochart says that jackals are intended; but, by the several contexts, particularly the last, it may well mean a kind of unclean bird, and so be the same with that mentioned above.—Watson.

KITRON; a city of Zebulun, which that tribe could not take from the Canaanites, Judg. 1: 30. Kitron is Sippor, (Sepphoris,) says Bab. Megill. (fol. 6. 1.) a very strong place, and the largest city in Galilee. It is noted in the Talmuds for being a university; in which taught rabbi Judah the Holy, who died here.—Calmet.

KLOPSTOCK, (FREDERIC THEOPHILUS,) one of the most eminent poets of Germany, was born, in 1724, at Quedlinburg, and was educated at the college of that place, at Jena, and at Leipsic. The first three cantos of his Messiah were published, in 1748, in a Bremen periodical work; in 1751 the first five appeared, and, in 1755, the first ten; the concluding ten did not appear till 1769. In 1750, the king of Denmark invited him to Copenhagen, and gave him a pension. Klopstock continued to reside in the Danish capital till 1771, when he removed to Hamburg, to fill the offices of Danish legate, and counsellor from the court of Baden. He died March 14, 1803. As a lyrical writer Klopstock is perhaps among the most successful of any age. He may well be called the Pindar of modern poetry; but that he is superior to him in richness and deep feeling, as the spiritual world which he paints, excels in intrinsic magnificence the subjects celebrated by the Grecian poet. His religious odes exhibit the elevation of the Psalmist. Purity and noble feeling were the characteristics of his mind. The most illiterate cannot fail to understand and venerate Klopstock as a writer of sacred poetry.

His first wife, MARGARET, whom he married in 1754, and who died in 1758, was a woman of genius. Among her works are Letters from the Dead to the Living; and the Death of Abel, a tragedy. Her husband placed over her remains this simple and beautiful epitaph:—"Seed sown by God, to ripen for the harvest."

The Messiah is a work of great sublimity and beauty; but Klopstock has certainly failed to accomplish that which some of his countrymen sanguinely hoped from him; namely, to eclipse the Paradise Lost. His patriotic Odes glow with poetic fire, and his Tragedies, though not calculated for the stage, are worthy of their author. Ency. Ame.—Davenport.

KNEADING-TROUGHS. In the description of the departure of the Israelites from Egypt, (Exod. 12: 34.) we read that "the people took their dough before it was leavened, their kneading-troughs being bound up in their clothes upon their shoulders." Persons who know how cumbersome our kneading-troughs are, and how much less important they are than many other utensils, may wonder at this statement, and find a difficulty in accounting for it. But this wonder will cease, when it is understood that the vessels which the Arabs make use of, for kneading the unleavened cakes they prepare for those who travel in the very desert through which Israel passed, are only small wooden bowls; and that they seem to use no other in their own tents for that purpose, or any other; these bowls being used by them for kneading their bread, and serving up their provisions when cooked. It will appear, that nothing could be more convenient than kneading-troughs of this sort for the Israelites in their journey. Besides, Dr. Pococke gives us a description of a round leather coverlid, which the Arabs lay on the ground, and which serves them to eat off. This piece of furniture has, he says, rings round it by which it is drawn together with a chain, that has a hook to it, to hang it by. It is drawn together, and in this manner they bring it full of bread, and when the repast is over, carry it away at once, with all that is left. Perhaps this utensil is rather to be understood by the word translated kneading-troughs, than the Arab wooden bowl. There is nothing, in the other three places in which the word occurs, to contradict this explanation. These places are Exod. 8: 3. Deut. 28: 5. and 17; in the two last of which places it is translated store.

Many of the sneers that pass for wit, while they are nothing better than sheer ignorance, lose even that shadow of support to their profaneness, at which they catch, by more correct information.—Calmet.

KNEE, not only signifies that part of the body so called, but the whole body, a part being put for the whole, Ps. 109: 24. Also for persons; so, weak and feeble knees denote weak and disconsolate persons, Job 4: 4. Heb. 12: 12. Isa. 35: 3.—Brown.

KNIFE. To put a knife to our throat at the table of the great, is carefully to restrain our appetite, as if we were in the utmost hazard of eating too much, Prov. 23: 2.—Bronn.

KNOCK. Jesus knocks at the door of our heart; by his word, spirit, and providence he awakens, invites, and urges us to receive himself as the free gift of God, and Savior come to seek and save that which was lost, Rev. 3: 20. Sol. Song 5: 2. Our knocking at his door of mercy is fervent and frequent prayers for his distinguished presence and favor, Matt. 7: 7, 8. Luke 11: 10.—Bronn.

KNOLLYS, (HANSARD;) a very eminent minister among the English Baptists of the seventeenth century. He was a man of great learning, sound principles, solid piety, and true pulpit eloquence. He was deservedly popular as a preacher, and suffered greatly for conscience' sake. Few men of his age were more useful. He was an Episcopal minister some years, but came to this country in 1633, a Baptist. For some hard things said of the Massachusetts government he ingeniously made a confession in Boston. He was the first minister ever settled in Dover, N. H. where he preached from 1635 to 1639. He was afterwards involved in some disturbances, and went to Long Island. Most of the New England historians have abused his character in a shameful manner. Only Cotton Mather has done him justice. About 1642, he returned to England, and formed a large Baptist church in London, of which he was near fifty years the minister. He died, September 19, 1691, aged ninety-three. He published Rudiments of the Hebrew Grammar, 1648.—Backus; Veimey.

KNOWLEDGE, is defined by Mr. Locke to be the perception of the connexion and agreement, or disagreement and repugnancy of our ideas. It also denotes learning, or the improvement of our faculties by reading; experience, or the acquiring new ideas or truths, by seeing a variety of objects, and making observations upon them in our own minds. No man, says the admirable Dr. Watts, is obliged to learn and know every thing; this can neither be sought nor required, for it is utterly impossible: yet all persons are under some obligation to improve their own understanding, otherwise it will be a barren desert, or a forest overgrown with weeds and brambles. Universal ignorance, or infinite error, will over-spread the mind which is utterly neglected and lies without any cultivation.

The following rules, therefore, should be attended to for the improvement of knowledge:—1. Deeply possess your mind with the vast importance of a good judgment, and the rich and inestimable advantage of right reasoning.—2. Consider the weaknesses, failings, and mistakes of human nature in general.—3. Be not satisfied with a slight view of things, but take a wide survey now and then of the vast and unlimited regions of learning, the variety of questions and difficulties belonging to every science.—4. Presume not too much upon a bright genius, a ready wit, and good parts; for this, without study, will never make a man of knowledge.—5. Do not imagine that large and laborious reading, and a strong memory, can denominate you truly wise, without meditation and studious thought.—6. Be not so weak as to imagine that a life of learning is a life of laziness.—7. Let the hope of new discoveries, as well as the satisfaction and pleasure of known truths, animate your daily industry.—8. Do not hover always on the surface of things, nor take up suddenly with mere appearances.—9. Once a day, especially in the early years of life and study, call yourselves to an account what new ideas you have gained.—10. Maintain a constant watch, at all times, against a dogmatical spirit.—11. Be humble and courageous enough to retract any mistake, and confess an error.—12. Beware of a fanciful temper of mind, and a humorous conduct.—13. Have a care of trifling with things important and momentous, or of sporting with things awful and sacred.—14. Ever maintain a virtuous and pious frame of spirit.—15. Watch against the pride of your own reason, and a vain conceit of your own intellectual powers, with the neglect of divine aid and blessing.—16. Offer up, therefore, your daily requests to God, the Father of Lights, that he would bless all your attempts and labors in reading, study, and conversation.—Watts on the Mind; Dr. John Edwards' Uncertainty, Deficiency, and Corruption of Human Knowledge; Reid's Intellectual Powers of Man; Stennett's Sermon on Acts 26: 24, 25. Upham's Intellectual Philosophy; Douglas on the Advancement of Society; Works of Robert Hall; *Amer. KNOWLEDGE OF GOD, is often taken for the fear of God, and the whole of religion. There is, indeed, a speculative knowledge, which consists only in the belief of his existence, and the acknowledgment of his perfections, but has no influence on the heart and conduct. A spiritual, saving knowledge is attended with veneration for the Divine Being, (Ps. 89: 7.) love to him as an object of beauty and goodness, (Zech. 9: 17.) humble confidence in his mercy and promise, (Ps. 9: 10.) and sincere, uniform, and persevering obedience to his word, 1 John 2: 3. It may further be considered as a knowledge of God, the Father; of his love, faithfulness, power, &c. Of the Son, as it relates to the dignity of his nature, (1 John 5: 20.) the suitability of his offices, (Heb. 9.) the perfection of his work, (Ps. 68: 18.) the brightness of his example, (Acts 10: 38.) and the prevalence of his intercession, Heb. 7: 25. Of the Holy Ghost, as equal with the Father and the Son; of his agency as an enlightener and comforter; as also in his work of witnessing, sanctifying, and directing his people, John 15, 16. 2 Cor. 3: 17, 18. John 3: 5, 6. Rom. 8: 16.

This knowledge may be considered as experimental, (2 Tim. 1: 12.) confiding, (Job 13: 15, 16.) affectionate, (1 John 3: 19.) influential, (Ps. 9: 16. Matt. 5: 16.) self-abasing, (Is. 6. Job 42: 5, 6.) satisfying, (Psal. 36: 7. Prov. 3: 17.) and superior to all other knowledge, Phil. 3: 8.

The advantages of religious knowledge are very great. It forms the basis of true honor and felicity. Not all the lustre of a noble birth, not all the influence of wealth, not all the pomp of titles, not all the splendor of power, can give dignity to the soul that is destitute of inward improvement. By this we are allied to angels, and are capable of rising forever in the scale of being. Such is its inherent worth, that it hath always been represented under the most pleasing images. In particular, it hath been compared to light, the most valuable and reviving of nature's works, and to that glorious luminary which is the most beautiful and transporting object our eyes behold. If we entertain any doubts concerning the intrinsic value of religious knowledge, let us look around us, and we shall be convinced how desirable it is to be acquainted with God, with spiritual, with eternal things. Observe the difference between a cultivated and a barren country. While the former is a lovely, cheerful, and delightful sight, the other administers a spectacle of horror. There is an equal difference between the nations among whom the principles of piety prevail, and the nations that are overrun with idolatry, superstition, and error. Knowledge, also, is of great importance to our personal and private felicity: it furnishes a pleasure that cannot be met with in the possession of inferior enjoyments; a fine entertainment, which adds a relish to prosperity, and alleviates the hour of distress. It throws a lustre upon greatness, and reflects an honor upon poverty. Knowledge will also instruct us how to apply our several talents for the benefit of mankind. It will make us capable of advising and regulating others. Hence we may become the lights of the world, and diffuse those munificent beams around us, which shall shine on benighted travellers, and discover the path of rectitude and bliss. This knowledge, also, tends to destroy bigotry and enthusiasm. To this we are indebted for the important change which hath been made since the beginning of the Reformation. To this we are indebted for the general cultivation and refinement of the understandings of men. It is owing to this that even arbitrary governments seem to have lost something of their original ferocity, and that there is a source of improvement in Europe which will, we hope, in future times, shed the most delightful influences on society, and unite its members in harmony, peace, and love. But the advantages of religious knowledge are still greater, for it points out to us an eternal felicity. The several branches of human science are intended only to bless and adorn our present existence; but religious knowledge bids us provide for an immortal being, sets the path of salvation before us, and is our inseparable companion in the road to glory. As it instructs in the way to endless bliss, so it will survive that mighty day when all worldly literature and accomplishments shall forever cease. At that solemn period, in which the records and registers of men shall be destroyed, the systems of human policy be dissolved, and the grandest works of genius die, the wisdom which is spiritual and heavenly shall not only subsist, but be increased to an extent that human nature cannot in this life admit. Our views of things, at present, are obscure, imperfect, partial, and liable to error; but when we arrive at the realms of everlasting light, the clouds that shadowed our understanding will be removed; we shall behold, with amazing clearness, the attributes, ways, and works of God; shall perceive more distinctly the design of his dispensations; shall trace with rapture the wonders of nature and grace, and become acquainted with a thousand glorious objects, of which the imagination can as yet have no conception, 1 Cor. 13: 9—12.

In order to increase in the knowledge of God, there must be dependence on him from whom all light proceeds, (Jas. 1: 6.) attention to his revealed will, (John 5: 39.) a watchful spirit against corrupt affections, (Luke 21: 34.) a humble frame of mind, (Ps. 25: 9.) frequent meditation, (Ps. 101: 34.) a persevering design of conformity to the divine image, Hos. 6: 3. Charnock's Works, vol. ii. p. 331; Saurin's Sermon, vol. i. ser. 1; Gill's Body of Div., vol. iii. p. 12, 8vo; Tillotson's Sermon, ser. 113; Watts' Works, vol. i. ser. 45; Hall's Sermon on the Advantages of Knowledge to the Lower Classes; Foster's Essay on Popular Ignorance; Dwight's Theology.—*Hend. KNOX, (JOHN,) the great champion of the Scottish reformation, was born, in 1505, at Gifford, in East Lothian, and was educated at Haddington and St. Andrews. After he was created master of arts, he taught philosophy, most probably as a regent in one of the colleges of the university. His class became celebrated, and he was considered as equalling, if not excelling, his master, in the subtleties of the dialectic art. About the same time, although he had no interest but what was procured by his own merit, he was advanced to clerical orders, and ordained a priest before he reached the age fixed by the canons of the church. At this time, the fathers of the Christian church, Jerome and Augustine, attracted his particular attention. By the writings of the former, he was led to the Scriptures as the only pure fountain of divine truth, and instructed in the utility of studying them in the original languages. In the works of the latter he found religious sentiments very opposite to those taught in the Romish church, who, while she retained his name as a saint in her calendar, had banished his doctrine as heretical from her pulpits. From this time he renounced the study of scholastic theology; and, although not yet completely emancipated from superstition, his mind was fitted for improving the means which Providence had given for leading him to a fuller and more comprehensive view of the system of evangelical religion. It was about the year 1535, when this favorable change commenced; but it does not appear that he professed himself a Protestant before the year 1542. He was converted from the Romish faith by Wishart, and became a zealous preacher of the new doctrines. Having been compelled to take shelter in the castle of St. Andrews, he fell into the hands of the French in July, 1547, and was carried with the garrison to France, where he remained a captive on board of the galleys till 1549. Subsequent to his liberation he was for a short time chaplain to Edward VI., after which he visited Geneva and Frankfort, and, in 1555, returned to his native country. After having for twelve months labored actively and successfully to strengthen the Protestant cause in Scotland, he revisited Geneva, where he remained till 1559. During his residence in Geneva he published his First Blast of the Trumpet against the monstrous Government of Women; a treatise which was levelled against Mary of England, but which gave serious offence to Elizabeth. From April, 1559, when he once more and finally set foot on Scottish earth, till his decease, which took place November 24, 1572, the reformed church was triumphant, and he was one of its most prominent, admired, and honored leaders.

When his body was laid in the grave, the regent of Scotland emphatically pronounced his eulogium, in the well-known words, "There lies he who never feared the face of man."

Knox has been styled the intrepid reformer; and that character he unquestionably deserves. In personal intrepidity, and popular eloquence, he resembled Luther. His doctrinal sentiments were those of Calvin; and like Zuinglius, he felt an attachment to the principles of religious liberty. He effected much in the great work of the reformation; but his manners were so severe, and his temper so acrid, that whilst he may be equally respected with Luther and Melancthon, he is not equally beloved. Knox was, however, known and beloved by the principal persons among the reformed in France, Switzerland, and Germany; and the affectionate veneration in which his memory was held in Scotland after his death, evinced that the influence he possessed among his countrymen, during his life, was not constrained, but founded on the high opinion which they entertained. Banatyne has thus drawn his character, and it is unquestionably entitled to consideration:—"In this manner (says he) departed this man of God; the light of Scotland, the comfort of the church within the same, the mirror of godliness, and pattern, and example to all true ministers, in purity of life, soundness of doctrine, and boldness in reproving of wickedness; one that cared not for the favor of men, how great soever they were."

Of his works the principal is a History of the Reformation in Scotland: the fourth edition of it includes all his other writings. Life of Knox by Dr. McCre. Jones' Chris. Biog.—Hend. Buck; Davenport.

KNOX, (Dr. VICIUSMUS,) a divine and miscellaneous writer, was born in 1752; was educated at Merchant Tailors school, and at St. John's college, Oxford; succeeded his father as head master of Tunbridge school; held that situation for thirty-three years; obtained the livings of Runwell and Ramsden Crays, in Essex, and the chapelry of Shipbourne, in Kent; and died December 6, 1821. Among his original works are, Essays, Moral and Literary; Liberal Education; Winter Evenings; Personal Nobility; Christian Philosophy; and The Spirit of Despotism. He was the compiler of the Elegant Extracts and Epistles.—Davenport.

KOHATH; the second son of Levi, and father of Amram, Izhar, Hebron, and Uzziel, Gen. 46: 11. Exod. 6: 18. Kohath's family was appointed to carry the ark and sacred vessels of the tabernacle, while the Israelites marched through the wilderness, Num. 4, &c.—Watson.

KOLLOCK, (HENRY, D. D.,) minister of Savannah, was born at New Providence, New Jersey, December 14, 1778, and was graduated at Princeton, in 1794. In December, 1800, he was ordained at Elizabethtown. In December, 1803, he was appointed professor of theology at Princeton, having a care also of the church. His abilities and eloquence procured him great respect.

In 1806, he removed to Savannah, where he was a minister about thirteen years. For a time some ecclesiastical difficulties, founded on a charge of intemperance, threw a cloud over his good name. He went to Europe in 1817, and returned with invigorated health. He died, December 19, 1819, aged forty-one. After his death, his sermons were published in four volumes.—Allen.

KORAH, was the son of Izhar, of the race of Levi, and father of Asher, Elkanah, and Alisaph, and head of the Korites, a celebrated family among the Levites. Korah, being dissatisfied with the rank he held among the sons of Levi, and envying the authority of Moses and Aaron, formed a party against them, in which he engaged Dathan, Abiram, and On, with two hundred and fifty of the principal Levites, Num. 16: 1—3, &c. When Korah, for his rebellion, was swallowed up in the earth, his sons were preserved from his misfortunes.

In succeeding generations the sons of Korah continued as before to serve in the tabernacle of the Lord. David appointed them their office in the temple, to guard the doors, and sing the praises of God. To them are ascribed several psalms, which are designated by the name of Korah; as the forty-second, forty-fourth to the forty-ninth, eighty-fourth to the eighty-seventh; in all, eleven psalms.—Watson.

KORAN, or with the article, AL-KORAN, (Alcoran,) i. e. the Koran, which originally means the reading, or that which is to be read, is the Bible, or religious code of the Mohammedans, written in Arabic by Mohammed. It is also called Al-Forkan, either from its division into distinct portions, or because it is regarded as that which divides right from wrong; Al-Moshaf, the volume; and Al-Kitab, the book.

1. KORAN, HISTORY OF THE.—It is the common opinion, that Mohammed, assisted by one Sergius, a monk, composed this book. The Koran, while Mohammed lived, was only kept in loose sheets: his successor, Abubeker, first collected them into a volume, and committed the keeping of it to Haphsa, the widow of Mohammed, in order to be consulted as an original; and there being a good deal of diversity between the several copies already dispersed throughout the provinces, Ottoman, successor of Abubeker, procured a great number of copies to be taken from that of Haphsa, at the same time suppressing all the others not conformable to the original. There are seven principal editions of the Koran; two at Medina, one at Mecca, one at Cufa, one at Bassora, one in Syria, and the common, or vulgar edition. The first contains six thousand verses, the others surpassing this number by two hundred or two hundred and thirty-six verses; but the number of words and letters is the same in all; viz. seventy-seven thousand six hundred and thirty-nine words, and three hundred and twenty-three thousand and fifteen letters. The number of commentaries on the Koran is so large, that the bare titles would make a huge volume. Ben Os-chair has written the history of them, entitled Tarikh Ben Oshair. The principal among them are, Reidhari, Thaalabi, Zamalchshari, and Bacai. The Mohammedans have a positive theology built on the Koran and tradition, as well as a scholastical one built on reason. They have likewise their casuists, and a kind of canon law, wherein they distinguish what is of divine and what of positive right. They have their beneficiaries, too, chaplains, almoners, and canons, who read a chapter every day out of the Koran in their mosques, and have prebends annexed to their office. The hatib of the mosque is what we call the parson of the parish; and the sheikhs are the preachers, who take their texts out of the Koran.

2. KORAN, MOHAMMEDAN FAITH CONCERNING.—It is the general belief among the Mohammedans that the Koran is of divine original; nay, that it is eternal and uncreated; remaining, as some express it, in the very essence of God, and the first transcript has been from everlasting, by God's throne, written on a table of vast bigness, called the preserved table, in which are also recorded the divine decrees, past and future; that a copy from this table, in one volume, upon paper, was, by the ministry of the angel Gabriel, sent down to the lowest heaven, in the month of Ramadan, on the night of power, from whence Gabriel revealed it to Mohammed in parcels, some at Mecca, and some at Medina, at different times, during the space of twenty-three years, as the exigency of affairs required; giving him, however, the consolation to show him the whole (which they tell us was bound in silk, and adorned with gold and precious stones of paradise) once a year; but in the last year of his life he had the favor to see it twice. In fine, the book of the Koran is held in the highest esteem and reverence among the Mussulmen. They dare not so much as touch the Koran without being first washed, or legally purified; to prevent which an inscription is put on the cover or label,—“Let none touch but they who are clean.” It is read with great care and respect, being never held below the girdle. They swear by it; take omens from it on all weighty occasions; carry it with them to war; write sentences of it on their banners; adorn it with gold and precious stones; and knowingly suffer it not to be in the possession of any of a different religion. Some say that it is punishable even with death, in a Christian, even to touch it; others, that the veneration of the Mussulmen leads them to condemn the translating it into any other language as a profanation: but these seem to be exaggerations. The Mohammedans have taken care to have their Scripture translated into the Persian, the Javan, the Malayan, and other languages; though out of respect to the original, these versions are generally, if not always, interlined.

3. KORAN, THE STYLE AND MERITS OF THE, EXAMINED.—The praise of all the productions of genius is invention; that quality of the mind, which, by the extent and quickness of its views, is capable of the largest conceptions, and of forming new combinations of objects the most distant and unusual. But the Koran bears little impression of this transcendent character. Its materials are wholly borrowed from the Jewish and Christian Scriptures, from the Talmudical legends and apocryphal gospels then current in the East, and from the traditions and fables which abounded in Arabia. The materials collected from these several sources are here heaped together with perpetual and heedless repetitions, without any settled principle or visible connexion. When a great part of the life of Mohammed had been spent in preparatory meditation on the system he was about to establish, its chapters were dealt out slowly and separately during the long period of twenty-three years. Yet, thus defective in its structure, and no less objectionable in its doctrines, was the work which Mohammed delivered to his followers as the oracles of God. The most prominent feature of the Koran, that point of excellency in which the partiality of its admirers has ever delighted to view it, is the sublime notion it generally impresses of the nature and attributes of God. If its author had really derived these just conceptions from the inspiration of that Being whom they attempt to describe, they would not have been surrounded, as they now are, on every side, with error and absurdity. But it might be easily proved, that whatever it justly defines of the divine tributes, was borrowed from our Holy Scripture; which even from its first promulgation, but especially from the completion of the New Testament, has extended the views and enlightened the understandings of mankind; and thus furnished them with arms which have too often been effectually turned against itself by its ungenerous enemies. In this instance, particularly, the copy is far below the great original, both in the propriety of its images and the force of its descriptions.

It is, therefore, abundantly apparent, that no miracle was either externally performed for the support, or is internally involved in the composition of the Mohammedan revelation. See Sale's Koran; Prideaux's Life of Mahomet; White's Sermons at the Dampton Lecture; and MORHAMMEDANISM.—Hend. Buck.

KORNTHAL, (SOCIETY OF;) a religious community in the kingdom of Wurtemberg, which originated in the following circumstances:—In the year 1818, Theophilus William Hoffmann, a notary-public, and burgomaster of Leonberg, perceiving that a difference of religious belief led a great number of the inhabitants of Wurtemberg to Russia and America, thought it would be an efficacious means of preventing other dissenters from following their example, if they were removed from under the jurisdiction of the Lutheran consistory, and obtained toleration for the exercise of their religious worship. A royal decree, of the 22d of August, 1819, sanctioned their separation from the Lutheran church, and gave its approbation to regulations, formed by themselves, for their organization as a religious body, and for their relation to the state. They consisted, at that time, of about forty families; but their numbers rapidly increased. They purchased the lordship of Kornthal, a bailiwick of Leonberg, two leagues from Stutgard, containing a thousand acres of arable and woody land, with some buildings, for a hundred and fifteen thousand florins. One of their first cares was to erect a commodious place of worship, capable of holding two thousand persons. Their mode of worship nearly resembles that of the Protestant churches, from which they are legally separated, although they adopt the tenets and teach the catechism of Luther, and have a liturgy similar, not to that introduced into certain Lutheran churches in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, but to that of 1582. It will be seen from what follows, that their discipline resembles that of the Moravian Brethren.

Their service consists of a succession of hymns, prayers, and Scripture reading; the Lord's supper is administered every fourth week, eight days previous to which, separate meetings are held of married men and widowers, married women and widows, bachelors, and spinsters. Besides the Sundays, they celebrate the festivals of Jesus Christ, the Apostles, St. Stephen, the New Year, Epiphany, Holy Thursday, Good Friday, Easter, Ascension, Pentecost, St. John the Baptist, Annunciation, and Purification of the Virgin Mary. They have also, once a month, a day of fasting and prayer. Their clergy consist of readers, elders, and a president, called bishop, who in public service appear in white robes. A secular president administers their temporal affairs; who, like all their civil and ecclesiastical officers, is elected by the community, whose suffrage is also requisite in the admission of members. A community of goods is not held by them: any member, on quitting the society, may carry away his movables; but he can only sell his fixtures to another member, or, in default of a purchaser, to the community. The two sexes have separate burial places. Feasts at baptisms and funerals are abolished; also salutations on the new year. Mourning is never worn. Oaths are forbidden. Benevolence towards persons of other communions is commanded. Begging is prohibited, and care is taken of the poor and aged. A portion of the money collected for charitable uses, is applied to carrying the knowledge of the gospel to heathen lands. They have schools for each sex, in which they are mainly solicitous to inculcate piety and virtue. No member may marry without the advice of the presidents, especially out of the society. Every one must have some trade. For every thing there is a fixed price. No brother may borrow money but from the common chest. No member may lodge a foreigner, or take a foreign servant, without informing the president. The various branches of agriculture, and the mechanical arts, form the habitual employment of this colony. Since 1821, a kind of journal has, at indefinite periods, presented to the public a view of the civil and religious state of this society, whose prosperity will augment while it shall retain its primitive zeal, its purity of manners, and its love of labor.—Hend. Buck.

KRUDENER, (BARONESS VALERIA,) a religious enthusiast, daughter of count Wittenkoff, was born, in 1766, at Riga; married baron Krudener when she was only fourteen; and was for a considerable period one of the gayest of the gay in the Parisian circles. At length she became a fanatical devotee, announced herself as an envoy from Heaven, and wandered from state to state preaching, and surrounded by thousands of people. In many places she was driven out by the magistrates. She died, in the Crimea, in 1824. Alexander of Russia was among those who listened to her doctrines. She wrote Valeria, a novel, which is believed to depict some of her early adventures.—Davenport; Hend. Buck; Eney. Amr.

KTISTOLATRÆ, a branch of the Monophysites, which maintained that the body of Christ before his resurrection was corruptible.—Hend. Buck.

KYRLE, (JOHN,) a man remarkable for his active benevolence, was born, in 1640, at Whitehouse, in Gloucestershire, and died at Ross, in Herefordshire, in 1724. Pope, in his Moral Essays, has commemorated the good deeds of this estimable character. With his small fortune, however, Kyrle could not solely have accomplished all that is attributed to him; but his example prompted some, and his solicitations induced others, to associate with him in the work of charity and public utility.—Davenport.

LABADISTS, were so called from their founder, John Labadie, a native of France. He was originally in the Romish communion; but leaving that, he became a member of the reformed church, and performed with reputation the ministerial functions in France, Switzerland, and Holland. He at length erected a new community, which resided successively at Middleburg, in Zealand, Amsterdam, Hervorden, and at Aitona, where he died, about 1674. After his death, his followers removed their wandering community to Wiewert, in the district of North Holland, where it soon fell into oblivion. If we are to judge of the Labadists by their own account, they did not differ from the reformed church so much in their tenets and doctrines as in their manners and rules of discipline; although it seems that Labadie had some strange notions.—H. Buck.

LABARUM; the name given to the imperial banner, upon which Constantine, after his conversion, blazoned the monogram of Christ.—Hend. Buck.

LACTANTIUS, (LUCIUS CÆLIUS,) a father of the church, the purity of whose Latinity has gained for him the title of the Christian Cicero, was born in the third century, but whether in Africa, or at Fermo, in Italy, is undecided. He studied under Arnobius; became celebrated for his eloquence; and was appointed tutor to Crispus, the son of Constantine. He is supposed to have died at Treves, about 325. His principal works are, De Opificio Dei; and Divinarum Institutionum.—Davenport.

LAITY; the people, as distinguished from the clergy. (See CLERGY.)

LAKE; a confluence of waters. The principal lakes in Judea, were the lake Asphaltites, the lake of Tiberias, and the lake Semechon; and, towards Egypt, the lake Sirbon. (See the respective articles).—Calcut.

LAMAISM; the religion of the people of Thibet. The Delai Lama, "Grand Lama," is at once the high-priest, and the visible object of adoration, to this nation: to the hordes of wandering Tartars, and to the prodigious population of China. He resides at Patoli, a vast palace on a mountain near the banks of the Burampooter, about seven miles from Lahasse. The foot of the mountain is surrounded by twenty thousand lamas, or priests, in attendance on their sovereign pontiff, who is considered as the vicegerent of the Deity on earth; and the more remote Tartars are said to regard him absolutely as the Deity himself, and call him God, the everlasting father of heaven. They believe him to be immortal, and endowed with all knowledge and virtue. Every year they come up from different parts to worship, and make rich offerings at his shrine. Even the emperor of China, who is a Mantchou Tartar, does not fail in acknowledgments to him in his religious capacity; and entertains in the palace at Pekin a inferior lama, deputed as his nuncio from Thibet.

The grand Lama is only to be seen in a secret place of his palace, amidst a great number of lamps, sitting cross-legged on a cushion, and decked all over with gold and precious stones; while, at a distance, the people prostrate themselves before him, it being not lawful for any so much as to kiss his feet. He returns not the least sign of respect, nor ever speaks, even to the greatest princes; but only lays his hand upon their heads, and they are fully persuaded that they thereby receive a full forgiveness of their sins. The suantsassés, or Indian pilgrims, often visit Thibet as a holy place; and the Lama entertains a body of two or three hundred in his pay. Besides his religious influence and authority, he is possessed of unlimited power throughout his dominions, which are very extensive. The inferior lamas, who form the most numerous as well as the most powerful body in the state, have the priesthood entirely in their hands, and, besides, fill up many monastic orders, which are held in great veneration among them. The whole country, like Italy, abounds with priests; and they entirely subsist on the rich presents sent them from the utmost extent of Tartary, from the empire of the great mogul, and from almost all parts of the Indies.

The opinion of the orthodox among the Thibetians is, that when the grand lama seems to die, either of old age or infirmities, his soul, in fact, only quits a crazy habitation to enter another, younger and better; and is discovered again in the body of some child, by certain tokens, known only to the lamas, or priests, in which order he always appears. Almost all the nations of the East, except the Mohammedans, believe the metempsychosis, or transmigration of the soul, as the most important article of their faith; especially the inhabitants of Thibet, Burmah, and Anan, the Siamese, the greater part of the Chinese and Japanese, and the Monguls and Kalmucks. According to their doctrine, the soul no sooner leaves her old habitation than she enters a new one. The delai lama, therefore, or rather the god Foe or Foh, residing in the delai lama, passes to his successor; and he being a god, to whom all things are known, the grand Lama is therefore acquainted with every thing which happened during his residence in his former bodies.

This religion, which was early adopted in a large part of the globe, is said to have been of three thousand years' standing; and neither time, nor the influence of men, has had the power of shaking the authority of the grand Lama. This theocracy, which extends as fully to temporal as to spiritual concerns, is professed all over Thibet and Mongolia; is almost universal in Greater and Less Bucharina, and several provinces of Tartary; has some followers in the kingdom of Cashmere, in India; and is the predominant religion of China.

It has been observed that the religion of Thibet is the counterpart of the Roman Catholic, since the inhabitants of that country use holy water, and a singing service. They also offer alms, prayers, and sacrifices for the dead. They have a vast number of convents filled with monks and friars, amounting to thirty thousand, and confessors chosen by their superiors. They use beads, wear the mitre, like the bishops; and their delai lama is nearly the same among them as the sovereign pontiff was formerly, in the zenith of his power, among the Roman Catholics. So complete is the resemblance, that, when one of the first Roman missionaries penetrated Thibet, he came to the conclusion, that the devil had set up there an imitation of the rites of the Catholic church, in order the more effectually to destroy the souls of men.

Captain Turner, speaking of the religion of Thibet, says, "It seems to be the schismatical offspring of the religion of the Hindoos, deriving its origin from one of the followers of that faith, a disciple of Bouddhu, who first broached the doctrine which now prevails over the wide extent of Tartary. It is reported to have received its earliest admission in that part of Tibet, or Thibet, bordering upon India, which from hence became the seat of the sovereign lamas; and to have traversed over Mantchieux Tartary, and to have been ultimately disseminated over China and Japan. Though it differs from the Hindoo in many of its outward forms, yet it still bears a very close affinity with the religion of Brumba in many important particulars. The principal idol in the temples of Tibet, or Thibet, is Muha-Moonee, the Boodhu of Bengal, who is worshipped under these and various other epithets, throughout the great extent of Tartary, and among all nations to the eastward of the Brumhapooter. In the wide-extended space over which this faith prevails, the same object of veneration is acknowledged under numerous titles: among others, he is styled Godumu, or Gotumu, in Assam and Ava, Shummuu in Siam, Amida Butu in Japan, Fohi in China," &c.—Watson.

LAMB OF GOD. By this name John the Baptist called our Savior, (John 1: 29, 36.) to signify his innocence, and his quality as a victim to be offered for the sins of the world. Or, he might allude to these words of the prophet: "He is brought as a lamb to the slaughter, and as a sheep before his shearers is dumb, so he openeth not his mouth," Isa. 53: 7. If it were a little before the passover, then the sight of a number of lambs going to Jerusalem to be slain on that occasion, might suggest the idea; as if he had said, "Behold the true, the most excellent Lamb of God," &c.—Calmet.

LAMBETH ARTICLES. (See ARTICLES.)

LAMBERT, (JOHN,) the English martyr. His real name was Nicholson, Lambert being assumed in the latter part of his life to avoid the dangers that beset his life. He was born in Norfolk, and educated at Cambridge, where the excellent Bilney was the means of his conversion, not only to Protestant principles, but to God. He was soon obliged to seek refuge in Holland; whence in 1532 he was brought to London by means of Sir Thomas More, and tried before the archbishop of Canterbury on forty-nine articles, preserved, with his answers, by Fox. In 1534, Warham dying, Cranmer succeeded to the primacy, and Lambert was released. In 1538, he was apprehended at the instigation of bishop Gardiner, and tried before Henry VIII. with great pomp. Lambert defended himself with the firmness of a man, the learning of a scholar, and the humility of a Christian. But the cause was already prejudged, and he was condemned to be burnt. Lord Cromwell and Cranmer, afterwards such distinguished friends of the Reformation, that day were against him.

No man was used at the stake with greater cruelty than was Lambert. But God was with him. Just before he expired, he lifted up his hands, all flaming with fire, and cried out to the people, with his dying voice, in these glorious words, NONE BUT CHRIST! NONE BUT CHRIST! A volume could not have conveyed the energy of divine truth like these words, in these circumstances.—Middleton, vol. i. p. 139.

LAME. Persons weak in body, or in their intellect and grace, and halting between different opinions, are called lame, Isa. 33: 23. Heb. 12: 13.—Brown.

LAMECH; a descendant of Cain, the son of Mathusael, and father of Jabal, Jubal, Tubal-Cain, and Naamah, Gen. 4: 18—20, &c. He stands branded as the father of polygamy, the first who dared to violate the sacred command; (Gen. 2: 24.) giving way to his unbridled passion, and thus overleaping the divine mound raised by the wisdom of our great Creator; which restraint is enforced by the laws of nature herself, who peoples the earth with an equal number of males and females, and thereby teaches foolish man that polygamy is incompatible with her wise regulations. He married Adah and Zillah: the former was the mother of Jabel and Jubal, and the latter of Tubal-Cain and Naamah, his sister.—Watson.

LAMENTATIONS OF JEREMIAH; a mournful poem, composed by the prophet, on occasion of the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar. The first two chapters principally describe the calamities of the siege of Jerusalem; the third deploras the persecutions which Jeremiah himself had suffered; the fourth adverts to the ruin and desolation of the city and temple, and the misfortune of Zedekiah; and the fifth is a kind of form of prayer for the Jews in their captivity. At the close the prophet speaks of the cruelty of the Edomites, who had insulted Jerusalem in her misery, and threatens them with the wrath of God. (See JEREMIAH.)

The first four chapters of the Lamentations are in the acrostic form; every verse or couplet beginning with a letter of the Hebrew alphabet, in regular order. The first and second chapters contain twenty-two verses, according to the letters of the alphabet; the third chapter has triplets, beginning with the same letter; and the fourth is like the first two, having twenty-two verses. The fifth chapter is not an acrostic. The style of Jeremiah's Lamentations is lively, tender, pathetic, and affecting. It was the talent of this prophet to write melancholy and moving elegies; and never was a subject more worthy of tears, nor written with more tender and affecting sentiments.—Calmet.

LAMPETIANS; a denomination in the seventeenth century, the followers of Lampetius, a Syrian monk. He pretended that as man is born free, a Christian, in order to please God, ought to do nothing by necessity; and that it is, therefore, unlawful to make vows, even those of obedience. To this system it is said he added the doctrines of the Arians, Carpocratians, and other denominations.—Hend. Buck.

LAMP. There is frequent mention of lamps in Scripture, and the word is often used figuratively. The invention of lamps is ascribed to the Egyptians. They also were the first who put burning lamps in the tombs with their dead, as an emblem of the immortality of the soul. Lamps were known to the Hebrews as early as the time of Moses and Job.

To do this subject justice, it might be considered under several distinctions: as, (1.) Military lamps, those intended to meet the exigencies of night, in the external air, when the breeze is lively, or when the wind is high. (2.) Domestic lamps, those intended for service in the interior of a dwelling, or to be carried about into all parts of it; but not powerful enough to resist a gale of wind in the open air. (3.) Lamps for religious uses; those hung up in temples, or deposited in the sacred recesses of edifices, public or private, &c. We shall, however, attend only to the distinction between lamps for the exterior, the open air; and lamps for the interior, domestic purposes.

1. We meet with the Hebrew term lappid, properly lampid, (whence the word lamp,) in that remarkable history of the "smoking furnace and the burning lamp," which ratified the covenant made with Abraham; (Gen. 15: 17.) where the text observes that, (1.) it was after the sun was gone down, (2.) when it was dark, what is rendered, a furnace, passed; and this is expressly noted as (3.) smoking. Whatever light, or splendor, overcame the darkness of the evening, with the much greater darkness occasioned by the density of the smoke by which it was immediately surrounded, and in the centre of which it blazed, was certainly not feeble, or dim, but lively, vigorous, and even powerful. The action took place in the open air; and this lamp, described as burning, was competent to resist, and more than resist, every impulse of the atmosphere. With this we may compare the appearances at the giving of the law, (Exod. 20: 18.) and in Daniel's vision, Dan. 10: 6. Also Jndg. 7: 15. 15: 4. Isa. 62: 1. Ez. 1: 13, and Zech. 12: 6, in all of which the same word is used in the original. To this word answers the Greek lampas, Matt. 25: 1.

2. A lamp for domestic use is called ner in the Hebrew, and is frequently, though erroneously, rendered candle in our version. See Prov. 31: 18. Job. 29: 3. 18: 5, 6. 2 Sam. 21: 18. Num. 21: 30. This household lamp is in Greek usually called the luchnos, Matt. 5: 15. The houses in the East were, from the remotest antiquity, lighted with lamps; and hence it is so common in Scripture to call every thing which enlightens the body or mind, which guides or refreshes, by the name of a lamp. These lamps were sustained by a large candlestick set upon the ground. The houses of Egypt, in modern times, are never without lights: they burn lamps all the night long, and in every occupied apartment. So requisite to the comfort of a family is this custom reckoned, or so imperious is the power which it exercises, that the poorest people would rather retrench part of their food than neglect it. As this custom no doubt prevailed in Egypt and the adjacent regions of Arabia and Palestine in former times, it imparts a beauty and force to some passages of Scripture which have been little observed. Thus, in the language of Jeremiah, to extinguish the light in an apartment is a convertible phrase for total destruction; and nothing can more properly and emphatically represent the total destruction of a city than the extinction of the lights: "I will take from them the light of a candle, and this whole land shall be a desolation and an astonishment." See also Job 21: 17. 18: 5, 6. A brilliant lamp, on the other hand, the chosen symbol of prosperity, a beautiful instance of which occurs in the complaint of Job, 29: 2, 3. When the ten tribes were taken from Rehoboam, and given to his rival, Jehovah promised to reserve one tribe, and assigns this reason: "That David my servant may have a light always before me in Jerusalem," 1 Kings 11: 36. In many parts of the East, and in particular in the Indies, instead of torches and flambeaux, they carry a pot of oil in one hand, and a lamp full of oily rags in the other. (See MARRIAGE.)—Calmet; Watson.

LAND, in the Old Testament, often denotes the country of the Israelites, or the particular country, or district, spoken of; the land of Canaan, the land of Egypt, the land of Ashur, the land of Moab. In many places of our public version the phrase "all the earth" is used, where the meaning should be restricted to the land, or all the land.—Calmet.

LANFRANC, a pious and learned Romish prelate, was born, in 1005, at Pavia; became prior of Bec, in Normandy, in 1044; and was made abbot of St. Stephen, at Caen, in 1062. When William the Conqueror ascended the English throne, he raised Lanfranc to the archbishopric of Canterbury, who held the see till his decease, in 1089. Lanfranc rebuilt the cathedral of Canterbury, and founded the hospitals of St. John and Harbledown. He was the antagonist of the great Berengarius, and wrote, in good Latin, various theological works.—Davenport.

LANGDON, (SAMUEL, D. D.), minister of Portsmouth, N. H., and president of Harvard college, was a native of Boston; was graduated in 1740; ordained as the successor of Mr. Fitch in 1747; inducted into the office of president as the successor of Mr. Locke in 1774, but resigned it, in consequence of the disaffection of his pupils, occasioned by his want of the requisite dignity and authority, in 1780. He settled at Hampton Falls, N. H., in 1781. His extensive knowledge, hospitality, patriotism, and piety secured to him, in this calm retreat, the affection and respect of the people of his charge, and of his numerous acquaintance. He died, November 29, 1797, aged seventy-four. He published many sermons, besides an Examination of R. Sandeman's letters on Theron and Aspasio, 1765; a Summary of Christian Faith and Practice, 1768; and Remarks on the Leading Sentiments of Dr. Hopkins' System of Doctrines, 1794. Alden's Acc. of the Relig. Soc. of Portsmouth; Hist. Col., vol. x. p. 51.—Allen.

LANGUAGE, in general, denotes those articulate sounds by which men express their thoughts. Much has been said respecting the invention of language. On the one side, it is observed, that it is altogether a human invention, and that the progress of the mind, in the invention and improvement of language, is, by certain natural gradations, plainly discernible in the composition of words. But on the other side it is alleged, that we are indebted to divine revelation for the origin of it. Without supposing this, we see not how our first parents could so early hold converse with God, or the man with his wife. Admitting, however, that it is of divine origin, we cannot suppose that a perfect system of it was all at once given to man. It is much more natural to think that God taught our first parents only such language as suited their present occasion, leaving them, as he did in other things, to enlarge and improve it, as their future necessities should require.

Without attempting, however, to decide this controversy, we may consider language as one of the greatest blessings belonging to mankind. Destitute of this, we should make but small advancements in science, be lost to all social enjoyments, and religion itself would feel the want of such a power. Our wise Creator, therefore, has conferred upon us this inestimable privilege: let us then be cautious that our tongues be not the vehicle of vain and useless matter, but used for the great end of glorifying him, and doing good to mankind.

What was the first language taught man, is matter of dispute among the learned, but most think it was the Hebrew. There are, however, other opinions on the oft-disputed subject as to the primitive language. The Armenians allege, that as the ark rested in their country, Noah and his children must have remained there a considerable time, before the lower and marshy country of Chaldea could be fit to receive them; and it is therefore reasonable to suppose they left their language there, which was probably the very same that Adam spoke. Some have fancied the Greek the most ancient tongue, because of its extent and copiousness. The Teutonic, or that dialect of it which is spoken in the Lower Germany and Brabant, has found a strenuous patron in Geropius Becanus, who endeavors to derive even the Hebrew itself from that tongue. The pretensions of the Chinese to this honor have been allowed by several Europeans. The patrons of this opinion endeavor to support it, partly, by the great antiquity of the Chinese, and their having preserved themselves so many ages from any considerable mixture or intercourse with other nations. It is a notion advanced by Dr. Alix, and maintained by Mr. Whiston with his usual tenacity and fervor, that the Chinese are the posterity of Noah, by his children born after the flood; and that Fohi, the first king of China, was Noah. As for those which are called the Oriental languages, they have each their partisans. The generality of Eastern writers allow the preference to the Syriac, except the Jews, who assert the antiquity of the Hebrew with the greatest warmth; and with them several Christian writers agree, particularly Chrysostom, Austin, Origen, and Jerome, among the ancients; and among the moderns, Bochart, Heidegger, Selden, and Buxtorf. The Sanscrit has also put in its claims; and some have thought that the Path bears the character of the highest antiquity.

All these are however useless speculations. The only point worth contending for is, that language was conveyed at once to the first pair in sufficient degree for intellectual intercourse with each other, and devotional intercourse with God; and that man was not left, as infidel writers have been pleased to say, to form it for himself out of rude and inarticulate sounds.

It is true that many languages bear marks of being raised to their improved state from rude and imperfect elements, and that all are capable of being enriched and rendered more exact; and it is this which has given some color to those theories which trace all language itself up from elemental sounds, as the necessities of men, their increasing knowledge, and their imagination led to the invention of new words and combinations. All this is, however, consistent with the Scripture fact, that language was taught at first by God to our first parents. The dispersion of mankind carried many tribes to great distances, and wars still further scattered them, and often into wide regions, where they were further dispersed to live chiefly by the chase, by fishing, or at best but an imperfect agriculture. In various degrees we know they lost useful arts; and for the same reasons they would lose much of their original language; those terms being chiefly retained which their immediate necessities, and the common affairs of a gross life, kept in use. But when civilization again overtook these portions of mankind, and kingdoms and empires were founded among them, or they became integral parts of the old empires, then their intercourse with each other becoming more rapid, and artificial, and intellectual, their language was put into a new process of improvement, and to the eye of the critic would exhibit the various stages of advancement; and in many it would be pushed beyond that perfection which it had when it first began to deteriorate. LANTERN, (lampadôn.) The word occurs, John 18: 3; but appears to denote a sort of military lamp. (See LAMP.) The soldiers came thus furnished to apprehend our Lord, lest he should escape through the darkness of the night.—Watson.

LAODICEA. There were several cities of this name, but the Scripture speaks only of that in Phrygia, upon the river Lycus, near Colosse. Its ancient name was Diospolis; it was afterwards called Rhoas. Lastly, Antiochus, the son of Stratonice, rebuilt it, and called it Laodicea, from the name of his wife Laodice. It increased towards the time of Augustus Cæsar. The fertility of the soil, and the good fortune of some of its citizens, raised it to greatness. Hiero, who adorned it with many offerings, bequeathed to the people more than two thousand talents; and though an inland town, it grew more potent than the cities on the coast, and became one of the largest towns in Phrygia. Such was its state when Christianity was planted in it, and also at the date of the epistle to the Colossians, A. D. 60, or 61. Whether the church here was numerous, we know not; but it seems they boasted of their splendid garments, and wealth, and knowledge; which agrees with their history, that they were enriched by the fleeces of their sheep, and eminent in polite studies.

Its three theatres, and the immense circus, which was capable of containing upwards of thirty thousand spectators, the spacious remains of which (with other ruins buried under ruins) are yet to be seen, give proof of the greatness of its ancient wealth and population; and indicate too strongly, that in that city where Christians were rebuked, without exception, for their lukewarmness, there were multitudes who were lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God. The amphitheatre was built after the Apocalypse was written, and the warning of the Spirit had been given to the church of the Laodiceans to be zealous and repent, Rev. 3: 14—22. It became the mother-church of sixteen bishoprics.

There are no sights of grandeur, nor scenes of temptation, around it now. Its tragedy may be briefly told. It was lukewarm, and neither cold nor hot; and therefore it was loathsome in the sight of God; and with the city of its abode, it has been blotted from the world. "Laodicea," says Dr. Smith, "is utterly desolated, and without any inhabitant, except wolves, and jackals, and foxes. It can boast of no human inhabitants, except occasionally when wandering Turcomans pitch their tents in its spacious amphitheatre. Colonel Lake observes, "There are few ancient cities more likely than Laodicea to preserve many curious remains of antiquity beneath the surface of the soil. Its opulence, and the earthquakes to which it was subject, render it probable that valuable works of art were often there buried beneath the ruins of the public and private edifices." The finest sculptured fragments are to be seen at a considerable depth, in excavations which have been made among the ruins.—Watson; Calmet.

LAPWING, (dukiphath.) Levit. 11: 19. Deut. 14: 18. The bird intended by the Hebrew name in these places is undoubtedly the hoopoe; a very beautiful, but most unclean and filthy, species of birds. The Septuagint renders it epopa; and the Vulgate, upupa; which is the same with the Arabian interpreters. The Egyptian name of the bird is kukuphah, and the Syrian, kikuphah; which approach the Hebrew dukuphath. It may have its name from the noise or cry it makes, which is very remarkable, and may be heard a great way.—Harris; Abbott; Watson.

LARDNER, (NATHANIEL, D. D.), a learned dissenting divine, was born, in 1681, at Hawkhurst, in Kent, of pious parents; studied at Utrecht and Leyden; became a minister in his twenty-fifth year; and, after having been chaplain and tutor in the family of lady Treby, acquired equal reputation as a preacher and a writer. During the year 1724, he was engaged, with several other ministers, in preaching a lecture, on Tuesday evenings, at the Old Jewry, from whence originally sprung his great work, "The Credibility of the Gospel History." On the 24th of August, 1729, he received an unexpected invitation from the church at Crutched Friars, which he accepted. He maintained a large correspondence, both in Great Britain and foreign parts, particularly in America and Germany. On account of his deafness, he in 1751 resigned the place of morning preacher at Crutched Friars, having been assistant there near twenty-two years. As he lived very retired, especially the latter part of his life, he engaged in very few public things; however, as a private man, he was always ready in every good word and work, affording his assistance, according to his ability, to those in distress. He died, at his native place, in 1768. The collected edition of his works forms eleven volumes, octavo. Of these the chief is, The Credibility of the Gospel History, a production which is deserving of the highest praise, for its learning, faithfulness, and candor. See Memoirs, by Dr. Kippis.—Jones' Chris. Biog.; Davenport.

LARNED, (SYLVESTER), the eloquent minister of New Orleans, was the son of colonel Simon Larned, of Pittsfield, Massachusetts. His mother was a woman of extraordinary intellectual power and pious zeal. He was born August 31, 1796, and in his senior year at college his mind was first impressed by religious truth. He graduated, at Middlebury, (Vt.) in 1813, having the English oration.

His talents were very early developed. His theological education was at Andover and Princeton. At this period no one equalled him in extemporary debate. After he became a preacher, in 1817, and was ordained as an evangelist, he repaired to New Orleans. On the arrival of Mr. Larned the society was quickly established, and he was settled as the minister of the first Presbyterian congregation. He fell a victim to the yellow fever, Thursday, August 31, 1820, aged twenty-four. He preached on the preceding Sabbath from the words, "For to me to live is Christ and to die is gain;" and closed his discourse in tears. Probably no preacher in the United States occupied a more important station, or was more admired for his eloquence. By his death, a kind of sacrifice to duty, he left a deep impression of the courage and value of true piety.—Allen.

LATIMER, (HUGH), a pious prelate, one of the victims of the sanguinary Mary, was the son of a yeoman, and was born, about 1470, at Thurston, in Leicestershire. He was educated at Christ's college, Cambridge. In early life he was a zealous papist, but, being converted at fifty-three, he became an equally zealous champion of the Reformation.

The credit to the Protestant cause, which he gained in the pulpit, he maintained by a holy life out of it. Mr. Bilecy and he gave daily instances of goodness, which malice could not scandalize, nor envy misinterpret. They visited the prisoners, relieved the poor, and fed the hungry. Cambridge was full of their good works; their charities to the poor, and friendly visits to the sick, were constant topics of discourse. (See BILECY.)

After having encountered many perils, he was made bishop of Worcester, in 1535, by Henry VIII. The bishopric, however, he resigned, on the passing of the act of the six articles; and was punished by being imprisoned during the remainder of Henry's reign. He had the courage, while in favor at court, to write a letter of remonstrance to Henry VIII., on the evil of prohibiting the use of the Bible in English, and even presented him for a new year's gift, instead of a purse as was usual, a New Testament, having the leaf turned down to this passage: "Whoremongers and adulterers God will judge." The accession of Edward VI. set Latimer at liberty, and he resumed his preaching, but refused to resume the mitre. On Mary ascending the throne, he was again incarcerated; and, in 1555, was brought to the stake, where he suffered with unshaken courage. Ridley was his fellow-martyr. When they came to the stake, he lifted up his eyes and said, "Fidelis est Deus;" i. e. God is faithful, who will not suffer us to be tempted above what we are able to bear. He then prepared himself, saying to the bishop of London, "We shall this day, brother, light such a candle in England, as shall never be put out."

Such was the death of Hugh Latimer, bishop of Worcester. He had a happy temper, improved by the best principles; and such was his cheerfulness, that none of the circumstances of life were seen to discompose him: such was his Christian fortitude, that not even the severest trials could unman him. Indeed, for Latimer, no eulogy is wanting, when it is recollected that he was one of the leaders of that noble army of martyrs who introduced the Reformation into England.

"He, more than any other man, promoted the Reformation by his preaching. The straight forward honesty of his remarks, the liveliness of his illustrations, his homely wit, his racy manner, his manly freedom, the playfulness of his temper, the simplicity of his heart, the sincerity of his understanding, gave life and vigor to his sermons when they were delivered, and render them now the most amusing productions of that age, and to us, perhaps, the most valuable." See Gilpin's Lives of Reformers; Middleton's Evang. Biog.—Davenport; Jones' Chris. Biog.

LATITUDINARIANS; persons who, disregarding fixed, determinate, or exclusive views of doctrine or worship, maintain that men will be saved, independently of any particular persuasion which they entertain. The term was given "to More, Hales, Chillingworth, Wilkins, Cudworth, Whitecot, Gale, Tillotson, and others, mostly Cambridge men, who endeavored to examine all the principles of morality and religion on philosophical principles, and to maintain them by the reason of things. They declared against superstition on the one hand, and enthusiasm on the other." They were attached to the constitution and forms of the church; but moderate in their opposition to those who dissented from it. They were mostly Arminians of the Dutch school, but admitted of a considerable latitude of sentiment, both in philosophy and theology, on which account they were denominated Latitudinarians. In conjunction with other clergymen of that period, they introduced a very inefficient mode of preaching into the established church; learnedly defeating the truth of Christianity as a system, but modifying the statements of the gospel, obscuring the glory of divine grace, and thus neutralizing its influence on the heart of a man. They were, in fact, low churchmen, of Arminian principles; moderate in piety, in sentiment, and in zeal; though some of them gradually became "fierce for moderation."—Hend. Enck.

LAUD, (WILLIAM, D. D.), a prelate, the son of a clothier, was born, in 1573, at Reading, in Berkshire; was educated at the free school of his native place, and at St. John's college, Oxford; was ordained in 1601; became president of his college in 1611; and, after having held various livings, was at length patronised by James I., who had long looked upon him with coldness. His first preferment from the sovereign was the deanery of Gloucester, which he obtained in 1616. In 1620 he was nominated to the see of St. David's, whence he was successively translated, in 1626, 1628, and 1633, to Bath and Wells, London, and Caoterbury. From the moment of his attaining power he acted the part of a furious persecutor of those who differed from him on religious points, and an enemy to public liberty. His ingratitude, too, was equal to his violence. The meeting of the long parliament was the signal of his downfall. He was impeached, and confined during three years in the Tower. On his being brought to trial he defended himself with great courage and acuteness. A bill of attainder was at length passed against him by the commons, and he was executed, January 10, 1644-5. Laud was intolerant, tyrannical, and superstitious; but it would be unjust to conceal that he was a patron of learning. The most interesting of his works is his Diary.—Davenport; Clissold; Ency. Amer.

LAUGHTER, is an indication either of delight and assurance; or of mirth and mockery. Sarah in her transport of joy called her son Isaac; that is, laughter, Gen. 21: 6. "At destruction and famine thou shalt laugh;" i. e. thou shalt not fear it, thou shalt be perfectly secure against those evils. God laughs at the wicked; he despises their vain efforts. Ishmael laughed at Isaac; he insulted him, he vexed him. See Gal. 4: 29. Laughter in general implies rejoicing. "There is a time to laugh, and a time to weep;" that is, a time to rejoice, and a time to be afflicted, Eccl. 3: 4. "Blessed are ye who weep now, for ye shall laugh," Luke 6: 21, 25. It is frequently used for excessive and irreligious mirth. "I said of laughter, it is mad," Eccl. 2: 2. "Your laughter shall be turned into mourning;" your worldly joy shall terminate in sorrow and remorse, James 4: 9. Abraham's laughter, when God promised him a son, was an expression of admiration and gratitude, not of doubt: the Scripture which relates it does not disapprove of it, as it does of Sarah's, Gen. 17: 17.—Calmet.

LAURA; in church history, a name given to a collection of little cells at some distance from each other, in which the hermits of ancient times lived together in a wilderness. These hermits did not live in community, but each monk provided for himself in his distinct cell. The most celebrated lauras mentioned in ecclesiastical history were in Palestine; as the laura of St. Enythmus, St. Saba, the laura of the towers, &c.—Hend. Buck.

LAUREATE, as a passive verb, to be crowned with the prize, as a successful theological candidate, in ancient times, at the Scotch universities.—Hend. Buck.

LAURENTIUS, (commonly called St. Laurence,) a Christian martyr of the third century, was one of the deacons of the church at Rome. Being seized and commanded to produce the church treasures, he collected together the helpless poor Christians, who were supported by their brethren, and said, "These are the true treasures of the church!" The governor of the city, exasperated by disappointment, and by what he took to be an intended insult, ordered him to immediate tortures and death; which (though actually roasted on a gridiron) Laurentius endured with a fortitude inconceivable. He died August 2, A. D. 258.—Fox, 32.

LAVATER, (JOHN CASPAR,) the philosopher and divine, a native of Zurich, in Switzerland, was born in 1741; became pastor to the Orphan's church, in his birthplace, and afterwards to that of St. Peter; and received a wound from a French soldier in 1799, of which he died in 1801. He was the author of Swiss Lays; Spiritual Canticles; The Journal of a Secret Observer; and other productions; but the work which has made him universally known is his Fragments on Physiognomy. These Fragments have been translated in several languages; but their popularity has been long on the wane. Dr. Spurzheim, however, has followed his steps in this department with better success. Lavater was an enthusiastic, but eminently worthy and benevolent man. His Christian piety was of the highest order.—Davenport; Ency. Amer.

LAVER, (BRAZEN.) Moses was directed (Exod. 30: 18.) to make, among other articles of furniture for the services of the tabernacle, a laver of brass, Exod. 38: 8. (See GLASS.) This is not particularly described as to form; but the lavers made for the temple were borne by four cherubim, standing upon bases or pedestals mounted on brazen wheels, and having handles belonging to them, by means of which they might be drawn, and conveyed from one place to another, as they should be wanted. These lavers were double, that is to say, composed of a basin, which received the water that fell from another square vessel above it, from which they drew water with cocks. The whole work was of brass; the square vessel was adorned with the heads of a lion, an ox, and a cherub; that is to say, of extraordinary hieroglyphic creatures. Each of the lavers contained forty baths, or four bushels, forty-one pints, and forty cubic inches of Paris measure. There were ten made in this form, and of this capacity; five of them were placed to the right, and five to the left of the temple, between the altar of burnt-offerings and the steps which led to the porch of the temple.—Calmet.

LAW; a rule of action; a precept or command, coming from a superior authority, which an inferior is bound to obey. The manner in which God governs rational creatures is by a law, as the rule of their obedience to him, and this is what we call God's moral government of the world.

The term, however, is used in Scripture with considerable latitude of meaning; and to ascertain its precise import in any particular place, it is necessary to regard the scope and connexion of the passage in which it occurs. Thus, for instance, sometimes it denotes the whole revealed will of God as communicated to us in his word. In this sense it is generally used in the book of Psalms, 1: 2. 19: 7. 119. Isa. 8: 20. 42: 21. Sometimes it is taken for the Mosaic institution as distinguished from the gospel, John 1: 17. Matt. 11: 13. 12: 5. Acts 25: 8. Hence we frequently read of the law of Moses as expressive of the whole religion of the Jews, Heb. 9: 19. 10: 28. Sometimes, in a more restricted sense, for the ritual or ceremonial observances of the Jewish religion. In this sense the apostle speaks of "the law of commandments contained in ordinances," (Eph. 2: 15. Heb. 10: 1.) and which, being only "a shadow of good things to come," Christ Jesus abolished by his death, and so in effect destroyed the ancient distinction between Jew and Gentile, Gal. 3: 17.

Very frequently it is used to signify the decalogue, or ten precepts which were delivered to the Israelites from mount Sinai. It is in this acceptation of the term that the Lord Jesus declares he "came not to destroy the law, but to fulfil it;" (Matt. 5: 17.) and he explains its import as requiring perfect love to God and man, Luke 10: 27. It is in reference to this view that St. Paul affirms, "By the deeds of the law shall no flesh living be justified; for by the law is the knowledge of sin," Rom. 3: 20. The language of this law is, "The soul that sinneth it shall die," and "Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things that are written," or required, "in the book of the law, to do them," Gal. 3: 10. To deliver believers from this penalty, "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being himself made a curse for us," Gal. 3: 13. The law, in this sense, was not given that men should obtain righteousness or justification by it, but to convince them of sin, to show them their need of a Savior, to shut them up, as it were, from all hopes of salvation from that source, and to recommend the gospel of divine grace to their acceptance, Gal. 3: 19—25.

Again, this term denotes the rule of good and evil, or of right and wrong, revealed by the Creator and inscribed on man's conscience, even at his creation, and consequently binding upon him by divine authority; and in this respect it is in substance the same with the decalogue. That such a law was connate with, and, as it were, implanted in, man, appears from its traces, which, like the ruins of some noble building, are still extant in every man. It is from those common notions, handed down by tradition, though often imperfect and perverted, that the heathens themselves distinguished right from wrong, by which "they were a law unto themselves, showing the work of the law written in their hearts, their conscience bearing witness;" (Rom. 2: 12—15.) although they had no express revelation.

The term law is, however, eminently given to the moral law, as given by Moses; on the principles and spirit of which, a few general remarks may be offered. The right consideration of this divine institute, says Dr. Graves, will surround it with a glory of truth and holiness, not only worthy of its claims, but which has continued to be the light of the world on theological and moral subjects, and often on great political principles, to this day.

1. Illustration of the Moral Law as given to the Jews.—It is an obvious, but it is not therefore a less important remark, that to the Jewish religion we owe that admirable summary of moral duty, contained in the ten commandments. All fair reasoners will admit that each of these must be understood to condemn, not merely the extreme crime which it expressly prohibits, but every inferior offence of the same kind, and every mode of conduct leading to such transgression; and, on the contrary, to enjoin opposite conduct, and the cultivation of opposite dispositions. Thus, the command, "Thou shalt not kill," condemns not merely the single crime of deliberate murder, but every kind of violence, and every indulgence of passion and resentment, which tends either to excite such violence, or to produce that malignant disposition of mind, in which the guilt of murder principally consists: and similarly of the rest. In this extensive interpretation of the commandments, we are warranted, not merely by the deductions of reason, but by the letter of the law itself. For the addition of the last, "Thou shalt not covet," proves clearly that in all, the dispositions of the heart, as much as the immediate outward act, is the object of the divine Legislator; and thus it forms a comment on the meaning, as well as a guard for the observance, of all the preceding commands. Interpreted in this natural and rational latitude, how comprehensive and important is this summary of moral duty! It inculcates the adoration of the one true God, who "made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is;" who must, therefore, be infinite in power, and wisdom, and goodness; the object of exclusive adoration; of gratitude for every blessing we enjoy; of fear, for he is a jealous God; of hope, for he is merciful. It prohibits every species of idolatry; whether by associating false gods with the true, or worshipping the true by symbols and images. Commanding not to take the name of God in vain, it enjoins the observance of all outward respect for the divine authority, as well as the cultivation of inward sentiments and feelings suited to this outward reverence; and it establishes the obligation of oaths, and, by consequence, of all compacts and deliberate promises; a principle, without which the administration of laws would be impracticable, and the bonds of society must be dissolved. By commanding to keep holy the Sabbath, as the memorial of the creation, it establishes the necessity of public worship, and of a stated, and outward profession of the truths of religion, as well as of the cultivation of suitable feelings; and it enforces this by a motive which is equally applicable to all mankind, and which should have taught the Jew that he ought to consider all nations as equally creatures of that Jehovah whom he himself adored; equally subject to his government, and, if sincerely obedient, entitled to all the privileges his favor could bestow. It is also remarkable, that this commandment, requiring that the rest of the Sabbath should include the man-servant, and the maid-servant, and the stranger that was within their gates, nay, even their cattle, proved that the Creator of the universe extended his attention to all his creatures; that the humblest of mankind were the objects of his paternal love; that no accidental differences, which so often create alienation amongst different nations, would alienate any from the divine regard; and that even the brute creation shared the benevolence of their Creator, and ought to be treated by men with gentleness and humanity.

When we proceed to the second table, comprehending more expressly our social duties, we find all the most important principles on which they depend clearly enforced. The commandment which enjoins, "Honor thy father and mother," sanctions the principles, not merely of filial obedience, but of all those duties which arise from our domestic relations; and, while it requires not so much any one specific act, as the general disposition which should regulate our whole course of conduct in this instance, it impresses the important conviction, that the entire law proceeds from a Legislator able to search and judge the heart of man. The subsequent commands coincide with the clear dictates of reason, and prohibit crimes which human laws in general have prohibited as plainly destructive of social happiness. But it was of infinite importance to rest the prohibitions, "Thou shalt not kill," "Thou shalt not commit adultery," "Thou shalt not steal," "Thou shalt not bear false witness," not merely on the deductions of reason, but also on the weight of a divine authority. How often have false ideas of public good in some places, depraved passions in others, and the delusions of idolatry in still more, established a law of reputation contrary to the dictates of reason, and the real interests of society. In one country we see theft allowed, if perpetrated with address; in others, piracy and rapine honored, if conducted with intrepidity. Sometimes we perceive adultery permitted, the most unnatural crimes committed without remorse or shame; nay, every species of impurity enjoined and consecrated as a part of divine worship. In others, we find revenge honored as spirit, and death inflicted at its impulse, with ferocious triumph. Again, we see every feeling of nature outraged, and parents exposing their helpless children to perish for deformity of body or weakness of mind; or, what is still more dreadful, from mercenary or political views; and this inhuman practice familiarized by custom, and authorized by law. And, to close the horrid catalogue, we see false religions leading their deluded votaries to heap the altars of their idols with human victims; the master butchers his slave, the conqueror his captive; nay, dreadful to relate, the parent sacrifices his children, and, while they shriek amidst the tortures of the flames, or in the agonies of death, he drowns their cries by the clangor of cymbals and the yells of fanaticism. Yet these abominations, separate or combined, have disgraced ages and nations which we are accustomed to admire and celebrate as civilized and enlightened.—Babylon and Egypt, Phœnicia and Carthage, Greece and Rome. Many of these crimes legislators have enjoined, or philosophers defended. What, indeed, could be hoped from legislators and philosophers, when we recollect the institutions of Lycurgus, especially as to purity of manners, and the regulations of Plato on the same subject, in his model of a perfect republic; when we consider the sensuality of the Epicureans, and immodesty of the Cynics; when we find suicide applauded by the Stoics, and the murderous combats of gladiators defended by Cicero, and exhibited by Trajan? Such variation and inconstancy in the rule and practice of moral duty, as established by the feeble or fluctuating authority of human opinion, demonstrates the utility of a clear divine interposition, to impress these important prohibitions; and it is difficult for any sagacity to calculate how far such an interposition was necessary, and what effect it may have produced by influencing human opinions and regulating human conduct, when we recollect that the Mosaic code was probably the first written law ever delivered to any nation; and that it must have been generally known in those Eastern countries, from which the most ancient and celebrated legislators and sages derived the models of their laws and the principles of their philosophy.

But the Jewish religion promoted the interests of moral virtue, not merely by the positive injunctions of the decalogue; it also inculcated clearly and authoritatively the two great principles on which all piety and virtue depend, and which our blessed Lord recognised as the commandments on which hang the law and the prophets,—the principles of love to God and love to our neighbor. The love of God is everywhere enjoined in the Mosaic law, as the ruling disposition of the heart, from which all obedience should spring, and in which it ought to terminate, Deut. 6: 4, 5. 10: 12. Lev. 19: 13, 33, 34.

Thus, on a review of the topics we have discussed, it appears that the Jewish law promulgated the great principles of moral duty in the decalogue, with a solemnity suited to their high pre-eminence; that it enjoined love to God with the most unceasing solicitude, and love to our neighbor, as extensively and forcibly, as the peculiar design of the Jewish economy, and the peculiar character of the Jewish people, would permit; that it impressed the deepest conviction of God's requiring, not mere external observances, but heart-felt piety, well regulated desires, and active benevolence; that it taught sacrifice could not obtain pardon without repentance, or repentance without reformation and restitution; that it described circumcision itself, and, by consequence, every other legal rite, as designed to typify and inculcate internal holiness, which alone could render men acceptable to God; that it represented the love of God as designed to act as a practical principle, stimulating to the constant and sincere cultivation of purity, mercy, and truth; and that it enforced all these principles and precepts by sanctions the most likely to operate powerfully on minds unaccustomed to abstract speculations and remote views, even by temporal as well as eternal rewards and punishments; the assurance of which was confirmed from the immediate experience of similar rewards and punishments, dispensed to their enemies and to themselves by that supernatural Power which had delivered the Hebrew nation out of Egypt, conducted them through the wilderness, planted them in the land of Canaan, regulated their government, distributed their possessions, and to which alone they could look to obtain new blessings, or secure those already enjoyed. From all this we derive another presumptive argument for the divine authority of the Mosaic code; and it may be considered, that a moral system thus perfect, promulgated at so early a period, to such a people, and enforced by such sanctions as no human power could undertake to execute, strongly bespeaks a divine original.

2. Illustration of the Moral Law as given to Christians.—It is important to remark, however, that, although the moral laws of the Mosaic dispensation pass into the Christian code, they stand there in other and higher circumstances; so that the New Testament is a more perfect dispensation of the knowledge of the moral will of God than the Old. In particular, (1.) They are more expressly extended to the heart, as by our Lord, in his sermon on the mount; who teaches us that the thought and inward purpose of any offence, is a violation of the law prohibiting its external and visible commission. (2.) The principles on which they are founded are carried out in the New Testament into a greater variety of duties, which by embracing more perfectly the social and civil relations of life, are of a more universal character. (3.) There is a much more enlarged injunction of positive and particular virtues, especially those which constitute the Christian temper. (4.) By all overt acts being inseparably connected with corresponding principles in the heart, in order to constitute acceptable obedience, which principles suppose the regeneration of the soul by the Holy Ghost. This moral renovation is, therefore, held out as necessary to our salvation, and promised as a part of the grace of our redemption by Christ. (5.) By being connected with promises of divine assistance, which is peculiar to a law connected with evangelical provisions. (6.) By their having a living illustration in the perfect and practical example of Christ. (7.) By the higher sanctions derived from the clearer revelation of a future state, and the more explicit promises of eternal life, and threatenings of eternal punishment. It follows from this, that we have in the gospel the most complete and perfect revelation of moral law ever given to men; and a more exact manifestation of the brightness, perfection, and glory of that law, under which angels and our progenitors in paradise were placed, and which it is at once the delight and the interest of the most perfect and happy beings to obey.

3. Law, remedial, a fancied law, which some believe in, who hold that God, in mercy to mankind, has abolished that rigorous constitution or law that they were under originally, and instead of it has introduced a more mild constitution, and put us under a new law, which requires no more than imperfect sincere obedience, in compliance with our poor, infirm, impotent circumstances since the fall. I call this a fancied law, because it exists nowhere except in the imagination of those who hold it. (See NEONOMIANS; and JUSTIFICATION.)

3. Law of honor is a system of rules constructed by people of fashion, and calculated to facilitate their intercourse with one another, and for no other purpose. Consequently nothing is adverted to by the law of honor but what tends to incommode this intercourse. Hence this law only prescribes and regulates the duties betwixt equals, omitting such as relate to the Supreme Being, as well as those which we owe to our inferiors; and, in most instances, is favorable to the licentious indulgence of the natural passions. Thus it allows of fornication, adultery, drunkenness, prodigality, duelling, and of revenge in the extreme, and lays no stress upon the virtues opposite to these.

5. Laws of nations are those rules which by a tacit consent are agreed upon among all communities, at least among those who are reckoned the polite and humanized part of mankind. Graves on the Pentateuch; Witherspoon's Moral Philosophy; Gill's Body of Div., vol. i. p. 454, 8vo. vol. iii. 425, ditto; *Paley's Mor. LAW, (WILLIAM,) a non-juring divine, was born, in 1686, at King's Cliffe, in Northamptonshire; was educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge; and died in 1761. Law was a man of piety, acuteness and talent; but a firm believer in the absurdities of Behmen. Of his works the most popular are, The Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life; and a Practical Treatise on Christian Perfection.—Jones' Chris. Biog.; Davenport.

LAW, (EDMUND, D. D.,) a learned prelate, was born, in 1703, near Cartmel, in Lancashire; was educated at St. John's college, Cambridge; and after having held some lesser preferments, among which were the living of Greystock, the archdeaconry of Carlisle, and the mastership of Peterhouse, Cambridge, he was raised, in 1769, to the bishopric of Carlisle. He died in 1787. He wrote Considerations on the Theory of Religion; Inquiry into the Ideas of Space, Time, &c.; and various tracts; and published an edition of Locke's works.—Davenport.

LAWYERS. These functionaries, so often mentioned in the New Testament, were men who devoted themselves to the study and explanation of the law; particularly of the traditional or oral law. They belonged to the sect of the Pharisees, and fell under the reproof of our Savior for having taken from the people the key of knowledge. They were as the blind leading the blind.—Calmet.

LAY-BROTHERS; among the Romanists, illiterate persons, who devote themselves at some convent to the service of the religious. They wear a different habit from that of the religious, but never enter into the choir, nor are present at the chapters; nor do they make any other vow than that of constancy and obedience.—Hend. Buck.

LAYMAN; one who follows a secular employment, and is not in orders; opposed to a clergyman. The distinction is purely ecclesiastical; and being founded on misinterpretation and misapplication of the word of God, is most preposterously adopted by some dissenters, whose professed principles are totally at variance with the unscriptural idea which it is calculated to foster. (See CLERGY.)—Hend. Buck.

LAZARUS; brother to Martha and Mary. He dwelt at Bethany with his sisters, near Jerusalem; and the Lord Jesus did him the honor sometimes of lodging at his house when he visited the city. See the account of his resurrection related at large in John 11: 5, &c.—Watson.

LEAD, is a very heavy metal, sufficiently well known. The mode of purifying it from the dross which is mixed with it, by subjecting it to a fierce flame, and melting off its scoria or dross, furnishes several allusions in Scripture to God's punishing, or purifying his people. The prophet Ezekiel (22: 18, 20.) compares the Jews to lead, because of their guilt, and dross, from which they must be purged as by fire. Mention is made of a talent of lead in Zech. 5: 7, 8, which probably was of a figure and size as well known as any of our weights in ordinary use; so that though weights are usually called in Hebrew stones, yet, perhaps, they had some of metal only; as this talent of lead, for instance.

Lead was one of the substances used for writing upon by the ancients. (See Book.)—Calvet.

LEADLYANS; the followers of Jean Leadly, an English lady, who, about the beginning of the eighteenth century, pretended to visions, and insisted that if all who bear the Christian name, regardless of external doctrines and discipline, would commit their souls to the care of the internal guide, the church would speedily become a glorious scene of charity, concord, and happiness. Her disciples she formed into a body, to which she gave the name of the Philadelphina Society. She predicted a period when all intellectual beings should be finally restored to perfection and happiness. She had two principal associates, Bromely and Pordage, the former of whom had nothing to recommend him but his mystical piety; and the latter surpassed Jacob Behmen himself in obscurity and nonsense; and could only excite in his hearers a stupid awe, by the sonorous jingle of his words.—Hend. Buck.

LEAGUE, (SMALCALDIC;) a solemn alliance first formed at Smalcald, in 1530, and afterwards at Frankfort, by the elector of Saxony, and those princes who were confederate with him, with a view to defend, with the utmost vigor, their religion and liberties against the dangers and encroachments with which they were menaced by the diet which had just been framed at the diet of Augsburg. Into this confederacy they invited the kings of England, France, and Denmark, with several other states and republics, and left no means unemployed that might tend to corroborate and cement it. Mosheim's Church Hist., iv. p. 98.—Hend. Buck.

LEAGUE AND COVENANT, (SOLENN.) (See COVENANT.)

LEAN. Men lean to their own understanding, when, without serious consulting of God, they trust to their own wisdom and prudence to direct their management, Prov. 3: 5. Saints lean upon Christ when, trusting in his word, they cleave to his person, depend on his righteousness and strength, and delight themselves in his love, Sol. Song 8: 5. Hypocrites lean on the Lord when they profess a strong attachment to his truth, ordinances and ways; and expect that he will show them singular favors and deliverances, Eccl. 3: 11.—Brown.

LEARN. (1.) To get the knowledge of things by hearing or observing, 1 Cor. 14: 31. Ps. 119: 71. (2.) To imitate; to follow as a pattern, Ps. 106: 35. Matt. 11: 29. (3.) To take heed, 1 Tim. 1: 20. (4.) To know the sentiments of others, Gal. 3: 2. Christ learned obedience by the things which he suffered; by his sufferings he experimentally felt what it was to obey the divine law; and he improved them all to excite his holy manhood to fulfil the obedience required of him, Heb. 5: 8. Some are ever learning and yet never come to the knowledge of the truth; have long the means of instruction, and profess to use them, and yet never have any solid knowledge of divine things, 2 Tim. 3: 7.—Brown.

LEARNING; skill in any science, or that improvement of the mind which we gain by study, instruction, observation, &c. An attentive examination of ecclesiastical history will lead us to see how greatly learning is indebted to Christianity, and that Christianity, in its turn, has been much served by learning. "All the useful learning," says Dr. Jortin, "which is now to be found in the world, is in a great measure owing to the gospel. The Christians, who had a great veneration for the Old Testament, have contributed more than the Jews themselves to secure and explain those books. The Christians, in ancient times, collected and preserved the Greek versions of the Scriptures, particularly the Septuagint, and translated the originals into Latin. To Christians were due the old Hexapla; and in later times Christians have published the Polyglots and the Samaritan Pentateuch. It was the study of the Holy Scriptures which excited Christians from early times to study chronology, sacred and secular; and here much knowledge of history, and some skill in astronomy, were needful. The New Testament, being written in Greek, caused Christians to apply themselves also to the study of that language. As the Christians were opposed by the pagans and the Jews, they were excited to the study of pagan and Jewish literature, in order to expose the absurdities of the Jewish traditions, the weakness of paganism, and the imperfections and insufficiency of philosophy. The first fathers, till the third century, were generally Greek writers. In the third century the Latin language was much upon the decline, but the Christians preserved it from sinking into absolute barbarism. Monks, indeed, produced many sad effects; but Providence here also brought good out of evil; for the monks were employed in the transcribing of books, and many valuable authors would have perished if it had not been for the monasteries. In the ninth century, the Saracens were very studious, and contributed much to the restoration of letters. But whatever was good in the Mohammedan religion, it is in no small measure indebted to Christianity for it, since Mohammedanism is made up for the most part of Judaism and Christianity. If Christianity had been suppressed at its first appearance, it is extremely probable that the Latin and Greek tongues would have been lost in the revolutions of empires, and the irruptions of barbarians in the East and in the West; for the old inhabitants would have had no conscientious and religious motives to keep up their language; and then, together with the Latin and Greek tongues, the knowledge of antiquities and the ancient writers would have been destroyed. To whom, then, are we indebted for the knowledge of antiquity, for every thing that is called philosophy, or the littera humaniores?—to Christians. To whom, for grammars and dictionaries of the learned languages?—to Christians. To whom for chronology, and the continuation of history through many centuries?—to Christians. To whom for rational systems of morality, and improvements in natural philosophy, and for the application of these discoveries to religious purposes?—to Christians. To whom for metaphysical researches carried as far as the subject will permit?—to Christians. To whom for the moral rules to be observed by nations in war and peace?—to Christians. To whom for jurisprudence, and for political knowledge, and for settling the rights of subjects, both civil and religious, upon a proper foundation?—to Christians. To whom for the Reformation?—to Christians.

"As religion hath been the chief preserver of erudition, so erudition hath not been ungrateful to her patroness, but hath contributed largely to the support of religion. The useful expositions of the Scriptures, the sober and sensible defences of revelation, the faithful representations of pure and undefiled Christianity; these have been the works of learned, judicious, and industrious men." Nothing, however, is more common than to hear the ignorant decry all human learning as entirely useless in religion; and what is still more remarkable, even some, who call themselves preachers, entertain the same sentiments. But to such we can only say what a judicious preacher observed upon a public occasion, that if all men had been as unlearned as themselves, they never would have had a text on which to have displayed their ignorance. Dr. Jortin's Sermons, vol. vii. charge 1; Miss H. More's Hints to a Young Princess, vol. i. p. 64; Cook's Miss. Ser. on Matt. 6: 3; Dr. Stennett's Ser. on Acts 20: 24, 25; Buckminster's Oration.—Hend. Buck.

LEAST. The wilful breaker of the least of God's commandments shall be called least in the kingdom of heaven; i. e. shall be of little use or esteem in the visible church, and, without repentance, shall never be admitted into the kingdom of glory, Matt. 5: 19.—Brown.

LEAVE. God may leave his people so as to withdraw his sensible presence and comfort for a time; but never leaves them, nor forsakes them, so as to break his covenant relation to them, as their God, Savior, and Portion; or, as to withhold what continued supplies of gracious influence are necessary to maintain the existence of their new nature, Ps. 141: 8. Heb. 13: 5. Dying parents leave their fatherless children with God, when by the effectual, fervent prayer of faith, they commit them to his care, and trust in his promise that he will preserve, direct, and provide for them, Jer. 49: 11.—Brown.

LEAVEN; well known for its gradually transforming power, Matt. 13: 33. 16: 11. 1 Cor. 5: 6. It was forbidden to the Hebrews, during the seven days of the passover, in memory of what their ancestors did, when they went out of Egypt; they being then obliged to carry unleavened meal with them, and to make bread in haste; the Egyptians pressing them to be gone, Exod. 12: 15, 19. Lev. 2: 11. They were hence very careful in cleansing their houses from it before this feast began.

God forbade either leaven or honey to be offered to him in his temple; that is, in cakes, or in any baked meats. But on other occasions they might offer leavened bread or honey. See Num. 15: 20, 21, where God requires them to give the first fruits of the bread, which was kneaded in all the cities of Israel, to the priests and Levites. Paul (1 Cor. 5: 7, 8.) expresses his desire, that Christians should celebrate their passover with unleavened bread; which figuratively signifies sincerity and truth.—Calmet.

LEBANON, or LIBANUS; signifying white, from its snows; the most elevated mountain or mountain-chain in Syria, celebrated in all ages for its cedars; which, as is well known, furnished the wood for Solomon's temple. This mountain is the centre, or nucleus, of all the mountain-ridges which, from the north, the south, and the east, converge towards this point; but it overtops them all. This configuration of the mountains, and the superiority of Lebanon, are particularly striking to the traveller approaching both from the Mediterranean on the west, and the Desert on the east. Dr. E. D. Clarke, in the month of July, saw some of the eastern summits of Lebanon, or Anti-Libanus, near Damascus, covered with snow, not lying in patches, as is common in the summer season with mountains which border on the line of perpetual congelation, but do not quite reach it, but with that perfectly white, smooth, and velvet-like appearance which snow only exhibits when it is very deep,—a striking spectacle in such a climate, where the beholder, seeking protection from a burning sun, almost considers the firmament to be on fire. At the time this observation was made, the thermometer, in an elevated situation near the sea of Tiberias, stood at one hundred and two degrees in the shade. Sir Frederic Henniker passed over snow in July; and Ali Bey describes the same eastern ridge as covered with snow in September.

The cedar of Lebanon has, in all ages, been reckoned an object of unrivalled grandeur and beauty in the vegetable kingdom. It is, accordingly, one of the natural images which frequently occur in the poetical style of the Hebrew prophets; and is appropriated to denote kings, princes, and potentates of the highest rank. (See CEDAR.)

The stupendous size, the extensive range, and great elevation of Libanus; its towering summits capped with perpetual snow, or crowned with fragrant cedars; its olive plantations; its vineyards producing the most delicious wines; its clear fountains, and cold-flowing brooks; its fertile vales, and odoriferous shrubberies,—combine to form, in Scripture language, "the glory of Lebanon," Isa. 35: 4. But that glory, liable to change, has, by the unanimous consent of modern travellers, suffered a sensible decline. The extensive forests of cedar, which adorned and perfumed the summits and declivities of those mountains, have almost disappeared. Only a small number of these "trees of God, planted by his almighty hand," which, according to the usual import of the phrase, signally displayed the divine power, wisdom, and goodness, now remain. Their countless number in the days of Solomon, and their prodigious bulk, must be recollected, in order to feel the force of that sublime declaration of the prophet: "Lebanon is not sufficient to burn, nor the beasts thereof sufficient for a burnt-offering," Isa. 40: 16. Though the trembling sinner were to make choice of Lebanon for the altar; were to cut down all its forests to form the pile; though the fragrance of this fuel, with all its odoriferous gums, were the incense; the wine of Lebanon pressed from all its vineyards, the libation; and all its beasts, the propitiatory sacrifice; all would prove insufficient to make atonement for the sins of men; would be regarded as nothing in the eyes of the supreme Judge for the expiation of even one transgression. The just and holy law of God requires a nobler altar, a costlier sacrifice, and a sweeter perfume,—the obedience and death of a divine Person to atone for our sins, and the incense of his continual intercession to secure our acceptance with the Father of mercies, and admission into the mansions of eternal rest.—Watson.

LEBBÆUS; otherwise Judas or Thaddæus, brother of James the Less, son of Mary sister of the Virgin, and of Cleophas, and brother of Joseph. He was married and had children. Nicephorus calls his own wife Mary. The Muscovites believe, that they received the faith from him.—Calmet.

LEBONAH; (Judg. 21: 19.) a place which Maundrell takes for Chan-Leban, four leagues from Sichem southward, and two from Bethel.—Calmet.

LECLERC, (JOHN,) an eminent critic, was born, in 1657, at Geneva; and died, in 1736, in a state of childishness, at Amsterdam, where he was a clergyman, and professor of philosophy, belles-lettres, and Hebrew. Leclerc was impatient of contradiction, acrimonious and satirical in debate, irascible, and fond of singularity. He has been called the self-constituted inquisitor of the republic of literature. Among his works are, Arts Critica; Harmonia Evangelica; and the three Bibliothèques, or Libraries, in twenty-five, twenty-eight, and twenty-nine volumes.—Davenport; Ency. Am.

LECTURE, (RELIGIOUS;) a discourse or sermon delivered on any subject in theology. Beside lectures on the Sabbath day, many think proper to preach on weekdays; sometimes at five in the morning, before people go to work, and at seven in the evening, after they have done. In London there is preaching almost every forenoon and evening in the week, at some place or other. It may be objected, however, against week-day preaching, that it has a tendency to take people from their business, and that the number of places open on a Sabbath day supercedes the necessity of it. But in answer to this may it not be observed,—1. That people stand in need at all times of religious instruction, exhortation, and comfort?—2. That there is a probability of converting sinners then as well as at other times?—3. That ministers are commanded to be instant in season and out of season?—And, 4. It gives ministers an opportunity of hearing one another, which is of great utility. After all, it must be remarked, that he who can bear the truth on a Sabbath day does not act consistently to neglect his family or business to be always present at week-day lectures; nor is he altogether wise who has an opportunity of receiving instruction, yet altogether neglects it.—Head. Buck.

LECTURES, (BAMPTON;) a course of eight sermons preached annually at the university of Oxford, set on foot by the reverend John Bampton, canon of Salisbury. According to the directions in his will, they are to be preached upon either of the following subjects: To confirm and establish the Christian faith, and to confute all heretics and schismatics; upon the divine authority of the Holy Scriptures; upon the authority of the writings of the primitive fathers, as to the faith and practice of the primitive church; upon the divinity of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ; upon the divinity of the Holy Ghost; upon the articles of the Christian faith, as comprehended in the Apostles' and Nicene creeds. For the support of this lecture, he bequeathed his lands and estates to the chancellor, masters, and scholars of the university of Oxford forever, upon trust that the vice-chancellor for the time being take and receive all the rents and profits thereof; and, after all taxes, reparations, and necessary deductions made, to pay all the remainder to the endowment of these divinity lecture sermons. He also directs in his w.l., that no person shall be qualified to preach these lectures unless he have taken the degree of master of arts, at least in one of the two universities of Oxford or Cambridge, and that the same person shall never preach the same sermon twice. A number of excellent sermons preached at this lecture are now before the public. A more enlarged account of this lecture may be seen in the Christian Observer for May, 1809.—Hend. Buck.

LECTURE, (MERCHANTS';) a lecture set up in the year 1672, by the Presbyterians and Independents, to show their agreement among themselves, as well as to support the doctrines of the Reformation against the prevailing errors of Popery, Socinianism, and Infidelity. The principal ministers for learning and popularity were chosen as lecturers; such as Dr. Bates, Dr. Manton, Dr. Owen, Mr. Baxter, Mr. Collins, Jenkins, Mead, and afterwards Mr. Alsop, Howe, Cole, and others. It was encouraged and supported by some of the principal merchants and tradesmen of the city. Some misunderstanding taking place, the Presbyterians removed to Salter's hall, and the Independents remained at Pinner's hall, and each party filled up their numbers out of their respective denominations. This lecture is kept up to the present day, and is now held at Broad street meeting every Tuesday morning.—Hend. Buck.

LECTURE, (MONTHLY.) A lecture preached monthly by the Congregational ministers of London in their different chapels, taken in rotation. These lectures have of late been systematically arranged, so as to form a connected course of one or more years. A valuable volume on the Evidences of Revelation, published in 1827, is one of the fruits of these monthly exercises.—Hend. Buck.

LECTURES, (MORNING.) Certain casuistical lectures, which were preached by some of the most able divines in London. The occasion of these lectures seems to be this: During the troublesome times of Charles I., most of the citizens having some near relation or friend in the army of the earl of Essex, so many bills were sent up to the pulpit every Lord's day for their preservation, that the minister had neither time to read them, nor to recommend their cases to God in prayer; it was, therefore, agreed by some London divines to separate an hour for this purpose every morning, one half to be spent in prayer, and the other in a suitable exhortation to the people. When the heat of the war was over, it became a casuistical lecture, and was carried on till the restoration of Charles II. These sermons were afterwards published in several volumes quarto, under the title of the Morning Exercises. The authors were the most eminent preachers of the day; Mr. (afterwards archbishop) Tillotson was one of them. It appears that these lectures were held every morning for one month only; and from the preface to the volume, dated 1689, the time was afterwards contracted to a fortnight. Most of these were delivered at Cripple-gate church, some at St. Giles', and a volume against popery in Southwark. Mr. Neale observes, that this lecture was afterwards revived in a different form, and continued in his day. It was kept up long afterwards at several places in the summer, a week at each place; but lately the time was exchanged for the evening.—Hend. Buck.

LECTURES, (MOYER'S;) a course of eight sermons preached annually, set on foot by the beneficence of lady Moyer, about 1720, who left by will a rich legacy, as a foundation for the same. A great number of English writers having endeavored, in a variety of ways, to invalidate the doctrine of the Trinity, this opulent and orthodox lady was influenced to think of an institution, which should produce to posterity an ample collection of productions in defence of this branch of the Christian faith. The first course of these lectures was preached by Dr. Waterland, on the Divinity of Christ, and are well worthy of perusal.—Hend. Buck.

LECTURE, (WARBURTONIAN;) a lecture founded by bishop Warburton, to prove the truth of revealed religion in general, and the Christian in particular, from the completion of the prophecies in the Old and New Testament which relate to the Christian church, especially to the apostasy of papal Rome. To this foundation we owe the admirable discourses of Hurl, Halifax, Bagon, and many others.—Hend. Buck.

LECTURERS, in the church of England, are an order of preachers distinct from the rector, vicar, and curate. They are chosen by the vestry, or chief inhabitants of the parish, supported by voluntary subscriptions and legacies, and are usually the afternoon preachers, and sometimes officiate on some stated day in the week. Where there are lectures founded by the donations of pious persons, the lecturers are appointed by the founders, without any interposition or consent of the rectors of churches, &c. though with the leave and approbation of the bishop; such as that of lady Moyer at St. Paul's. But the lecturer is not entitled to the pulpit without the consent of the rector or vicar, who is possessed of the freehold of the church.—Hend. Buck.

LEE, (ANN,) founder of the sect of Shakers in America, was born in Manchester, England, about 1736, and was the daughter of a blacksmith, who lived in Toad lane. Her trade was that of a cutter of hatter's fur. She married at an early age Abraham Standley, a blacksmith, who lived in her father's house. She had four children, who all died in infancy.

At the age of twenty-two, about 1758, she became a convert to James Wardley, who was originally a Quaker, but who in 1747, imagining that he had supernatural visions and revelations, established the sect, called Shakers, from their bodily agitations. Having become a member of this society, which was merely a new form of the fanaticism of the French prophets fifty years before, she passed through the exercises of the sect. In her fits, as she clenched her hands, it is said, the blood flowed through the pores of her skin. Her flesh wasted away, and in her weakness she was fed like an infant. Thus was she exercised nine years, by the end of which time, it might be thought, she had lost her reason. At length, about 1770, she made the discovery of the wickedness of marriage, and opened her testimony against it. She called herself "Ann, the Word," signifying, that in her dwelt the Word; and to this day her followers say, that "the man who was called Jesus, and the woman who was called Ann, are verily the two first pillars of the church, the two anointed ones," &c.

Soon after Mrs. Standley, alias Ann Lee, begun her testimony against "the root of human depravity," her exercises induced the people of Manchester to shut her up in a mad-house, where she was kept several weeks. She came to America in the ship Maria, Capt. Smith, and arrived at New York in May, 1774, having as her companions her brother, William Lee, James Whitaker, John Hocknell, called elders, and others. In the spring of 1776, she went to Albany, and thence to Nissequana, now Water-Vliet, eight miles from Albany. Here she and her followers lived unknown a few years, holding their meetings as usual. (See SHAKERS.)

But the beginning of 1780, when there was an unusual religious commotion, brought her in a fine harvest of deluded followers. One of these, Valentine Rathbun, was a Baptist minister, who however in about three months recovered his senses, and published a pamphlet against the imposture. He says, that there attended this infatuation an inexplicable agency upon the body, to which he himself was subjected, that afforded the nerves suddenly and forcibly like the electric fluid, and was followed by tremblings and the complete deprivation of strength. When the good mother had somewhat established her authority with her new disciples, she warned them of the great sin of following the vain customs of the world, and having fleeced them of their ear-rings, necklaces, buckles, and every thing which might nourish pride, and having cut off their hair close by their ears, she admitted them into her church. Thus metamorphosed, they were ashamed to be seen by their old acquaintance, and would be induced to continue Shakers to save themselves from further humiliation.

The impostor asserted, that she was not liable to the assaults of death, and that, when she left this world, she should ascend in the twinkling of an eye to heaven. But unhappily for her claims, she died at Water-Vliet, September 8, 1784.

As to the moral character of another Ann, Reuben Rathbun, who was once a Shaker, testifies, that he once saw her come to hard blows with William Lee. He adds, "It appears to me, that the mother, at that time, was very much overcome with strong liquor." He considered her also as well skilled in profane and indecent language. But, whatever might have been her moral deportment, it is one of the deplorable facts, of which the history of the world is full, evincing the blindness and depravity of man, that rational beings should yield their minds to her blasphemous religious pretensions. New York Theol. Mag., i. 82; V. Rathbun's Hints; D. Rathbun's, Taylor's, West's and Brown's Account of Shakers.—Allen.

LEECH. (See HORSE-LEECH.)

LEEK, (chetsir;) in Num. 11: 5, translated "leek;" in 1 Kings 18: 5. 2 Kings 19: 26. Job 40: 15. Ps. 37: 2. 90: 5. 103: 15. 104: 14. 129: 6. 147: 8. Isa. 35: 7. 37: 27. 40: 6; it is rendered "grass;" in Job 8: 12, "herb;" in Prov. 27: 25. Isa. 15: 6, "hay;" and in Isa. 34: 13, "a court."

The leek is much of the same nature with the onion. The kind called karrat by the Arabians, the allium porrum of Linnaeus, Hasselquist says, must certainly have been one of those desired by the children of Israel, as it has been cultivated and esteemed from the earliest times to the present in Egypt. The inhabitants are very fond of eating it raw, as sauce for their roasted meat; and the poor people eat it raw with their bread, especially for breakfast.

There is reason, however, to doubt whether this plant is intended in Num. 11: 5, and so differently rendered everywhere else: it should rather intend such vegetables as grow promiscuously with grass. Ludolphus supposes that it may mean lettuce and salads in general; and Maillet observes, that the succory and endive are eaten with great relish by the people in Egypt. Bishop Lowth thinks it is the lotus, a sort of water lily, peculiar to Egypt, which forms one of the most common aliments of the Egyptians now, as we learn from history it did in ancient times. The root of this plant is round, of the size of an apple, of an agreeable flavor and refreshing quality, especially in the heats of summer. Some or all of these may be meant.—Watson.

LEES; dregs. To drink up the cup of God's wrath, "even to the lees," is to drink the whole cup to the bottom, Ps. 75: 8. Isa. 51: 17. Ezek. 23: 34. "The lees of the people," signifies the vilest part of them, Isa. 49: 6, 7. God threatens by Zephaniah, to visit those who are settled on their lees; i. e. hardened in their sins, Zeph. 1: 12.—Calmet.

LEGAL or MOSAIC DISPENSATION. (See DISPENSATION.)

LEGALIST, strictly speaking, is one who acts according to or consistent with the law; but in general the term is made use of to denote one who expects salvation by his own works. (See LAW.) We may further consider a legalist as one who has no proper conviction of the evil of sin; who, although he pretends to abide by the law, yet has not a just idea of its spirituality and demands. He is ignorant of the grand scheme of salvation by free grace: proud of his own fancied righteousness, he submits not to the righteousness of God; he derogates from the honor of Christ, by mixing his own works with his; and in fact denies the necessity of the work of the Spirit, by supposing that he has ability in himself to perform all those duties which God has required. Such is the character of the legalist; a character diametrically opposite to that of the true Christian, whose sentiment corresponds with that of the apostle, "By grace are ye saved, through faith, and that not of yourselves: it is the gift of God. Not of works, lest any man should boast." Eph. 2: 8, 9.—Hend. Buck.

LEGATE; a cardinal or bishop, whom the pope sends as his ambassador to sovereign princes.—Hend. Buck.

LEGEND, (legenda;) originally a book, in the Romish church, containing the lessons that were to be read in divine service; from hence the word was applied to the histories of the lives of saints, because chapters were read out of them at matins; but as the golden legend, compiled by James de Varase, about the year 1290, contained in it several ridiculous and romantic stories, the word is now used by Protestants to signify any incredible or inauthentic narrative. Hence, as Dr. Jortin observes, we have false legends concerning the miracles of Christ, of his apostles, and of ancient Christians; and the writers of these fables had, in all probability, as good natural abilities as the disciples of Christ, and some of them wanted neither learning nor craft; and yet they betray themselves by faults against chronology, against history, against manners and customs, against morality, and against probability. A liar of this kind can never pass undiscovered; but an honest relater of truth and matter of fact is safe; he wants no artifice, and fears no examination.—Hend. Buck.

LEGION. The Roman legions were composed each of ten cohorts, a cohort of fifty maniples, and a manipule of fifteen men; consequently, a full legion contained six thousand soldiers, Matt. 26: 53.—Calmet.

LEGION, (THEBEAN;) a name given, in the time of Diocletian, to a whole legion of Christians, consisting of more than six thousand men, who were said to have suffered martyrdom by the order of Maximian. Though this story hath never wanted patrons, yet it is disbelieved by many. Dr. Jortin, in his usual facetious way, says, that it stands upon the authority of one Eucherius, bishop of Lyons, and a writer of the fifth century, who had it from Theodorus, another bishop, who had the honor and felicity to find the relics of these martyrs by revelation, and perhaps by the smell of the bones!—Hend. Buck.

LEGION, (THUNDERING;) a name given to those Christians who served in the Roman army of Marcus Antonius, in the second century. The occasion of it was this:—When that emperor was at war with the Marcomanni, his army was inclosed by the enemy, and reduced to the most deplorable condition by the thirst under which they languished in a parched desert. Just at this time they were remarkably relieved by a sudden and unexpected rain. This event was attributed to the Christians, who were supposed to have effected this by their prayers; and the name of the thundering legion was given to them, on account of the thunder and lightning that destroyed the enemy, while the shower revived the fainting Romans. Whether this was really miraculous or not, has been disputed among learned men. Those who wish to see what has been said on both sides, may consult Witsius Dissertat. de Legione Fulminatrice, which is subjoined to his Aegyptiaca, in defence of this miracle; as also what is alleged against it by Dan. Lauroque, in a discourse upon that subject, subjoined to the Adversaria Sacra of Matt. Lauroque, his father. The controversy between Sir Peter King and Mr. Moyle upon this subject is also worthy of attention.—Hend. Buck.

LEHI, (jaw-bone;) Judg. 15: 18. Calmet remarks, that the Hebrews sometimes called naked, sharp, and steep rocks, teeth, (1 Sam. 14: 4, 5. Job 39: 28.) and that in this case God opened a rock called Maches, or the Cheek-tooth, which was at the place where Samson obtained his victory, and which, for this reason, he called Lehi, the Jaw-bone. This fountain issuing out of a rock called the Cheek-tooth, at a place named the Jaw-bone, has induced some to believe that it came immediately out of a tooth-hole in the ass's jaw-bone, which would be a surprising miracle indeed. But as Calmet explains the matter, the miracle of the fountain issuing out of the rock at Samson's prayer is acknowledged; and wonders are not to be multiplied without necessity. This opinion is adopted by Josephus, by the paraphrast Jonathan, and by many commentators. En-hakkore signifies "the fountain of invocation." The fountain subsisted long, and still subsists, probably, in Palestine. Glycas, and the martyr Antoninus, speak of it as in the suburbs of Eleutheropolis.—Calmet.

LEIBNITZ, (GODFREY WILLIAM;) baron, a philosopher and scholar of almost universal genius, was born, in 1646, at Leipsic; and studied at the universities of that place and of Jena. He was first in the service of the elector of Mentz, as counsellor of revision in the chancery; and, after the death of that prince, was patronised by the house of Hanover. He also received pensions and flattering distinctions from Peter the Great, the king of Prussia, and the emperor of Germany; and was a member of various learned bodies. France he visited once, and England twice, and was received with the respect which was due to his merits. He died at Hanover, in 1716. The major part of the numerous works of Leibnitz has been collected in six quarto volumes by Dutens. Some of the rest were published by Raspe, with the title of Philosophic Works.

"Leibnitz, who was thus occupied with the most abstruse metaphysical inquiries, (says a modern writer,) was also in his day the rival of Newton himself in physical science; possessed unequalled erudition, classical and scholastic; was distinguished by his knowledge of Roman jurisprudence and German antiquities; and was a profound and masterly controversial theologian."

Gibbon also has drawn his character at full length, and in glowing colors. But unlike Gibbon, Leibnitz was a Christian. He was a Protestant, and a Trinitarian. One of his works is entitled "A Logical Defence by new arguments of the Most Holy Trinity." Ency. Am.—Davenport. LEIGHTON, (Abp. ROSECR.,) the most pious and popular preacher of his time, was the eldest son of Dr. Alexander Leighton, and born in London, in the year 1613. After being instructed in the common parts of education, and initiated into the higher branches, he was sent to the university of Edinburgh. He was pious from his youth; early indicating considerable talents, as well as a strong desire to serve God in the sacred ministry; and his studies were directed with that important view. He soon commanded the admiration of his fellow-students by his quick progress in the mathematics and philosophy, and by his familiar acquaintance with the learned languages; while he gained their esteem by the gentleness of his temper, and the prudence of his conduct. Having finished his academical course with great success and applause, he was sent abroad, and lived several years in France. He early imbibed a strong aversion to prelacy, and to the tyranny which the leaders in the church of England practised; an aversion, doubtless, greatly heightened by the sufferings of his father, who was a conscientious, zealous, and persecuted Puritan. The son, accordingly, on his return to Britain, attached himself to the church of Scotland, which was strictly formed on the Presbyterian model; and having been unanimously called by the congregation of Newbottle, near Edinburgh, he was ordained there about the thirtieth year of his age. He remained at Newbottle several years, and was most assiduous in discharging the various duties of his office. His preparation for the pulpit was very exact: he diligently visited the poor, the sick, and the afflicted of his flock; and promoted personal, domestic, social, and public religion, to the utmost of his power, by precept, example, and many prayers.

At the time when Charles I. was confined, by the commissioners of the parliament, in Holmby house, and the engagement was formed to rescue him, Leighton, disgusted with animosity, unable perhaps to ascertain the point where resistance to the authority of a prince becomes lawful and necessary, and probably dreading the downfall of monarchy, declared for the engagement, and gave up his connexion with the Presbyterians, to form one with the Episcopalians. For this conduct, the Presbyterians denounced him as an apostate, and the Episcopalians welcomed him as a convert.

The office of principal in the university of Edinburgh becoming vacant soon after Leighton's resignation of his charge, the magistrates and common-council of that city, who had the gift of presentation, unanimously chose him to fill the chair, and pressed his acceptance of it, by the powerful motive, that he would serve the church, signally, without taking any part in public measures. He delivered lectures, especially to the students of theology, and occasionally supplied the place of divinity professor. His theological lectures are known to the learned world, and have been translated into English. For pure Latin, sublime thought, and warm diction, they have never been surpassed, and seldom equalled. In that office Dr. Leighton remained ten years, the ornament and delight of the university, and a blessing to studious youth.

The conduct of bishop Leighton in accepting a bishopric, in 1662, has been much blamed; but it appears that he hoped, by such conduct, to accommodate differences, and soften animosities; but still, afterwards, he was not satisfied with his own conduct.

The good bishop, who had expressly declared to Charles, that he would not plant even Christianity itself by violence, and far less a particular mode of government and worship, in 1667, went to London the second time, and remonstrated earnestly with the king, against the oppressive measures pursued. Charles, as usual, gave him fair speeches and promises, but nothing effectual was done. Leighton returned to his diocese with a heavy heart, and labored in word and doctrine, preaching and catechising throughout his diocese.

In the year 1670, he was, without his solicitation, and against his will, appointed to the archbishopric of Glasgow, though he did not take possession of that see for twelve months after the appointment. While he was archbishop of Glasgow, he did all in his power to reform the clergy; to correct wickedness, and promote piety among the people; to suppress violence, and to soothe the minds of the Presbyterians. Finding his new situation more and more disagreeable, and seeing no hope of uniting the different parties, he again determined to resign his dignity, and went to London for that purpose, in the summer of 1673. The king, however, still refused to accept his resignation, but gave a written engagement to allow him to retire, after the trial of another year; and, when that period had elapsed, his resignation was accepted.

After resigning the dignity of archbishop of Glasgow, he resumed that of bishop of Dunblane; but, wearied and disgusted with the court, he retired to Broadhurst, in Sussex, and there, in domestic and peaceful habits, spent the remainder of his days with a relative. In 1684, he expired, serene and happy. The works of this learned and pious man consist of various sermons; "A Commentary on the First Epistle of Peter;" "A Critical Exposition of some of the Psalms;" and "Lectures on the First Nine Chapters of St. Matthew;" and have been frequently published. Few uninspired writings, says Dr. Doddridge, are better adapted to mend the world. They continually overflow with love to God and man.

For a further account of this excellent man, see Leighton's Works; Burnet's History of his Own Times; Burnet's Pastoral Care; Doddridge's Preface to Leighton's Works; The Remains of Archbishop Leighton, by Jernett; his Select Works by Chubb, Boston, 1832.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

LELAND, (Joux, D. D.,) a learned English dissenting minister, well known by his writings in defence of Christianity, was born at Wigan, in Lancashire, in 1691, of eminently pious and virtuous parents. They took the earliest care to imbue his mind with virtuous principles; but in his sixth year, the small pox deprived him of his understanding and memory, obliterating from the tablet of his mind all his former ideas. In this deplorable state he continued nearly a year, when his faculties seemed to spring up anew; and though he did not retain the least trace of any impressions made on him prior to his disorder, yet he now discovered a quick apprehension and strong memory. In a few years after, his parents settled at Dublin, which situation gave him an early introduction to learning and the sciences.

When properly qualified by years and study, he was called to the pastoral office, in a congregation of Protestant dissenters in that city. He was an able and acceptable preacher, but his labors were not confined to the pulpit. The numerous attacks that, at that period, were made upon Christianity, and some of them by writers of no contemptible ability, determined him to consider the subject with the exactest care and most faithful examination. The result was a firm conviction of the divine authority, as well as the importance and excellency of Christianity, which he now set himself to defend against a host of assailants. He was indeed a master in this controversy, and his history of it, entitled "A View of the Deistical Writers that have appeared in England, in the last and present Century," is greatly and deservedly esteemed. His calm and dispassionate manner of treating his opponents, and his solid confutation of their objections and reasonings, contributed more to depress the cause of atheism and infidelity, than the angry zeal of warm disputants.

In the decline of life, he published another laborious work, entitled "The Advantages and Necessity of the Christian Revelation, shown from the state of Religion in the Ancient Heathen World, especially with respect to the Knowledge and Worship of the One true God; a Rule of Moral Duty, and a State of Rewards and Punishments; to which is prefixed, a long preliminary Discourse on Natural and Revealed Religion," two volumes quarto. This noble and extensive subject, the several parts of which have been slightly and occasionally handled by other writers, Leland has treated at large with superior ability. The work has been subsequently reprinted, in two volumes, octavo. Dr. Leland died in 1766, in the seventy-fifth year of his age, highly respected for his learning and talents. After his death, his Sermons were published, in four volumes, octavo, with a preface, giving some account of the life, character, and writings of the author, by the Rev. Dr. Isaac Weld; London, 1769.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

LELAND, (THOMAS,) a divine and miscellaneous writer, was born, in 1722, at Dublin, and was educated at Trinity college, where, in 1763, he became professor of oratory. In 1768, the lord lieutenant appointed him his chaplain, and subsequently gave him the vicarage of Bray, and a prebend in St. Patrick's cathedral. Dr. Leland died in 1785. He wrote Sermons; The History of Ireland; The Life of Philip of Macedon; and a Dissertation on the Principles of Human Eloquence, (which was anonymously attacked by Hurd;) and translated the Orations of Demosthenes and Æschines.—Davenport.

LEMPRIERE, (JOHN,) a native of Jersey, was educated at Winchester, and at Pembroke college, Oxford; was head master of Abington grammar-school, and afterwards of the school at Exeter; and, on resigning the latter, was presented to the livings of Meeth and Newton Petrock, in Devonshire, which he held till his decease, in 1824. He compiled the Bibliotheca Classica; and Universal Biography; and printed the first volume of a translation of Herodotus.—Davenport.

LENT, a Teutonic word,—in German, Lenz, the spring; a time of fasting in the church, observed as a period of humiliation before Easter. The Romish church, and some of the Protestant communion, maintain, that it was always a fast of forty days, and, as such, of apostolical institution. Others think that it was of ecclesiastical institution, and that it was variously observed in different churches, and grew by degrees from a fast of forty hours to a fast of forty days. This is the sentiment of Morton, bishop Taylor, Du Moulin, Daille, and others.

Anciently, the manner of observing Lent among those who were piously disposed, was to abstain from food till evening: their only refreshment was a supper, and it was indifferent whether it was flesh or any other food, provided it was used with sobriety and moderation. Lent was thought the proper time for exercising more abundantly every species of charity: thus what they spared of their own bodies by abridging them of a meal, was usually given to the poor: they employed their vacant hours in visiting the sick and those that were in prison; in entertaining strangers, and reconciling differences. The imperial laws forbade all prosecution of men in criminal actions, that might bring them to corporal punishment and torture, during the whole season. This was a time of more than ordinary strictness and devotion; and, therefore, in many of the great churches, they had religious assemblies for prayer and preaching every day. All public games and stage plays were prohibited at this season, and also the celebration of all festivals, birthdays, and marriages.

The Christians of the Greek church observe four Lents; the first commences on the 15th of November; the second is the same with our Lent; the third begins the week after Whitsuntide, and continues till the festival of St. Peter and St. Paul; and the fourth commences on the 1st of August, and lasts no longer than till the 15th. These Lents are observed with great strictness and austerity, but on Saturdays and Sundays they indulge themselves in drinking wine and using oil, which are prohibited on other days.—Hend. Duck.

LENTIL, (odeshim; Gen. 25: 34. 2 Sam. 17: 28. 23: 11. Ezek. 4: 9.) a sort of pulse; in the Septuagint phakos, and Vulgate lens. The lentils of Egypt were very much esteemed among the ancients. St. Austin says, they grow abundantly in Egypt, are much used as a food there, and those of Alexandria are considered particularly valuable. Dr. Shaw says, beans, lentils, kidney-beans, and garvancos are the chief of their pulse kind. Beans, when boiled, and stewed with oil and garlic, are the principal food of persons of all distinctions. Lentils are dressed in the same manner as beans, dissolving easily into a mass, and making a pottage of a chocolate color. This, we find, was the "red pottage" which Esau, from thence called Edom, exchanged for his birthright.—Watson.

LEO X., Pope, JOHN DE MEDICI, the son of the illustrious Lorenzo, was born, in 1475, at Florence, and was nominated a cardinal in his thirteenth year. In 1505, he was made governor of Perugia; was intrusted with the command of the papal army in 1511; and was made prisoner, in the following year, at the battle of Ravenna. He attained the papal crown in 1513, on the death of Julius II. He died in 1521. Leo was one of the most magnificent patrons of learning and of the arts; but he was prodigal, and on some occasions grossly violated the principles of justice. To his shameless sale of indulgences, to raise money to complete St. Peter's church at Rome, the world is indebted for the Reformation of the church, by Luther.—Davenport.

LEO, (JOH. Z.) This great and good divine was born in Alsace, Germany, in 1482, and took his degree at the university of Basil in 1512. Here he was associated with Zuinglius, and imbibed from Dr. Wittenbush, his preceptor, the true principles of the gospel. He also studied the Oriental languages, the fathers, particularly Jerome and Augustine, and the books of Luther, Erasmus, and Reuchlin, the famous Hebraist. Called to the pastoral charge at Zurich, where he labored eighteen years, he openly opposed the abominations of popery, both from the pulpit and the press; and became distinguished among the great and burning lights of the Reformation.

Assisted by other learned men, he undertook, by request of his brethren, the translation of the Old Testament, to which he devoted himself with such intense application as destroyed his health. He died in 1542, leaving most of the poetical books unfinished; which however were completed by his friend Bibliander, and published by Conrad Pellican. It is said that Robert Stephens in a great measure pirated this translation. He was also the author of Annotations on Genesis, Exodus, and the Epistles, besides translating some of the Works of Zuinglius into Latin.

In his last moments he said, "To my Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, my hope and my salvation, I wholly give up my soul and body. I cast myself wholly upon his mercy and grace. In this confidence I fear not to die."—Middleton, i. p. 152.

LEONARD, (GEORGE,) a young minister of great loveliness and promise, was born in Raynham, Mass., August 17, 1802, of pious parents. His father dying when he was five years old, his religious education devolved on his excellent mother. He became pious in 1818, was baptized in 1820, and graduated at Brown university in 1824. He was immediately chosen tutor of Columbian college, Washington. In 1826, he accepted an invitation to become pastor of the second Baptist church in Salem, (Mass.) where he labored till the failure of his health, in 1829. Having in some measure recovered in 1831, he settled as pastor of the Baptist church in Portland, (Me.) where he fell a victim to the ardor of his zeal. He died of an affection of the lungs, August 11, 1832, in the calm triumph of the Christian believer. His last words were, "Prepare to meet your God." He was eminent as a biblical scholar.—Memoir, prefixed to his Sermons.

LEONIDAS, father of the celebrated Origen, was a Christian martyr of the third century. Previous to the execution, his son, in order to encourage him, wrote to him as follows: "Beware that your care for us does not make you change your resolution!" The father accepted the heroic exhortation of the son, and yielded his neck joyfully to the stroke of the executioner.—Fox, p. 23.

LEOPARD, (nimir; Cant. 4: 8. Isa. 11: 6. Jer. 5: 6. 13: 23. Hosea 13: 7. Hab. 1: 8. Dan. 7: 6.) pardalis,

Rev. 13: 2. Ecclus. 28: 23. There can be no doubt that the pard or leopard is the animal mentioned. Bochart shows that the name is similar in the Chaldee, Syriac, Arabic, and Ethiopic. The LXX uniformly render it by pardalis; and Jerome, pardus. The leopard is a fierce animal, spotted with a diversity of colors; it has small white eyes, wide jaws, sharp teeth, round ears, a large tail; five claws on his fore feet, four on those behind. It is said to be extremely cruel to man. Its name, leopard, implies that it has something of the lion and of the panther in its nature. Probably, these animals were numerous in Palestine; as we find places with a name intimating their having been the haunts of leopards: Nimrah, (Num. 32: 3.) Beth-Nimrah, (Num. 32: 36. Joshua 13: 27.) and "waters of Nimrim," (Isaiah 15: 6. Jer. 48: 34.) and "mountains of leopards," Cant. 4: 8. Brocard says, that the mountain called by the name of Leopards is two leagues from Tripoli northwards, and one league from Libanus. Nimrod might have his name from this animal.—Watson; Calmet.

LEPER. (See LEPROSY.)

LEPROSY. Moses mentions three sorts of leproisies; in (1.) men; (2.) houses; and (3.) clothes.

1. Leprosy in men: this disease affects the skin, and sometimes increases in such a manner, as to produce scurf, scabs, and violent itchings, and to corrupt the whole mass of blood. At other times it is only a deformity.

The Jews regarded the leprosy as a disease sent from God, and Moses prescribes no natural remedy for the cure of it. He requires only that the diseased person should show himself to the priest, and that the priest should judge of his leprosy; if it appeared to be a real leprosy, capable of being communicated to others, he separated the leper from the company of mankind. He appoints certain sacrifices and particular ceremonies already mentioned for the purification of a leper, and for restoring him to society. The marks which Moses gives for the better distinguishing a leprosy, are signs of the increase of this disease. Those who have treated of this disease, have made the same remarks, but have distinguished a recent leprosy from one already formed and become inveterate. A recent leprosy may be healed, but an inveterate one is incurable.

The common marks by which, as physicians tell us, an inveterate leprosy may be discerned are these: The voice becomes hoarse, like that of a dog which has been long barking, and comes through the nose rather than the mouth: the pulse is small and heavy, slow and disordered: the blood abounds with white and bright corpuscles, like millet-seeds; is, in fact, all a scurfy serum, without due mixture; so that salt put into it does not melt, and is so dry, that vinegar mixed with it bubbles up; the urine is undigested, settled, ash-colored, and thick; the sediment like meal mixed with bran: the face is like a coal half extinguished, shining, unctuous, bloated, full of very hard pimples, with small kernels round about the bottom of them: the eyes are red and inflamed, and project out of the head, but cannot be moved either to the right or left: the ears are swelled and red, corroded with ulcers about the root of them, and encompassed with small kernels: the nose sinks, because the cartilage rots: the nostrils are open, and the passages stopped with ulcers at the bottom:

the tongue is dry, black, swelled, ulcerated, shortened, divided in ridges, and beset with little white pimples; the skin of it is uneven, hard, and insensible; even if a hole be made in it, or it be cut, a putrefied saues issues from it instead of blood. Leprosy is very easily communicated; and hence Moses has taken so much precaution to prevent lepers from communication with persons in health. His care extended even to dead bodies thus infected, which he directed should not be buried with others.

We can hardly fail of observing the character, and terror in consequence, of this disease; how dreadful is the leprosy in Scripture! how justly dreadful, when so fatal, and so hopeless of cure! Mungo Park states that the Negroes are subject to a leprosy of the very worst kind; and Mr. Grey Jackson, in his "Account of Morocco;" (p. 192.) informs us, that the species of leprosy called jeddem, is very prevalent in Barbary. "At Morocco there is a separate quarter, outside of the walls, inhabited by lepers only. Those who are affected with it are obliged to wear a badge of distinction whenever they leave their habitations; so that a straw hat, with a very wide brim, tied on in a particular manner, is the signal for persons not to approach the wearer.

Niebuhr gives the best account of the various kinds of leprosy in Arabia.

2. The leprosy of houses, mentioned in Lev. 11: 34. The rabbins and others conclude, that this leprosy of houses was not natural, but was a punishment inflicted by God on wicked Israelites; but Calmet is of opinion that it was caused by animalculæ which erode the stones like mites in a cheese. Might it be similar to the dry-rot in timber?

3. The leprosy in clothes is also noticed by Moses, as common in his time. Calmet thinks it very credible, that the leprosy in clothes and skins was caused by vermin.—Calmet.

LESHEM, perhaps Laish, also Dan.—Calmet.

LESLIE, (CHARLES,) was born in Ireland but the date of his birth is unknown. His father, John Leslie, whose life exceeded a hundred years, was made bishop of the Orkney islands, by Charles the First, and afterwards successively translated to the Irish sees of Raphoe and Clogher. Charles was his second son, and received his education at Trinity college, Dublin, where he graduated master of arts. He afterwards became a student in the Temple, but relinquished the law for divinity, and entered into orders in 1680.

In 1687, he was made chancellor of Connor, and displayed great firmness in resisting the measures of the popish party, by disputation and otherwise; and in particular, withstood the admission of a sheriff of that religion, although nominated by James the Second himself. But notwithstanding this resistance to what he deemed an illegal mandate, he did not fall in with the principles of the revolution, and declined taking the oath to king William, which necessarily deprived him of all his preferments; and he withdrew, with his family, from England. He returned to his own country, and died at his own house at Glaslough, in the county of Monaghan, April the 13th, 1732. He wrote, with singular acuteness and ability, against Deists, Jews, and Socinians, and his works have been collected and published, in two volumes, folio.

Bayle styles him a man of great merit and learning, and adds, that he was the first who wrote, in Great Britain, against the fanaticism of madame Boitron; his books, he further says, are much esteemed, and especially his treatise of "The Snake in the Grass." Salmon observes, that his works must transmit him to posterity as a man thoroughly learned and truly pious. Dr. Hickeys says that he made more converts to a sound faith and holy life than any man of the age in which he lived; that his consummate learning, attended by the lowest humility, the strictest piety without the least tincture of narrowness, a conversation to the last degree lively and spirited, yet to the last degree innocent, made him the delight of mankind. Biog. Brit. and Ency. Brit.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

LESSONS, among ecclesiastical writers, are portions of the Holy Scriptures read in churches at the time of divine service. In the ancient church, reading the Scripture was one part of the service of the catechumen, at which all persons were allowed to be present, in order to obtain instruction. (See BIBLE.)—Hend. Evcl.

LETECH; a Hebrew measure, half an omer; containing sixteen pecks, or four bushels, Hos. 3: 2.—Calmet.

LETTERS; marks for the purpose of expressing sounds, used in writing. Few subjects have given rise to more discussion than the origin of alphabetic characters. If they are of human invention, they must be considered as one of the most admirable efforts of the ingenuity of man. So wonderful is the facility which they afford for recording human thought; so ingenious, and at the same time so simple, is the analysis which they furnish for the sounds of articulate speech, and for all the possible variety of words; that we might expect the author of this happy invention to have been immortalized by the grateful homage of succeeding ages, and his name delivered down to posterity with the ample honors it so justly merited. But the author and the era of this discovery, if such it be, are both lost in the darkness of remote antiquity. Even the nation to which the invention is due cannot now be ascertained. The Egyptians, the Assyrians, the Phœnicians, the Persians, the Indians, have all laid claim to the honor of it; and each has named its inventor among the remote, and probably fabulous, personages that figure in the earlier ages of their history.

Lucan affirms, that the Phœnicians invented the common letters before the Egyptians were acquainted with the use of paper, or with the art of writing in hieroglyphical characters; (lib. 3.) it was probably in imitation of the Phœnicians, therefore, that the Egyptians used letters in their writing. Of this we cannot be certain, but two things we know; first, that there were great resemblances in the ancient characters of the two people; and secondly, that Moses, who was instructed in all the learning of Egypt, wrote in Phœnician characters. The old Egyptian letters are at present unknown, though many of them remain. This people lost the use of their writing when under the dominion of the Greeks, and the Coptic or modern Egyptian character is formed from the Greek.

The Phœnicians spread the use of their letters throughout all their colonies. Cadmus carried them into Greece; the Greeks perfected them, and added others. They communicated them to the Latins, and after the conquests of Alexander, extended them over Egypt and Syria. So that the Phœnician writing, which is so ancient, and the parent of so many others, would at this day have been entirely forgotten, had not the Samaritans preserved the Pentateuch of Moses, written in the old Cœnaanite or Hebrew character; by the help of which, medals, and the small remains of Phœnician monuments, have been deciphered.

Some learned men, however, maintain that the square Hebrew character still in use, is the same as was used by Moses; but the greater number suppose that the Jews gradually abandoned the original character, while in captivity at Babylon, and that ultimately Ezra substituted the Chaldee, which is now used; while the Samaritans preserved their Pentateuch, written in old Hebrew and Phœnician characters. (See WARRISO.)

It is generally said, that the Hebrews have no vowels, and that to supply the want of them, they invented the vowel points, sometimes used by them in their books. But it is certain that they have vowels; though they do not always express them in their writing; and that the sound, powers, and quantity of these vowels are not always the same, as happens also in other languages. Aleph, Vau, Jod, and Ain are vowels; He is an aspirate only. The vowel points are modern, and the invention of the Massorets, about the middle of the ninth, or the beginning of the tenth, century. The honor of them is ascribed principally to the rabbins Asher and Naphtali, who lived at that time. They are ten in number, and express the five vowels according to their different changes and pronunciations. The inquisitive reader may find the substance of the dispute for and against the antiquity of the vowel points clearly and concisely represented by Prideaux, in the first part of his Connection, book v., and from thence may have a distinct view of the chief arguments produced pro and con in this controversy, by those eminent antagonists Capellus, the two Buxtorfs, &c.

The Hebrews have certain acrostic verses, which begin with the letters of the alphabet, ranged in order.

The most considerable of these is Psalm 119., which contains twenty-two stanzas of eight verses each, all acrostic; that is, the first eight begin with Aleph, the next eight with Beth, and so on. Other Psalms, as 25, 33, have but twenty-two verses, each beginning with one of the twenty-two letters of the alphabet. Others, as 111, 112, have one half of the verse beginning with one letter, and the other half with another. Thus:—

Blessed is the man who feareth the Lord,
Who delighteth greatly in his commandments.

The first half of the verse begins with Aleph; the second with Beth. The Lamentations of Jeremiah are also in acrostic verse, as well as the thirty-first chapter of Proverbs, from the eighth verse to the end.

The Jews use their characters not only for writing, but for numbers, as did the Greeks, who in their arithmetical computations fixed a numerical value on their letters. But we do not believe the ancient Hebrews did so, nor that letters were numerical among them. The sacred authors always write the numbers entire and without abbreviation. We know that some learned men have attempted to rectify dates, or supply years, on a supposition that the letters served for numerals in the Scripture; but it was incumbent on them first, to prove that the ancient Hebrews used that manner.

In consequence of this uncertainty respecting the author of alphabetic writing, and the high value and extreme difficulty of the invention itself, many have been inclined to attribute this art to an immediate revelation from the Deity; contending that it was communicated with other invaluable gifts from above, in remote ages, to the descendants of Abraham, and probably to the patriarch Moses, who was the author of the most ancient compositions in alphabetical writing that we at present possess. The arguments which are brought in support of the divine revelation of the alphabet, are chiefly these: 1. The high antiquity of the use of letters; the Hebrew characters having existed in a perfect state when Moses composed the Pentateuch, the most ancient writing now known to be extant. 2. The similarity between the various alphabets of different nations, which, for the most part, are the same, in the order, power, and even form, of their letters with the Hebrew. 3. The complete want of alphabetic characters among those nations, which have been cut off from all communication with the ancient civilized world, as the aboriginal Americans; or that part of the human race which had no opportunity of borrowing the system of written characters revealed to the Hebrews, as China. (See WARRISO, and BOOKS).—Watson: Calmet.

LETTER, (τὸν) Paul places the letter in opposition to the spirit; a way of speaking very common in the ecclesiastical style, Rom. 2: 27, 29. 7: 6. 2 Cor. 3: 6, 7. "God hath made us ministers of the New Testament, not of the letter, but of the spirit; for the letter killeth, but the spirit quickeneth;" that is, the law of Moses is incapable of giving life to the soul, and justifying before God those who are most servilely addicted to the literal observance of it. These things can be effected only by means of the gospel of Christ, and of that Spirit of truth and holiness which attends it, and makes it effectual to the salvation of the soul.—Calmet.

LEUCOPETRIANS; the name of a fanatical sect which sprung up in the Greek and Eastern churches towards the close of the twelfth century; they professed to believe in a double trinity, rejected wedlock, abstained from flesh, treated with the utmost contempt the sacraments of baptism and the Lord's supper, and all the various branches of external worship; placed the essence of religion in internal prayer alone; and maintained, as it is said, that an evil being or genius dwelt in the breast of every mortal, and could be expelled from thence by no other method than by perpetual supplication to the Supreme Being. The founder of this sect is said to have been a person called Leucopetrus, and his chief disciple, Tychicus, who corrupted by fanatical interpretations several books of Scripture, and particularly the gospel of Matthew. This account is not undoubted.—Hend. Burk.

LEVI, the third son of Jacob and Leah, was born in Mesopotamia, A. M. 2248, Gen. 29: 31. 34: 25, 26. 46: 11. 49: 5, 6.

Levi was, according to his father's prediction, scattered over all Israel, having no share in the division of Canaan, but certain cities in the portions of other tribes. He was not the worse provided for, however, since God chose the tribe for the service of the temple and priesthood, and bestowed on it many privileges above the other tribes, in dignity, and in the advantages of life. (See LEVITES.)—Calmet.

LEVIATHAN; Job 3: 8. 41: 1. Psalms 74: 14. 104: 26. Isaiah 27: 1. The old commentators concurred in regarding the whale as the animal here intended. Beza and Diodati were among the first to interpret it the crocodile: and Bochart has since supported this last rendering with a train of argument which has nearly overpowered all opposition, and brought almost every commentator over to his opinion. It is very certain that it could not be the whale, which does not inhabit the Mediterranean, much less the rivers that empty themselves into it; nor will the characteristics at all apply to the whale. The crocodile, on the contrary, is a natural inhabitant of the Nile, and other Asiatic and African rivers; of enormous voracity and strength, as well as fleetness in swimming; attacks mankind and the largest animals with most daring impetuosity; when taken by means of a powerful net, will often overturn the boats that surround it; has, proportionally, the largest mouth of all monsters whatever; moves both its jaws equally, the upper of which has not less than forty, and the lower than thirty-eight sharp, but strong and massy, teeth; and is furnished with a coat of mail, so scaly and callous as to resist the force of a musket-ball in every part, except under the belly. Indeed, to this animal the general character of the leviathan seems so well to apply, that it is unnecessary to seek farther.—Calmet; Harris; Abbott; Watson.

LEVIRATE; a Hebrew law, in obedience to which, when a man died without issue, his brother was obliged to marry his widow, with the view of raising up a first-born son to succeed to the inheritance. The term is derived from the word Levir, which, though not of classical authority, is found in the Vulgate and the Pandects, and is explained by Festus to signify a husband's brother. Michaëlis on the Laws of Moses, article 98.—Hend. Buck.

LEVITES. Under this name may be comprised all the descendants of Levi; but it principally denotes those who were employed in the lowest ministries of the temple, by which they were distinguished from the priests, who, being descended from Aaron, were likewise of the race of Levi by Kohath, but were employed in higher offices. The Levites were descendants of Levi, by Gershom, Kohath, and Merari, excepting the family of Aaron; for the children of Moses had no part in the priesthood, and were only common Levites.

God chose the Levites instead of the first-born of all Israel, for the service of his tabernacle and temple, Num. 3: 6, &c. They obeyed the priests in the ministrations of the temple, and brought to them wood, water, and other things necessary for the sacrifices. They sung, and played on instruments, in the temple, &c.; they studied the law, and were the ordinary judges of the country, but subordinate to the priests. Moses ordained that the Levites should not begin in the service of the tabernacle till they were five-and-twenty years of age, (Num. 8: 24—26.) or, as he says elsewhere, from thirty to fifty years old, Num. 4: 3. But David, finding that they were no longer employed in these grosser offices of transporting the vessels of the tabernacle, appointed them to enter on service at the temple at twenty years of age. The priests and Levites waited by turns, weekly, in the temple. They began their weeks on one Sabbath day, and on the Sabbath day in the following week went out of waiting, 1 Chron. 23: 24. 2 Chron. 21: 17. Ezra 3: 8.

God provided for the subsistence of the Levites, by giving them the tythe of corn, fruit, and cattle; but they paid to the priests the tenth of their tythes; and as the Levites possessed no estates in the land, the tythes which the priests received from them were looked on as the first-fruits which they were to offer to the Lord, Num. 18: 21—24. God assigned them for their habitations forty-eight cities, with fields, pastures and gardens, Num. 35. Of these, thirteen were given to the priests, six of which were cities of refuge, Joshua 20: 7. 21: 19, 20, &c. While the Levites were actually employed in the temple, they were subsisted out of the provisions in store there, and out of the daily offerings there made; and if any Levite quitted the place of his abode, to serve the temple, even out of the time of his half-yearly or weekly waiting, he was received there, kept and provided for, in like manner as his other brethren, who were regularly in waiting, Deut. 18: 6—8. When an Israelite made a religious entertainment in the temple, God required that the Levites should be invited to it, Deut. 12: 18, 19.

The consecration of Levites was without much ceremony. They were no peculiar habit to distinguish them from the other Israelites, and God ordained nothing particularly for their mourning, 2 Chron. 29: 34. The manner of their consecration may be seen in Num. 8: 5—7, &c.—Watson.

LEVITES, (MILITARY;) a name given to such ministers in the time of the Commonwealth, as filled the office of chaplain to the regiments of the parliamentary army.—Hend. Buck.

LEVITICUS; a canonical book of Scripture, being the third book of the Pentateuch of Moses; thus called because it contains principally the laws and regulations relating to the Levites, priests, and sacrifices; for which reason the Hebrews call it the law of the priests, because it includes many ordinances concerning their services. (See PENTATEUCH.)—Watson.

LEVITY; lightness of spirit, in opposition to gravity. Nothing can be more proper than for a Christian to wear an air of cheerfulness, and to watch against a morose and gloomy disposition. But though it be his privilege to rejoice, yet he must be cautious of that volatility of spirit which characterizes the unthinking, and marks the vain professor. To be cheerful without levity, and grave without austerity, form both a happy and dignified character.—Hend. Buck.

LEWIS DE DIEU. This great man, minister of Leyden, and professor in the Walloon college of that city, was born, in 1590, at Flushing, where his father was minister. He was a scholar of great abilities, and well versed in the Oriental tongues. He was held in high esteem by archbishop Usher. While yet a youth, prince Maurice being in Zealand, heard him preach, and some time after sent for him to court. Our young divine modestly excused himself, declaring that he designed in the exercise of his ministry to satisfy his conscience, and to censure freely what he should find deserved censure; a liberty which courts did not care to allow; while at the same time he thought the post offered him, more proper for a man in years than a student.

He was called to Leyden in 1619, and discharged his duties with great diligence till his death, in 1642. He declined the offer which was made him of the divinity professorship in the new university of Utrecht. He published in 1631, a Commentary on the Four Gospels, and Notes on the Acts of the Apostles, of which father Simon speaks highly. He drew up likewise rudiments of the Hebrew and Persian tongues, and edited several works in both languages. The learned Constantine l'Emperor says that for practical piety, knowledge of theology, and science of all kinds, he was a star of the first magnitude.—Middleton, vol. iii. p. 154.

LIBATION. This word is used in sacrificial language, to express an effusion of liquors, poured upon victims to be sacrificed to the Lord. The quantity of wine for a libation was the fourth part of a hin, rather more than two pints. Libations among the Hebrews were poured on the victim after it was killed, and the several pieces of it were laid on the altar, ready to be consumed by the flames, Lev. 6: 20. 8: 25, 26. 9: 4. 16: 12. 20. These libations consisted in offerings of bread, wine, and salt. The Greeks and Latins offered libations with the sacrifices, but they were poured on the victim's head while it was living. So Sinon, relating the manner in which he was to be sacrificed, says he was in the priest's hands ready to be slain; was loaded with bands and garlands; that they were preparing to pour upon him the libations of grain and salted meal:—

Jamque dies infanda aderat, nili sacra parari, Et salsa fruges, et circum tempora ritte.
Æneid ii. 130, 131.

"The salted barley on my front was spread,
The sacred filets bound my destined head."

PITT.

St. Paul describes himself, as it were, a victim about to be sacrificed, and that the accustomed libations were already, in a manner, poured upon him: "For I am ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand," 2 Tim. 4: 6. The same expressive sacrificial term occurs in Philip. 2: 17, where the apostle represents the faith of the Philippians as a sacrifice, and his own blood as a libation poured forth to hallow and consecrate it: "Yea, and if I be offered, spendomai, upon the sacrifice and service of your faith, I joy and rejoice with you all."—Watson; Calmet.

LIBELLATICI; a term in ecclesiastical history, applied to certain Christians, who saved themselves from persecution, either by privately signing libels (writings) of abjuration; or by procuring, either through interest or by money, libels of security, excusing them from the heathen sacrifices. Broughton's Dict.—Williams.

LIBERALITY; bounty; a generous disposition of mind, exerting itself in giving largely. It is thus distinguished from generosity and bounty:—Liberality implies acts of mere giving or spending; generosity, acts of greatness; bounty, acts of kindness. Liberality is a natural disposition; generosity proceeds from elevation of sentiment; bounty from religious motives. Liberality denotes freedom of spirit; generosity, greatness of soul; bounty, openness of heart.—Hend. Buck.

LIBERALITY OF SENTIMENT; a generous disposition a man feels towards another who is of a different opinion from himself; or, as one defines it, "that generous expansion of mind which enables it to look beyond all petty distinctions of party and system, and, in the estimate of men and things, to rise superior to narrow prejudices."

As liberality of sentiment is often a cover for error and scepticism on the one hand, and as it is too little attended to by the ignorant and bigoted on the other, we shall here lay before our readers a view of it by a masterly writer. "A man of liberal sentiments must be distinguished from him who hath no religious sentiments at all. He is one who hath seriously and effectually investigated, both in his Bible and on his knees, in public assemblies and in private conversations, the important articles of religion. He hath laid down principles, he hath inferred consequences; in a word, he hath adopted sentiments of his own.

"He must be distinguished, also, from that tame, undiscerning domestic among good people, who, though he has sentiments of his own, yet has not judgment to estimate the worth and value of one sentiment beyond another.

"Now, a generous believer of the Christian religion is one who will never allow himself to try to propagate his sentiments by the commission of sin. No collusion, no bitterness, no wrath, no undue influence of any kind, will he apply to make his sentiments receivable; and no living thing will be less happy for his being a Christian. He will exercise his liberality by allowing those who differ from him as much virtue and integrity as he possibly can.

"There are, among a multitude of arguments to enforce such a disposition, the following worthy our attention:—
"First, We should exercise liberality in union with sentiment, because of the different capacities, advantages, and tasks of mankind. Religion employs the capacities of mankind just as the air employs their lungs and their organs of speech. The fancy of one is lively, of another dull. The judgment of one is elastic; of another feeble, a damaged spring. The memory of one is retentive; that of another is treacherous as the wind. The passions of this man are lofty, vigorous, rapid; those of that man crawl, and hum, and buzz, and, when on wing, sail only round the circumference of a tulip. Is it conceivable that capability, so different in every thing else, should be all alike in religion? The advantages of mankind differ. How should he who hath no parents, no books, no tutor, no companions, equal him whom Providence hath gratified with them all; who, when he looks over the treasures of his own knowledge, can say, this I had of a Greek, that I learned of a Roman; this information I acquired of my tutor, that was a present of my father; a friend gave me this branch of knowledge, an acquaintance bequeathed me that? The tasks of mankind differ; so I call the employments and exercises of life. In my opinion, circumstances make great men; and if we have not Cæsars in the state, and Pauls in the church, it is because neither church nor state are in the circumstances in which they were in the days of those great men. Push a dull man into a river, and endanger his life, and suddenly he will discover invention, and make efforts beyond himself. The world is a fine school of instruction. Poverty, sickness, pain, loss of children, treachery of friends, malice of enemies, and a thousand other things, drive the man of sentiment to his Bible, and, so to speak, bring him home to a repast with his benefactor, God. Is it conceivable that he whose young and tender heart is yet unpractised in trials of this kind, can have ascertained and fasted so many religious truths as the sufferer has?

"We should believe the Christian religion with liberality, in the second place, because every part of the Christian religion inculcates generosity. Christianity gives us a character of God; but what a character does it give! God is Love. Christianity teaches the doctrine of Providence; but what a providence! Upon whom doth not its light arise? Is there an animalcule so little, or a wretch so forlorn, as to be forsaken and forgotten of his God? Christianity teaches the doctrine of redemption; but the redemption of whom?—of all tongues, kindred, nations, and people; of the infant of a span, and the sinner of a hundred years old: a redemption generous in its principle, generous in its price, generous in its effects; fixed sentiments of divine munificence, and revealed with a liberality for which we have no name. In a word, the liberal Christian always acts contrary to the spirit of his religion: the liberal man alone thoroughly understands it.

"Thirdly, We should be liberal, because no other spirit is exemplified in the infallible guides whom we profess to follow. I set one Paul against a whole army of uninspired men: 'Some preach Christ of good-will, and some of envy and strife. What then? Christ is preached; and I therein do rejoice, yea, and will rejoice. One eateth all things, another eateth herbs; but why dost thou judge thy brother? We shall all stand before the judgment-seat of Christ.' We often inquire, What was the doctrine of Christ, and what was the practice of Christ? Suppose we were to institute a third question, Of what TEMPER was Christ?

"Once more: We should be liberal as well as orthodox, because truths, especially the truths of Christianity, do not want any support from our illiberality. Let the little bee guard its little honey with its little sting; perhaps its little life may depend a little while on that little nourishment. Let the fierce bull shake his head, and nod his horn, and threaten his enemy, who seeks to eat his flesh, and wear his coat, and live by his death: poor fellow! his life is in danger; I forgive his bellowing and his rage. But the Christian religion,—is that in danger? And what human efforts can render that false which is true, that odious which is lovely? Christianity is in no danger, and therefore it gives its professors life and breath, and all things except a power of injuring others.

"In fine, liberality in the profession of religion is a wise and innocent policy. The bigot lives at home; a reptile he crawled into existence, and there in his hole he lurks a reptile still. A generous Christian goes out of his own party, associates with others, and gains improvement by all. It is a Persian proverb, 'A liberal hand is better than a strong arm.' The dignity of Christianity is better supported by acts of liberality than by accuracy of reasoning; but when both go together, when a man of sentiment can clearly state and ably defend his religious principles, and when his heart is as generous as his principles are inflexible, he possesses strength and beauty in an eminent degree." See Theol. Misc. vol. i. p. 39; Draper on Bigotry; Newton, Cecil, and Fuller's Works; Wayland's Discourses.—Hend. Buck.

LIBERTINE; one who acts without restraint, and pays no regard to the precepts of religion. (See LIBERTINES).—Hend. Buck.

LIBERTINES. 1. Mention is made of the synagogue of the Libertines, (Acts 6: 9,) concerning whom there are different opinions, two of which bid fairest for the truth. The first is that of Grotius and Vitringa, adopted by Guise and Doddridge, that they were Italian Jews or proselytes. The ancient Romans distinguished between libertus and libertinus. Libertus was one who had been a slave, and obtained his freedom; libertinus was the son of a libertus. But this distinction in after ages was not strictly observed; and libertinus also came to be used for one not born, but made free, in opposition to ingenuus, or one born free. But as all the other people of the several synagogues, mentioned in this passage of the Acts, are denominated from the places from whence they came, it is probable that the Libertines were so too; and as the Cyrenians and Alexandrians, who came from Africa, are placed next to the Libertines in that catalogue, it is probable they also belonged to the same country. So that, upon the whole, there is little reason to doubt of the Libertines being so called from the place from whence they came; and the order of the names in the catalogue might lead us to think, that they were farther off from Jerusalem than Alexandria and Cyrenia, which will carry us to the proconsular province in Africa about Carthage. That a city called Libertina did exist in that province is certain; and that it became the seat of a flourishing Christian church.

2. A religious sect which arose in the year 1525, whose principal tenets were, that the Deity was the sole operating cause in the mind of man, and the immediate author of all human actions; that, consequently, the distinctions of good and evil, which had been established with regard to those actions, were false, and groundless, and that men could not, properly speaking, commit sin; that religion consisted in the union of the spirit, or rational soul, with the Supreme Being; that all those who had attained this happy union, by sublime contemplation and elevation of mind, were then allowed to indulge without exception or restraint, their appetites or passions; that all their actions and pursuits were then perfectly innocent; and that, after the death of the body, they were to be united to the Deity. These maxims occasioned their being called Libertines, and the word has been used in an ill sense ever since.

3. Libertines of Geneva were a cabal of rakes rather than of fanatics; for they made no pretence to any religious system, but pleaded only for the liberty of leading voluptuous and immoral lives. This cabal was composed of a certain number of licentious citizens, who could not bear the severe discipline of Calvin. There were also among them several who were not only notorious for their dissolute and scandalous manner of living, but also for their atheistical impiety and contempt of all religion.—Hend. Park; Watson.

LIBERTY, denotes a state of freedom, in contradistinction to slavery or restraint.—1. Liberty of conscience is freedom from restraint in our choice, and judgment about matters of religion.—2. Internal liberty, or liberty of choice, is that in which our volitions are not determined by any foreign cause or consideration whatever offered to it, but by our own understanding or pleasure.—3. External liberty, or liberty of action, is opposed to a constraint laid on the executive powers; and consists in a power of rendering our volitions effectual.—4. Philosophical or moral liberty consists in a prevailing disposition to act according to the dictates of reason, i. e. in such a manner as shall, all things considered, most effectually promote our happiness.—5. Spiritual liberty consists in freedom from the curse of the moral law; from the servitude of the Jewish ritual; from the love, power, and guilt of sin; from the dominion of Satan; from the corruptions of the world; from the fear of death, and the wrath to come,

LIBYA. This name, in its largest sense, was used by the Greeks to denote the whole of Africa. But Libya Proper, or the Libya of the New Testament, the country of the Lubims of the Old, was a large country lying along the Mediterranean, on the west of Egypt. It was called Pentapolitana Regio by Pliny, from its five chief cities, Berenice, Arsinoe, Ptolemais, Apollonia, and Cyrene; and Libya Cyrenica by Ptolemy, from Cyrene, its capital. Libya is supposed to have been first peopled by, and to have derived its name from, the Lehabim, or Lubim. These, its earlier inhabitants, appear, in the times of the Old Testament, to have consisted of wandering tribes, who were sometimes in alliance with Egypt, and at others with the Ethiopians of Arabia; as they are said to have assisted both Shishak and Zerah in their expeditions into Judea, 2 Chron. 12, 14, 16. They were for a time sufficiently powerful to maintain a war with the Carthaginians, by whom they were in the end entirely overcome. Since that period, Libya, in common with the rest of the East, has successively passed into the hands of the Greeks, Romans, Saracens, and Turks. The city Cyrene, built by a Grecian colony, was the capital of this country, in which, and other parts, dwelt many Jews, who came up to Jerusalem at the feast of Pentecost, together with those dispersed among other nations, and are called by St. Luke "dwellers in the parts of Libya about Cyrene," Acts 2: 10.—Watson; Calmet; Jones.

LICE. Swarms of lice was the third plague with which God punished the Egyptians, Exod. 8: 16. The Hebrew word kamin, which the LXX. render sknipes, some translate "flies," and think them the same as gnats. But Josephus, the Jewish rabbins, and most of the modern translators render the Hebrew word at large lice; and Bochart and Bryant support this interpretation. The former argues that gnats could not be meant; 1. Because the creatures here mentioned sprang from the dust of the earth, and not from the waters. 2. Because they were both on men and cattle, which cannot be spoken of gnats. 3. Because their name comes from the radix kann, which signifies to make firm, fix, establish; which can never agree to gnats, flies, &c., which are ever changing their place, and are almost constantly on the wing. 4. Because kanah is the term by which talmudists express the term louse, &c. To which may be added, that if they were winged and stinging insects, as Jerome, Origen, and others have supposed, the plague of flies is unduly anticipated; and the next miracle will be only a repetition of the former.

Mr. Bryant, in illustrating the aptness of this miracle, has the following remarks: "The Egyptians affected great external purity, and were very nice both in their persons and clothing; bathing and making ablutions continually. Uncommon care was taken not to harbor any vermin. They were particularly solicitous on this head; thinking it would be a great profanation of the temple which they entered, if any animalculæ of this sort were concealed in their garments. The priests, says Herodotus, are shaved, both as to their heads and bodies, every third day, to prevent any louse, or any other detestable creature, being found upon them when they are performing their duty to the gods. The judgment, therefore, inflicted by the hands of Moses, was, consequently, not only most noisome to the people in general, but it was no small odium to the most sacred order in Egypt, that they were overrun with these filthy and detestable vermin."—Watson.

LIE. (See LYING.)

LIFE; properly a state of active and happy existence. 1. Mortal life, since the fall, is the continuance or duration of our present state, which the Scriptures represent as blended largely with death, and consequently short and vain, Gen. 3: 17. 19: 22—24. Job 14: 1, 2. James 4: 14. 2. Spiritual life consists in our being in the favor of God, influenced by a principle of sanctifying grace, and living in dependence on him to his glory. It is considered as of divine origin, (Col. 3: 4.) hidden, (Col. 3: 3.) peaceful, (Rom. 8: 6.) secure, John 10: 28. 3. Eternal life is the consummation of spiritual, (Rom. 6: 22.) that never ending state of existence which the saints shall enjoy in heaven; and is glorious, (Col. 3: 4.) holy, Rev. 21: 27. and blissful, 1 Pet. 1: 4. 2 Cor. 4: 17. (See HEAVEN.)—Head. Buck.

LIFE, BOOK OF. (See BOOK.)

LIFE, TREE OF. (See TREE OF LIFE.)

LIFTERS, and ANTLIFTERS; so were called two congregations at Killmaurs, in North Britain, who, according to Sir John Sinclair, differed on the paltry question, whether it was necessary for the minister to lift in his hand the plate of bread before its distribution in the Lord's supper. They were also called New Lights, and the others Old Lights; terms that have been applied in other cases somewhat similar. Grégoire's Hist. tom. i. p. 61, quoted from Sinclair's Works, vol. ix. pp. 375-6.—Williams.

LIFTING UP THE HANDS, is among the Orientals a common part of the ceremony of taking an oath:—"I have lift up mine hand unto the Lord," says Abraham, Gen. 14: 22. And, "I will bring you into the land concerning which I lift up mine hand," (Exod. 6: 8.) which I promised with an oath.

To LIFT UP ONE'S HANDS, EYES, SOUL, or HEART, unto the Lord, are also expressions describing the sentiments and emotion of one who prays earnestly, or desires a thing with ardor.—Calmet.

LIGHT, (phōs;) is used in a physical sense, (Matt. 17: 2. Acts 9: 3. 12: 7. 2 Cor. 4: 6.) for a fire giving light, (Mark 14: 54. Luke 22: 56.) for a torch, candle, or lamp, (Acts 16: 29.) and for the material light of heaven, as the sun, moon, or stars, Ps. 136: 7. James 1: 17. Figuratively taken, it signifies a manifest or open state of things; (Matt. 10: 27. Luke 12: 3.) also, in a still higher sense, the eternal source of truth, purity, and joy, 1 John 1: 5. James 1: 17.

God is said to dwell in light inaccessible, 1 Tim. 6: 16. This seems to contain a reference to the glory and splendor which shone in the holy of holies, where Jehovah appeared in the luminous cloud above the mercy-seat, and which none but the high-priest, and he only once a year, was permitted to approach unto; (Lev. 16: 2. Ezek. 1: 22, 26, 28.) but this was typical of the glory of the celestial world.

Light frequently signifies, also, instruction, both by doctrine and example; (Matt. 5: 16. John 5: 35.) or persons considered as giving such light, Matt. 5: 14. Rom. 2: 19. It is applied in the highest sense to Christ, the true Light, the Sun of Righteousness, who is that in the spiritual, which the material light is in the natural world; who is the great Author, not only of illumination and knowledge, but of spiritual life, health, and joy to the souls of men.

The images of light and darkness, says bishop Lowth, are commonly made use of in all languages to imply or denote prosperity and adversity, agreeably to the common sense and perception which all men have of the objects themselves. But the Hebrews, upon a subject more sublime indeed, in itself, and illustrating it by an idea which was more habitual to them, more daringly exalt their strains, and give a loose rein to the spirit of poetry. They display, for instance, not the image of the spring, of Aurora, or of the dreary night; but the sun and stars as rising with increased splendor in a new creation, or again involved in chaos and primeval darkness, Isa. 30: 26. 60: 19, 20. 24: 25. Ezek. 27: 7, 8.

The expressions are bold and daring; but the imagery is well known, the use of it is common, the signification definite; they are therefore perspicuous, clear, and truly magnificent.—Watson.

LIGHT OF NATURE. (See NATURE.)

LIGHT, DIVINE. (See KNOWLEDGE; & RELIGION.)

LIGHTFOOT, (JOHN, D. D.) a most learned English divine, was the son of a minister, and born in March, 1602, at Stoke-upon-Trent, in Staffordshire. At Cambridge, he applied himself to eloquence, and succeeded so well in it as to be thought the best orator of the under graduates in the university. He also made an extraordinary proficiency in Latin and Greek. When he took the degree of bachelor of arts he left the university, and became assistant to a school at Repton, in Derbyshire. After he had supplied this place a year or two, he entered into orders, and became curate of Norton-under-Hales, in Shropshire. He now began to study the Hebrew language, persuaded that no man could be well versed in the Scriptures but an Hebraist. Not long after he removed to Hornsey, where he wrote his Emblems, or Miscellanies, Christian and Judaical, in 1629. He was then only twenty-seven, and yet was well acquainted with the Latin and Greek fathers, as well as the ancient heathen writers. He, at that time, satisfied himself in clearing up many of the abstruse passages in the Bible: and therein had provided the chief materials, as well as formed the plan of his "Harmony." An opportunity of inspecting it at the press, was a motive for his going to London, where he had not long been, before he was chosen minister of St. Bartholomew's, behind the royal exchange. The great assembly of divines meeting in 1643, our author gave his attendance there, and made a distinguished figure in their debates; where he used great freedom, and gave signal proofs of his courage as well as learning, in opposing many of those tenets which the divines were endeavoring to establish. In 1653, he was presented to the living of Much Munden, in Hertfordshire. In 1655, he entered upon the office of vice-chancellor of Cambridge. The year of Dr. Lightfoot's decease is not exactly known. He was a true Christian. In the discharge of his clerical duties, he was zealous and active. As to his learning in the rabbinical way, he was excelled by none, and had few equals. The most complete edition of the works of this learned author is that edited by Pitman, comprised in thirteen volumes, octavo; London, 1825. Jones' Chris. Biog.—Head. Buck.

LIGURE, (lithim; Exod. 28: 19. 39: 12.) a precious stone, of a deep red color, with a considerable tinge of yellow. Theophrastus and Pliny describe it as resembling the carbuncle, of a brightness sparkling like fire.—Watson.

LILLY, (WILLIAM,) an astrologer, was born, in 1602, at Diseworth, in Leicestershire; and, after having been servant to a mantuamaker, and bookkeeper to a tradesman, he became a professor of astrology. Lilly, who had a tolerable spice of the knave in his composition, soon acquired both fame and money in his new vocation. During the civil wars he was consulted by both parties as to events; but it was the cause of the parliament that he finally espoused. He died in 1681. Among his works are, Observations on the Life and Death of Charles I.; and his own Life.—Davenport.

LILY, (shushan;) 1 Kings 7: 19, 22, 26. 2 Chron. 4: 5. Cant. 2: 16. 4: 5. 5: 13. 6: 2, 3. 7: 2. Hos. 14: 5. Krimon, Matt. 6: 28. Luke 12: 27.) a well known, sweet, and beautiful flower, which furnished Solomon with a variety of charming images in his Song, and with graceful ornaments in the fabric and furniture of the temple. The title of some of the Psalms "upon Shushan," or "Shoshanin," (Ps. 45, 60, 69, 80.) probably means no more than that the music of these sacred compositions was to be regulated by that of some odes, which were known by those names or appellations.

By "the lily of the valley," (Cant. 2: 2.) we are not to understand the humble flower, generally so called with us, the lilium convallium, but the noble flower which ornaments our gardens, and which in Palestine grows wild in the fields, and especially in the valleys. In the East, as with us, it is the emblem of purity and moral excellence. So the Persian poet, Sadi, compares an amiable youth to "the white lily in a bed of narcissuses," because he surpassed all the young shepherds in goodness.

As, in Cant. 5: 13, the lips are compared to the lily, bishop Patrick supposes the lily here instanced to be the same Patrick, on account of its deep red color, is particularly called by Pliny rubens lilium, and which, he tells us, was much esteemed in Syria. Such may have been the lily mentioned in Matt. 6: 28—30; for the royal robes were purple. Sir James E. Smith observes, "It is natural to presume the divine Teacher, according to his usual custom, called the attention of his hearers to some object at hand; and as the fields of the Levant are overrun with the amaryllis lutea, whose golden lilaceous flowers in autumn afford one of the most brilliant and gorgeous objects in nature, the expression of 'Solomon in all his glory not being arrayed like one of these,' is peculiarly appropriate. I consider the feeling with which this was expressed as the highest honor ever done to the study of plants; and if my botanical conjecture be right, we learn a chronological fact respecting the season of the year when the sermon on the mount was delivered." (See GRASS.)—Watson.

LIMBO, in Roman Catholic divinity, signifies a place on the borders of hell, where the patriarchs remained until the advent of Christ, who, before his resurrection, appeared to them, and opened for them the doors of heaven. It is commonly called limbus patrum; besides which, some adopt a limbus infantum, to which those infants go who die without having been baptized.—Head, Duck.

LIME, (shid); Deut. 27: 2, 4. Isa. 33: 12. Amos 2: 1.) a soft friable substance, obtained by calcining or burning stones, shells, or the like. From Isaiah 33: 12, it appears that it was made in a kiln lighted with thorn bushes; and from Amos 2: 1, that bones were sometimes calcined for lime. The use of it was for plaster or cement, the first mention of which is in Deut. 27.—Watson.

LIMITER, (limitour;) an itinerant and begging friar, employed by the convent to collect its dues, and promote its temporal interests, within certain limits, though under the direction of the brotherhood who employed him; he was occasionally a person of considerable importance. Russell's Notes; Works of the English and Scottish Reformers, vol. ii. pp. 536, 542.—Head, Duck.

LINCOLN. (ENSIGN.) This estimable man, "the memorial of whose virtues will be imperishable," was born in Hingham, (Mass.) Jan. 8, 1779. His early years were blest with the care of an eminently pious mother. He was regularly bred to the profession of a printer by Messrs. Manning and Loring, of Boston.

About the age of nineteen Mr. Lincoln felt the power of the gospel under the ministry of the Rev. Dr. Baldwin, and was baptized by him on profession of his faith. To the Baptist communion, though enlarged and catholic in his affections, he continued conscientiously and ardently attached to the end of his days. He soon became intimate with other young men of character and religious principle, and with them spent many of his evenings in social religious meetings, while as an apprentice he was a model of faithfulness and purity. Here were the germs of his subsequent life.

In the year 1800, he commenced business on his own account. The first work he printed was Cowper's Poems, in two volumes, the first edition of the works of that immortal bard of Christianity which appeared in this country.

When Mr. Samuel Hall (a name well known and respected among booksellers at the beginning of the present century) was looking round among the younger members of the profession for a successor, his eye rested on Mr. Lincoln; and he and Mr. T. Edmands, with whom he had just formed a partnership, became the purchasers of Mr. Hall's stock in trade, and the occupants of the long celebrated stand, No. 59, Cornhill, (now Washington street,) Boston. Very few partnerships have been of so long duration, or have contributed more to the furtherance of sound knowledge, especially religious knowledge, in our country; and it is but justice to add, that no partnership in trade has more deservedly enjoyed the esteem and confidence of the public, by the uniform exercise of all the mercantile and Christian virtues for the space of thirty years; none more enterprising, industrious, and economical; none more fair and honorable in the sight of all men. It was dissolved only by the lamented death of Mr. Lincoln, Dec. 2, 1832, at the age of fifty-three.

Mr. Lincoln had been from 1811, a licensed minister of the gospel of Christ; and though he never was ordained, and therefore never relinquished the secular profession to which he had been educated, and in which he thought it his duty to persevere with all the constancy of a man of the world, yet he preached, and prayed, and performed the ordinary offices of a minister of the gospel with all the holy fervor of an apostle. He won the unaffected respect of all men, as a generous neighbor, an honest friend, and a virtuous citizen. "A purer mind," says Mr. Buckingham, "never inhabited a mortal frame. A love of truth and goodness was the ruling passion of his soul. His manners were frank and open; his deportment was as free from prudery and affectation, as his heart was from hypocrisy. He delighted in the social intercourse of friends, and was always an object around which they might gather to indulge in the pleasures of conversation; to be pleased, improved, refined. There are few who combine so many of the useful qualities with so much retiring modesty. There are few who have done so much good in so noiseless a manner."

Mr. Lincoln's death, though in the meridian of life and usefulness, and watched by the breaking hearts of his family and friends, was not only peaceful but triumphant. He had lived to see the prosperity of the cause he loved, and labored to promote; to see the churches he had assisted largely in planting, flourishing in all directions around him; to see all his children who were grown up, become the devoted followers of the Savior, and preparing to fill his place in society, and in the church of God; and he felt that death was welcome. "If I should live to the age of Methuselah," he remarked, "I could find no better time to die." To an inquiry whether he enjoyed the presence of Christ, he readily answered, "The Savior promised to be with me a great while ago, and he will fulfil every word." Being asked on another occasion how he felt, "Oh, delightfully," was his characteristic reply; "the Lord reigneth; he will do infinitely well for me and mine. I feel entire confidence in his wisdom and goodness." A prayer which he offered audibly, about an hour before his death, concluded with these touching words: "Gracious Redeemer, what has been wrong do thou forgive; what has been gracious do thou record." The glory of Christ being afterwards alluded to, he said, (and they were his last words,) "Yes, not to behold his glory would be no heaven!" Thus in the full view of the near approach of death, and with an intellect calm and collected, he expressed his unshaken reliance on God, and his hope in his Redeemer.

At his funeral the church was dressed in the habiliments of mourning; and the general aspect and solemnity of the audience, composed in part of ministers and distinguished citizens of different denominations in the city and vicinity, seemed in silent eloquence to say that a saint of eminent usefulness had departed to the rewards of grace in the world of glory.

Mr. Lincoln was active in the organization of the Evangelical Tract society, the Howard Benevolent society, the Boston Baptist Foreign Mission society, the Massachusetts Baptist Education society, and other institutions of a similar character. To these he not only gave his name, but much of his time, and thoughts, and pen, as well as his property.

Among the numerous valuable works issued from the press of Lincoln and Edmands, for which the public are indebted to Mr. Lincoln, may be mentioned particularly, Winchell's Watts, the Pronouncing Bible, and the series of beautiful volumes, styled The Christian Library. Lincoln's Scripture Questions, and Sabbath School Class Book, prepared by him, are well known.—Rev. Dr. Sturp's Funeral Sermon; Boston Courier; Christian Watchman; Am. Baptist Magazine for April, 1833.

LINDSEY, (THEOPHILUS.) a Unitarian divine, was born, in 1723, at Middlewich, in Cheshire, and was educated at St. John's college, Cambridge. He, after ten years vacillation, resigned the living of Catterick in 1773, in consequence of his having embraced the principles of Unitarianism. On account of this resignation Mr. Belshams calls him "the venerable confessor." Upon this title Robert Hall admirably observes:—"The nature of the doctrine professed must be taken into consideration before we can determine that profession to be a Christian profession; nor is martyrdom entitled to the high veneration justly bestowed on acts of heroic piety, on any other ground than its being what the term imports, an attestation of the truth. It is the saint which makes the martyr, not the martyr the saint."

From 1774 till 1793, he was minister of a congregation r1 Essex street, in the Strand. He died in 1803. He wrote among other works, an Apology for himself; a Sequel to the Apology; Considerations on the Divine Government; an Examination of Mr. Robinson's Plea; an Historical View of the Unitarian Doctrine and Worship; and Sermons. See Belsham's Memoirs of Lindsey, Reviews of Robert Hall; Jones' Chris. Biog.—Davenport.

LINE. To stretch a line over a city, is to destroy it, Zech. 1: 16. Jer. 2: 8.—Calmet.

LINEN, (bed;) the product of a well known plant, (flax,) whose bark, being prepared, serves to make fine and much esteemed linen clothes. Another sort of linen Scripture calls shesh; which we believe to be cotton. Under the name of linen byssus is included; but this was something different from both linen and cotton. It was a kind of silk yielded by fish of the muscle kind, which Rondelet calls pinna magna. (See FLAX.)—Calmet.

LINN, (JOHN BLAIR,) an American divine and poet, son of William Linn, D. D., was born in Pennsylvania, in 1777, and after graduating at Columbia college, entered on the study of law, in the office of Alexander Hamilton, in New York. Finding but little agreeable to him in this pursuit, and having felt the power of religion on his heart, he determined to embrace the ministry; and after completing a course of theological study, he was settled as a preacher, in Philadelphia, in 1799. He died of consumption, in 1805. He is the author of Valerian, a poem on the influence of Christianity, and of the Powers of Genius, a poem possessing much beauty, and which has gone through several editions, both in England and the United States. Life by C. B. Brown; Allen.—Davenport.

LINUS; a Christian mentioned by Paul, (2 Tim. 4: 21.) an whom Irenæus, Eusebius, Optatus, Epiphanius, Austin, Jerome, and Theodoret, affirm to have succeeded Peter as bishop of Rome.

Mr. Taylor thinks there is little hazard in taking LINUS for the British CyLLIN, brother of Claudia. (See CLAUDIA, and POMONIA GRECIA.) If so, it agrees with the history that Christianity had made converts in the family of Brennus, king of Britain, and Caractacus, his son, then prisoners at Rome; and the first (Gentile) bishop of Rome was a Briton. (See CHRISTIANITY.)—Calmet.

LION. The name by which this noble animal is generally designated in the Hebrew Scriptures is translated, to pluck or tear off, and has been supposed to have originated in his remarkable habit of tearing his prey to pieces, Ps. 7: 2. 22: 13. Mic. 5: 8. But there are several other names given to him by the inspired writers, each of which is characteristic either of his age or some feature in his character.

We now proceed to describe this noble animal, whose outward form seems to speak his internal generosity. His figure is striking, his look confident and bold, his gait proud, and his roar is terrible. His stature is not overgrown, like that of the elephant, or rhinoceros; nor is his shape clumsy, like that of the hippopotamus, or the ox. It is compact, well proportioned, and sizable; a perfect model of strength, joined with agility. It is muscular and bold, neither charged with fat or unnecessary flesh.

It is sufficient but to see him in order to be assured of his superior force. His large head, surrounded with a dreadful mane; all those muscles that appear under the skin swelling with the slightest exertions; and the great breadth of his paws, with the thickness of his limbs, plainly evince that no other animal in the forest is capable of opposing him. His face is very broad, and is surrounded with very long hair, which gives it a most majestic air. His huge eyebrows; his round and fiery eyeballs, which, upon the least irritation, seem to glow with peculiar lustre; together with the formidable appearance of his teeth; exhibit a picture of terrific grandeur which it is impossible to describe. The length of a large lion is between eight and nine feet; and its height about four feet and a half. The top of the head, the temples, the cheeks, the under jaw, the neck, the breast, the shoulders, the hinder part of the legs, and the belly, are furnished with long hair, while all the rest of the body is covered with very short hair, of a tawny color. The mane of the lion grows every year longer as the animal grows older: but the lioness is without this appendage at every age. This mane is not coarse or rough as in a horse, but is composed of the same hair as covers the rest of the body.

It is usually supposed that the lion is not possessed of the sense of smelling in such perfection as many other animals. It is also observed, that too strong a light greatly incommodates him: this is apparent, indeed, from the formation of his eyes, which, like those of the cat, seem fitted for seeing best in the dark. For this reason, he seldom appears in open day, but ravages chiefly by night. With this fact, corresponds the language of the royal prophet, Ps. 104: 20—22.

The most fierce and terrible of these animals are found in Africa, and the hottest parts of Asia. It is particularly in the frightful deserts of these scorching regions that those enormous and ferocious beasts are found, that seem to be the scourge and terror of the neighboring kingdoms. Happily, indeed, says Buffon, the species is not very numerous, and it seems to be diminishing daily; for those who have travelled through these countries, assure us, there are by no means so many there at present, as were known formerly. (See JORDAN.)

Accustomed to measure his strength with every animal he meets, the habit of conquering renders the lion intrepid and terrible. In those regions where he has not experienced the dangerous arts and combinations of man, he has no apprehensions from his power. He boldly faces him, and seems to brave the force of his arms. Wounds rather serve to provoke his rage than to repress his ardor. Nor is he daunted by the opposition of numbers; a single lion of the desert often attacks an entire caravan, and, after an obstinate combat, when he finds himself overpowered, instead of flying he continues to combat, retreating, and still facing the enemy till he dies. To this trait in his character Job alludes, when, complaining of his trials, he hastily said to the Almighty, "Thou huntest me as a fierce lion," ch. 10: 16. We see, also, the propriety with which Hushai describes the valiant among the troops of Absalom, as possessing "the heart of a lion," 2 Sam. 17: 10.—Calmet.

LIP, is sometimes used for the bank of a river, for the border of a vessel or table, Exod. 25: 24. 2 Chron. 4: 2. It also signifies language, Gen. 11: 1. Exod. 6: 12, &c. "We will render thee the calves of our lips," says Hosea; (14: 2.) that is, sacrifices of praise, instead of bloody victims. "I do not send thee," says the Lord to Ezekiel, (3: 5.) "to a people deaf of lip," of an unknown language.—Calmet.

LITANY; a general supplication used in public worship to appease the wrath of the Deity, and to request those blessings a person wants. The word comes from the Greek litanea, "supplication." At first, the use of litanies was not fixed to any stated time, but were only employed as exigencies required. They were observed, in imitation of the Ninevites, with ardent supplications and fastings, to avert the threatened judgments of fire, earthquakes, inundations, or hostile invasions. About A. D. 400, litanies began to be used in processions, the people walking barefoot, and repeating them with great devotion; and it is pretended that by this means several countries were delivered from great calamities. The days on which they were used were called Rogation days; these were appointed by the canons of different councils, till it was decreed by the council of Toledo, that they should be used every month throughout the year; and thus, by degrees, they came to be used weekly on Wednesdays and Fridays, the ancient stationary days for fasting. To these days the rubric of the church of England has added Sundays, as being the greatest day for assembling at divine service.

Almost every saint in the Roman calendar has his litany, in which the people respond, Ora pro nobis, "pray for us." Litanies are found in the old Lutheran hymn books; but they are no longer used by German Protestants.—Hend. Buck.

LITHGOW, (WILLIAM,) a gentleman of Scotland, who, while travelling in Spain, in 1620, fell into the hands of the Inquisition, and was subjected to unheard of tortures, but was providentially delivered. The history may be found at length in Fox, pp. 167—173.

LITURGY, denotes all the ceremonies in general belonging to divine service. The word comes from the Greek leitourgia, "service, public ministry," formed of leitōs, "public," and ergon, "work." In a more restrained signification, liturgy is used among the Romanists to signify the mass, and among Protestants, the common prayer. All who have written on liturgies agree, that in primitive days, divine service was exceedingly simple, clogged with very few ceremonies, and consisted of but a small number of prayers; but, by degrees, they increased the number of ceremonies, and added new prayers, to make the office look more awful and venerable to the people. At length, things were carried to such a pitch, that a regulation became necessary: and it was found necessary to put the service and the manner of performing it into writing, and this was what they called a liturgy.

Liturgies have been different at different times and in different countries. The Armenians, Copts, Ethiopians, Greeks, Syrians, Jacobites, Maronites, and Nestorians, have their several liturgies, and some of them from three to forty different ones.

The liturgy of the Roman church consists of the Breviary, containing the matins, lauds, &c.; the Missal, or volume employed in saying mass, and containing the calendar, the general rubrics, or rites of that mass; the Ceremonial, containing the offices peculiar to the pope, such as consecration, benediction, canonization, &c.; the Pontifical, which describes the functions of bishops at ordinations, consecrations of churches, &c.; and the Ritual, containing the services as performed by the simple priests both in public worship and in private. The whole of this liturgy is performed in Latin.

The liturgy of the church of England was composed in the year 1517, and established in the second year of king Edward VI. In the fifth year of this king it was revised, because some things were contained in that liturgy which showed a compliance with the superstition of those times, and some exceptions were taken against it by some learned men at home, and by Calvin abroad. Some alterations were made in it, which consisted in adding the general confession and absolution, and the communion to begin with the ten commandments. The use of oil in confirmation and extreme unction was left out, and also prayers for souls departed, and what related to a belief of Christ's real presence in the eucharist. This liturgy, so reformed, was established by the acts of the fifth and sixth Edward VI. cap. 1. However, it was abolished by queen Mary, who enacted, that the service should stand as it was most commonly used in the last year of the reign of king Henry VIII. That of Edward VI. was re-established, with some alterations, by Elizabeth. Some further alterations were introduced, in consequence of the revision of the common prayer book, by order of king James, in the first year of his reign, particularly in the office of private baptism, in several rubrics, and other passages, with the addition of five or six new prayers and thanksgivings, and all that part of the catechism which contains the doctrine of the sacraments. The book of common prayer, so altered, remained in force from the first year of king James to the fourteenth of Charles II. The last revision of the liturgy was in the year 1661. Many petitions have been since made for a revision, but without success.

The common prayer book of the Protestant Episcopal Church, in the United States, which was adopted in 1789, omits the Athanasian creed, and leaves to the officiating minister the discretionary power to substitute for the article "he descended into hell," the words "he went into the place of departed spirits." *Bingham's Orig. LIVERPOOL LITURGY. A liturgy so called from its first publication at Liverpool. It was composed by some of the Presbyterians, who, growing weary of extempore prayer, thought a form more desirable. It made its appearance in 1652. Mr. Orton says of it. "It is scarcely a Christian liturgy. In the collect the name of Christ is hardly mentioned; and the Spirit is quite banished from it." It was little better than a deistical composition. Orton's Letters, vol. i. pp. 80, 81; Bogue and Bennett's Hist. of Diss. vol. iii. p. 342.—Hend. Buck.

LIVE. To be inwardly quickened, nourished, and actuated by the influence of God, Gal. 2: 20. (2.) To be greatly refreshed and comforted, Ps. 22: 16. 1 Thess. 3: 8. (3.) To have the continued possession of grace here, and glory hereafter, John 14: 19. God lives in and of himself; he has incomprehensible and everlasting activity and happiness, Num. 14: 21. Christ now lives possessed of all happiness for himself, Rev. 1: 18. He lives for his people, perpetually interceding for them, and conveying to them his purchased blessings; (Heb. 7: 25.) and he lives in them as a quickening Spirit; he dwells in their hearts by faith, and is the life-giving principle from which their spiritual activity and comforts proceed; and they live on him by faith, drawing virtue from his word, person, righteousness, and fullness, for their quickening, activity, and comfort, Gal. 2: 20. Men live not by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God. Even when there are no apparent means of subsistence, we are to trust to the power and promise of God for our support in life, Matt. 4: 4. Men live not to themselves, but unto God, or Christ, when they make, not their carnal case, profit, or honor their great end, but his glory, and the edification of his church, Rom. 14: 7, 8. 2 Cor. 5: 14, 15. To live in God's sight is to be preserved by his favor, live under his special care, and in the exercise of loving and pleasing him, Hos. 6: 2. Gen. 17, 18. The religious service of saints is called a living and reasonable sacrifice, to distinguish it from the ancient sacrifices of beasts; and because proceeding from a soul spiritually quickened, it is performed in a lively and active manner, Rev. 12: 1.—(See LIFE.) Brown.

LIZARD. Several species of lizards are well known. There are some in Arabia, a cubit in length; but in the Indies there are some much longer. In America they are eaten, as they probably were in Arabia and Judea, since Moses forbids them as food.

We find several sorts of lizards mentioned in Scripture; letoth; chomet; tinshemeth; (Lev. 11: 30.) and shemamith. The third is translated mole; but Bochart maintains that it is the chameleon, (which is a kind of lizard.)—Calmet.

LLORENTE, (JOHN ANTHONY,) a Spanish ecclesiastic, was born, in 1756, at Rincon del Soto, and obtained various preferments, among which was that of secretary-general to the Inquisition. Having accepted a considerable post under Joseph Bonaparte, and written in his favor, he was compelled to quit Spain on the return of Ferdinand. He died in 1823. He is the author of a History of the Inquisition; Memoirs relative to the History of the Spanish Revolution; Political Portraits of the Popes; and other works.—Davenport.

LLOYD, (WILLIAM, D. D.) a learned prelate of the church of England, was born at Tilehurst, in Berkshire, 1627, where his father was rector of the parish. After having resided at the university of Oxford for several years, and gone through his degrees, he obtained a prebend in the collegiate church of Ripon, soon after the restoration, and in 1666 was appointed chaplain to the king. After holding various other ecclesiastical preferments, among which was the deanery of Bangor, he, in 1676, was instituted to the vicarage of St. Martin's in the Fields, Westminster; and, in 1680, he was raised to the bishopric of St. Asaph. While he held this benefice, he joined archbishop Sancroft, and other prelates, in presenting a petition to king James II., deprecating his assumed power of suspending the laws against popery. The prosecution and acquittal of the petitioner is a well known and important fact in English history. On the revolution taking place, bishop Lloyd was made almoner to king William III.; and, in 1692, he was translated to the see of Litchfield. Thence he was promoted to the see of Worcester, where he sat till his death, in 1717, in the ninety-first year of his age.

His writings, which amount to about twenty distinct publications, display much learning and acuteness. He assisted Dr. Wilkins in his "Essay toward a real Character;" but his most important work is a "Dissertation on the Seventy Weeks of Daniel; and an Exposition of that Prophecy." We are also indebted to him for the chronology, and many of the references and parallel passages printed in most of our English Bibles. Biog. Brit.; Aikin's Gen. Biog.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

LOCKE, (JOHN,) one of the greatest of English philosophers and metaphysicians, was born, in 1632, at Wrington, in Somersetshire; and was educated at Westminster school, and at Christ church, Oxford; though he often said that what he had learned there was of little use to him, to enlighten and enlarge his mind. The first books which gave him a relish for the study of philosophy, were the writings of Des Cartes; for though he did not always approve of his sentiments, he found that he wrote with great perspicuity. After some time, he applied himself very closely to the study of medicine: not with any design of practising as a physician, but principally for the benefit of his own constitution, which was but weak. He went to the continent, in 1664, as secretary to the envoy sent to Berlin; resumed his medical studies after his return; and graduated as a bachelor of physic, in 1674, though he never entered upon general practice. Locke was introduced, in 1666, to lord Ashley, afterwards earl of Shaftesbury, who esteemed him highly, confided to him the superintendance of his son's education, and the forming of a constitution for the colony of Carolina, and when he himself became chancellor, appointed him secretary of presentations, and, at a later period, secretary to the board of trade. When Shaftesbury withdrew to Holland, Locke accompanied him, and he remained on the continent for some years. Here he formed a friendship with Limborch and Leclerc. So obnoxious was he to James' government, that the British envoy demanded that he should be delivered up; a fate which he escaped only by concealing himself for a year.

It was while he resided in Holland that he completed his Essay on the Human Understanding, and wrote his first Letter on Toleration. Having returned to England at the revolution, he published his Essay in 1690. It was virulently but vainly assailed, and rapidly spread his fame in all quarters. That fame he enhanced by his additional Letters on Toleration; his two Treatises on Government, which annihilated Filmer and the whole tribe of non-resistance teachers; his Thoughts on Education; Reasonableness of Christianity; and other pieces. His merit was rewarded by his being made a commissioner of appeals, and, subsequently, of trade and plantations.

The last fourteen or fifteen years of his life, Mr. Locke spent chiefly at Oates, seldom coming to town; and during this agreeable retirement, he applied himself to the study of the Scriptures, of the divine origin of which he was thoroughly persuaded. It has been said that Mr. Locke was a Unitarian, at least so far as to disbelieve the doctrine of the Trinity. The confidence with which his name has been quoted of late, to this effect, will appear remarkable, if it is remembered, 1. That no positive evidence of it is to be found in his writings. 2. That to Dr. Stillingfleet, who accused him of it, he expressly denied having written a sentence unfavorable to the doctrine of the Trinity. 3. That in a letter to Limborch, alluding to Dr. Allix's work on the Trinity, he uses this remarkable language: "I have not been in the habit of expecting any aid in this cause from the Jews and rabbins; but light is very delightful, from whatever source it may shine." His Common Place Book of the Scriptures is an invaluable fruit of his scriptural studies. He admired the wisdom and goodness of God in the method found out for the salvation of mankind; and when he thought upon it, he could not forbear crying out, "O, the depth of the riches of the goodness and knowledge of God!" He was persuaded that men would be convinced of this by reading the Scriptures without prejudice; and he frequently exhorted those with whom he conversed, to a serious study of these sacred writings. A relation inquired of him, what was the shortest and surest way for a young gentleman to attain a true knowledge of the Christian religion? "LET HIM STUDY," said Mr. Locke, "THE HOLY SCRIPTURE, ESPECIALLY IN THE NEW TESTAMENT. THEREIN ARE CONTAINED THE WORDS OF ETERNAL LIFE. IT HAS GOD FOR ITS AUTHOR; SALVATION FOR ITS END; AND TRUTH, WITHOUT ANY MIXTURE OF ERROR, FOR ITS MATTER." These words deserve to be written in letters of gold.

In 1704, his strength began to fail him more than ever in the beginning of the summer, a season which, for many years, had restored him some degree of strength. He then saw how short a time he had to live, and prepared to quit this world, with a deep sense of the manifold mercies of God to him, which he took delight in recounting to his friends; and full of a sincere resignation to the divine will, and in firm hopes of his promises of a future life, he expired, on the 28th of October, 1704, in the seventy-third year of his age.

There is no occasion to attempt a panegyric on this great man; his writings are now well known and valued, and will last as long as the English language. Averse to all mean complaisance, his wisdom, his experience, his gentle manners, gained him the respect of his inferiors, the esteem of his equals, the friendship and confidence of those of the highest quality. He was very exact to his word, and religiously performed whatever he promised. As he always kept the useful in his eye, he esteemed the employments of men only in proportion to the good they were capable of producing; for which reason he had no great value for those critics, and mere grammarians, who waste their lives in comparing words and phrases, and in coming to a determination in the choice of a various reading in a passage of no importance.

But, above all, Locke was a Christian, habitual and sincere. The ways of religion he loved, and he found them the ways of pleasantness and peace: thus he combined wisdom and knowledge, and truly benefited the world. He left several manuscripts behind him, besides his "Paraphrase on some of St. Paul's Epistles," which were published at different times after his death. His collected works form four quarto volumes. Great as are his merits in other respects, it is principally as the champion of civil and religious liberty that Locke is entitled to the reverence and gratitude of mankind.—Jones' Chris. Biog.; Davenport.

LOCUST; a voracious insect, belonging to the grasshopper or grylli genus, and a great scourge in Oriental countries.

Moses describes four sorts of locusts, or, it may be, the same sort in different states:—arbeh, salam, chargol, and chageb; which Jerome translates bruchus, attacus, ophiomachus, and locusta.

On many occasions the locust has been employed by the Almighty for chastising his guilty creatures. A swarm of locusts were among the plagues of Egypt, when they covered the whole land, so that the earth was darkened; and they devoured every green herb of the earth, and the fruit of every tree which the hail had left, Exod.

10: 15. But the most particular description of this insect, and of its destructive career, mentioned in the sacred writings, is to be found in Joel 2: 3—10. This is, perhaps, one of the most striking and animated descriptions to be met with in the whole compass of prophecy. The contorture of the passage is extremely curious; and the double destruction to be produced by locusts, and the enemies of which they were the harbingers, is painted with the most expressive force, and described with the most terrible accuracy. We may fancy the destroying army to be moving before us while we read, and imagine that we see the desolation spreading. The following extracts may furnish a commentary upon this and other passages in the Holy Scriptures:—

“The locusts were no sooner hatched, in June, than each of the broods collected itself into a compact body of a furlong or more in square, and marching afterwards directly forward towards the sea, they let nothing escape them; eating up every thing that was green and juicy, not only the lesser kinds of vegetables, but the vine likewise, the fig-tree, the pomegranate, the palm, and the apple tree, even all the trees of the field, (Joel 1: 12.) in doing which, they kept their ranks like men of war, climbing over, as they advanced, every tree or wall that was in their way; nay, they entered in our very houses and bed-chambers like thieves. The inhabitants, to stop their progress, made a variety of pits and trenches all over their fields and gardens, which they filled with water; or else they heaped up therein heath, stubble, and such like combustible matter, which were severally set on fire upon the approach of the locusts. But this was all to no purpose, for the trenches were quickly filled up, and the fires extinguished by infinite swarms succeeding one another, whilst the front was regardless of danger, and the rear pressed on so close, that a retreat was altogether impossible. A day or two after one of these broods was in motion, others were already hatched to march and glean after them, gnawing off the very bark, and the young branches of such trees, as had before escaped with the loss only of their fruit and foliage. So justly have they been compared by the prophet to a great army, who further observes, that the land is as the garden of Eden before them, and behind them a desolate wilderness.”—Shaw's Travels, p. 187, 4to.

“I cannot better represent their flight to you,” says Ecauplan, “than by comparing it to the flakes of snow in cloudy weather, driven about by the wind; and when they alight upon the ground to feed, the plains are all covered, and they make a murmuring noise as they eat, and in less than two hours they devour all close to the ground; then rising, they suffer themselves to be carried away by the wind; and when they fly, though the sun shines ever so bright, it is no lighter than when most clouded. The air was so full of them, that I could not eat in my chamber without a candle; [Joel 2: 10.] all the houses being full of them, even the stables, barns, chambers, garrets, and cellars,” ver. 9.

“These insects seek each other,” says M. Baron, “the moment they are able to use their wings; after their union, the female lays her eggs in a hole which she makes in the earth; and for this purpose she seeks light sandy earth, avoiding moist, compact, and cultivated grounds. The eggs lie all the winter, till the warmth of spring calls them into life.

“There is no doubt on the changes to which the locust is subject. The animal which appears at first in the form of a worm, passes afterwards into the state of a nymph; and undergoes a third metamorphosis by quitting its skin, and becoming a perfect animal, capable of continuing its species. A locust remains in its nymph state twenty-four or twenty-five days, more or less, according to the season: when, having acquired its full growth, it refrains some days from eating; and, gradually bursting its skin, comes forth a new animal, full of life and vigor. These insects leap to a height two hundred times the length of their bodies, by means of those powerful legs and thighs, which are articulated near the centre of the body. When raised to a certain height in the air, they spread their wings, and are so closely embodied together as to form but one mass, intercepting the rays of the sun, almost by a total eclipse.

“Even when dead they are hurtful. The infection spread by their corrupting carcasses is insupportable. Surinus and Cornelius Gemma both, mentioning a prodigious incursion of locusts in 1542, report, that after their death, they infected the air with such a stench, that the ravens, crows, and other birds of prey, though hungry, yet would not come near their carcasses. We have ourselves experienced two years ago the truth of this fact; the pits where they had been buried, after twenty-four hours, could not be passed. In A. D. 591, it is said that nearly a million of men and beasts were carried off in Spain, by a pestilence arising from their stench.”

Upon this information Mr. Taylor submits the following remarks:—

1. Heat and dryness are favorable to the increase of locusts. We think, therefore, that when God threatens to bring a plague of locusts over Israel, as in Joel, (chap. 2.) it may imply also a summer of drought. The prophet Nahum says of the locusts, that they camp in the hedges in the cold day, but when the sun ariseth they flee away. Every observer notices the torpid effect of cold, and the invigorating powers of heat, on the locust. But,

2. Another remarkable particular appears to have considerable connexion with some things said on Exod. 16: 13, that “in the morning, or evening, or in misty weather, locusts do not see equally well, nor fly so high; they suffer themselves to be more closely approached; they are stiff and slow in their motions; and are more easily destroyed.” This supports those who consider the word selav as denoting a mist, or fog; and think it possible that the word selavim (Num. 11: 31.) may express those clouds of locusts, which compose these flying armies.—The opposition of two winds was likely to produce a calm, and a calm to cause a fog; the lower flight of the locusts, the gathering them during the evening, all night, and the next morning, agree with these extracts; and the fatal effects (verses 33, 34.) while the flesh was yet between the teeth of the people, seem to be precisely such as might be expected, from the stench of the immense masses of locusts, spread all abroad round about the camp. Could a more certain way of generating a pestilence have been adopted, considering the stench uniformly attributed to them, and the malignity attending such infection as their dead carcasses so exposed must occasion?

As locusts are commonly eaten in Palestine, and in the neighboring countries, there is no difficulty in supposing, that the word acrides, used by Matthew, (3: 4.) speaking of the food on which John subsisted, might signify these insects. The ancients affirm, that in Africa, Syria, Persia, and almost throughout Asia, the people did commonly eat these creatures. Some nations were called Acridophagi, or eaters of locusts, because these insects formed their principal food.

To explain Rev. 9: 1—11, Mr. Taylor has translated the following passage from Niebuhr: (Descrip. Arab. p. 153.)—“An Arab of the desert near Basra [Bassorah] informed me of a singular comparison of the locust with other animals. The terrible locust of chap. 9. of the Apocalypse not then occurring to me, I regarded this comparison as a jest of the Bedouin, [Arab] and paid no attention to it, till it was repeated by another from Bagdad. It was thus:—He compared the head of the locust to that of the horse; its breast to that of the lion; its feet to those of the camel; its body to that of the serpent; its tail to that of the scorpion; its horns, [antennæ] if I mistake not, to the locks of hair of a virgin; and so of other parts."

It seems more natural to compare their teeth to those of lions, than their breasts to those of lions; but this is more especially proper to the Apocalyptic writer's purpose, as he had already informed us of their resemblance to "horses prepared for battle." As to the armor, &c. of horses prepared for battle, in the East, Knolles informs us, that the Mamelukes' horses were commonly furnished with silver bridles, gilt trappings, and rich saddles; and that their necks and breasts were armed with plates of iron. It is not therefore unlikely, that they had also ornaments resembling crowns of gold, to which the horns of the locust might be, with propriety, compared: we find they had really "breast-plates of iron;" and by their rushing on the enemy, and the use they made of their mouths, as described by Knolles, the comparison of them to locusts seems very applicable.

It is remarkable that Solomon says, (Prov. 30: 27.) "The locusts have no king;" but the locusts of the Apocalypse have a king, and a dreadful king too; Abaddon,—the destroyer. (See ABADDON.)—Calmet.

LOG; a Hebrew measure, which held five-sixths of a pint; it is called the fourth part of a cab, 2 Kings 6: 25. Lev. 14: 10, 12, 24.—Calmet.

LOGAN, (JOHN,) a divine and poet, was born, in 1748, at Fala, in Scotland; was educated at Edinburgh; and, after having been minister at South Leith, he removed to London, in 1786, and became a writer in the English Review. He died in 1788. Logan wrote a volume of poems; the tragedy of Runnemed; Sermons; a Dissertation on the Manners and Spirit of Asia; and a Review of the Charges against Mr. Hastings. For the last, which appeared anonymously, Stockdale, the publisher, was prosecuted; but was successfully defended by Erskine.—Davenport.

LOGOS, the word; a term employed by the evangelist John to designate the mediatorial character of our Redeemer, with special reference to his revelation of the character and will of the Father. It appears to be used as an abstract for the concrete, just as we find this same writer employing light for enlightener, life for life-giver, &c.; so that it properly signifies the speaker or interpreter, than which nothing can more exactly accord with the statement made, John 1: 18: "No man hath seen God at any time; the only-begotten, who is in the bosom of the Father, hath declared him," i. e. communicated to us the true knowledge of his mind and character. That the term is merely expressive of a divine attribute, a position which has been long and variously maintained by Socinians, though abandoned as untenable by some of their best authorities, is in total repugnance to all the circumstances of the context, which distinctly and expressly require personal subsistence in the subject which it describes. He whom John styles the Logos, has the creation of all things ascribed to him; is set forth as possessing the country and people of the Jews; as the only-begotten (son) of the Father; as assuming the human nature, and displaying in it the attributes of grace and truth, &c. Such things could never, with the least degree of propriety, be said of any mere attribute or quality. Nor is the hypothesis of a personification to be reconciled with the universally admitted fact, that the style of John is the most simply historical, and the furthest removed from that species of composition to which such a figure of speech properly belongs. To the Logos, the apostle attributes eternal existence, distinct personality, and strict and proper Deity—characters which he also ascribes to him in his first epistle—besides the possession and exercise of perfections which absolutely exclude the idea of derived or created being. See Dr. Lawrence's Dissertation on the Logos; J. J. Gurney's Biblical Notes; Stuart's Letters to Channing; Spirit of the Pilgrims; and Dr. J. P. Smith on the Person of Christ.—Hend. Buck. (See JOHN, GOSPEL OF.)

LOLLARDS; a religious sect, differing in many points from the church of Rome, which arose in Germany about the beginning of the fourteenth century; so called, as many writers have imagined, from Walter Lollard, their chief leader and champion, a native of Mentz, and equally famous for his eloquence and his writings, who was burnt at Cologne; though others think that Lollard was no surname, but merely a term of reproach applied to all heretics who concealed what was deemed error under the appearance of piety.

The monk of Canterbury derives the origin of the word Lollard from lolum, "a tare," as if the Lollards were the tares sown in Christ's vineyard. Abelley says, that the word signifies "praising God," from the German loben, "to praise," and herr, "lord;" because the Lollards employed themselves in travelling about from place to place, singing psalms and hymns. Others, much to the same purpose, derive lollhard, lullhard, or lollert, lullert, as it was written by the ancient Germans, from the old German word lullen, lollen, or lallen, and the termination hard, with which many of the high Dutch words end. Lollen signifies, "to sing with a low voice," and therefore Lollard is a singer, or one who frequently sings; and in the vulgar tongue of the Germans it denotes a person who is continually praising God with a song, or singing hymns to his honor.

Fuller, however, informs us, that in the reign of Edward III., about A. D. 1315, Walter Lollard, a German preacher, or, (as Perrin, in his History of the Waldenses, calls him,) one of their barbs, (pastors,) of great renown among them, came into England; and who was so eminent in England, that as in France they were called Berengarians, from Berengarius, and Petrobrusians, from Peter Bruis, and in Italy and Flanders, Arnoldists, from the famous Arnold of Brescia; so did the Waldensian Christians for many generations after bear the name of this worthy man, being called Lollards. Bishop Newton having mentioned the Lollards, says, "There was a man more worthy to have given name to the sect, the deservedly famous John Wickliffe, the honor of his own, and the admiration of succeeding times." In England, the followers of Wickliffe were called, by way of reproach, Lollards, though the first English Lollards came from Germany.

Lollard and his followers rejected the sacrifice of the mass, extreme unction, and penances for sin; arguing that Christ's sufferings were sufficient. He is likewise said to have set aside baptism, as a thing of no effect; but this appears to be a mistake, founded on their rejection of infant baptism, and their denial of its saving efficacy.

That this was the case, appears from the laws made against them in the reign of Henry IV.; for among the articles by which the inquisitors were to examine them, one was, "Whether an infant dying unbaptized can be saved?" This the Lollards constantly asserted, in opposition to the church of Rome, which decreed that no infant could be saved without it. Fox says, that among the errors they were charged with, were these: "That they spoke against the opinion of such as think children are damned who depart before baptism, and said that Christian people be sufficiently baptized in the blood of Christ, and need no water; and that infants be sufficiently baptized, if their parents are baptized before them." Fox thinks they were slandered in this matter; we think justly, so far as the denial of believers' baptism is concerned, for the last of the three charges is itself a plain contradiction of it. Besides, Sir Lewis Clifford, who had been a friend of Wickliffe, expressly affirmed, that "the Lollards would not baptize their new-born children;" and Thomas Walden, who had access to the writings of Wickliffe, calls him "one of the seven heads that came out of the bottomless pit for denying infant baptism, that heresie of the Lollards, of whom he was so great a ringleader."

Fox says, that it was upon these charges, that in the space of four years, one hundred and twenty Lollards, men and women, were apprehended, and suffered greatly; a number of them being burnt at the stake. William Sawtry, the parish priest of St. Osith, in London, was the first martyr in this English persecution. Rapin says, "In 1389, the Wickliffites or Lollards began to separate from the church of Rome, and appoint priests from among themselves to perform divine service after their way." From this period to the Reformation, their sufferings were very great. More than one hundred are recorded by name who were burnt to death.

The Lollards' tower still stands as a monument of their miseries, and of the cruelty of their implacable enemies.

This tower is at Lambeth palace, and was fitted up for this purpose by Chicheby, archbishop of Canterbury, who came to this see in 1144. It is said that he expended two hundred and eighty pounds to make this prison for the Lollards. The vast staples and rings to which they were fastened, before they were brought out to the stake, are still to be seen in a large lumber-room at the top of the palace; and ought to make Protestants look back with gratitude upon the hour which terminated so bloody a period. LOMBARD, (PETER), otherwise known by the title of Maſter of the Sentences; an author of great repute in the twelfth century. He was born at Novara, in Lombardy, and died archbishop of Paris, in 1164. His work on the sentences is divided into four books, and has been largely commented upon. He has also left commentaries on the Psalms and Paul's Epistles.—Hend. Buck.

LONG-SUFFERING OF GOD. (See PATIENCE OF GOD.)

LONG; to desire very earnestly, as one hungry or thirsty desires refreshment: (Gen. 34: 8. 2 Sam. 23: 15.) so persons grievously afflicted long for death, Job 3: 21. David's soul longed for his banished son Absalom, 2 Sam. 13: 39. Exiles long to see their native country, Gen. 31: 50. Faithful ministers sick or imprisoned long to visit their people, Phil. 2: 66. Saints long for the experience of God's presence or power in his ordinances, and for his salvation from the guilt, power, and pollution of sin, to perfect holiness and happiness, Ps. 84: 2. 119: 40, 174.—Brown.

LOOK. God's looking on men imports his perfect knowledge of their conduct; his care of and kindness to them; (Ps. 53: 2. Lam. 3: 50.) his delightful contemplation of their graces, (Sol. Song 6: 13.) or his apparent unconcern about them, as if he were a mere by-stander; (Hab. 1: 13. Ps. 35: 17.) or his terrifying and punishing them, Exod. 14: 24. Men's looking to God or Christ imports their viewing him by faith in his excellencies and new covenant relations, desiring direction, support, and every blessing of salvation from him, and their viewing him as their pattern, Ps. 34: 5. Isa. 45: 22. 17: 7. Heb. 12: 2.—Brown.

LOOKING-GLASSES. Moses says, that the devout women who sat up all night at the door of the tabernacle in the wilderness, offered cheerfully their "looking-glasses" to be employed in making a brazen laver for the purifications of the priests, Exod. 38: 8. These looking-glasses were, without doubt, of brass, since the laver was made out of them. (See GLASS, and LAVER.)—Calmet.

LORD; a term properly denoting one who has dominion, whether in a family or community; or whether on earth or in heaven. Applied to God, it signifies the supreme Governor and Disposer of all things. When printed with large capitals in the English Bible, it stands for the Hebrew Jehovah, and when in small, Adonai; names exclusively given to the Divine Being. (See GOD, and JEHOVAH.)—Hend. Buck.

LORD'S DAY. (See SABBATH.)

LORD'S NAME TAKEN IN VAIN, consists first, in using it lightly or rashly, in exclamations, adjurations, and appeals in common conversation. 2. Hypocritically in our prayers, thankgivings, &c. 3. Superstitiously, as when the Israelites carried the ark to the field of battle, to render them successful against the Philistines, 1 Sam. 4: 3, 4. Wantonly, in swearing by him, or creatures in his stead, Matt. 5: 34, 37. 5. Angrily, or sportfully, cursing, and devoting ourselves or others to mischief and damnation. 6. Perjuring ourselves, attesting that which is false, Mal. 3: 5. 7. Blasphemously reviling God, or causing others to do so, Rom. 2: 24.

Perhaps there is no sin more common as to the practice, and less thought of as to the guilt of it, than this. Nor is it thus common with the vulgar only, but with those who call themselves wise, humane, and moral. They tremble at the idea of murder, theft, adultery, &c., while they forget that the same law which prohibits the commission of these crimes, does, with equal force, forbid that of profaning his name. No man, therefore, whatever his sense, abilities, or profession may be, can be held guiltless, or be exonerated from the charge of being a wicked man, while he lives in the habitual violation of this part of God's sacred law.

A very celebrated female writer justly observes, that "it is utterly inexcusable; it has none of the palliatives of temptation which other vices plead, and in that respect stands distinguished from all others, both in its nature and degree of guilt. Like many other sins, however, it is at once cause and effect; it proceeds from want of love and reverence to the best of Beings, and causes the want of that love both in themselves and others. This species of profaneness is not only swearing, but, perhaps, in some respects, swearing of the worst sort; as it is a direct breach of an express command, and offends against the very letter of that law, which says, in so many words, "Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain." It offends against politeness and good breeding, for those who commit it little think of the pain they are inflicting on the sober mind, which is deeply wounded when it hears the holy name it loves dishonored; and it is as contrary to good breeding to give pain, as it is to true piety to be profane. It is astonishing that the refined and elegant should not reprobate this practice for its coarseness and vulgarity, as much as the pious abhor it for its sinfulness.

"I would endeavor to give some faint idea of the grossness of this offence by an analogy, (O! how inadequate!) with which the feeling heart, even though not seasoned with religion, may yet be touched. To such I would earnestly say—Suppose you had some beloved friend—to put the case still more strongly, a departed friend—a revered parent, perhaps, whose image never occurs without awakening in your bosom sentiments of tender love and lively gratitude; how would you feel if you heard this honored name bandied about with unfeeling familiarity and indecent levity; or, at best, thrust into every pause of speech as a vulgar expletive? Does not your affectionate heart recoil at the thought? And yet the hallowed name of your truest Benefactor, your heavenly Father, your best Friend, to whom you are indebted for all you enjoy; who gives you those very friends in whom you so much delight, those very talents with which you dishonor him, those very organs of speech with which you blaspheme him, is treated with an irreverence, a contempt, a wantonness, with which you cannot bear the very thought or mention of treating a human friend. His name is impiously, is unfeelingly, is ungratefully singled out as the object of decided irreverence, of systematic contempt, of thoughtless levity. His sacred name is used indiscriminately to express anger, joy, surprise, impatience; and, what is almost still more unpardonable than all, it is wantonly used as a mere unmeaning expletive, which, being excited by no temptation, can have nothing to extenuate it; which causing no emotion, can have nothing to recommend it, unless it be the pleasure of the sin." *H. LORD'S PRAYER is that which our Lord gave to his disciples on the mount. According to what is said in the sixth chapter of Matthew, it was given as a directory; but from Luke 11: 1, some argue that it was given as a form. Some have thought that the second and fourth petition of that prayer could be intended only for temporary use; but it is always our highest duty to pray that Christ's kingdom may be advanced in the world, and also to profess our daily dependence on God's providential care. Nevertheless, there is no reason to believe that Christ meant that his people should always use this as a set form; for, if that had been the case, it would not have been varied as it is by the two evangelists, Matt. 6. Luke. 11. Besides, we do not find that the disciples ever used it as a form.

It is, however, a most exquisite summary of prayer, for its matter, brevity, and order; and Christians should study its meaning, and enter into its spirit, far more deeply than they do. Frequently as it is repeated in the course both of public and domestic devotion, it is far from being universally known, or if known, from being always recollected, what is the nature and extent of the petitions it in volves. This may in a great measure be accounted for by the consideration that the prayer is often impressed upon the youthful memory, without any explanation of its meaning or its views; and recited mechanically in after life, with an habitual feeling that whatever the child could learn, the man must understand. What is familiar to the memory, is by a very natural process of association supposed to be also familiar to the mind. See Doddridge's Lectures, lect. 194; Barron's Works, vol. i. p. 48; Archbishop Leighton's Explanation of it; West on the Lord's Prayer; Gill's Body of Div.; Hannah More's Works; Forde's Expo. on Edification by Public Instruction, pp. 11, 12; Mendham's Expo. of the Lord's Prayer; Fuller's Works.—*Hend. LORD'S SUPPER is an ordinance which our Savior instituted as a commemoration of his death and sufferings. 1. It is commonly called a sacrament, that is, a sign and an oath: an outward and visible sign of an inward and spiritual grace; an oath by which we bind our souls with a bond unto the Lord. Some, however, reject this term as not being scriptural; as likewise the idea of swearing or vowing to the Lord. (See Vow.) 2. It is called the Lord's supper, because it was first instituted in the evening, and at the close of the passover supper; and because we therein feed upon Christ, the bread of life, Rev. 3: 20. 1 Cor. 11: 3. It is called the communion, as herein we have communion with Christ, and with his people, 1 Cor. 12: 13. 10: 17. 4. It is called the eucharist, a thanksgiving, because Christ, in the institution of it, gave thanks, (1 Cor. 11: 24.) and because we, in the participation of it, must give thanks likewise. 5. It is called a feast, and by some a feast upon a sacrifice, (though not a sacrifice itself,) in allusion to the custom of the Jews feasting upon their sacrifices, 1 Cor. 10: 18.

As to the nature of this ordinance, we may observe, that, in participating of the bread and wine, we do not consider it as expiatory, but, 1. As a commemorating ordinance. We are here to remember the person, love, and death of Christ, 1 Cor. 11: 24. 2. A confessing ordinance. We hereby profess our esteem for Christ, and dependence upon him. 3. A communicating ordinance; blessings of grace are here communicated to us. 4. A covenanting ordinance. God, in and by this ordinance, declares that he is ours, and we by it declare ourselves to be his, Matt. 26: 28. Heb. 8: 8. 5. A standing ordinance, for it is to be observed to the end of time, 1 Cor. 11: 26. It seems to be quite an indifferent thing what bread is used in this ordinance, or what colored wine, for Christ took that which was readiest. The eating of the bread and drinking of the wine being always connected in Christ's example, they ought never to be separated; whenever one is given, the other should not be withheld. This bread and wine are not changed into the real body and blood of Christ, but are only emblems thereof. (See TRANSUBSTANTIATION.)

The subjects of this ordinance should be such as make a credible profession of the gospel in the mode appointed his disciples by the Savior; the ignorant, and those whose lives are immoral, have no right to it; nor should it be ever administered as a test of civil obedience, for this is sacrilegiously perverting the design of it. None but true believers can approach it with profit; yet we cannot exclude any who make a credible profession of faith in Christ; for God only is the judge of the heart, while we can only act according to outward appearances.

Much has been said respecting the time of administering it. Some plead for the morning, others the afternoon, and some for the evening; which latter, indeed, was the time of the first celebration of it, and is most suitable to a supper. How often it is to be observed has been disputed. Some have been for keeping it every day in the week; others four times a week; some every Lord's day, which many think is nearest the apostolic practice; (Acts 20: 7.) a practice which was long kept up in Christian antiquity, and only deviated from when the love of the Christians began to wax cold. Others have kept it three times a year, and some once a year; but the most common is once a month. It evidently appears, however, both from Scripture, (1 Cor. 11: 26.) and from the nature of the ordinance, that it ought to be frequent.

As to the posture, Dr. Doddridge justly observes, that it is greatly to be lamented that Christians have perverted an ordinance, intended as a pledge and means of their mutual union, into an occasion of discord and contention, by laying such a stress on the manner in which it is to be administered, and the posture in which it is to be received. As to the latter, a table posture seems most eligible, as having been used by Christ and his apostles, and being peculiarly suitable to the notion of a sacred feast; and kneeling, which was never introduced into the church till transubstantiation was received, may prove an occasion of superstition.

We will only subjoin a few directions in what frame of mind we should attend upon this ordinance. It should be with sorrow for our past sins, and a tender composure of affection, free from the disorders and ruffles of passion; with a holy awe and reverence of the divine Majesty, yet with a gracious confidence and earnest desires towards God; with raised expectations; prayer, joy, and thanksgiving, and love to all men. When coming from it, we should admire the condescensions of divine grace; watch against the snares of Satan, and the allurements of the world; rejoice in the finished work of Christ; depend upon the gracious influence of the Spirit, that we may live more to the glory of God; keep up a sense of the divine favor; and be longing for heaven, where we hope at last to join the general assembly of the first-born.

The advantages arising from the participation of the Lord's supper are numerous. 1. It is a means of strengthening our faith in the Lord Jesus Christ. 2. It affords great consolation and joy. 3. It increases love. 4. It has a tendency to enlighten our minds in the mystery of godliness. 5. It gives us an utter aversion to all kinds of sin, and occasions a hearty grief for it. 6. It has a tendency to excite and strengthen all holy desires in us. 7. It renews our obligations to our Lord and Master. 8. It binds the souls of Christians one to another.

In the early times of the gospel the celebration of the Lord's supper was both frequent and numerously attended. Voluntary absence was considered as a culpable neglect; and exclusion from it, by the sentence of the church, as a severe punishment. Every one brought an offering proportioned to his ability; these offerings were chiefly of bread and wine; and the ministers appropriated as much as was necessary for the administration of the eucharist. They then had a part of what was left for their maintenance; and the rest furnished supplies for the poor. LOT; the son of Haran, and nephew to Abraham. He accompanied his uncle from Ur to Haran, and from thence to Canaan; a proof of their mutual attachment, and similarity of principles respecting the true religion. With Abraham he descended into Egypt, and afterwards returned with him into Canaan: but the multiplicity of their flocks, and still more the quarrels of their servants, rendered a friendly separation necessary. When God destroyed the cities of the plain with fire and brimstone, he delivered "just Lot" from the conflagration, according to the account of the divine historian.

The whole time that Lot resided there was twenty-three years. During all this period he had been a preacher of righteousness among this degenerate people. In him they had before their eyes an illustrious example of the exercise of genuine piety, supported by unsullied justice and benevolent actions. And doubtless it was for these purposes that divine Providence placed him for a time in that city. The losses which Lot sustained on this melancholy occasion were very great; his wife, property, and all the prospects of the future settlement of his family. Some think it was in judgment for a worldly choice.

Lot left Zoar, and retired with his two daughters to a cave in an adjacent mountain. Conceiving that all mankind was destroyed, and that the world would end, unless they provided new inhabitants for it, they made their father drink, and the eldest lay with him without his perceiving it; she conceived a son whom she called Moab. The second daughter did the same, and had Ammon. The crime of incest was not then clearly understood, as now.

2. Several questions are proposed concerning Lot's wife being changed into a pillar of salt. Some are of opinion, that being surprised and suffocated with fire and smoke, she continued in the same place, as immovable as a rock of salt; others, that a column or monument of salt stone was erected on her grave; others, that she was stifled in the flame, and became a monument of salt to posterity; that is, a permanent and durable monument of her imprudence. The common opinion is, that she was suddenly petrified and changed into a statue of rock salt, which is as hard as the hardest rocks.

The words of the original, however, have been much too strictly taken by translators. Getsib, rendered statue, by no means expresses form, but fixation; hence a military post; that is, a fixed station; and as the Hebrews reckoned among salts both nitre and bitumen, so the term salt here used, denotes the bituminous mass which overwhelmed this woman, fixed her to the place where it fell upon her, raised a mound over her, of a height proportioned to that of her figure, and was long afterwards pointed out by the inhabitants as a memento of her fate, and a warning against loitering, when divinely exhorted, Luke 17: 32.—Watson; Calmet.

LOTS are a mutual agreement to determine an uncertain event, no other ways determinable, by an appeal to the providence of God, on casting or throwing something. This is a decisory lot, Prov. 16: 33. 18: 18. The matter, therefore, to be determined, in order to avoid guilt, should be important, and no other possible way left to determine it; and the manner of making the appeal solemn and grave, if we would escape the guilt of taking the name of God in vain. Wantonly, without necessity, and in a ludicrous manner, to make this appeal, must be therefore highly blamable. And if thus the decisory lot, when wantonly and unnecessarily employed, be criminal, equally, if not more so, must the divinatory lot be, which is employed for discovering the will of God; this, being no means of God's appointment, must be superstitious, and the height of presumption.

The manner of casting lots is not described in the Scriptures; but several methods appear to have been used. Solomon observes, (Prov. 16: 33.) that "the lot," pebble, "is cast into the lap," (bechif.) probably, of an urn, or vase. Literally, "in a lot-vase the lots are shaken in all directions; nevertheless, from the Lord is their whole decision—judgment."

The wise man also acknowledges the usefulness of this custom, Prov. 18: 18. "The lot causeth contentions to cease, and parteth between the mighty." It is sometimes forbidden, however; as, when it is practised without necessity; or with superstition; or with a design of tempting God; or, in things in which there are other natural means of discovering truth, reason and religion furnish better ways to guide us. Haman (Esth. 3: 7, &c.) used lots, not only out of superstition, but likewise in an unjust and criminal matter, when he undertook to destroy the Jews. Nebuchadnezzar did so in a superstitious manner, when, being on the way to Jerusalem, and Rabbath of the Ammonites, he cast lots to determine which of the two cities he should first attack, Ezek. 21: 18, &c.

The Moravian Brethren employ the appeal to lot in the case of marriage and other appointments in their community.—Hend. Buck; Calmet.

LOVE; an attachment of the affections to any object, accompanied with an ardent desire to promote its happiness. It has been distinguished into, 1. Love of com- placency, which arises from the consideration of any object agreeable to us, and calculated to afford us pleasure. 2. Love of esteem, which arises from the mere consideration of some excellency in an object, and belongs either to persons or things. 3. Love of gratitude, which arises from the sense of kindness conferred on us. 4. Love of benevolence, which is an inclination to seek the happiness and welfare of any being. Usually these elements are blended in our attachments; but they often exist in a separate state, or in very different degrees of combination.

It is the excellency of the Christian system, that it ennobles, regulates, and directs this passion to proper objects, and moderates it within due bounds. Finding this principle in the human mind, it does not banish but encourage it; does not depress but exalt it; does not abate but promote it. It is conducted by piety to proper objects, is animated with the noblest expectations, and is trained up for perpetual exercise in a world where it shall be perfectly purified, perfectly extended, and perfectly rewarded.

Love is the greatest of all graces; (1 Cor. 13: 13.) it awakens the end of the law; (1 Tim. 1: 5.) resembles the inhabitants of a better world; and without it every other attainment is of no avail, 1 Cor. 13. (See CHARITY.)—Dwight's Theology; Hend. Buck; Calmet.

LOVE OF OUR NEIGHBOR, is that humane, tender, and benevolent regard for our fellow-men required by the divine law, which is to be exercised towards all without exception, according to their degree of proximity to us, in kindred, place, acquaintance, and opportunity. It is a settled disposition of the soul, in the view of time and eternity, prompting us to every act of kindness towards them. It does not consist merely in pity and relief of others; (1 Cor. 13.) in love to our benefactors only, and those who are related to us, Matt. 5: 46, 47. It must flow from love to God, and extend to all mankind; yea, we are required by the highest authority to love even our enemies; (Matt. 5: 44.) not so as to countenance them in their evil actions, but to forgive the injuries they have done to us; and promote as well as pray for their happiness, conversion, and salvation. (See CHARITY.)—Hend. Buck.

LOVE, BROTHERLY, is that peculiar attachment among Christians arising from their common faith, interest, object, and hope. Its foundation is their common love of Christ, and truth, and virtue, or Christian holiness. Love to good men must be particularly cultivated, for it is the command of Christ; (John 13: 3.) they belong to the same Father and family; (Gal. 5: 10.) we hereby give proof of our discipleship; (John 13: 35.) the example of Christ should allure us to it, (1 John 3: 16.) it is creative of a variety of pleasing sensations, and prevents a thousand evils.

This love should show itself by praying for our brethren, (Eph. 6: 18.) bearing one another's burdens, by assisting and relieving each other, (Gal. 6: 2.) by forbearing with one another, (Col. 3: 13.) by reproving and admonishing in the spirit of meekness, (Prov. 27: 5, 6.) by establishing each other in the truth, by conversation, exhortation, and stirring up one another to the several duties of religion, both public and private, Jude 20, 21. Heb. 10: 24, 25. (See CHARITY.) Dwight's Theology; Fuller's Works; Works of Robert Hall; Douglas on Truth and Error.—Hend. Buck.

LOVE, FAMILY OF. A peculiar sect of Baptists, that arose in Holland, in the sixteenth century, (1555,) founded by Henry Nicholas, a Westphalian. He maintained that he had a commission from above to teach men that the essence of religion consisted in the feelings of divine love; that all other theological tenets, whether they related to objects of faith or modes of worship, were of no sort of moment; and, consequently, that it was a matter of indifference what opinions Christians entertained concerning the divine nature, provided their hearts burned with the pure and sacred flame of piety and love.—Hend. Buck.

LOVE FEASTS. (See ΑΓΑΠΕ.)

LOVE OF GOD, is either his natural delight in that which is good, (Isa. 61: 8.) or his special benevolence to mankind, (John 3: 16.) or that gracious, sovereign affection he bears to his people, Eph. 2: 4. 1 John 4: 19. Not that he possesses the passion of love as we do; but it implies his benevolent purpose and will to deliver, bless, and save his people. The love of God to his people appears in his all-wise designs and plans for their happiness, Eph. 3: 10. 2. In the choice of them, and determination to sanctify and glorify them, 2 Thess. 2: 13. 3. In the gift of his Son to die for them, and redeem them from sin, death, and hell, Rom. 5: 9. John 3: 16. 4. In the revelation of his will, and the declaration of his promises to them, 2 Peter 1: 4. 5. In the awful punishment of their enemies, Ex. 19: 4. 6. In his actual conduct towards them; in supporting them in life, blessing them in death, and bringing them to glory, Rom. 8: 30—39. 6: 23.

The properties of this love may be considered as, 1. Everlasting, Jer. 31: 3. Eph. 1: 4. 2. Immutable, Mal. 3: 6. Zeph. 3: 17. 3. Free; neither the sufferings of Christ nor the merits of men are the cause, but his own good pleasure, John 3: 16. 4. Great and unspeakable, Eph. 2: 4, 6. 3: 19. Ps. 36: 7. Gill's Div.; Hall's Help to Zion's Travellers; Fuller's Works.—Hend. Buck.

LOVE TO GOD; the disposition which lies at the foundation of all true holiness, or real virtue. To serve and obey God on the conviction that it is right to serve and obey him, is in Christianity joined with that love to God which gives life and animation to service, and renders it the means of exalting our pleasures, at the same time that it accords with our convictions. The supreme love of God is the chief, the noblest, therefore, of all our affections. It is the sum and the end of law; and though lost by us in Adam, it is restored to us by Christ.

When it regards God absolutely, and in himself, as a Being of infinite and harmonious perfections and moral beauties, it is that movement of the soul towards him which is produced by admiration, approval, and delight. When it regards him relatively, it fixes upon the ceaseless emanations of his goodness to us all in the continuance of the existence which he at first bestowed; the circumstances which render that existence felicitous; and, above all, upon that "great love wherewith he loved us," manifested in the gift of his Son for our redemption, and in saving us by his grace; or, in the forcible language of St. Paul, upon "the exceeding riches of his grace in his kindness to us through Christ Jesus." Under all these views an unbounded gratitude overflows the heart which is influenced by this spiritual affection. But the love of God is more than a sentiment of gratitude: it rejoices in his perfections and glories, and devoutly contemplates them as the highest and most interesting subjects of thought; it keeps the idea of this supremely beloved object constantly present to the mind; it turns to it with adoring ardor from the business and distractions of life; it connects it with every scene of majesty and beauty in nature, and with every event of general and particular providence; it brings the soul into fellowship with God, real and sensible, because vital; it moulds the other affections into conformity with what God himself wills or prohibits, loves or hates; it produces an unbounded desire to please him, and to be accepted of him in all things; it is jealous of his honor, unwearied in his service, quick to prompt to every sacrifice in the cause of his truth and his church; and it renders all such sacrifices, even when carried to the extent of suffering and death, unreluctant and cheerful. It chooses God as the chief good of the soul, the enjoyment of which assures its perfect and eternal interest and happiness. "Whom have I in heaven but thee? and there is none upon earth that I desire beside thee," is the language of every heart, when its love of God is true in principle and supreme in degree.

If, then, the will of God is the perfect rule of morals; and if supreme and perfect love to God must produce a prompt, an unwearied, a delightful subjection to his will, or rather, an entire and most free choice of it as the rule of all our principles, affections, and actions; the importance of this affection in securing that obedience to the law of God in which true morality consists, is manifest; and we clearly perceive the reason why an inspired writer has affirmed, that "love is the fulfilling of the law." The necessity of keeping this subject before us under those views in which it is placed in the Christian system, and of not surrendering it to mere philosophy, is, however, an important consideration. (See AFFECTIONS.)

With the philosopher the love of God may be the mere approval of the intellect; or a sentiment which results from the contemplation of infinite perfection, manifesting itself in acts of power and goodness. In the Scriptures it is much more than either, and is produced and maintained by a different process. We are there taught that "the carnal mind is enmity against God," and is not, of course, capable of loving God. Yet this carnal mind may consist with deep attainments in philosophy, and with strongly impassioned poetic sentiment. The mere approval of the understanding, and the susceptibility of being impressed with feelings of admiration, awe, and even pleasure, when the character of God is manifested in his works, as both may be found in the carnal mind which is enmity to God, are not therefore the love of God. They are principles which enter into that love, since it cannot exist without them; but they may exist without this affection itself, and be found in a vicious and unchanged nature.

The love of God is a fruit of the Holy Spirit; that is, it is truly exercised only in the souls which he has regenerated; and, as that which excites its exercise is chiefly, and in the first place, a sense of the benefits bestowed by the grace of God in our redemption, and a humble persuasion of our personal interest in those benefits, it necessarily presupposes our reconciliation to God through faith in the atonement of Christ, and that attestation of it to the heart by the Spirit of adoption. We here see, then, another proof of the necessary connexion of Christian morals with Christian doctrine, and how imperfect and deceptive every system must be which separates them.

Love is essential to true obedience; for when the apostle declares love to be "the fulfilling of the law," he declares, in effect, that the law cannot be fulfilled without love; and that every action which has not this for its principle, however virtuous in its show, fails of accomplishing the precepts which are obligatory upon us. But this love to God cannot be fully exercised so long as we are sensible of his wrath, and are in dread of his judgments. These feelings are incompatible with each other, and we must be assured of his readiness to forgive, before we are capable of loving him with the whole heart, and soul, and mind, and strength. Thus the very existence of love to God implies the doctrines of atonement, repentance, faith, and the gift of the Spirit of adoption to believers; and unless it be taught in this connexion, and through this process of experience, it will be exhibited only as a bright and beautiful object to which man has no access; or a fictitious and imitative sentimentalism will be substituted for it, to the delusion of the souls of men.

It is not either from the visionary mystic, the sensual fanatic, or the frantic zealot, but from the plain word of God, that we are to take our ideas of this divine sentiment. There we find it described in all its native purity and simplicity. The marks by which it is there distinguished contain nothing enthusiastic or extravagant. It may be considered, 1. As sincere, Matt. 22: 36, 38. 2. Constant, Rom. 8. 3. Universal of all his attributes, commandments, ordinances, &c. 4. Progressive, 1 Thess. 5: 12. 2 Thess. 1: 3. Eph. 3: 19. 5. Superlative, Lam. 3: 24. 6. Eternal, Rom. 8. This love manifests itself, 1. In a desire to be like God. 2. In making his glory the supreme end of our actions, 1 Cor. 11: 31. 3. In delighting in communion with him, 1 John 1: 3. 4. In grief under the hidings of his face, Job 23: 2. 5. In relinquishing all that stands in opposition to his will, Phil. 3: 8. 6. In regard to his house, worship, and ordinances, Ps. 84. 7. In love for his truth and people, Ps. 119. John 13: 35. 8. By confidence in his promises, Ps. 71: 1. And lastly, by obedience to his word, John 14: 15. 1 John 2: 3. Gill's Body of Div., vol. iii. p. 94, 8vo; Watts' Discourses on Love to God; Scott's Ser., ser. 14; Maclaurin's Essays; Edwards' Works; Bellamy on True Religion, and Signs of Counterfeit Love, p. 82; Bishop Porteus' Ser., vol. 1. ser. 1; Wilberforce's View; Works of Hannah More; Newton's Works; Scott's Works; Cecil's Works; Fuller's do.; Hall's do.; but above all, Dwight's Theology.—Watson.—*Hend. LOVE OF THE WORLD. (See WORLD.)

LOW. Let the rich Christian rejoice in that he is made low; humble in the temper of his mind; or even that he has his outward wealth and honor taken from him, as that tends to his real good, James 1: 10. Christ was made for a little while, or in a little degree, lower than the angels, in his state of humiliation, Ps. 8: 5. Heb. 2: 7, 9. —Bronn.

LOW CHURCHMEN; those who disapproved of the schism made in the church by the non-jurors, and who distinguished themselves by their moderation towards Dissenters, and were less ardent in extending the limits of ecclesiastical authority. (See HIGH CHURCHMEN.)—Hend. Buck.

LOWER PARTS OF THE EARTH are (1.) Valleys, which diversify the face of the globe, and are evidently lower than hills, which also contribute to that diversity, Isa. 44: 23. (2.) The grave, which is the lowest part of the earth, usually opened to men, Ps. 63: 9. (3.) Sheol, or Hades, sometimes called the deep, or abyss; and, indeed, it is secluded from our cognizance, till we are called to visit "that bourne from whence no traveller returns," Eph. 4: 9. (4.) As to the phrase "lower parts of the earth," in Ps. 139: 15, it is obscure. It does not appear necessary to take the Hebrew word, rendered "lower parts," as expressing the extremely deep, or central parts, in reference to the general globe of the earth; (see Ps. 63: 9. Eph. 4: 9. Isa. 44: 23.) so that the dust of the earth, of which man was originally made, being taken from the valley, not from high hills, may be understood by the phrase. "The formation of my body was not without thy knowledge, though as wonderful as the composition of the globe itself!" Comp. Job 10: 9—12.—Calmet.

LOWTH, (WILLIAM,) a distinguished divine, and father of bishop Lowth, was born in London, the 11th of September, 1661. He was educated at the Merchant Tailors' school, whence he was elected, in 1675, into St. John's college, Oxford; where, in 1683, he graduated master of arts, and proceeded to bachelor of divinity in 1688. His studies were strictly confined within his own province, and applied solely to the duties of his function; yet, that he might acquire himself the better, he acquired an uncommon share of critical learning. He was scarcely any ancient author, Greek or Latin, profane or ecclesiastical, especially the latter, that he had not read with care and attention, constantly accompanying his reading with critical and philological remarks. But the most valuable part of his character was that which least appeared in the eyes of the world. His piety, diligence, hospitality, and beneficence, rendered his life highly exemplary, and greatly enforced his public exhortations.

The works of this learned divine, who died in 1732, are, "A Vindication of the Divine Authority and Inspiration of the Old and New Testament;" "Directions for the profitable reading of the Holy Scriptures;" "A Commentary on the Prophetical Books of the Old Testament," which generally accompanies Patrick and Whitby. Biog. Brit.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

LOWTH, (ROBERT, D. D.,) a distinguished English prelate, was born at Buriton, the 27th of Nov. 1710. In 1737, he graduated master of arts, at Oxford, and in 1741, was elected professor of poetry in the university of Oxford. The first preferment which he obtained in the church, was the rectory of Ovington, in Hampshire, in 1744; and four years afterwards he accompanied Mr. Legge, afterwards chancellor of the exchequer, to Berlin. He was, about this time, appointed tutor to the sons of the duke of Devonshire, during their travels on the continent. On his return he was appointed archdeacon of Winchester, by bishop Hoadley, who, three years after, presented him with the rectory of East Woodhay.

In 1753, he published his valuable work, "De Sacra Poesi Hebræorum, Prælectiones Academicæ," quarto. Of this work, to which the duties of the author's professorship gave occasion, all the best critics speak in unqualified praise. In 1751, he received the degree of doctor in divinity, from the university of Oxford, by diploma; and in 1755, went to Ireland as chaplain to the marquis of Hartington, then appointed lord-lieutenant, who nominated him bishop of Limerick, a preferment which he exchanged for a prebend of Durham, and the rectory of Sedgfield. In the year 1753, he preached a sermon in favor of free inquiry in matters of religion, which has been often reprinted, and has been much admired. In the same year he published his "Life of William of Wykeham," octavo; and in 1762, "A Short Introduction to English Grammar;" a production that has gone through a great number of editions, and may be considered the precursor of that attention to grammatical accuracy and precision which has since distinguished the best writers of English prose. In 1766, Dr. Lowth was appointed bishop of St. David's, whence, in a few years afterwards, he was translated to the see of Oxford.

In 1777, he succeeded Dr. Terrick in the diocese of London: and, in the following year, published the last of his literary labors, namely, "Isaiah; a new Translation, with a Preliminary Dissertation, and Notes." This elegant and beautiful version of the evangelical prophet, of which learned men in every part of Europe have been unanimous in their eulogiums, is alone sufficient to transmit his name to posterity. On the death of archbishop Cornwallis, the primacy was offered to Dr. Lowth; a dignity which he declined on account of his advanced age and family afflictions. In 1768, he lost his eldest daughter; and in 1783, his second daughter suddenly expired while presiding at the tea-table: his eldest son was also suddenly cut off in the prime of life. This amiable prelate died on the 3d of November, 1787, at his palace of Fulham, in the seventy-seventh year of his age. Dodsley's An. Register, and Brit. Plutarch.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

LUCIAN; a philosopher and wit, who appeared as one of the early opposers of the Christian religion and its followers.

The hostile sentiments of the heathens towards Christianity, says Dr. Neander, were different, according to the difference of their philosophical and religious views. There entered then upon the contest two classes of men, who have never since ceased to persecute Christianity. These were the superstitious, to whom the honoring God in spirit and in truth was a stumbling-stone, and the careless unbeliever, who, unacquainted with all feelings of religious wants, was accustomed to laugh, and to mock at every thing which proceeded from them, whether he understood it or not, and at all which supposed such feelings and proposed to satisfy them.

Such was Lucian. To him Christianity, like every other remarkable religious phenomenon, appeared only as a fit object for his sarcastic wit. Without giving himself the trouble to examine and to discriminate, he threw Christianity, superstition, and fanaticism into the same class. It is easy enough, in any system which lays deep hold on man's nature, to find out some side open to ridicule, if a man bring forward only that which is external in the system, abstracted from all its inward power and meaning, and without either understanding, or attempting to understand this power. He, therefore, who looked on Christianity with cold indifference, and the profane every-day feelings of worldly prudence, might easily here and there find objects for his satire. The Christian might indeed have profited by that ridicule, and have learned from the children of darkness to join the wisdom of the serpent with the meekness of the dove. In the end the scoffer brings himself to derision, because he ventures to pass sentence on the phenomena of a world of which he has not the slightest conception, and which to his eyes, buried as they are in the films of the earth, is entirely closed.

Such was Lucian. He sought to bring forward all that is striking and remarkable in the external conduct and circumstances of Christians, which might serve for the object of his sarcastic railery, without any deeper inquiry as to what the religion of the Christians really was. And yet even in that at which he scoffed, there was much which might have taught him to remark in Christianity no common power over the hearts of men, had he been capable of such serious impressions. The firm hope of eternal life, which taught them to meet death with tranquillity, their brotherly love one towards another, might have indicated to him some higher spirit which animated these men; but instead of this he treats it all as delusion, because many gave themselves up to death with something like fanatical enthusiasm. He scoffs at the notion of a crucified man having taught them to regard all mankind as their brethren, the moment they should have abjured the gods of Greece; as if it were not just the most remarkable part of all this, that an obscure person in Jerusalem, who was deserted by every one, and executed as a criminal, should be able, a good century after his death, to cause such effects as Lucian, in his own time, saw extending in all directions, and in spite of every kind of persecution. How blinded must he have been to pass thus lightly over such a phenomenon! But men of his ready wit are apt to exert it with too great readiness on all subjects. They are able to illustrate every thing out of nothing; with their miserable "nil admirari;" they can close their hearts against all lofty impressions. With all his wit and keenness, with all his undeniably fine powers of observation in all that has no concern with the deeper impulses of man's spirit, he was a man of very little mind. But hear his own language: "The wretched people have persuaded themselves that they are altogether immortal, and will live forever; therefore they despise death, and many of them meet it of their own accord. Their first lawgiver has persuaded them also to regard all mankind as their brethren, as soon as they have abjured the Grecian gods; and, honoring their crucified Master, have begun to live according to his laws. They despise every thing heathen equally, and regard all but their own notions as profaneness, while they have yet embraced those notions without sufficient examination." He has no further accusation to make against them here, except the ease with which they allowed their benevolence towards their fellow-Christians to be abused by impostors, in which there may be much truth, but there is nevertheless some exaggeration. Neander's Church History.—Watson.

LUCIANISTS, or LUCANISTS; a sect so called from Lucianus, or Lucanus, a heretic of the second century, being a disciple of Marcion, whose errors he followed, adding some new ones to them. Epiphanius says he abandoned Marcion, teaching that people ought not to marry, for fear of enriching the Creator; and yet other authors mention that he held this error in common with Marcion and other Gnostics. He denied the immortality of the soul, asserting it to be material.

There was another sect of Lucianists, who appeared some time after the Arians. They taught that the Father had been a Father always, and that he had the name even before he begot the Son, as having in him the power and faculty of generation; and in this manner they accounted for the eternity of the Son.—Hend. Buck.

LUCIFER. This word signifies literally the morning star. Isaiah (14: 12, &c.) speaks of the fall of Lucifer, which most commentators are of opinion denotes the king of Babylon, who, like Satan, fell from his state of glory and elevation, and was cast headlong into hell, or hades, the state of the dead, 1 Tim. 3: 6.—Calmet.

LUCIFERIANIS; a sect who adhered to the schism of Lucifer, bishop of Cagliari, in the fourth century, who was banished by the emperor Constantius, for having defended the Nicene doctrine concerning the three persons in the Godhead. It is said, also, that they believed the soul to be corporeal, and to be transmitted from the father to the children. The Luciferians were numerous in Gaul, Spain, Egypt, &c. The occasion of this schism was, that Lucifer would not allow any acts he had done to be abolished. There were but two Luciferian bishops, but a great number of priests and deacons. The Luciferians bore a great aversion to the Arians.—Hend. Buck.

LUCIFUGÆ, or LIGHT-HATERS; a name of reproach given to the early Christians, because, in times of persecution, they frequently held their religious assemblies at night, or before the break of day.—Hend. Buck.

LUCIUS, (of Cyrene,) mentioned Acts 13: 1, was one of the prophets of the Christian church at Antioch. Some think that he was one of the seventy.

2. A disciple, mentioned Rom. 16: 21, and styled Paul's kinsman, is thought by some to be the same as Lucius the Cyrenian; but he is generally distinguished from him. We know nothing of this Lucius, unless he and Luke be the same person, which seems very credible. (See LUKE.)—Calmet.

LUUD; the fourth son of Shem, (Gen. 10: 22.) who is believed to have peopled Lydia, a province of Asia Minor. Arias Montanus places the Ludim where the Tigris and Euphrates meet, and M. le Clerc, between the rivers Charabos and Saccoras or Masca.—Calmet.

LUDIM; the son of Mizraim, (Gen. 10: 13.) and also a people frequently mentioned in Scripture, Isa. 66: 19. Jer. 46: 9. Ezek. 27: 10. 30: 5. We may admit of two countries under this name. (1.) Lydia in Asia; and (2.) Lydia, or Ludim, in Africa. Josephus affirms, that the descendants of Ludim had long been extinct, having been destroyed in the Ethiopian wars. The Jerusalem paraphrast translates Ludim, the inhabitants of the Mareotis, a part of Egypt. The truth is, that although these people were in Egypt, it is not easy to show exactly where they dwelt.—Calmet.

LUHITH; a mountain, in the opinion of Lyra, and the Hebrew commentators on Isa. 15: 5; but Eusebius thinks it to be a place between Areopolis and Joara; others suppose between Petra and Sihor. From Jer. 48: 5, it is evident that it was an elevated station, but whether a town on a hill, or a place for prospect, or simply the prospect up a hill, the road lying that way, does not appear. The order of the places named is not the same in both prophets, though both refer to the calamities of Moab, to which dominion Luhith belonged.—Calmet.

LUKE, the evangelist, is the author of the gospel bearing his name, and also of the Acts of the Apostles. Mr. Taylor has bestowed much labor on an historical biography of this evangelist, with a view to the elucidation and authentication of several of the Scripture narratives. He says, "We have traced the evangelist under the names of Lucius and Luke, from Jerusalem to Antioch, from Antioch to Troas and Philippi; again from Philippi to Jerusalem, and from Jerusalem to Malta, and to Rome. We have found him a learned, confidential, and considerate man, advanced in years, endowed with the Holy Ghost from on high, an inspired teacher, a valuable companion and counsellor of the apostle Paul; a correct, judicious, and spirited writer, a man of research, and of no less fortitude than composure. We now part with him, at the conclusion of his history, on his last remove into Achaia; where he soon after died, at the great age of eighty-four."

"Nothing so fully establishes our confidence in a writer, as a knowledge of his personal character. If he be loose, inaccurate, heedless, we hardly know how to trust him when he declares the most solemn truths in the most solemn manner. If he be studious, particular, punctual, we pay a deference even to his current discourse; and if he affirm a thing, we rest satisfied of its truth and reality. But, persons of strict accuracy seldom trust to their memory entirely on important affairs; they make memoranda, or keep some kind of journal, in which they minute transactions as they arise; so that, at after-periods, they can refer to events thus recorded, and refresh their memories by consulting their former observations. This, too, is customary, chiefly, if not wholly, among men of letters, men of liberal and enlarged education, men who are conversant with science, and who know the value of hints made on the spot, pro re nata."

"We turn now to the preface of Luke's gospel, and we find it completely in union with this strongly marked exactness and precision:—'Whereas many good people enough, and not to be blamed, have taken in hand, but did not complete their intention, to publish an orderly narration of certain events, as they have been delivered to us by those who, from the beginning of these events, were (some of them) eye-witnesses, and (others) parties concerned in them, promoters of them by personal participation; it has seemed good to me, having accurately examined all points from a much earlier period than they had done, indeed from the very first rise of the matter, to write an orderly history of these things; and thereby to accomplish that desirable purpose in which those writers have failed.' We say, this profession of correctness and order is perfectly in character with the man who tells us how many days he staid in such a place, in what point the wind was, what was the name of the ship he sailed in, on what occasion a council was held in the vessel, and what was the language and observations of the seamen, as to the bearing of the port they intended to make, &c. This man could not bear the imperfections of the books which came under his notice on a certain subject; they did not begin early enough, and they ended too soon. He therefore determined to begin his history much earlier, and to continue it much later. This he accomplished in a manner which we shall see hereafter.

"We have presumed, that Luke, at our first acquaintance with him, was of mature age, a reasoning and considerate man; and we further presume, a physician. Such was the companion of Cleopas, Luke 24: 18. But, there is another personage of greater importance than Cleopas, on whose account the character of Luke peculiarly demands notice. For if we reflect, we shall find that Mary, the mother of Jesus, was of much about the age of Luke; (say nearly fifty years, at the time of the crucifixion;) that she was no less reasoning and no less considerate than he was; and that his profession of physician admitted access to the confidence of the sex, without offence. The inference we wish to draw is, that this evangelist received from the holy mother those papers which he has preserved in the early part of his gospel; with that information which enabled him to assert his 'perfect understanding (or diligent tracing) of all things connected with this history, from the very first.' It is probable, that this confidence was the result of prolonged intercourse.

"By tracing the chronology of Luke's life in an inverted order, we obtain a stronger conviction of the truth of the facts stated, than others have allowed themselves to indulge; nevertheless, that these facts have been already admitted, may appear from the words of the equally cautious and learned Lardner. 'It is probable, that he is Lucius, mentioned Rom. 16: 21. If so, he was related to St. Paul the apostle. And it is not unlikely, that that Lucius is the same as Lucius of Cyrene, mentioned by name, (Acts 13: 1.) and in general with others, chap. 11: 20. It appears to me very probable, that St. Luke was a Jew by birth, and an early Jewish believer. This must be reckoned to be a kind of requisite qualification for writing a history of Christ, and the early preaching of his apostles, to advantage; which certainly St. Luke has performed. He may, also, have been one of the two whom our Lord met in the way to Emmaus, on the day of his resurrection, as related Luke 24: 13—35. He is expressly styled by the apostle his fellow-laborer, Philem. ver. 24. If he be the person intended Col. 4: 14, (which seems very probable,) he was or had been by profession a physician. And he was greatly valued by the apostle, who calls him beloved. He accompanied Paul when he first went into Macedonia. And we know, that he went with the apostle from Greece through Macedonia and Asia, to Jerusalem, and thence to Rome, where he stayed with him two years of his imprisonment. We do not exactly know when Luke formed the design of writing his two books; but, probably, they are the labor of several years. Nor can any hesitate to allow the truth of what is said by some of the ancients, that Luke, who for the most part was a companion of Paul, had likewise more than a slight acquaintance with the rest of the apostles.'

"We have no design of enlarging on the life of Luke; but would point out a few incidental allusions to him, in their regular order. For, notwithstanding what appears so conspicuously, his habitual correctness and diligence, we, by placing him in the number of the one hundred and twenty, on whom the Holy Ghost fell, in a visible form, insist on his unquestionable inspiration; and that in no ordinary degree. He was, in this respect, though no apostle, yet equal to the apostles: and there can be no doubt, but what the extraordinary gifts of the Holy Spirit qualified him abundantly for the discharge of every duty to which he might be called, whether as a teacher, or as a writer. (See INSPIRATION.)

"We suppose him, he being a Cyrenian, to have felt a special interest in the opposition raised by 'those of the synagogue of the Libertini, of the Cyrenians, and the Alexandrians' (all Africans) against Stephen; which ended in the death of that protomartyr, Acts 6: 9. And here, perhaps, began his acquaintance with the 'young man, whose name was Saul.' We suppose him, also, to have sympathized much with those who were scattered abroad on the persecution that followed the death of Stephen; 'some of whom were men of Cyprus and Cyrene, who went as far as Antioch,' Acts 11: 20. But, whether he quitted Jerusalem at this time, cannot be determined without reserve. If he did, he was now a sufferer through the persecution of that very man, Saul, with whom he afterwards contracted the most confidential intimacy. 'Little did either of them see the events of a few years!'

2. LUKE, (GOSPEL OF.) Lardner thinks that there are a few allusions to Luke's gospel in some of the apostolical fathers, especially in Hermas and Polycarp; and in Justin Martyr there are passages evidently taken from it; but the earliest author, who actually mentions St. Luke's gospel, is Irenæus; and he cites so many peculiarities in it, all agreeing with the gospel which we now have, that he alone is sufficient to prove its genuineness. We may however observe, that his testimony is supported by Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, Origen, Eusebius, Jerome, Chrysostom, and many others. Dr. Owen and Dr. Townson have compared many parallel passages of St. Mark's and St. Luke's gospels; and Dr. Townson has concluded that St. Luke had seen St. Mark's gospel, and Dr. Owen, that St. Mark had seen St. Luke's; but there does not appear to be a sufficient similarity of expression to justify either of these conclusions. There was among the ancients a difference of opinion concerning the priority of these two gospels; and it must be acknowledged to be a very doubtful point.

There is also some doubt about the place where this gospel was published. It seems most probable that it was published in Greece, and for the use of Gentile converts. Dr. Townson observes, that the evangelist has inserted many explanations, particularly concerning the scribes and Pharisees, which he would have omitted if he had been writing for those who were acquainted with the customs and sects of the Jews. The accounts to which he refers in his preface are now entirely lost, and the names of their authors are not known. When the four authentic gospels were published, and came into general use, all others were quickly disregarded and forgotten.

St. Luke's gospel is addressed to Theophilus; but there was a doubt, even in the time of Epiphanius, whether a particular person, or any good Christian in general, be intended by that name. Theophilus was probably a real person, that opinion being more agreeable to the simplicity of the sacred writings. We have seen that St. Luke was for several years the companion of St. Paul; and many ancient writers consider this gospel as having the sanction of St. Paul, in the same manner as St. Mark's had that of St. Peter. Whoever will examine the evangelist's and the apostle's account of the eucharist in their respective original works, will observe a great coincidence of expression, Luke 22: 1 Cor. 11.

St. Luke seems to have had more learning than any other of the evangelists, and his language is more varied, copious, and pure. This superiority in style may perhaps be owing to his longer residence in Greece, and greater acquaintance with Gentiles of good education, than fell to the lot of the writers of the other three gospels. This gospel contains many things which are not found in the other gospels; among which are the following: the birth of John the Baptist; the Roman census in Judea; the circumstances attending Christ's birth at Bethlehem; the vision granted to the shepherds; the early testimony of Simeon and Anna; Christ's conversation with the doctors in the temple when he was twelve years old; the parables of the good Samaritan, of the prodigal son, of Dives and Lazarus, of the wicked judge, and of the publican and Pharisee; the miraculous cure of the woman who had been bowed down by illness eighteen years; the cleansing of the ten lepers; and the restoring to life the son of a widow at Nain; the account of Zaccheus, and of the penitent thief; and the particulars of the journey to Emmaus. It is very satisfactory that so early a writer as Irenæus has noticed most of these peculiarities; which proves not only that St. Luke's gospel, but that the other gospels also, are the same now that they were in the second century. (See ACTS OF THE APOSTLES.)—Calmet; Watson.

LUKEWARMNESS; applied to the affections, indifference, or want of ardor. In respect to religion, hardly any thing can be more culpable than this spirit. If there be a God possessed of unspeakable rectitude in his own nature, and unbounded goodness towards his creatures, what can be more inconsistent and unbecoming than to be frigid and indifferent in our devotions to him? Atheism, in some respects, cannot be worse than lukewarmness. The atheist disbelieves the existence of a God, and, therefore, cannot worship him at all; the lukewarm owns the existence, sovereignty, and goodness of the Supreme Being, but denies him that fervor of affection, that devotedness of heart, and activity of service, which the excellency of his nature demands, and the authority of his word requires. Such a character, therefore, is represented as absolutely loathsome to God, and obnoxious to his wrath, Rev. 3: 15, 16.

The general signs of a lukewarm spirit are such as these:—Neglect of private prayer; a preference of worldly to religious company; a lax attendance on public ordinances; omission or careless perusal of God's word; a zeal for some appendages of religion, while languid about religion itself; a backwardness to promote the cause of God in the world, and a rashness of spirit in censuring those who are desirous to be useful.

If we inquire the causes of such a spirit, we shall find them to be—worldly prosperity; the influence of carnal relatives and acquaintances; indulgence of secret sins; the fear of man; and sitting under an unfaithful ministry.

The inconsistency of it appears if we consider, that it is highly unreasonable; dishonorable to God; incompatible with the genius of the gospel; a barrier to improvement; a death-blow to usefulness; a direct opposition to the commands of Scripture; and tends to the greatest misery.

To overcome such a state of mind, we should consider how offensive it is to God; how incongruous with the very idea and nature of true religion; how injurious to peace and felicity of mind; how ungrateful to Jesus Christ, whose whole life was labor for us and our salvation; how grievous to the Holy Spirit; how dreadful an example to those who have no religion; how unlike the saints of old, and even to our enemies in the worst of causes; how dangerous to our immortal souls, since it is indicative of our want of love to God, and exposes us to just condemnation, Amos 6: 1. Massillon's Sermons; Davies' Sermons; Walkers' Sermons; Fuller's Works—Hend. Buck.

LUNATICS; a name given to those diseased persons, who suffer most severely on the changes of the moon; for example, epileptical persons, or those who have the falling sickness; insane persons, or those tormented with fits of morbid melancholy; as well as persons possessed by the devil; for often those have been believed to be really possessed by the devil, who were tormented only with great degrees of melancholy or fury. Jerome (in Matt. 4: 24.) is of opinion, that the lunatics in the gospel were possessed persons, whom the people through mistake called lunatics, because they saw them most tormented during the change of the moon; the devil affecting to make them suffer most in these circumstances, that simple people might impute the cause of it to the moon, and from thence take occasion to blaspheme the Creator. Others maintain, that all the difference between an epileptic and a lunatic was, that one was more disordered than the other. Persons subject to epilepsies are not all equally attacked. Some fall more frequently, others more rarely: some every day. Lunatics are affected chiefly on the declension of the moon. Comp. Matt. 17: 15. (See DEMONIAES.)—Calmet.

LUST; the irregular love of pleasure, riches, or honors, Rom. 7: 7—25. 1 John 2: 6. As in both Testaments, evil desires, as well as evil actions, are equally proscribed, so the first care of every man who would please God should be to crucify his lusts, Gal. 5: 24.—Calmet.

LUTHER, (MARTIN,) the celebrated reformer, was born the 10th of November, 1483, at the town of Eisleben, in the electorate of Saxony. His father, John Luther, was remarkable for his industry. He was a local magistrate, a man of respectability, and good character. His mother, Margaret Lindeman, was a woman of eminent piety; and Luther was much benefited by her maternal instructions. At an early age, he was placed under the tuition of George Omlius, who instructed him in the elements of knowledge, and from whom he was early removed, to be placed in a superior school at Magdeburg. At the age of fifteen, he was sent to a distinguished seminary in Eisenach; his master's name was John Trebonius, and the school was conducted by Franciscans. Here was laid the foundation of his future eminence; and he soon composed Latin verses, which alike surprised and gratified his instructors. At the age of nineteen, he repaired to the seminary of Erfurt, where he diligently studied logic and Latin, and most probably Greek; and attained so much proficiency, that, when only twenty years of age, he took the degree of master of arts.

Luther at this time was in an unregenerate state; but in the following year, 1504, walking out one day with a friend, named Alexius, they were overtaken by a thunder-storm, and his friend was struck dead by his side. Perceiving the vanity of all terrestrial good, he then determined on ending his days in a monastery; and notwithstanding the contrary advice of his friends, and the pleasure he derived from social intercourse, in 1505 he entered the Augustinian monastery at Erfurt. On embracing the monastic profession, he was very imperfectly acquainted with the routine of the discipline. It was in 1507, (2d of May,) and in Luther's twenty-fourth year, that he entered into orders, and celebrated his first mass. This date is the more remarkable, because he discovered, about the same time, a Latin copy of the Bible, lying in the library of the monastery; he eagerly laid hold of this neglected book, and persevered in studying it with so much diligence, that he was able, in a short time, to refer with ease and promptitude to any particular passage. In the zealous prosecution of his studies, he had little opportunity of deriving assistance from the labors of others. The writings of the fathers, with the exception of those of Augustine, were wholly unknown to him. His knowledge of Greek was very imperfect, and with Hebrew he was entirely unacquainted. Besides, the only copy of the Scriptures as yet in his possession, was the Latin Vulgate. Erasmus had not then published his edition of the New Testament; and since the days of Jerome, no very eminent example had been given of the application of sound criticism to the sacred canon. Deprived thus of information, from the researches of others, Luther would often spend a whole day in meditating on a few particular passages. To this he was prompted equally by a thirst for information, and the disquieted state of his mind. Before his acquaintance with the Bible, he had, like other persons, been satisfied with the current doctrines, and had never thought of examining a subject in which he suspected no error. Now, however, he was sufficiently advanced to perceive that his early creed must be abandoned, without having gone far enough to find another in its place. His former melancholy returned, and continued to do so at intervals, until his views of divine truth acquired clearness and consistency. During this state of uncertainty, when reflecting on the wrath of God, and on the extraordinary examples of punishment recorded in Scripture, he was sometimes struck with such terror as almost to faint away. He has been so much agitated by eagerness of temper, when engaged in a dispute on doctrine, as to find it necessary to throw himself on a bed in an adjoining chamber, where he would fall down in prayer, and frequently repeat these words: "He hath concluded all in unbelief, that he might have mercy upon all." In those agitations of mind, Luther's resort was to the works of Augustine, who was, in his eyes, an oracle of equal price, as Jerome in those of Erasmus. Luther, absorbed in study, and averse to consume time in the uniostructive routine of Romish ceremonies, became unmiſodful of the forms of the monastery; he would read and write with such ardor, for days together, as to overlook the hours prescribed for divine service by the canons; he was, on the other hand, rigid in the observance of the penance enjoined to his profession.

At a diet held at Worms, in 1495, it had been agreed among the electors, that each should become the founder of a university. Luther's sovereign, Frederick, elector of Saxony, surnamed the Sage, was fully alive to the advantages of erecting such an establishment in his territory. In 1508, Luther was appointed to an academical chair in the university of Wittenberg, at the early age of twenty-five. He now felt the necessity of acquiring a knowledge of Hebrew. Luther was, in many respects, not only a sincere but a zealous Catholic. In addition to the duty of teaching his class and preaching, Luther occasionally heard confessions. In the exercise of this function, in the year 1517, some persons came to him to confess, and though guilty of serious crimes, refused to undergo the penance prescribed by him, because they had already received remission in the shape of an indulgence. Luther, revolting at this evasion, flatly refused them the absolution for which they applied. As he persisted in this negative determination, the persons in question, considering themselves aggrieved, entered a serious complaint against him with Tetzel, who was at that time in the neighborhood of the town of Interbock. In an evil hour for the papacy, Tetzel became violently incensed against Luther; and being one of the holy commission charged with the extirpation of heresy, he threatened to subject Luther, and those who might adhere to him, to the horrors of the inquisition. The manner in which Luther proceeded, affords a convincing proof that he acted with no deliberate hostility to the church. Conformably to the custom of the age, in the case of doubtful points, he came to the determination of stating his ideas in a series of propositions, with a view to a public disputation. Accordingly, on the 31st of October, 1517, he published ninety-five, discussing copiously the doctrines of penitence, charity, indulgences, purgatory, &c. Having affixed the propositions to the church adjacent to the castle of Wittenberg, an invitation to a public disputation on them was subjoined, accompanied with a request, that those who were necessarily absent, would transmit him their observations in writing. A long and tedious contest ensued between Tetzel and Luther; they wrote much and violently; and, resolute as was his character, a considerable time elapsed before he came to an open rupture with the court of Rome. Towards the end of the year 1519, Luther began to express, without reserve, his dissent from the church of Rome, on the subject of the sacrament.

In the year 1521, Luther published his celebrated essay, "De Captivitate Babylonica Ecclesie." He here examined into the nature and use of the sacraments, which, as is well known, are, according to the Romanists, seven in number. From this enumeration Luther dissented; and denied the name of sacrament to confirmation, holy orders, marriage, or extreme unction. But he continued to include penance in the list, as well as baptism and the Lord's supper. The universities of Cologne and Louvain having openly burned Luther's books, and a similar example having been given at Rome, the reformer now determined to retaliate. He caused public notice to be given at Wittenberg, that he purposed burning the antichristian decretals, on Monday, the 10th of December. So novel a scene excited great interest, and the concourse, accordingly, was immense. The people assembled at nine o'clock in the morning, and proceeded, in regular divisions, to the spot in the neighborhood where the ceremony was to be performed. Having there partaken of a slight repast, an eminent member of the university erected a kind of funeral pile, and set it on fire; after which Luther took Gratian's Abridgment of the Canon Law, the Letters commonly called Decretals of the Pontiffs, the Clementines and Extravagants, and, last of all, the Bull of Leo X. A. these he threw into the fire, and exclaimed with a loud voice, "Because ye have troubled the saints of the Lord, therefore let eternal fire trouble you." Having remained to witness their consumption, he returned into the city, accompanied by the same multitude, without the occurrence of the slightest disorder. Luther, according to his usual practice, replied with great spirit to the condemning sentence of the universities of Cologne and Louvain. The adherents of the court of Rome were much disappointed at the inefficient operation of the bull against Luther; and the conduct of that court, in this business, has been subjected to those charges of impolicy which are generally applied to unsuccessful counsels. It has been said by many persons, that the bull was too long delayed; by others, that its language was too violent and arbitrary. The term granted to Luther having expired, a new bull made its appearance on the 3d of January, 1521, confirming the preceding in all its extent, with the serious addition of Luther's excommunication. But this edict made very little impression, and its reception tended only to show the diminished efficacy of papal fulminations against the progress of opinion.

The time had now arrived for holding Charles' first diet. The city of Nuremberg being infested with the plague, the place of meeting was fixed at Worms. The diet assembled in January, and the agents of the court of Rome were indefatigable in their efforts to get a summons for Luther speedily issued. Frederick, apprized of all their machinations, gave Luther information, through the medium of Spalatin, of what was likely to happen, and caused him to be asked what course he would pursue in the event of his being summoned by the emperor to appear before the diet?—a step which, in consequence of the urgency of the pope's agents, he thought very probable. Luther's answer was conveyed in a very spirited and well-written letter to Spalatin, in which he says, "If there were as many devils in Worms as there are tiles on the roofs of the houses, I would go on." When drawing towards the close of his journey, Luther received an invitation from Glasio, the emperor's confessor, to meet him at the residence of one of Luther's friends, at some distance from the road. But Luther, whether suspicious of Glasio, or, as is more likely, afraid of exceeding the limited term of twenty-one days, replied, "that he was determined to go whither he had been ordered by the emperor." Accordingly, he reached Worms on the 16th of April, attired in his friar's cowl, seated in an open chariot, preceded by the emperor's herald on horseback, in his official dress. Next day, the 17th of April, notice was sent from the emperor to Luther, that his presence was required at the diet in the afternoon. Even the roofs are said to have been covered with spectators. An intimation having been privately given to Luther not to speak, except in reply, the proceedings commenced on the part of one John Eckius, official, as it is termed, of the archbishop of Treves, and equally hostile to Luther as his namesake, the disputant. This orator, in an audible voice, first in Latin, and next in German, proposed two questions:—"Whether Luther avowed himself the author of the books bearing his name?" to a collection of which he then pointed; and "Whether he was disposed to retract, or persist in their contents?" Luther instantly acknowledged himself the author of these works; but, in regard to the second question, he asked, no doubt by the suggestion of his counsel, that "time might be given him to consider his answer." On entering the diet next day, Eckius recapitulated, with great form, the proceedings of the day before, and asked Luther once more whether he retracted or persisted? Luther delivered an answer at great length, first in German, and afterwards in Latin. Notwithstanding the awe of the assembly, and the excessive heat from the great numbers present, he spoke in a tone of clearness and confidence for two hours, and ended in these noble words: "Let me then be refuted and convinced by the testimony of the Scriptures, or by the clearest arguments; otherwise I cannot and will not recant; for it is neither safe nor expedient to act against conscience. Here I take my stand. I can do no otherwise, so help me God! Amen."

Eckius, who had discovered symptoms of impatience during the delivery of the defence, declared, as soon as it was ended, that Luther had not answered to the point, and ought not to express doubts about things that had been already defined and condemned by so many councils. Luther replied. The emperor being, in a great measure, unacquainted with the mode of conducting the affairs of Germany, and impatient at the continuance of the controversy, allowed himself to be persuaded that the fittest course would be to excommunicate Luther at once. This took place, accordingly, next day, the 19th of April; but, being done without the assent of the princes, the efficacy of the decree was very different from what would have attended a concurrent resolution of the diet. Many persons of distinction continued to visit Luther, and the multitude gave evident signs of their interest in his cause. The subsequent proceedings of the diet were such as to show the expediency of this step, extraordinary as it was. After some delay, incurred, probably, for the purpose of taking advantage of the departure of Luther's principal friends from the diet, an imperial edict was issued, which declared him a schismatic and heretic, and put him under the ban of the empire. This edict was not published until the 26th of May, although dated, for the sake of appearing the act of the diet at large, so far back as the 8th of May.

Luther was now confined in the castle of Wittemberg; but though secluded from intercourse with the world, he was incapable of passing his time in inactivity or indifference. The first essay which Luther found means to publish from his retreat, was a short treatise in German, "On the Abuse of Auricular Confession." His next publication was a short practical work, consisting of "Notes on the Evangelists," the merit of which was acknowledged, even by his adversaries. He carried on, likewise, a controversy with James Latomus, a divine of Louvain, already known to the public by his disputes with Renclin and Erasmus, and who had undertaken the defence of the decision given by his university in Luther's cause. In 1521, he also composed his celebrated work on "Monastic Vows."

Luther was now to encounter an adversary of a new kind. Henry VIII. of England, having, in the early part of life, paid some attention to the study of scholastic theology, was flattered by his courtiers into the belief of being able to obtain an easy triumph over the arguments of Luther. Henry's book, considering the badness of his cause, and the wretched system of learning then in vogue, is not destitute of merit. But Luther was not to be discouraged, either by high-sounding encomiums, or by the rank of his assailant. He made a prompt reply, and had no scruple in describing the king by the most uncourteous epithets. Luther having, after a short absence, returned from the castle of Wittemberg, began, in 1522, to devote himself to a labor of great importance,—the translation of the Scriptures into German. The magnitude of the design was in correspondence with his ardent and enterprising cast of mind; and the seclusion of his present residence was favorable to the commencement of its execution. The church of Rome was well aware of the danger to her superstitious legends and extravagant assumptions, from a good translation of the Bible. Her defenders have, therefore, directed many attacks against Luther's labor, and have presumed to accuse it of frequently vitiating the sense of the original. Meanwhile the civil authorities in Germany continued their efforts to crush the Lutheran doctrine.

In the same year Luther returned to Wittemberg, which gave occasion to lively demonstrations of joy; the learned and unlearned partaking equally in the general exultation. It was about this time that Luther had occasion to write to the Bohemians. They were beginning, he heard, to waver in their favorable disposition towards the new creed, in consequence of the divisions arising among its followers. He argued strongly, that to return to the church of Rome was not the way to escape the evils of discussions, since no communion was more distracted by multiplicity of schisms. Indefatigable in his labors against the papacy, he soon after published a work, entitled, "Adversus falso nominatum ordinem Episcoporum." The next of his numerous publications was a small treatise, entitled, "De Doctrinis Hominum Vitandis." This may be considered an abridgment of his former book on "Monastic Vows."

It is now time to direct our attention to the proceedings of the court of Rome. The virtuous but inexperienced Adrian had paid the debt of nature on the 14th of September, 1523. His death gave occasion, as usual, to strong contentions of interest in the conclave. At last, Julius of Medicis was elected in the end of November, and assumed the name of Clement VII. The chief difficulty which he apprehended, in regard to the Reformation, arose from the extraordinary admissions made by his predecessor. He deemed it expedient, therefore, to negotiate as if Adrian had taken no active part in these unpleasant proceedings. Blind, like most bad governments, to the real cause of public discontent, Clement and his advisers looked in particular circumstances and events, for that which they should have sought in the general diffusion of information. On the 7th of December, therefore, Clement addressed a letter to the elector Frederick, alluding, in general terms, to the disturbances existing in Germany, and expressing a confident belief that the elector would advocate the cause of the church. This letter, in imitation of the example of his predecessors, was intended to pave the way for the further progress of Campeggio's negotiation. Accordingly, on the 15th of January, 1524, that legate being about to repair to the diet assembled at Nuremberg, the pope wrote another letter to Frederick, still expressed in general terms, but in a style of studied complaisance, and intimating a wish that the elector would consult with the legate, in regard to the best means of restoring peace and tranquillity to the empire. Aply as this letter was penned, it does not appear to have extracted any answer from the wary Frederick. The publication of "The Recess of the Diet" took place on the 18th of April. It was divided into two general heads; the first regarding Luther and his doctrine, the second treating of the dangers which threatened Germany.

Luther having speedily obtained a copy of the "Recess" published by the diet, was strongly agitated by the conduct of the princes of Germany. With that disregard of consequences which so frequently marked his conduct, he instantly republished the Edict of Worms, of May 8th, 1521, and contrasting it with that of Nuremberg, had no hesitation to call the princes "miserable, infatuated men, set over the people by God in his anger." His views in other respects began to expand, and he ventured, on the 9th of October, 1524, to lay aside his monastic habit, and to assume the dress of a professor or preacher. A part of this year was passed by Luther in a manner much more profitable than controversy. He translated the Psalms into German verse, for the use of the common people; and added sacred hymns of his own composition. Luther now determined to settle himself in marriage. This step, remarkable in itself, on the part of one who had sworn celibacy, was rendered still more so by the existence of a similar obligation on the part of her whom he espoused. (See BORE, CATHERINE VON.) The advocates of the church of Rome poured out the most vehement declamations against Luther, on the occasion of his marriage with a nun. Some affirmed that he was mad, or possessed with an evil spirit. The elector, John, now consented to take steps to make the Lutheran the predominant religion in his dominions. Though the majority of his subjects were favorably inclined to it, the change was too great to be effected otherwise than by degrees.

Towards the end of 1525, an attempt, it was said, was intended to be made to cut off Luther by poison. In consequence of the suspicion of some of Luther's friends, a Jew and several other persons were arrested at Wittemberg; but, on their examination, nothing could be discovered, and Luther interceded that they might not be put to the torture. They were accordingly set at liberty. Hitherto Luther had been not only the origin, but the main spring, of the opposition to the papacy; but the range which it now embraced, was too wide to be directed by the exertions of an individual. The further progress of this opposition belongs, therefore, to general history, and would be wholly misplaced in a biographical relation. In directing the translation of the Bible, Luther now devoted much time. He had divided this stupendous labor into three parts,—the books of Moses; the subsequent history of the Jews; and, lastly, the prophetic and other books of the Old Testament. The version of the prophets did not begin to appear till 1527; and, in completing this part of his task, Luther received benefit from the assistance of some Jews of the city of Worms. The book of Isaiah was printed in 1528. Daniel followed soon after; and, in 1530, the whole was completed. His chief coadjutors in this noble undertaking were Bugenhagen, better known by the name of Pomeranus, Justus Jonas, Melancthon, and Matthew, surnamed Aurogallus.

The year 1526 was the first, since 1517, that Luther allowed to pass without publishing a book against the Romanists. In the course of the year, however, he published his "Commentaries on Jonah and Habakkuk," along with some lesser pieces of Scripture criticism. The imperial diet, at midsummer, was held at the city of Spire, and the pressure of business was such as to require the attendance of the elector John, during several months. Luther continued occupied in plans for the progress of the Reformation, which were to be submitted to the elector, as soon as more urgent business permitted him to give them his attention. Next year, 1528, Luther published his "Commentary on Genesis and Zechariah," as well as a Letter to the bishop of Misnia, respecting the Eucharist. Luther, while residing at Cobourg, suffered several attacks of ill health, but nothing could relax his application to his studies. He employed his time in the translation of the books of the prophets, and in composing his "Commentary on the Psalms." From the fatigue of these graver employments, he sought relaxation in composing an Admonition to the Clergy assembled at Augsburg, which he thought proper to send to that city to be printed. It was entitled, "Admonitio ad Ecclesiasticis ordinis Congregationes in Comitibus Augustanis." During the following year, 1532, Luther published commentaries on different portions of Scripture. It was now that he was destined to lose a valuable friend and protector, in the person of John, elector of Saxony, who expired of apoplexy, on the 16th of August, being cut off, like his brother Frederick, in his sixty-third year.

The year 1536 was remarkable for the death of the great Erasmus. It is much to be lamented, that his dispute with Luther was revived two years before, with a great share of mutual asperity; Luther having gone so far as to bring the charge of atheism against his antagonist. Improperly as Erasmus acted in his latter years, he deserves to be regarded as one of the principal founders of the Reformation. (See ERASMUS.) Luther's last controversy with Erasmus was followed by one with very different opponents, the Anabaptists. (See ANABAPTISTS.) In the beginning of 1537, Luther was afflicted with a stragury, and the symptoms were so severe, that both he and his friends began to despair of his life. During this alarming illness, much anxiety was manifested for his recovery, as well by his friends as by the public characters who favored the Reformation. His recovery appears to have been complete, and he was able to resume his labors in the cause of religion. He prepared for the press two editions of his great work, the translation of the Bible, and published them successively in 1541 and 1545.

It was in 1545, in Luther's sixty-second year, that his constitution began to exhibit strong symptoms of decline. But bodily infirmity was not the only misfortune of Luther. That constitutional ardor which enabled him to brave the threats of ecclesiastical and temporal rulers, was connected with a temper productive, in several respects, of much uneasy sensation to its possessor. It happened, also, very unfortunately, that the evening of Luther's day was clouded by an altercation with the lawyers on the subject of clandestine marriages. So strong was the effect of this accumulation of chagrin, that Luther lost his attachment to his favorite city, Wittemberg, and left it in the month of July, 1545. His companions were his three sons, John, Martin, and Paul, and his steady friend, Justus Jonas. His health now, however, rapidly declined; and, on the 18th of February, he expired at Eisleben. His last words were, "O my heavenly Father, eternal and merciful God, thou hast revealed to me thy Son, our Lord Jesus Christ! I have preached him, I have confessed him, I love him, and I worship him as my dearest Savior and Redeemer; him whom the wicked persecute, accuse, and blaspheme." He then repeated three times the words of the psalm, "Into thy hands I commit my spirit; God of truth, thou hast redeemed me."

Luther was no ordinary man. In all his proceedings, various as they were, in his preachings, his treatises, and disputations, we discern no step taken for the gratification of personal advantage; all is disinterested and zealous; all is prompted by an anxiety to understand and promulgate the word of God.

In considering Luther as an author, we are struck with the extent and variety of his labors. They consist of controversial tracts, of commentaries on Scripture, of sermons, of letters, and of narratives of the chief events of his life. The leading feature of his controversial writings is an unvaried confidence of the goodness of his arguments. His compositions of all kinds, including sermons and epistolary disquisitions, are calculated, by his distinguished biographer, Seckendorff, at the extraordinary number of eleven hundred and thirty-seven. Where the mass of writing was so large, we must expect little polish of style. Luther's imagination was vigorous, but the cultivation of taste engaged no part of his attention. His inelegance of style has been chiefly remarked in his Latin publications. His theological system he professed to found altogether on the authority of Scripture.

Warm as he was in temper, and unaccustomed to yield to authoritative demands, he yet possessed much of the milk of human kindness. His frankness of disposition was apparent at the first interview, and his communicative turn, joined to the richness of his stores, rendered his conversation remarkably interesting. The visitor of Luther's domestic circle was assured of witnessing a pleasing union of religious service with conjugal and paternal affection. The diffusion of religious knowledge being always foremost in Luther's mind, he was fond, when along with his friends, of turning the conversation in that direction. Nor was there any objection on the part of his associates.

As a preacher, he was justly celebrated. He mounted the pulpit full of his subject, and eager to diffuse a portion of his stores among his audience. The hearer's attention was aroused by the boldness and novelty of the ideas; it was kept up by the ardor with which he saw the preacher inspired. In the discourse, there was nothing of the stiffness of labored composition; in the speaker, no affectation in voice or gesture. Luther's sole object was to bring the truth fully and forcibly before his congregation. His delivery was aided by a clear elocution, and his diction had all the copiousness of a fervent imagination. Few men have conferred on posterity so many benefits as this learned, pious, and zealous reformer. Jones' Chris. Biog.; Bowers' Life of Luther; Ency. Amer.; Mosheim; Robertson's Charles V.—Hend. Buck.

LUTHERANISM; the system of Protestantism adopted by the followers of Luther. It has undergone some alterations since the time of its founder.

Luther reduced the number of sacraments to two, viz. baptism and the eucharist; but he believed the impanation or consubstantiation; that is, that the matter of the bread and wine remain with the body and blood of Christ; and it is in this article that the main difference between the Lutheran and the English churches consists.

Luther maintained the mass to be no sacrifice; exploded the adoration of the host, auricular confession, meritorious works, indulgences, purgatory, the worship of images, &c., which had been introduced in the corrupt times of the Romish church. He also opposed the doctrine of free will, maintained predestination, and asserted our justification to be solely by the imputation of the merits and satisfaction of Christ. He also opposed the fastings of the Romish church, monastical vows, the celibacy of the clergy, &c.

The Lutherans, however, of all Protestants, are said to differ least from the Romish church; as they affirm that the body and blood of Christ are materially present in the sacrament of the Lord's supper, though in an incomprehensible manner; and likewise represent some religious rites and institutions, as the use of images in churches, the distinguishing vestments of the clergy, the private confession of sins, the use of wafers in the administration of the Lord's supper, the form of exorcism in the celebration of baptism, and other ceremonies of the like nature, as tolerable, and some of them as useful. The Lutherans maintain, with regard to the divine decrees, that they respect the salvation or misery of men, in consequence of a previous knowledge of their sentiments and characters, and not as free and unconditional, or as founded on the gratuitous mercy and sovereign will of God.

Towards the close of the seventeenth century, the Lutherans began to entertain a greater laxity of sentiment than they had before adopted. Their public teachers now use an unbounded liberty of dissenting from the decisions of those symbols or creeds which were once deemed almost infallible rules of faith and practice, and of declaring their dissent in the manner they judge the most expedient. Mosheim attributes this change in their sentiments to the maxim which they generally adopted, that Christians were accountable to God alone for their religious opinions; and that no individual could be justly punished by the magistrate for his erroneous opinions, while he conducted himself like a virtuous and obedient subject, and made no attempts to disturb the peace and order of civil society. This just maxim has however been made a cover for the vilest hypocrisy of scepticism. On the present state of the Lutheran church in Germany, see Spirit of the Pilgrims, 1828—1833; Robinson's Bibl. Repos. for 1831; N. Y. Bap. Reg. 1834. See also the article NEOLOGY; and PROTESTANT EVANGELICAL CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

In Sweden, the Lutheran church is episcopal; in Norway the same. In Denmark, the episcopal authority is retained, and the name of bishop re-adopted instead of that of superintendent, which still obtains in most parts of Germany; though the superior power is vested in a consistory, over which there is a president, with a distinction of rank and privileges, and a subordination of inferior clergy to their superiors, different from the parity of Presbyterianism. Mosheim's Eccles. History; Life of Luther; Hanveit's Ch. Hist., vol. ii. p. 454; Enc. Brit.; Robertson's History of Charles V. vol. ii. p. 42; Luther on Galatians.—Hend. Buck.

LUXURY; a disposition of mind addicted to pleasure, riot, and superfluities. Luxury implies a giving one's self up to pleasure; voluptuousness, an indulgence in the same to excess. Luxury may be further considered as consisting in, 1. Vain and useless expenses. 2. In a parade beyond what people can afford. 3. In affecting to be above our own rank. 4. In living in a splendor that does not agree with the public good. In order to avoid it, we should consider that it is ridiculous, troublesome, sinful, and ruinous. Robinson's Claude, vol. i. p. 382; Ferguson on Society, part vi. sect. 2.—Hend. Buck.

LUZ. (See BETHEL.)

LYCAONIA; a province of Asia Minor, and forming part of Cappadocia, having Galatia north, Pisidia south, Cappadocia east, and Phrygia west. In it were the cities of Iconium, Derbe, and Lystra, Acts 14: 6, &c. The "speech of Lycaonia" is generally believed to have been a corrupt Greek; that is, Greek mingled with a great deal of Syriac.—Calmet.

LYCIA; a province of Asia Minor, having Phrygia on the north, the Mediterranean on the south, Pamphylia on the east, and Caria on the west, 1 Mac. 15: 23. Acts 27: 5. Paul landed at the port of Myra in this province, when going to Rome, A. D. 60.—Calmet.

LYDDA, in Hebrew, Lud, or Lod, by the Greeks and Latins called Lydda, or Diopolis, is a city in the way from Jerusalem to Caesarea Philippi. It lay east of Joppa four or five leagues; and belonged to Ephraim. It seems to have been inhabited by the Benjamites, after the Babylonish captivity, (Neh. 11: 35.) and was one of the three toparchies which were dismembered from Samaria, and given to the Jews, 1 Mac. 11: 34. Peter coming to Lydda, cured Æneas, who was sick of the palsy, Acts 9: 33, 34.

Lydda was denominated by the Greeks Diopolis, [the city,] or temple of Jupiter, probably because a temple had been dedicated in its vicinity to that deity. Since the crusades it has received from the Christians the name of St. George, on account of its having been the scene of the martyrdom and burial of that saint. In this city tradition reports that the emperor Justinian erected a church." It is now a ruined village.—Calmet.

LYDIA; a woman of Thyatira, a seller of purple, who dwelt in the city of Philippi, in Macedonia, Acts 16: 14, 40. Her household was the first in Europe converted by Paul's preaching. This woman was not by birth a Jewess, but a proselyte. Whether she was married, and had children, is unknown.—Calmet.

LYDIA; a Roman province, once a celebrated kingdom of Asia Minor, peopled by the sons of Lud, son of Shem, Gen. 10: 23. We have very little notice of these Lydians in Scripture. They are mentioned in Isa. 66: 19, if these be not rather the Lydians in Egypt.—Calmet.

LYING; speaking falsehoods wilfully, with an intent to deceive. Thus, by Grove, "A lie is an affirmation or denial by words, or any other signs to which a certain determinate meaning is affixed, of something contrary to our real thoughts and intentions." Thus, by Paley, "A lie is a breach of promise; for whoever seriously addresses his discourse to another, tacitly promises to speak the truth, because he knows that the truth is expected." There are various kinds of lies. 1. The pernicious lie, uttered for the hurt or disadvantage of our neighbor. 2. The officious lie, uttered for our own or our neighbor's advantage. 3. The ludicrous and jocosely lie, uttered by way of jest, and only for mirth's sake in common converse. 4. Pious frauds, as they are improperly called, pretended inspirations, forged books, counterfeit miracles, are species of lies. 5. Lies of the conduct, for a lie may be told in gestures as well as in words; as when a tradesman shuts up his windows to induce his creditors to believe that he is abroad. 6. Lies of omission, as when an author wilfully omits what ought to be related; and may we not add, 7. That all equivocation and mental reservation come under the guilt of lying?

The evil and injustice of lying appear, 1. From its being a breach of the natural and universal right of mankind to truth in the intercourse of speech. 2. From its being a violation of God's sacred law, Phil. 4: 8. Lev. 19: 11. Col. 3: 9. 3. The faculty of speech was bestowed as an instrument of knowledge, not of deceit; to communicate our thoughts, not to hide them. 4. It is esteemed a reproach of so heinous and hateful a nature for a man to be called a liar, that sometimes the life and blood of the slanderer have paid for it. 5. It has a tendency to dissolve all society, and to indispose the mind to religious impressions. 6. The punishment of it is tremendous: the loss of credit, the hatred of those whom we have deceived, and an eternal separation from God in the world to come, Rev. 21: 8. 22: 15. Psalm 101: 7. LYSANIAS, or LYSIAS, tetrarch of Abilene, a small province in Lebanon, (Luke 3: 1.) was probably son or grandson of another Lysanias known in history, (Dio. lib. xlix. p. 44.) and put to death by Mark Antony, who gave part of his kingdom to Cleopatra. (See ABILA.)—Calmet.

LYSIAS; a friend and relation of king Antiochus Epiphanes, to whom he left the regency of Syria when he passed beyond the Euphrates. (See ANTIOCHUS EPIPHANES.)—Calmet.

LYSIMACHUS; brother of Menelaus, high-priest of the Jews, who, in an attempt to pillage the treasury of the temple, was killed, 2 Mac. 4: 39, 40. He is sometimes reckoned among the high-priests, because he was vicegerent to his brother Menelaus; but he never himself possessed that dignity.—Calmet.

LYSTRA; a city of Lycaonia, of which Timothy was a native, and where Paul and Barnabas, in the space of a few hours, were first deified, and then stoned by the people. What a lesson on the instability of popular favor! Acts 14. (See LYCAONIA.)—Calmet.

M.

MAACAH, MAACHAH, MAACHATI, or BETH-MAACHA; a little province of Syria, east and north of the sources of Jordan, toward Damascus. It was called Abel-beth-maacha, because Abel was situated in it. (See ABEL, the plain.)—Calmet.

MAACHAH; daughter of Abishalom, wife of Rehoboam, king of Judah, and mother of Abijam his successor, 1 Kings 15: 2. In 2 Chron. 13: 2, she is called Micaiah, daughter of Uriel of Gibeah. (See KING'S MOTHER.)—2. The daughter of Abishalom, wife of Abijam, king of Judah, and mother of Asa his successor, 1 Kings 15: 10, 13, 14. Asa deprived her of the office of priestess of the groves. There are several other persons of this name, mentioned in the Old Testament.—Calmet.

MAALEH-ACRABBIM; a mountain, so called from the multitude of scorpions that infested it, at the southern end of the Salt sea, Num. 34: 4. Josh. 15: 3.—Calmet.

MACARIANS; the followers of Macarius, an Egyptian monk, who was distinguished, towards the close of the fourth century, for his sanctity and virtue. In his writings there are some superstitious tenets, and also certain opinions that seem tainted with Origenism. The name has been also applied to those who adopted the sentiments of Macarius, a native of Ireland, who, about the close of the ninth century, propagated in France the tenet afterwards maintained by Averroës, that one individual intelligence or soul performed the spiritual and rational functions in all the human race.—Hend. Buck.

MACCABEES; two apocryphal books of the Old Testament, which contain the history of Judas, surnamed Maccabæus, and his brothers, and the wars which they maintained against the kings of Syria, in defence of the Jewish religion, and the independence of their country. The author and age of these books are uncertain. The first is a valuable historical document, supplying important information respecting the Jewish affairs at the time to which it refers. The second contains a considerable quantity of spurious matter, and requires to be read with caution. (See ΑΠΟΚΡΥΦΑ; JERUSALEM, and JEWS.)

There are a third and fourth book of Maccabees, but they are of no authority whatever. They are found in some manuscripts and editions of the LXX., but have never been admitted even into the Vulgate.—Hend. Buck.

MACEDONIA; a kingdom of Greece, having Thrace to the north, Thessaly south, Epirus west, and the Ægean sea east. Alexander the Great, son of Philip, king of Macedonia, having conquered Asia, and subverted the Persian empire, the name of the Macedonians became very famous throughout the East; and it is often given to the Greeks, the successors of Alexander in the monarchy. In like manner, the name of Greeks is often put for Macedonians, 2 Maccabees 4: 36. When the Roman empire was divided, Macedonia fell to the share of the emperor of the East. After it had long continued subject to the Romans, it fell under the power of the Ottoman Turks, who are the present masters of it.

St. Paul was invited by an angel of the Lord, who appeared to him at Troas, to come and preach the gospel in Macedonia, Acts 16: 9. After this vision, the apostle no longer doubted his divine call to preach the gospel in Macedonia; and the success that attended his ministry confirmed him in his persuasion. Here he laid the foundation of the churches of Philippi and Thessalonica.—Calmet; Watson.

MACEDONIANS; the followers of Macedonius, bishop of Constantinople, who, through the influence of the Eunomians, was deposed by the council of Constantinople, in 360, and sent into exile. He considered the Holy Ghost as a divine energy diffused throughout the universe, and not as a person distinct from the Father and the Son. The sect of the Macedonians was crushed before it had arrived at its full maturity, by the council assembled by Theodosius, in 381, at Constantinople. (See SEMI-ARIANS.)—Hend. Buck.

MACHIAVELLIANISM; the doctrine or principles of Machiavel, as laid down in his treatise entitled "The Prince," and which consists in doing any thing to compass a design, without any regard to the peace or welfare of subjects, the dictates of honesty and honor, or the precepts of religion. This work has been translated into many languages, and written against by many authors, though the world is not agreed as to the motives of the writer; some thinking he meant to recommend tyrannical maxims; others, that he only delineated them to excite abhorrence.—Hend. Buck.

MACKINTOSH, (Sir JAMES, LL. D.) This distinguished man, who united in no ordinary degree the rarest qualities of the philosopher, the jurist, the orator, the historian, and the man of letters, was born at Alldowrie, in the county of Inverness, Scotland, October 24, 1765. His early instruction and training fell into the hands of his grandmother, a woman of great excellence. In 1783, he entered King's college, Aberdeen, where his acquaintance with the celebrated Robert Hall commenced, and gave a tone to his mind which it ever after in some degree retained. At Edinburgh he studied medicine, but on going to London to practise, he soon embarked on the more congenial current of politics. In 1791, the powerful talent displayed in his Vindicia Gallica, brought him into the notice of Sheridan, Fox, and even of Burke. He now studied law thoroughly, and his Lectures on the Law of Nature and of Nations, in 1798, and his defence of Peltier in 1803, won him the highest reputation. He received the honor of knighthood and was appointed Recorder of Bombay, where he for several years discharged his official duties with distinguished zeal, ability, and philanthropy. In 1811, his health failing, he returned to England, with a pension from the East India company of twelve hundred pounds a year. In 1813, he entered the house of commons as representative of the county of Nairn, and in 1818, for Knareborough. The part he took on the question of natural rights, won him the name of the Friend of America. On all questions of foreign policy, and international law, on the alien bill, the liberty of the press, religious tolerations, slavery, the settlement of Greece, parliamentary reform, and especially the reform of the criminal law, Sir James took a prominent part, and was always found on the side of freedom, justice, and humanity. The rich gifts of profound and original thought, the delightful combination of philosophy and taste, were exhibited by Mackintosh in higher perfection than by any parliamentary orator since the time of Burke. In 1822, he was elected lord rector of the university of Glasgow, and in 1830, commissioner for the affairs of India. He died May 30, 1832, greatly lamented.

Sir James Mackintosh was a Christian; always in conviction, but in his last days vitally. His principal works, besides those mentioned above, are Life of Sir Thomas More, Progress of Ethical Philosophy, and History of England.—Museum, 1833; Life of Robert Hall.

MACKNIGHT, (JAMES, D. D.) an eminent Scotch divine and critic, was born in 1721, at Irvine, in Argyleshire; studied at Glasgow and Leyden; was first settled at Maybole and Jedburgh, and was, for thirty years, one of the ministers of Edinburgh. He died in 1800. He published a Harmony of the Four Gospels; The Truth of the Gospel History; and a much admired Translation, with Commentaries and Notes, of all the Apostolic Epistles. This last was the great labor of his life.—Davenport.

MACLAURIN, (JOHN,) one of the brightest ornaments of the Christian name, was born in October, 1693, at Glenderule, in Argyleshire, of which parish his father was minister. He had two brothers, one of whom, Daniel, died young; and the other, Colin, is well known as one of the ablest mathematicians of the age. Losing their parents at an early period, they were taken under the care of an uncle, Mr. Daniel Maclaurin, minister of Kilsinnan, who sent them to the university of Glasgow, where they pursued their studies with great effect; after which, John was sent to finish his education at Leyden, under professor Wesselius. In 1717, he was licensed to preach, by the presbytery of Dumbarton; and in 1719, ordained minister of Luss, a country parish situated on the banks of Loch Lomond, about twenty miles north-west of Glasgow.

He was not allowed, however, to continue long in so obscure a station. His uncommon talents attracted the attention of all who had access to know him; and, in 1723, he accepted an invitation from the city of Glasgow, to become the minister of the north-west parish, a station which afforded an ample field for his talents and usefulness, and in which he continued to labor with great acceptance, till removed by death, on the 5th of September, 1754.

Mr. MacLaurin was a correspondent of president Edwards, and with him it appears originated the proposal of a union of Christians in extraordinary prayer, which Edwards so ably recommended, and which was the germ of the present Monthly Concert. His mind was of the very highest order, and imbued with a piety pure and profound as that of a seraph, and as active and unwearied in planning and doing good. The fruits of his pen that remain, though small in quantity, are of sterling value, and prove him to have been a profound thinker, an accurate and cogent reasoner, deeply versed in the mysteries of redemption, and zealous for the glory of his divine Master. His works consist of "Essays and Sermons," in one volume duodecimo, which has often been published; and an octavo volume on the "Prophecies concerning the Messiah," of which the late Dr. Hurd has been thought to avail himself in his excellent "Introductory Sermons at Lincoln's Inn."

It has been remarked, by a late writer and competent judge, that Mr. MacLaurin's "Essay on Prejudices against the Gospel," and the sermons on "The Sins of men not Chargeable on God," and "On Glorifying in the Cross of Christ," are compositions, the two first for profundity and acuteness, and the last for impressive eloquence, to which, in the whole range of theological literature, we shall not easily find any thing superior. See Mr. Brown's Introductory Essay, prefixed to a new edition of his works, 1824.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

MAD, MADNESS. Insanity, or deprivation of reason; medically defined to be delirium without fever. Our Lord cured, by his word, several who were deprived of the exercise of their rational powers; and the circumstances of their histories prove, that there could neither be mistake nor collusion respecting them. How far madness may be allied to, or connected with, demoniacal possession, is a very intricate inquiry; and whether in the present day (as perhaps anciently) evil spirits may not take advantage from distemperature of the bodily frame, to augment evils endured by the patient, is more than may be affirmed, though the idea seems to be not absolutely repugnant to reason. Nevertheless, what may be, is probably different on most inquiries from what we can prove really is.

The epithet mad, is applied to several descriptions of persons in Scripture; as (1.) To one deprived of reason, Acts 26: 21. 1 Cor. 14: 23.—(2.) To one whose reason is depraved, and overruled by the fury of his angry passions, Acts 2: 11.—(3.) To one whose mind is perplexed and bewildered, so disturbed that he acts in an uncertain, extravagant, irregular manner, Deut. 28: 34. Eccl. 7: 7.—(4.) To one who is infatuated by the vehemence of his desires after idols, and vanities, Jer. 1: 33,—or (5.) After folly, deceit, and falsehood, Hosea 9: 7.

David's madness (1 Sam. 21: 13.) is by many supposed not to have been feigned, but a real epilepsy, or falling sickness; and the LXX. use words which strongly indicate this sense. It is urged in support of this opinion, that the troubles which David underwent might very naturally weaken his constitutional strength; and that the force he suffered in being obliged to seek shelter in a foreign court, would disturb his imagination in the highest degree. See Saurin's Sermons.—Calmet.

MADAI, the third son of Japheth, (Gen. 10: 2.) is commonly thought to be father of the Medes; but, beside that Media is too distant from the other countries peopled by Japheth, it cannot be comprehended under the name of "The Isles of the Gentiles," which were allotted to the sons of Japheth. These reasons have induced some learned men to suggest, that Madai was father of the Macedonians; whose country was called Emathia, as if from the Hebrew or Greek Ei, an island, and Madai; q. d. the isle of Madai. Near this country is mentioned a people called Mædi or Madi. (See MEDIA.)—Calmet.

MAGDALA; a city on the west side of the sea of Galilee, near Dalmanutha; Jesus, after the miracle of the seven loaves, being said by St. Matthew to have gone by ship to the coasts of Magdala; (Matt. 15: 39.) and by St. Mark, to "the parts of Dalmanutha," Mark 8: 10. Mr. Buckingham came to a small village in this situation called Migdal, close to the edge of the lake, beneath a range of high cliffs, in which small grottoes are seen, with the remains of an old square tower, and some larger buildings, of rude construction, apparently of great antiquity. Migdol implies a tower, or fortress; and this place, from having this name particularly applied to it, was doubtless, like the Egyptian Migdol, one of considerable importance; and may be considered as the site of the Migdal of the Naphthalites, as well as the Magdala of the New Testament.—Watson.

MAGDALEN, (RELIGIOUS or SR.) a denomination given to divers communities of nuns, consisting generally of penitent courtizans; sometimes also called Magdalennes. They were established at Mentz in 1542; at Paris in 1492; at Naples in 1324; at Rouen and Bordeaux in 1618. In each of these monasteries there were three kinds of persons and congregations: the first consisted of those who were admitted to make vows, and those bear the name of St. Magdalen; the congregation of St. Martha was the second, and was composed of those whom it was not thought proper to admit to vows finally; the congregation of St. Lazarus was composed of such as were detained by force. The religious of St. Magdalen at Rome were established by pope Leo X. Clement VIII. settled a revenue on them; and further appointed, that the effects of all public prostitutes dying intestate should fall to them; and that the testaments of the rest should be invalid, unless they bequeathed a portion of their effects, which was to be at least a fifth part of them. The term originated in the mistaken notion, that Mary Magdalen, of whom we read in the gospel, was a woman of bad character; a notion which is still very prevalent, notwithstanding the increased attention which has been excited to the interpretation of Holy Scripture. (See MARY MAGDALEN.)—Hend. Buck.

MAGI, or MAGIANS; from mag, or mag, which signifies a priest, in the Pehlvi language; an ancient caste of priests with the Persians and Medians, who, abominating the adoration of images, worshipped God only by fire, in which they were directly opposite to the Sabians. (See SABIAN.) The Magi believed that there were two principles, one the cause of all good, and the other the cause of all evil; in which opinion they were followed by the sect of the Manichees. (See MANICHEES.) They called the good principle Jezden, and Ormuzd; and the evil principle Akriman, or Ahermen. The former was by the Greeks called Oromasdes, and the latter, Arimanius. The reason of their worshipping fire was, because they looked upon it as the truest symbol of Oromasdes, or the good god; as darkness was of Arimanius, or the evil god. In all their temples they had fire continually burning upon their altars, and in their own private houses.

The religion of the Magi fell into disgrace on the death of the ringleaders, who had usurped the sovereignty after the death of Cambyses; and the slaughter that was made of the chief men among them sunk it so low, that Sabianism everywhere prevailed against it, Darius and most of his followers on that occasion going over to it. But the affection which the people had for the religion of their forefathers not being easily to be rooted out, the famous Zoroaster, some ages after, undertook to revive and reform it.

The reformation which this great man made in the Magian religion was in the first principle of it; for he introduced a God superior both to Oromasdes and Arimanius. Dr. Prideaux is of opinion that Zoroaster took the hint of this alteration in their theology from the prophet Isaiah, who brings in God, saying to Cyrus, king of Persia, "I am the Lord, and there is none else: I form the light, and create darkness; I make peace and create evil," ch. 45: 7. In short, Zoroaster held that there was one supreme independent Being, and under him two principles, or angels; one the angel of light, or good, and the other the angel of evil, or darkness; that there is a perpetual struggle between them, which shall last to the end of the world; that then the angel of darkness and his disciples shall go into a world of their own, where they shall be punished in everlasting darkness; and the angel of light and his disciples shall go into a world of their own, where they shall be rewarded in everlasting light.

Zoroaster was the first who built temples; the Magians before his time performing their devotions on the tops of hills, and in the open air, by which means they were exposed to the inconvenience of rain and tempests, which often extinguished their sacred fires. To procure the greater veneration for these sacred fires, he pretended to have received fire from heaven, which he placed on the altar of the first fire-temple he erected, which was that of Xis, in Media, from whence they say it was propagated to all the rest. The Magian priests kept their sacred fire with the greatest diligence, watching it day and night, and never suffering it to be extinguished. They fed it only with wood stripped of the bark, and they never blowed it with their breath or with bellows, for fear of polluting it; to do either of these was death by their law. The Magian religion, as reformed by Zoroaster, seems in many things to be built upon the plan of the Jewish. The Jews had their sacred fire which came down from heaven upon the altar of burnt-offerings, which they never suffered to go out, and with which all their sacrifices and oblations were made. Zoroaster, in like manner, pretended to have brought this holy fire from heaven; and as the Jews had a Shekinah of the divine presence among them, resting over the mercy-seat in the holy of holies, Zoroaster likewise told his Magians to look upon the sacred fire in their temples as a Shekinah, in which God especially dwelt.—From these and some other instances of analogy between the Jewish and Magian religion, Prideaux infers that Zoroaster had been first educated and brought up in the Jewish religion.

Zoroaster made his first appearance in Media, in the city of Xis, now called Aderbajan, as some say; or, according to others, in Ecbatana, now called Tauris, in the age of Daniel. Instead of admitting the existence of two first causes, with the Magians, he asserted the existence of one supreme God, who created both these, and out of these two produced, according to his sovereign pleasure, every thing else. He had the address to bring over Darius to his new reformed religion, notwithstanding the strongest opposition of the Sabians; and from that time it became the national religion of all that country, and so continued for many ages after, till it was supplanted by that of Mohammed. Zoroaster composed a book containing the principles of the Magian religion. It is called Zendavesta, and by contraction Zend. (See ZEND.)

So great an improvement in the moral character and influence of the religion of a whole nation as was effected by Zoroaster, a change which certainly is not paralleled in the ancient history of the religion of mankind, can scarcely be thought possible, except we suppose a divine interposition, either directly, or by the occurrence of some very impressive events. Now as there are so many authorities for fixing the time of Zoroaster or Zeratust to not many years subsequent to the death of the great Cyrus, the events connected with the conquest of Babylon may account for his success in that reformation of religion of which he was the author. For, had not the minds of men been prepared for this change by something extraordinary, it is not supposable that they would have adopted a purer faith from him. That he gave them a better doctrine, is clear from the admission of Prideaux, who has very unjustly branded him as an impostor. Let it then be remembered, that as "the Most High ruleth in the kingdoms of men," he often overrules great political events for moral purposes. The Jews were sent into captivity to Babylon to be reformed from their idolatrous propensities, and their reformation commenced with their calamity. A miracle was there wrought in favor of three

Hebrew confessors of the existence of the one only God, and that under circumstances to put shame upon a popular idol in the presence of the king and "all the rulers of the provinces," that the issue of this controversy between Jehovah and idolatry might be made known throughout that vast empire.

Nor are we to suppose the impression confined to the court; for the history of the three Hebrew youths, of Nebuchadnezzar's dream, sickness, and reformation from idolatry, of the interpretation of the handwriting on the wall by Daniel the servant of the living God, of his deliverance from the lions, and the publicity of the prophecy of Isaiah respecting Cyrus, were too recent, too public, and too striking in their nature, not to be often and largely talked of. (See CYRUS.) Besides, in the prophecy respecting Cyrus, the intention of Almighty God in recording the name of that monarch in an inspired book, and showing beforehand that he had chosen him to overturn the Babylonian empire, is expressly mentioned as having respect to two great objects; first, the deliverance of Israel, and, second, the making known his supreme divinity among the nations of the earth. We quote from Lowth's translation:—

"For the sake of my servant Jacob,
And of Israel my chosen,
I have even called thee by thy name;
I have surnamed thee, though thou knewest me not.
I AM JEHOVAH, and none else,
Beside me there is no God;
I will gird thee, though thou hast not known me,
That they may know, from the rising of the sun,
And from the West, that there is NONE BESIDE ME," &c.

It was therefore intended by this proceeding on the part of Providence to teach, not only Cyrus, but the people of his vast empire, and surrounding nations, 1. That the God of the Jews was Jehovah, the self-subsistent, the eternal God; 2. That he was God alone, there being no Deity beside himself; and, 3. That good and evil, represented by light and darkness, were neither independent nor eternal subsistences, but his great instruments, and under his control.

The Persians, who had so vastly extended their empire by the conquest of the countries formerly held by the monarchs of Babylon, were thus prepared for such a reformation of their religion as Zoroaster effected. The principles he advocated had been previously adopted by Cyrus and other Persian monarchs, and probably by many of the principal persons of that nation. Zoroaster himself thus became acquainted with the great truths contained in this famous prophecy, which attacked the very foundations of every idolatrous and Manichean system. From the other sacred books of the Jews, who mixed with the Persians in every part of the empire, he evidently learned more. This is sufficiently proved from the many points of similarity between his religion and Judaism, though he should not be allowed to speak so much in the style of the Holy Scriptures as some passages in the Zendavesta would indicate. He found the people, however, "prepared of the Lord" to admit his reformations, and he carried them.

This cannot but be looked upon as one instance of several merciful dispensations of God to the Gentile world, through his own peculiar people, the Jews, by which the idolatries of the heathen were often checked, and the light of truth rekindled among them. This renders pagan nations more evidently "without excuse." That this dispensation of mercy was afterwards neglected among the Persians, is certain. How long the effect continued we know not, nor how widely it spread; perhaps longer and wider than may now distinctly appear. If the Magi, who came from the East to seek Christ, were Persians, some true worshippers of God would appear to have remained in Persia to that day; and if, as is probable, the prophecies of Isaiah and Daniel were retained among them, they might be among those who "waited for redemption," not at Jerusalem, but in a distant part of the world. The Parsees, who were nearly extirpated by Mohammedan fanaticism, were charged by their oppressors with the idolatry of fire, and this was probably true of the multitude. Some of their writers, however, warmly defended themselves against the charge. A considerable number of them remain in India to this day, and profess to have the books of Zoroaster.

2. The term Magi was also anciently used generally throughout the East, to distinguish philosophers, and especially astronomers. Pliny and Ptolemy mention Arabi as synonymous with Magi; and it was the opinion of many learned in the first ages of Christianity, that the Magi who presented offerings to the infant Savior, (Matt. 2: 1.) came from southern Arabia; for it is certain that "gold, frankincense, and myrrh," were productions of that country. They were philosophers among whom the best parts of the reformed Magian system, which was extensively diffused, were probably preserved. They were pious men, also, who had some acquaintance, it may be, with the Hebrew prophecies, and were favored themselves with divine revelations. They are to be regarded as members of the old patriarchal church, never quite extinguished among the heathen; and they had the special honor to present the homage of the Gentile world to the infant Savior.—Hend. Buck; Watson.

MAGIC; a term originally conveying a good or laudable meaning, being used purely to signify the study of wisdom, and the more sublime parts of knowledge, as taught by the Magi; but as some of them engaged in astrology, divination, sorcery, &c., it became odious, and was, in length of time, only used to signify an unlawful and diabolical kind of science, supposed to depend on the influence of the devil and departed spirits.

Magie has been divided into natural, which consists in the application of natural active causes to passive subjects, by means of which many surprising, but yet simply natural effects are produced; celestial, which attributes to spirits a kind of rule or dominion over the planets, and to these an influence over the affairs of men; and diabolical, which consists in the invocation of demons, the entering into compact with the devil, &c., with a view to produce effects seemingly surpassing the powers of nature. All indulgence in such arts of imposture was strictly prohibited by the law of Moses, under pain of death, as a form of idolatry.—Hend. Buck.

MAGICIANS; persons pretending to a supernatural acquaintance with, and control over the powers of nature. They abounded in Egypt; and, according to the earliest accounts which we have of them in the book of Exodus, they appear to have possessed great dexterity; but how great soever their sleight of hand, so that they seemed to work miracles equally great with those recorded in these accounts, they were themselves obliged to acknowledge the limitation of their power. (See JANNES.)

God by Moses forbids recourse to such on pain of destruction, Lev. 19: 31. 20: 6. It was such sort of people that Saul extirpated out of the land of Israel, 1 Sam. 28: 3. Daniel also speaks of magicians and diviners in Chaldea, under Nebuchadnezzar, Dan. 1: 20, &c. He names four sorts: Chartumim, Asaphim, Mecaspim, and Casdim, Dan. 2: 2. The first, Chartumim, according to Theodotion, signifies "enchanters;" according to the LXX., "sophists;" according to Jerome, harialas, "diviners, fortune-tellers, casters of nativities." The second word, Asaphim, has a great resemblance to the Greek word sophos, "wise man;" whether the Greeks took this word from the Babylonians, or vice versa. Theodotion and Jerome have rendered it "magicians;" the LXX., "philosophers." The third word, Mecaspim, by Jerome and the Greeks, is translated malefici, "enchanters;" such as used noxious herbs and drugs, the blood of victims, and the bones of the dead, for their superstitious operations. The fourth word, Casdim, or Chaldeans, has two significations: first, the Chaldean people, over whom Nebuchadnezzar was monarch; the second, a sort of philosophers, who dwelt in a separate part of the city, who were exempt from all public offices and employments. Their studies were physic, astrology, divination, foretelling of future events by the stars, interpretation of dreams, augury, worship of the gods, &c. All these inquisitive and superstitious arts were prohibited among the Israelites, as founded on imposture or devilism, and as inconsistent with faith in God's providence, and trust in his supremacy.—Hend. Buck; Watson.

MAGISTER DISCIPLINÆ, or MASTER OF DISCIPLINE;

the appellation of a certain ecclesiastical officer in the ancient church. It was a custom in some places, particularly in Spain, in the time of the Gothic kings, about the end of the fifth century, for parents to dedicate their children very young to the service of the church. For this purpose they were taken into the bishop's family, and educated under him by some grave and discreet person whom the bishop deputed for that purpose, and set over them, by the name of Presbyter, or Magister Disciplina, whose chief business it was to inspect their behavior, and instruct them in the rules and discipline of the church.—Hend. Buck.

MAGNANIMITY; greatness of soul; a disposition of mind exerted in contemning dangers and difficulties, in scorning temptations, and despising earthly pomp and splendor. Cic. de Offic., lect. i. ch. 20; Grove's Moral Phil., vol. ii. p. 268. See articles COURAGE; FORTITUDE; in this work; Steele's Christian Hero; Watts on Self-Murder.—Hend. Buck.

MAGNIFY; to make great, or declare to be great. God magnifies his own mercy or name, when, by the fulfillment or powerful application of his word, he discovers the unbounded nature of his mercy, and other perfections. Gen. 19: 19. Acts 19: 7. He magnifies his word above all his name when he clearly discovers his mercy and faithfulness contained and pledged in it, Ps. 138: 2. Jesus magnified the law and made it honorable; his subjection to it, as he was the great Lawgiver, highly demonstrated the honor and immutable obligation of it: and he rendered to it an infinitely more valuable obedience than it could ever have received of men, Isa. 42: 21. Men magnify God or his works when they publish and declare his greatness and glory, Ps. 34: 2. Job 46: 24.—Brown.

MAGOG; son of Japheth, (Gen. 10: 2.) and father, as is believed, of the Scythians and Tartars; a name which comprehends the Getæ, the Goths, the Sarmatians, the Saccæ, the Massagettæ, and others. The Tartars and Muscovites possess the country of the ancient Scythians, and retain several traces of the names Gog and Magog. They were formerly called Mogli, and in Tartary are the provinces Lug, Mongug, Cangigu, and Gigui; Engui, Cor-gangui, Caigni, &c. Gog and Magog have in a manner passed into a proverb, to express a multitude of powerful, cruel, barbarous, and implacable enemies to God and his worship. (See GOG.)—Calmet.

MAHALATH, is the title of Psalms 53 and 88. "To the chief musician on Mahalath;" which some think signifies a musical instrument; but Calmet rather thinks it imports dancing, which is certainly its proper signification in Hebrew; as if the title of the Psalm imported to be, "An instructive Psalm of David, for the chief master of dancing;" or, for the chorus of singers and dancers.—Calmet.

MAHANAIM; a city of the Levites, of the family of Merari, in the tribe of Gad, upon the brook Jabbok, Josh. 21: 38. 13: 26. The name Mahanaim signifies "two hosts," or "two fields." The patriarch gave it this name because in this place he had a vision of angels coming to meet him, Gen. 32: 2. Mahanaim was the seat of the kingdom of Ishbosheth, after the death of Saul, 2 Sam. 2: 9, 12. It was also to this place that David retired, during the usurpation of Absalom; (2 Sam. 17: 24.) and this rebellious son was subdued, and suffered death, not far from this city.—Watson.

MAHER-SHALAL-HASH-BAZ, (he hasteneth to the prey;) a name given to one of the sons of the prophet Isaiah, by way of prediction. The prophet observes, that his children were for signs and wonders, and this name is evidence of the fact. Of the same nature we are to consider Emmanuel, and some other names.—Calmet.

MAHOMET. (See MOHAMMED; MOHAMMEDANISM.) MAIMED, implies the loss of a limb or member; often the absolute loss of it, not a suspension of its use, by a contraction, or diminution. This total loss is clearly the import of the original word: "If thine hand or foot offend thee, cut them off, and cast them from thee—enter into life maimed, rather than, having two hands," &c. Matt. 18: 8. And this should the rather be observed, to distinguish it from withered, contracted, &c.; and because it may be asked, what we should think of a person who could restore a lost limb, or member. Perhaps we are not always sensible of the full import of this word, when reading the history of the miraculous cures performed by our Lord.—Calmet.

MAIMONIDES, or BEN MAIMON, (MOSSES,) one of the most celebrated of the Jewish rabbis, who is called the eagle of the doctors, and the lamp of Israel, was born, in 1131, at Cordova; was profoundly versed in languages, and in all the learning of the age; became chief physician to the sultan of Egypt; and died in 1204. Among his works are, a Commentary on the Mishna; an Abridgment of the Talmud; and The Book of Precepts.—Davenport.

MAJORISTS; those who held with Major in the Lutheran controversy, about the time of the Interim, relative to good works; it being maintained by those so called, that they were necessary to salvation; whereas their opponents were of opinion that such a position only swelled the errors of popery, already countenanced by some of the reformers; and one of them went so far as to avow, that good works were hurtful to salvation.—Head. Buck.

MAKAZ; a city probably of Dan, (1 Kings 4: 9.) supposed by Calmet to be the Maktesh, the jaw-tooth, or En-hakkore, of Judg. 15: 19. Zeph. 1: 11.—Calmet.

MAKELOTH; an encampment of Israel in the desert; (Num. 33: 25, 26.) thought to be Malathis, which Eusebius and Jerome place twenty miles from Hebron, in the south of Judah.—Calmet.

MALACHI; the last of the twelve minor prophets. It is doubted whether his name be a proper name, or only a general one, signifying the angel of the Lord, a messenger, a prophet. It appears by Hag. 1: 13, and Mal. 3: 1, that in these times the name of Malach-Jehovah, messenger of the Lord, was given to prophets. The author of the Lives of the Prophets, under the name of Epiphanius Dorotheus, and the Chronicon Alexandrinum, say, that Malachi was of the tribe of Zebulun, and native of Sapha; that the name Malachi was given to him because of his angelical mildness. He died very young, as they say, and was buried near the place of his ancestors. It is much more probable, however, that Malachi was the same as Ezra; and this is the opinion of the ancient Hebrews, of the Chaldee paraphrast, of Jerome, and of abbot Rupert.

It appears certain that Malachi prophesied under Nehemiah, and after Haggai and Zechariah, at a time of great disorder among the priests and people of Judah; whom he reproves. He inveighs against the priests; reproves the people for having taken strange wives, for inhumanity to their brethren, for too frequently divorcing their wives, and for neglect of paying tithes and first-fruits. He seems to allude to the covenant that Nehemiah renewed with the Lord, together with the priests and the chief of the nation. Malachi is the last of the prophets of the synagogue, and lived about four hundred years before Christ. He prophesied of the coming of John the Baptist, and of the twofold coming of our Savior very clearly, ch. 3. He speaks of the abolition of sacrifices under the old law, and of the sacrifice of the new covenant, ch. 1: 10, 13. 4: 5, 6.—Calmet.

MALEVOLENCE, is that disposition of mind which inclines us to wish ill to any person. It discovers itself in frowns and a lowering countenance; in uncharitableness, in evil sentiments; hard speeches to or of its object; in cursing and reviling; and doing mischief either with open violence or secret spite, as far as there is power. It is a sort of habitual hatred. (See HATRED).—Head. Buck.

MALICE, is a settled or deliberate determination to revenge or do hurt to another. It more frequently denotes the disposition of inferior minds to execute every purpose of mischief within the more limited circle of their abilities. It is a most hateful temper in the sight of God, (Rom. 1: 29.) strictly forbidden in his holy word, (Col. 3: 8—12.) disgraceful to rational creatures, (1 Cor. 14: 20.) and every way inimical to the spirit of Christianity, Matt. 5: 44. 1 Pet. 2: 1. (See CHARITY; LOVE).—Head. Buck.

MALIGNITY, a disposition obstinately bad or malicious. Malignancy and malignity are words nearly synonymous. In some connexions, malignity seems rather more pertinently applied to a radical depravity of nature; and malignancy to indications of this depravity in temper and conduct in particular instances. It differs only in degree from malevolence.—Head. Buck.

MALTA. (See MELITA.)

MAMMON; the Syriac god of wealth, or worldly acquisitions of all kinds, Matt. 6: 24.

MAMRE; a city; (Gen. 13: 18.) either the same as Hebron and Arba, (Gen. 23: 17, 19. 35: 27.) or a place at a short distance from it.—Calmet.

MAN; the head and lord of the animal creation, in whose complex structure the organic or vegetable, the animal or sensitive and the intellectual or spiritual world, are wonderfully united, and his condition on earth modified by the laws of each. (See ADAM; PHYSIOLOGY; MATERIALISM; SOUL; DEPRIVITY; SALVATION.)

In the present article we design to notice the natural history of man; his characteristics as a distinct species; the principal varieties observable in the race; the unity of the species; and the sources to which naturalists trace the individual and generic varieties.

I. The natural history of man in its most comprehensive sense constitutes a subject of immense extent and of endless variety; or rather includes several very important subjects, if we attempt to describe both the individual and the species. In a complete history of man it would be necessary in respect to the former to relate the phenomena of his first production, to examine his anatomical structure, his bodily and intellectual functions, his propensities and feelings and diseases, and progress from birth to death; to point out the circumstances that distinguish him from other animals, and determine the precise degree of resemblance or difference, of specific affinity or diversity between them and ourselves; to compare or contrast with each other the various nations or tribes of human beings; to delineate the physical and moral characters of the people inhabiting the different portions of the globe, and to trace their progress from the first rudiments of civil society to the state at which they are now arrived. To write such a history of our species, says Mr. Lawrence, would demand a familiar acquaintance with nearly the whole circle of human knowledge, and a combination of the most opposite talents and pursuits. This labor, much too extensive to be properly executed by any individual, is divided into several subordinate branches. The anatomist and physiologist unfold the construction, and uses of the corporeal mechanism; the surgeon and physician describe its diseases; while the metaphysician and moralist employ themselves with the functions of the mind and moral sentiments. Man in society, his progress in the various countries and ages of the world, his multiplication and extension, are the province of the historian and political economist; while the divine traces the higher relations that connect man with his Creator, with superior beings, and the future world. (See HEAVEN; and HELL.)

II. The distinctive characteristics of man as a species are the following:

1. Smoothness of the skin, and want of natural offensive weapons or means of defence.
2. Possession of two hands, and very perfect structure of the hand.
3. Slow growth; long infancy; late puberty.
4. Menstruation of the female sex; exercise of the sexual functions not confined to particular seasons; reined and honorable conjugal sentiments.
5. Erect stature; to which the conformation of the body in general, and that of the pelvis, lower limbs, and their muscles in particular, are accommodated.
6. Capability of inhabiting all climates and situations, and of living on all kinds of food.
7. Great proportion of the brain to the face.
8. Great number and development of mental faculties, whether intellectual, moral, or religious.
9. Speech; letters; arts and sciences; REVELATION.
10. Perfectibility; or capacity of indefinite individual and social improvement; REVEALED IMMORTALITY.

III. The differences which exist between inhabitants of the different regions of the globe, both in bodily formation, and in the faculties of the mind, have led some naturalists, as Linnaeus and Buffon, to the supposition of distinct species. "With those forms, proportions, and colors, which we consider so beautiful in the fine figures of Greece, contrast," it has been said, "the woolly hair, the flat nose, the retreating forehead and advancing jaws, and black skin of the Negro; or the broad square face, narrow oblique eyes, beardless chin, coarse straight hair, and olive color of the Calmuck. Compare the ruddy and sanguine European with the jet-black African, the red man of America, the yellow Mongolian, or the brown South sea Islander; the gigantic Patagonian with the dwarfish Laplander; the highly civilized nations of Europe, so conspicuous in arts, science, and literature, in all that can strengthen and adorn society, or exalt and dignify human nature, with a troop of naked, shivering and starved New Hollanders, a horde of filthy Hottentots, or the whole of the more or less barbarous tribes that cover nearly the entire continent of Africa. Are these all brethren? have they descended from one stock, or must we trace them to more than one? and if so, how many Adams must we admit?"

reduced to five—(1) the Caucasian, (2) the Mongolian, (3) the American, (4) the African, and (5) the Australian; and will probably be yet reduced to three—the Japhetite, the Shemite, and the Hamite; while the unity of the species on anatomical and scientific principles is now generally acknowledged. See Cuvier's Animal Kingdom.

IV. The differences of physical organization, and of moral and intellectual qualities, which characterize the several races, says Dr. Lawrence, (himself a sceptic,) are,

"1. Analogous in kind and degree to those which distinguish the breeds of domestic animals, and must therefore be accounted for on the same principles.

"2. They are produced in both instances as native or congenial varieties, and these transmitted to the offspring in hereditary succession.

"3. Of the circumstances that favor this production of varieties in the animal kingdom, the most powerful is the state of domestication.

"4. External or adventitious causes, such as climate, situation, food, way of life, have considerable effect in altering the constitution of man, and animals; but this effect, as well as that of art and accident, is confined usually to the individuals, not being transmitted by generation, and not therefore affecting the race.

"5. That the human species, therefore, is single, and that all the differences it exhibits are to be regarded merely as varieties." Thus again does the progress of true science corroborate the Bible!

Good's Book of Nature; Lawrence's Lectures on Physiology; Spurzheim's Works; Combe and Chalmers on the Constitution of Man; Mason on Self-Knowledge.

MAN OF GOD, generally signifies a prophet; a man devoted to God; to his service. Moses is called peculiarly "the man of God," Deut. 33: 1. Josh. 14: 6. Our Savior frequently calls himself "the son of man," in allusion, probably, to the prophecy of Daniel, in which the Messiah is spoken of, Dan. 7: 13.—Calmet.

MAN OF SIN. (See ΑΝΤΙΧΡΙΣΤΗΣ.)

MANAEN; a Christian prophet and teacher, who had been in early life a foster-brother of Herod Antipas, Acts 13: 1. It is thought that he was one of the seventy disciples, but no particulars of his life are known.—Calmet.

MANASSEH, the eldest son of Joseph, (Gen. 41: 50.) was born, A. M. 2290, B. C. 1714. The name Manasseh

The testimony of revelation on this point is well known; and the time has been when certain men of science thought that they had discovered facts that must set aside that testimony. But since the subject has been more fully investigated by Blumenbach, Pritchard, and others, a better state of opinion has prevailed. However easy it may be to observe distinct, well-marked differences between the particular specimens of the human race, we find the case very different when we come to make the division, and reduce all the specimens to one or the other of them. Whatever number we may fix upon, and however well we may distinguish them, we see them, after all our attempts, constantly running into each other by every shade of gradation. Bory de St. Vincent divided the human race into fifteen species! Linnæus and Buffon into six! The differences are now called by the more correct name of varieties; the generic ones, or races, are signifies forgetfulness, because Joseph said, "God hath made me forget all my toil, and all my father's house." When Jacob was going to die, Joseph brought his two sons to him, that his father might give them his last blessing, Gen. 48. Jacob adopted them, though the birthright was given to Ephraim.

The tribe of Manasseh came out of Egypt in number thirty-two thousand two hundred men, upwards of twenty years old, under the conduct of Gamaliel, son of Pedahzur, Num. 2: 20, 21. This tribe was divided in the land of promise. One half-tribe of Manasseh settled beyond the river Jordan, and possessed the country of Bashan, from the river Jabbok to mount Libanus; and the other half-tribe of Manasseh settled on this side Jordan, and possessed the country between the tribe of Ephraim south, and the tribe of Issachar north, having the river Jordan east, and the Mediterranean sea west, Josh. 16, 17.—Watson.

MANASSEH, the fifteenth king of Judah, and son and successor of Hezekiah, was twelve years old when he began to reign, and reigned fifty-five years, 2 Kings 20: 21. 21: 1, 2. 2 Chron. 33: 1, 2, &c.

His history is remarkable as a strong illustration of divine forbearance and mercy. He did evil in the sight of the Lord; worshipped the idols of the land of Canaan; rebuilt the high places that his father Hezekiah had destroyed; set up altars to Baal; and planted groves to false gods. He raised altars to the whole host of heaven, in the courts of God's house; made his son pass through the fire in honor of Moloch; was addicted to magic, divinations, auguries, and other superstitions; set up the idol Astarte in the house of God; finally, he involved his people in all the abomination of the idolatrous nations to that degree, that Israel committed more wickedness than the Canaanites, whom the Lord had driven out before them.

To all these crimes Manasseh added cruelty; and he shed rivers of innocent blood in Jerusalem. The Lord being provoked by so many crimes, threatened him by his prophets, 2 Chron. 33: 11, 12, &c. It was probably Sargon or Esar-haddon, king of Assyria, who sent Tartan into Palestine, and who taking Azoth, attacked Manasseh, put him irons, and led him away, not to Nineveh, but to Babylon, of which Esar-haddon had become master, and had reunited the empires of the Assyrians and the Chaldeans.

Manasseh, in bonds at Babylon, humbled himself before God, who heard his prayers, and brought him back to Jerusalem; and Manasseh acknowledged the hand of the Lord. Manasseh was probably delivered out of prison by Saosduchia, the successor of Esar-haddon, 2 Chron. 33: 13, 14, &c. Being returned to Jerusalem, he restored the worship of the Lord; broke down the altars of the false gods; abolished all traces of their idolatrous worship; but he did not destroy the high places: which is the only thing Scripture reproaches him with, after his return from Babylon. He caused Jerusalem to be fortified; and he inclosed with a wall another city, which in his time was erected west of Jerusalem, and which went by the name of the second city, 2 Chron. 33: 11. He put garrisons into all the strong places of Judah. Manasseh died at Jerusalem, and was buried in the garden of his house, in the garden of Uzza, 2 Kings 21: 18. He was succeeded by his son Amon.—Watson.

MANDEVILLE, (BERNARD,) a sceptical physician and writer, was born, about 1670, at Dort, in Holland; settled in England at the beginning of the eighteenth century; and died in 1733. He is the author of several productions, among which are, an Inquiry into the Origin of Honor; Free Thoughts on Religion; and The Virgin Unmasked; but his principal work is The Fable of the Bees, or Private Vices made Public Benefits. This last most false and extravagant position was attacked by Berkeley, to whom Mandeville replied, and was presented, as flagrantly immoral, by the grand jury of Middlesex.—Davenport.

MANDRAKE, (dūdaim; Gen. 30: 14—16. Cant. 7: 13.) Interpreters have wasted much time and pains in endeavoring to ascertain what is intended by the Hebrew word dūdaim. Some translate it by "violet," others, "lilies," "jasmines," "truffle or mushroom," and some think that the word means "flowers," or "fine flowers," in general. Bochart, Calmet, and Sir Thomas Browne, suppose the citron intended; Celsus is persuaded that it is the fruit of the lote tree; Hiller, that cherries are spoken of; and Ludolf maintains that it is the fruit which the Syrians call mauz, resembling in figure and taste the Indian fig.

But the generality of interpreters and commentators understand by dūdaim, mandrakes, a species of melon; and it is so rendered in the Septuagint, and in both the Targums, on Gen. 29: 32—34. 30: 14. It appears from Scripture, that they were in perfection about the time of wheat harvest, have an agreeable odor, may be preserved, and are placed with pomegranates, Cant. 7: 13.

Nor was the opinion of their prolific virtue confined to the Jews; the Greeks and the Romans had the same notion of mandrakes. They gave to the fruit the name of "Apple of Love," and to Venus that of Man-dragoritis. The emperor Julian in his epistle to Calixenes says, that he drank the juice of mandrakes to excite his inclinations. And before him, Dioscorides had observed of it, "The root is supposed to be used in philters or love-potions." On the whole, there seems little doubt but this plant had a provocative quality, and therefore its Hebrew name dūdaim may be properly deduced, says Calmet, from dudim, pleasures of love.—Watson; Calmet.

MANICHÆANS, or MANICHÆES; a denomination founded in the latter part of the third century, by Mani, Manes, or Manicheus. Being a Persian or Chaldean by birth, and educated among the Magi, he attempted a coalition of their doctrine with the Christian system, or rather, the explication of the one by the other. Dr. Lardner, so far from taking Mani and his followers for enthusiasts, as some have done, thinks they erred on the other side, and were rather a sect of reasoners and philosophers, than visionaries and enthusiasts. So Faustus, one of their leaders, says, the doctrine of Mani taught him not to receive every thing recommended as said by our Savior, but first to examine and consider whether it be true, sound, right, genuine; while the Catholics, he says, swallowed every thing, and acted as if they despised the benefit of human reason, and were afraid to examine and distinguish between truth and falsehood. Augustine, it is well known, was for some time among this sect; but it was not pretensions to inspiration, but specious and alluring promises of rational discoveries, by which Augustine was deluded, as he particularly states in his letter to his friend Honoratus. So Beausobre remarks: "These heretics were philosophers, who, having formed certain systems, accommodated revelation to them, which was the servant of their reason, not the mistress."

Mani, according to Dr. Lardner, believed in an eternal, self-existent Being, completely happy and perfect in goodness, whom alone he called God, in a strict and proper sense; but he believed, also, in an evil principle, or being, which he called hyle, or the devil, whom he considered as the god of this world, blinding the eyes of them that believe not, 2 Cor. 4: 4. God, the supreme and good, they considered as the Author of the universe; and, according to Augustine, they believed, also, in a consubstantial Trinity, though they strangely supposed the Father to dwell in light inaccessible, the Son to have his residence in the solar orb, and the Holy Spirit to be diffused throughout the atmosphere; on which account they paid a superstitious, and perhaps an idolatrous, reverence to the sun and moon. Their belief in the evil principle was, no doubt, adopted to solve the mysterious question of the origin of evil, which, says Dr. Lardner, was the ruin of these men, and of many others. As to the hyle, or the devil, though they dared not to consider him as the creature of God, neither did they believe in his eternity; for they contended, from the Greek text of John 8: 44, that he had a father. But they admitted the eternity of matter, which they called darkness; and supposed hyle to be the result of some wonderful and unaccountable commotion in the kingdom of darkness, which idea seems to be borrowed from the Mosaic chaos. In this commotion darkness became mingled with light, and thus they account for good and evil being so mixed together in the world. Having thus brought hyle, or Satan, into being, they next found an empire and employment for him. Every thing, therefore, which they conceived unworthy of the fountain of goodness, they attributed to the evil being; particularly the material world, the Mosaic dispensation, and the Scriptures on which it was founded. This accounts for their rejecting the Old Testament. Dr. Lardner contends, however, that they received generally the books of the New Testament, though they objected to particular passages as corrupted, which they could not reconcile to their system.

On Rom. 7. Mani founded the doctrine of two souls in man, two active principles; one, the source and cause of vicious passions, deriving its origin from matter; the other, the cause of the ideas of just and right, and of inclinations to follow those ideas, deriving its origin from God. Considering all sensual enjoyments to be in some degree criminal, they were enemies to marriage; though, at the same time, knowing that all men cannot receive this saying, they allowed it to the second class of their disciples, called auditors; but by no means to the perfect or confirmed believers. Another absurd consequence of believing the moral evil of matter was, that they denied the real existence of Christ's human nature, and supposed him to suffer and die in appearance only. According to them, he took the form only of man; a notion that was afterwards adopted by Mahomet, and which necessarily excludes all faith in the atonement. Construing too literally the assertion that flesh and blood could not inherit the kingdom of God, they denied the doctrine of the resurrection. Christ came, they said, to save the souls of men, and not the bodies. No part of matter, according to them, could be worthy of salvation. In many leading principles they thus evidently agreed with the Gnostics, of whom, indeed, they may be considered a branch. (See Gnostics; and MAGI.)—Watson.

MANIFEST; to show a thing clearly, and render it visible, Eccl. 3: 18. 1 Tim. 3: 16. The Son of God was manifest when he appeared visibly in our nature, 1 John 3: 5. The apostles were manifest when it fully appeared by their behavior, doctrine, and success, that they were sent of God, 2 Cor. 11: 6. The saints and the wicked are manifest when the difference between their characters and states is clearly discovered, 1 John 3: 10. The manifestation of the Spirit is either that which the Holy Ghost shows to men, the doctrines of the gospel, the love of God, and our interest in it, and the things of another world; or, his gifts and graces, whereby his power and residence in us are plainly evinced, 1 Cor. 12: 7. The manifestation of the sons of God is the public display of their station and happiness, in their being openly acknowledged and honored by Christ at the last day, Rom. 8: 19.—Brown.

MANIFOLD. God's wisdom, mercy, and grace, are manifold; unbounded in their nature, showed forth in a variety of ways, and numerous in their fruits, Eph. 3: 10. Neh. 9: 19. 1 Pet. 4: 10. Temptations and trials are manifold when very numerous, and in many different forms, and from various sources, 1 Pet. 1: 6. Transgressions are manifold when many in number, and of many different forms, and in many various degrees of aggravation, Amos 6: 12.—Brown.

MANNA; a substance which God gave to the children of Israel for food, in the deserts of Arabia. It began to fall on Friday morning, the sixteenth day of the second month, which from thence was called Ijar, and continued to fall daily in the morning, except on the Sabbath, till after the passage over Jordan, and to the passover of the fortieth year from the exodus, that is, from Friday, June 5, A. M. 2513, to the second day of the passover, Wednesday, May 5, A. M. 2553. It was a small grain, white, like hoar-frost, round, and the size of coriander seed, Ex. 16: 14. Num. 11: 1—5. It fell every morning with the dew, about the camp of the Israelites, and in so great quantities during the whole forty years of their journey in the wilderness, that it was sufficient to feed the entire multitude, of above a million of souls, every one of whom gathered, for his share every day, the quantity of an omer, i. e. about three quarts. It maintained all this multitude, and yet none of them found any inconvenience from the constant eating of it. Every Friday there fell a double quantity, (Exod. 16: 5.) and though it putrefied and bred maggots when kept on any other day, yet on the Sabbath it suffered no such alteration. And the same manna that was melted by the heat of the sun, when left in the field, was of so hard a consistence when brought into the house, that it was beat in mortars, and would even endure the fire. It was baked in pans, made into paste, and so into cakes. Instead of "It is manna," read "What is it?" in Ex. 16: 14.

Scripture gives to manna the name of "bread of heaven," and "food of angels;" perhaps, as intimating its superior quality, Ps. 78: 25. There is a vegetable substance called manna which falls in Arabia, in Poland, in Calabria, in mount Libanus, and elsewhere. The most common and the most famous is that of Arabia, which is a kind of condensed honey, found in the summer time on the leaves of trees, on herbs, on the rocks, or the sand of Arabia Petraea. That which is gathered about mount Sinai has a very strong smell, which it receives from the herbs on which it falls. It easily evaporates, insomuch that if thirty pounds of it were kept in an open vessel, hardly ten would remain at the end of fifteen days. Several writers think that the manna with which the Israelites were fed was like that now found in Arabia, and that the only thing that was miraculous in the occurrence was the regularity of the supply, and its cessation on the Sabbath. The Jews, however, with the majority of critics, for good reasons, are of opinion that it was a totally different substance from the vegetable manna, and was specially provided by the Almighty for his people. And this is confirmed by the language of our Lord, John 6.—Calmet.

MANNER. God spake unto the fathers under the Old Testament, in divers manners; not fully, and all at once, but by little and little, sometimes more, and sometimes less clearly; and by the different means of angels, prophets, visions, dreams, voices from heaven, Urim and Thummim, &c., Heb. 1: 1. To say the manner of Beersheba liveth, was to swear by the idol there worshipped, Amos 8: 14.—Brown; Owen on the Spirit.

MANNING, (JAMES, D. D.) first president of the college in Rhode Island, was born in New Jersey, October 22, 1738, and graduated at Nassau hall, in 1762. Not long after he began to preach, several of his Baptist brethren in New Jersey and Pennsylvania proposed the establishment of a college in Rhode Island, on account of the religious freedom which was there enjoyed. He was chosen its first president. The charter was obtained in February, 1764, and in 1765 he removed to Warren, Rhode Island, to make preparations for carrying the design into execution. In 1770, the institution was removed to Providence, where a spacious building had been erected, to which two others have since been added, and the whole called Brown University. He was soon chosen pastor of the Baptist church in that town also, and he continued in the active discharge of the duties of these two offices, (except in an interval of about six months, in 1786, when he was a member of congress,) till his death, by apoplexy, July 29, 1791, aged fifty-two.

Dr. Manning was equally known in the religious, political, and literary world. Nature had given him distinguished abilities. The resources of his genius seemed adequate to all duties and occasions. He was of a kind and benevolent disposition, social and communicative in mind, and enchanting in manners. His life was a scene of labor for the benefit of others. His piety, and his fervent zeal in preaching the gospel, evinced his love to God and man. With a most graceful form, a dignified and majestic appearance, his address was manly, familiar, and engaging, his voice harmonious, and his eloquence irresistible. In the government of the college he was mild, yet energetic. He lived beloved and died lamented, beyond the lot of ordinary men. The good order, learning, and respectability of the Baptist churches in the eastern states, under God are much owing to his personal influence, and assiduous attention to their welfare. Benedict, ii. p. 346.

MANOAH, the father of Samson, was of the tribe of Dan, and a native of the city of Zorah, Judg. 13: 6—23. (See SAMSON.)—Watson.

MANSLAYER. (See AVENGER, and REFUGEE.)

MANTON, (THOMAS, D. D.) a laborious and zealous divine of the seventeenth century, was born, in 1620, at Laurence-Lydiard, Somerset, England. His father and both his grandfathers were ministers. He was educated at Oxford, and received orders from bishop Hall, before he was twenty; being regarded by the good bishop as an extraordinary young man. Alluding to his extreme youth he afterwards said, "The Lord forgive my rash intrusion." He soon settled at Stoke-Newington, near London. Here he prepared and published his Expositions of James and Jude. During the revolution he was frequently called to preach before the parliament, where he had the courage to preach against the death of the king, though he gave great offence. Some years after he was chosen preacher of St. Paul's, Covent-Garden, where he had a numerous congregation of persons of great note and rank, and was eminently successful in his ministry. Usher calls him one of the best preachers in England. He was also chaplain to the Protector, and one of the committee for examining ministers under the commonwealth. He was forward however to promote the restoration, and was chosen one of the king's chaplains, and one of the Savoy commissioners; but soon fell under suspicion for non-conformity, and, in 1662, was deprived and imprisoned for six months. He died October 18, 1677. Perhaps few men of the age had more virtue, and fewer failings; but his only trust was in the Lamb of God. He left numerous writings, chiefly sermons and expositions.—Middleton, iii. p. 429.

MAON; a city in the south of Judah, (Josh. 15: 55. 1 Sam. 23: 24, 25. 2: 2.) and about which Nabal the Carmelite had great possessions. It is thought to be the Mænois, or Mæonis, which Eusebius places in the neighborhood of Gaza; and the Mænum of the Codex Theodosianus, which is near Beersheba.—Calmet.

MARAH, (bitterness.) When the Israelites coming out of Egypt, arrived at the desert of Etham, they there found the water to be so bitter, that neither themselves nor their cattle could drink it, Exod. 15: 23. They therefore began to murmur against Moses, who praying to the Lord, was shown a kind of wood; which being thrown into the water, made it potable. This wood is called alvah by the Mahometans. The word alva has some relation to aloes, which is a very bitter wood; and some interpreters have hinted, that Moses took a very bitter sort of wood, on purpose that the power of God might be more remarkable, in sweetening these waters. Josephus says, that this legislator used the wood which he found by chance, lying at his feet.

We believe that the colonists who first peopled some parts of America, corrected the qualities of the water they found there, by infusing in it branches of saffron; and it is understood that the first inducement of the Chinese to the general use of tea, was to correct the water of their rivers; it follows, therefore, that some kinds of wood possess such a quality: and it may be, that God directed Moses to the very wood proper for his purpose. But then, it must be confessed, that the water of those parts continues bad to this day, and is so greatly in want of something to improve it, that had such a discovery been communicated by Moses, it could hardly have been lost. It must therefore be admitted to have been a miracle, wrought by divine power upon a special occasion.—Calmet.

MARAN-ATHA. (See ANATHEMA.)

MARBLE, (shish ; 1 Chron. 29: 2. Esth. 1: 6. Cant. 5: 15.) a valuable kind of stoe, of a texture so hard and compact, and of a grain so fine, as readily to take a beautiful polish. It is dug out of quarries in large masses, and is much used in buildings, ornamental pillars, &c. Marble is of different colors,—black, white, &c.; and is sometimes elegantly clouded and variegated. The Seventy and Vulgate render it "Parian stone," which was remarkable for its bright white color. Probably the cliff Ziz, (2 Chron. 20: 16.) was so called from being a marble crag: the place was afterwards called Petra. The variety of stones mentioned in the pavement of Ahasuerus might be marble of different colors. The ancients sometimes made pavements wherein were set very valuable stones.—Watson.

MARCELLA; a Roman widow, the intimate friend of Paula, and of Eustochium. The latter received instruction from her; and it is easy to judge, says Jerome, of the merit of one who could form such disciples. Marcella was a Christian, and deeply learned in the Scriptures. She was greatly opposed to the errors of Origen, who mingled the dogmas of oriental philosophy with the truths of Christianity. On difficult passages of Scripture she consulted Jerome; but she herself was consulted from all parts as a great theologian, and her answers were always dictated by prudence and humility. She died A. D. 409, soon after Rome was taken by the Goths.—Betham.

MARCELLANS; a sect of ancient heretics, towards the close of the second century; so called from Marcellus of Ancyra, their leader, who was accused of reviving the errors of Sabellius. Some, however, are of opinion that Marcellus was orthodox, and that they were his enemies, the Arians, who fathered their errors upon him.—Hend. Buck.

MARCIONITES, or MARCIONISTS, Marcionistæ; a very ancient and popular sect of heretics, who, in the time of Epiphanius, were spread over Italy, Egypt, Palestine, Syria, Arabia, Persia, and other countries; they were thus denominated from their author, Marcion. Marcion was of Pontus, the son of a bishop, and at first made profession of the monastic life; but he was excommunicated by his own father, who would never admit him again into communion with the church, not even on his repentance. On this he abandoned his own country, and retired to Rome, where he began to broach his doctrines.

He flourished between the years 130 and 160, and was one of the most distinguished and influential heretics of the second century. He was the second person before Manes who mixed the Eastern doctrines with Christianity. His celebrity arose, not so much from his introducing any new doctrines, as from his enlarging upon those which had been taught before him, which he did in a work which he entitled Antitheses, which was celebrated by the ancients, and regarded by his followers as a symbolical book.

He laid down two principles, the one good, the other evil; between these he imagined an intermediate kind of deity, of a mixed nature, who was the creator of this inferior world, and the god and legislator of the Jewish nation. The other nations, who worshipped a variety of gods, were supposed to be under the empire of the evil principle. These two conflicting powers exercised oppressions upon rational and immortal souls; and therefore the supreme God, to deliver them from bondage, sent to the Jews a being more like unto himself, even his Son Jesus Christ, clothed with a certain shadowy resemblance of a body: this celestial messenger was attacked by the prince of darkness, and by the god of the Jews, but without effect. Those who followed the directions of this celestial conductor, mortify the body by fastings and austerities, and renounce the precepts of the god of the Jews and the prince of darkness, shall after death ascend to the mansions of felicity and perfection. The rule of manners which Marcion prescribed to his followers was excessively austere, containing an express prohibition of wedlock, wine, flesh, and all the external comforts of life.

Marcion denied the real birth, incarnation, and passion of Jesus Christ, and held them to be apparent only. He denied the resurrection of the body, and allowed none to be baptized but those who preserved their continence; but these he granted might be baptized three times. In many things he followed the sentiments of the heretic Cerdon, and rejected the law and the prophets, or, according to Theodoret, the whole of the Old Testament. He pretended the gospels had been corrupted, and received only one, which has been supposed to be that of Luke; but they are so very different, that the most distinguished modern critics are decidedly of opinion that Marcion's was merely an apocryphal gospel, and a mutilated or garbled copy of Luke's, as some of the fathers alleged on conjecture. He rejected the two epistles to Timothy, that to Titus and the Hebrews, and the Apocalypse. Whoever would wish to investigate the history of this heretic, can hardly avoid studying the five books written expressly against him by Tertullian; but they must be read with some allowance for invective. Dr. Burton on the Early Heresies, Note 13.—Hend. Buck.

MARCITES, Marcitæ; a sect of heretics in the second century, who also called themselves perfecti, and made profession of doing every thing with a great deal of liberty and without fear. This doctrine they borrowed from Simon Magus, who however was not their chief; for they were called Marcites from one Marcus, who conferred the priesthood, and the administration of the sacraments, on women.—Hend. Buck.

MARCOSIANS, or COLOBARIANS; an ancient sect in the church, making a branch of the Valentines.

Ireneus speaks at large of the leader of this sect, Marcus, who, it seems, was reputed a great magician. The Marcosians had a great number of apocryphal books, which they held for canonical, and of the same authority with ours. Out of these they picked several idle fables touching the infancy of Jesus Christ, which they put off for true histories. Many of these fables are still in use and credit among the Greek monks.—Hend. Buck.

MARCUS; a Christian bishop of Arethusa, who having destroyed a heathen temple, and erected a Christian church in its room, was accused before the emperor Julian. His persecutors stripped and beat him, and after various torments covered him with honey, and hung him up in a basket to be stung to death by wasps.—Fox, p. 69.

MARESHAH, or MARISSA; a city of Judah, called also Moresbeth and Morasthi. The prophet Micah was a native of this city. It was two miles from Eleutheropolis; and near to it, in the vale of Zephathah, was fought a famous battle between Asa, king of Judah, and Zerah, king of Cush, in which Asa defeated a million of men, 2 Chron. 14: 9—13. In the latter times of the Jewish commonwealth, Mareshah belonged to Idumea, as did several other southerly cities of Judah.—Calmet.

MARGARET, (queen of Scotland;) a woman of the rarest piety, and of a character fitted to throw a lustre on the purest ages. She was granddaughter to Solomon, king of Hungary. With her brother, Edgar Atheling, she was wrecked on the coast of Scotland, and was there, in 1066, married to Malcolm, who had just recovered the throne of Scotland from the usurper Macbeth. Through her influence the ferocious spirit of her husband received a happy tincture of humanity, and through his high opinion of her wisdom she was enabled greatly to reform the kingdom, to diminish taxes, purify the courts of justice, repress the insolence of the soldiery, revive the spirit of piety, and introduce a more serious regard to the duties of the Sabbath. She made laws to enforce temperance. The poor and unfortunate shared her kindest regard. Her children she carefully and successfully educated on Christian principles. Theoderic, a monk of Durham, who wrote her life, says, "She would discourse with me concerning the sweetness of everlasting life, in such a manner as to draw tears from my eyes." In 1093, while suffering from sickness, she heard of the death of her husband, who was slain at Alnwick, in Northumberland, in the reign of William Rufus. She received the bitter news as a Christian. "I thank thee, O Lord," she said, "that in sending me so great an affliction, thou wouldst purify me from my sins. Thou, who by thy death hast given life to the world, deliver me from evil." This excellent queen survived but a few days.—Betham.

MARGARET, of FRANCE, duchess of Berri and Savoy, daughter of Francis I., was born in 1523, and received a superior education. She was the patroness of the sciences and learned men; and after the death of her father gained a high reputation by her beauty, piety, learning, and amiable qualities. She married Philibert, duke of Savoy, in 1559, and died, 1574, aged fifty-one. The most illustrious of the literati contended who should praise her best, and her subjects called her the Mother of her People.—Betham.

MARIAMNE. (See HEROD.)

MARK was the nephew of Barnabas, being his sister's son. He is supposed to have been converted to the gospel by St. Peter, who calls him his son; (1 Peter 5: 13.) but no circumstances of his conversion are recorded. The first historical fact mentioned of him in the New Testament is, that he went, in the year 41, from Jerusalem to Antioch, with Paul and Barnabas. Not long after, he set out from Antioch with those apostles upon a journey, which they undertook by the direction of the Holy Spirit, for the purpose of preaching the gospel in different countries: but he soon left them, probably without sufficient reason, at Perga in Pamphylia, and went to Jerusalem, Acts 13. Afterwards, when Paul and Barnabas had determined to visit the several churches which they had established, Barnabas proposed that they should take Mark with them; to which Paul objected, because Mark had left them in their former journey. This difference of judgment ended in their separation, though it did not break their friendship, or cool their zeal for the diffusion of the gospel. Mark accompanied his uncle Barnabas to Cyprus, but it is not mentioned whether they went when they left that island. We may conclude that St. Paul was afterwards reconciled to Mark, from the manner in which he mentions him in his epistles written subsequently to this dispute; and particularly from the direction which he gives to Timothy: "Take Mark, and bring him with thee; for he is profitable to me for the ministry," 2 Tim. 4: 11. No further circumstances are recorded of Mark in the New Testament; but it is believed, upon the authority of ancient writers, that soon after his journey with Barnabas he met Peter in Asia, and that he continued with him for some time; perhaps till Peter suffered martyrdom at Rome. Epiphanius, Eusebius, and Jerome, all assert that Mark preached the gospel in Egypt; and the two latter call him bishop of Alexandria, where he suffered martyrdom.

2. Dr. Lardner thinks that Mark's Gospel is alluded to by Clement of Rome: but the earliest ecclesiastical writer upon record who expressly mentions it is Papias. It is mentioned, also, by Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, Origen, Eusebius, Epiphanius, Jerome, Augustine, Chrysostom, and many others. The works of these fathers contain numerous quotations from this gospel; and as their testimony is not contradicted by any ancient writer, we may safely conclude that the gospel of Mark is genuine. The authority of this gospel is not affected by the question concerning the identity of Mark the evangelist, and Mark the nephew of Barnabas; since all agree that the writer of this gospel was the familiar companion of St. Peter, and that he was qualified for the work which he undertook, by having heard, for many years, the public discourses and private conversation of that apostle.

Some writers have asserted that St. Peter revised and approved this gospel, and others have not scrupled to call it the gospel according to St. Peter; by which title they did not mean to question St. Mark's right to be considered as the author of this gospel, but merely to give it the sanction of St. Peter's name. The following passage in Eusebius appears to contain so probable an account of the occasion of writing this gospel, and comes supported by such high authority, that we think it right to transcribe it: "The lustre of piety so enlightened the minds of Peter's hearers at Rome, that they were not contented with the bare hearing and unwritten instruction of his divine preaching, but they earnestly requested St. Mark, whose gospel we have, being an attendant upon St. Peter, to leave with them a written account of the instructions which had been delivered to them by word of mouth; nor did they desist till they had prevailed upon him; and thus they were the cause of the writing of that gospel, which is called according to St. Mark; and they say, that the apostle being informed of what was done, by the revelation of the Holy Ghost, was pleased with the zeal of the men, and authorized the writing to be introduced into the churches. Clement gives this account in the sixth book of his Institutions; and Papias, bishop of Hierapolis, bears testimony to it." Jerome also says, that St. Mark wrote a short gospel from what he had heard from St. Peter, at the request of the brethren at Rome, which, when St. Peter knew, he approved, and published it in the church, commanding the reading of it by his own authority.

Different persons have assigned different dates to this gospel; but there being almost an unanimous concurrence of opinion, that it was written while Mark was with St. Peter at Rome, and not finding any ancient authority for supposing that St. Peter was in that city till A. D. 64, we are inclined to place the publication of this gospel about A. D. 65. St. Mark having written this gospel for the use of the Christians at Rome, which was at that time the great metropolis and common centre of all civilized nations, we accordingly find it free from all peculiarities, and equally accommodated to every description of persons. Quotations from the ancient prophets, and allusions to Jewish customs, are, as much as possible, avoided; and such explanations are added as might be necessary for Gentile readers at Rome; thus, when Jordan is first mentioned in this gospel, the word river is prefixed, (Mark 1: 5) the Oriental word carban is said to mean a gift, (Mark 7: 11.) the preparation is said to be the day before the Sabbath, (Mark 15: 42.) and defiled hands are said to mean unwashed hands; (Mark 7: 2.) and the superstition of the Jews upon that subject is stated more at large than it would have been by a person writing at Jerusalem. Some learned men, from a collation of St. Matthew's and Mark's gospels, have pointed out the use of the same words and expressions in so many instances, that it has been supposed Mark wrote with St. Matthew's gospel before him; but the similarity is not strong enough to warrant such a conclusion; and seems no greater than might have arisen from other causes. St. Peter would naturally recite in his preaching the same events and discourses which St. Matthew recorded in his gospel; and the same circumstances might be mentioned in the same manner by men who sought not after "excellency of speech," but whose minds retained the remembrance of facts or conversations which strongly impressed them, even without taking into consideration the idea of supernatural guidance. (See INSPIRATION.) We may farther observe, that the idea of Mark's writing from St. Matthew's gospel does not correspond with the account given by Eusebius and Jerome, as stated above.—Watson.

MARK ON THE FOREHEAD. (See FOREHEAD.)

MARKET. The market or forum, in the cities of antiquity, was very different from our markets, where meat, &c. is usually sold. When we read (Acts 17: 17.) of the apostle Paul disputing with philosophers in the "market," at Athens, we are apt to wonder what kind of philosophers these market-folks could be; or why the disputants could not engage in a place fitter for investigation, and discussion, of abstruse and difficult subjects. But the fact is, that the forum was usually a public market on one side only, the other sides of the area being occupied by temples, theatres, courts of justice, and other public buildings. In short, the forums were sumptuous squares, surrounded by decorations &c. of various, and often of magnificent, kinds. Here the philosophers met, and taught; here laws were promulgated; and here devotions, as well as amusements, occupied the populace. The nearest ap proach to the composition of an ancient forum, is Covent-garden, in England; where we have a market in the middle, a church at one end, a theatre at one corner, and sitting magistrates close adjacent. In short, if we add a school for philosophical instruction, or divinity lectures, we have nearly the composition of an ancient forum, or market-place. Hence, when the Pharisees desired salutations in the market-places, (Mark 12: 38.) it was not merely from the country people who brought their produce for sale, but, as they loved to be admired by religious people at the temple, the synagogues, &c. so they desired salutations from persons of consequence, judges, magistrates, dignitaries, &c. in the forum, in order to display their importance to the people, to maintain their influence, &c.—Calmet.

MARLORATUS; one of the reformers of the sixteenth century. This excellent minister of Christ was born in Lorraine, in 1506. His parents dying while he was young, he obtained his education in a monastery of Augustine friars. Thence he went to the university of Saussane, where it pleased God to bring him to the knowledge of the truth. He soon became pastor first of Vivia, and then of Rouen, in Normandy, where he gathered, and watched over a large congregation with signal fidelity and success. In 1561, he distinguished himself at the conference at Poissy, in defence of the Protestants. The next year, in the civil war, Rouen was taken by the papists, and Marloratus, on a false charge of high treason, was sentenced to an infamous death. He died, glorifying God by his faith, patience, and meekness, in the fifty-sixth year of his age. He left several excellent writings.—Middleton, ii. p. 82.

MARONITES; a sect of Eastern Christians who follow the Syrian rites, and are subject to the pope; their principal habitation being on mount Libanus, or between the Ansarians to the north and the Druses to the south. Mosheim informs us, that the Monothelites, condemned and exploded by the council of Constantinople, found a place of refuge among the Mardaites, signifying in Syriac rebels, a people who took possession of Lebanon, A. D. 676, which became the asylum of vagabonds, slaves, and all sorts of rable; and about the conclusion of the seventh century they were called Maronites, after Maro, their first bishop; a name which they still retain. None, he says, of the ancient writers, give any certain account of the first person who instructed these mountaineers in the doctrine of the Monothelites; it is probable, however, from several circumstances, that it was John Maro, whose name they have adopted; and that this ecclesiastic received the name of Maro from his having lived in the character of a monk, in the famous convent of St. Maro, upon the borders of the Orontes, before his settlement among the Mardaites of mount Libanus. One thing is certain, from the testimony of Tyrius, and other unexceptionable witnesses, as also from the most authentic records, namely, that the Maronites retained the opinions of the Monothelites until the twelfth century, when, abandoning and renouncing the doctrine of one will in Christ, they were readmitted into the communion of the Roman church. The most learned of the modern Maronites have left no method unemployed to defend their church against this accusation; they have labored to prove, by a variety of testimonies, that their ancestors always persevered in the Catholic faith, and in their attachment to the Roman pontiff, without ever adopting the doctrine of the Monophysites or Monothelites. But all their efforts are insufficient to prove the truth of these assertions, and the testimonies they allege will appear absolutely fictitious and destitute of authority.

The nation may be considered as divided into two classes, the common people and the shaiks, by whom must be understood the most eminent of the inhabitants, who, from the antiquity of their families, and the opulence of their fortunes, are superior to the ordinary class. They all live dispersed in the mountains, in villages, hamlets, and even detached houses; which is never the case in the plains. The whole nation consists of cultivators. Every man improves the little domain he possesses, or farms, with his own hands. Even the shaiks live in the same manner, and are only distinguished from the rest by a bad pelisse, a horse, and a few slight advantages in food and lodging; they all live frugally, without many enjoyments, but also with few wants, as they are little acquainted with the inventions of luxury. In general, the nation is poor, but no one wants necessities; and if beggars are sometimes seen, they come rather from the sea-coast than the country itself. Property is as sacred among them as in Europe; nor do we see there those robberies and extortions so frequent with the Turks. Travellers may journey there, either by night or by day, with a security unknown in any other part of the empire, and the stranger is received with hospitality, as among the Arabs: it must be owned, however, that the Maronites are less generous, and rather inclined to the vice of parsimony. Conformably to the doctrines of Christianity, they have only one wife, whom they frequently espouse without having seen, and always without having been much in her company. Contrary to the precepts of that same religion, however, they have admitted, or retained, the Arab custom of retaliation, and the nearest relation of a murdered person is bound to avenge him. From a habit founded on distrust, and the political state of the country, every one, whether shaiks or peasant, walks continually armed with a musket and poinards. This is, perhaps, an inconvenience; but this advantage results from it, that they have no novices in the use of arms among them, when it is necessary to employ them against the Turks. As the country maintains no regular troops, every man is obliged to join the army in time of war; and if this militia were well conducted, it would be superior to many European armies. From accounts taken in late years, the number of men, fit to bear arms, amounts to thirty-five thousand.

In religious matters the Maronites are dependent on Rome. Though they acknowledge the supremacy of the pope, their clergy continue, as heretofore, to elect a head, with the title of batrak, or patriarch of Antioch. Their priests marry, as in the first ages of the church; but their wives must be maidens, and not widows; nor can they marry a second time. They celebrate mass in Syriac, of which the greatest part of them comprehend not a word. The gospel, alone, is read aloud in Arabic, that it may be understood by the people. The communion is administered in both kinds. In the small country of the Maronites there are reckoned upwards of two hundred convents for men and women. These religions are of the order of St. Anthony, whose rules they observe with an exactness which reminds us of earlier times. The court of Rome, in affiliating the Maronites, has granted them an hospitium at Rome, to which they may send several of their youth to receive a gratuitous education. It should seem that this institution might introduce among them the ideas and arts of Europe; but the pupils of this school, limited to an education purely monastic, bring home nothing but the Italian language, which is of no use, and a stock of theological learning, from which as little advantage can be derived; they accordingly soon assimilate with the rest. Nor has a greater change been operated by the three or four missionaries maintained by the French capuchins at Gazir, Tripoli, and Bairout. The most valuable advantage that has resulted from their labors is, that the art of writing has become more common among the Maronites, and rendered them, in this country, what the Copts are in Egypt; that is, they are in possession of all the posts of writers, intendants, and kaiyas among the Turks, and especially of those among their allies and neighbors, the Druses.

Mosheim observes, that the subjection of the Maronites to the spiritual jurisdiction of the Roman pontiff was agreed to with this express condition, that neither the popes nor their emissaries should pretend to change or abolish any thing that related to the ancient rites, moral precepts, or religious opinions of this people; so that, in reality, there is nothing to be found among the Maronites that savors of popery, if we except their attachment to the Roman pontiff. It is also certain that there are Maronites in Syria, who still behold the church of Rome with the greatest aversion and abhorrence; nay, what is still more remarkable, great numbers of that nation residing in Italy, even under the eye of the pontiff, opposed his authority during the seventeenth century, and threw the court of Rome into great perplexity. One body of these non-conforming Maronites retired into the valleys of Piedmont, where they joined the Waldenses; and another, above six hundred in number, with a bishop, and several ecclesiastics at their head, flew into Corsica, and implored the protection of the republic of Genoa, against the violence of the inquisitors.—Watson; Hend. Buck.

MARRIAGE; a civil and religious contract, by which a man is intimately and permanently united to one woman, for the various important ends ordained of God, Gen. 1: 28. 2: 18—24. Mal. 2: 14, 15. Matt. 19: 3—11. Eph. 5: 22—33. 6: 1—4. 1 Cor. 7: 2—39. It is founded on the original constitution of the sexes, and dignified by peculiar sentiments of affection, delicacy, and honor. Marriage is a part of the law of nations.

The public use of the marriage institution consists, according to Paley, in their promoting the following beneficial effects: 1. The private comfort of individuals. 2. The production of the greatest number of healthy children, their better education, and the making of due provision for their settlement to life. 3. The peace of human society, in cutting off a principal source of contention, by assigning one or more women to one man, and protecting his exclusive right by sanctions of morality and law. 4. The better government of society, by distributing the community into separate families, and appointing over each the authority of a master of a family, which has more actual influence than all civil authority put together. 5. The additional security which the state receives for the good behavior of its citizens, from the solicitude they feel for the welfare of their children, and from their being confined to permanent habitations. 6. The encouragement of industry. See also Dwight's Theology on this topic; and Anderson on the Domestic Constitution.

Whether marriage be a civil or a religious contract, has been a subject of dispute. The truth seems to be that it is both. It has its engagements to men, and its vows to God. A Christian state recognises marriage as a branch of public morality, and a source of civil peace and strength. It is connected with the peace of society by assigning one woman to one man, and the state protects him, therefore, in her exclusive possession. Christianity, by allowing divorce in the event of adultery, supposes, also, that the crime must be proved by proper evidence before the civil magistrate; and lest divorce should be the result of unfounded suspicion, or be made a cover for license, the decision of the case could safely be lodged nowhere else. Marriage, too, as placing one human being more completely under the power of another than any other relation, requires laws for the protection of those who are thus so exposed to injury. The distribution of society into families, also, can only be an instrument for promoting the order of the community, by the cognizance which the law takes of the head of a family, and by making him responsible, to a certain extent, for the conduct of those under his influence. Questions of property are also involved in marriage and its issue. The law must, therefore, for these and many other weighty reasons, be cognizant of marriage; must prescribe various regulations respecting it; require publicity of the contract; and guard some of the great injunctions of religion in the matter by penalties.

In every well-ordered society marriage must be placed under the cognizance and control of the state. But then those who would have the whole matter to lie between the parties themselves, and the civil magistrate, appear wholly to forget that marriage is also a solemn religious act, in which vows are made to God by both persons, who, when the rite is properly understood, engage to abide by all those laws with which he has guarded the institution; to love and cherish each other; and to remain faithful to each other until death. For if, at least, they profess belief in Christianity, whatever duties are laid upon husbands and wives in the Holy Scriptures, they engage to obey, by the very act of their contracting marriage.

2. We find but few laws in the books of Moses concerning the institution of marriage. Though the Mosaic law nowhere obliges men to marry, the Jews have always looked upon it as an indispensable duty implied in the words, "increase and multiply;" (Gen. 1: 28.) so that a man who did not marry his daughter before she was twenty years of age, was looked upon as accessory to any irregularities the young woman might be guilty of for want of being timely married. Moses restrained the Israelites from marrying within certain degrees of consanguinity; which had till then been permitted, to prevent their taking wives from among the idolatrous nations among whom they lived, Gen. 34: 3. A man was at liberty to marry not only in the twelve tribes, but even out of them, provided it was to a proselyte, or among such nations as used circumcision; such were the Midianites, Ishmaelites, Edomites, Moabites, and Egyptians. Accordingly, we find Moses himself married to a Midianite, and Boaz to a Moabite. Amasa was the son of Jether, an Ishmaelite, by Abigail, David's sister; and Solomon, in the beginning of his reign, married Pharaoh's daughter. Whenever we find him and other kings blamed for marrying strange women, we must understand it of those nations which were idolatrous and uncircumcised.

The laws of revelation, as well as most civilized countries, have made several exceptions of persons marrying who are nearly related by blood. (See LEVIRATE; and INCEST.) Some have supposed from those passages, 1 Tim. 3: 2. Tit. 1: 6, that bishops or pastors ought never to marry a second wife. But such a prohibition would be contrary to natural right, and the design of the law itself; neither of which was ever intended to be set aside by the gospel dispensation. It is more probably designed to guard against polygamy, and against divorce on frivolous occasions; both of which were frequent among the Jews, but condemned by our Lord, Matt. 19: 3—9. (See POLYGAMY; and DIVORCE.)

Marriage should always be entered into with deliberation; at a proper age; and with mutual consent; as well as with the consent of parents and guardians, under whose care single persons may be. It is an honorable state, (Heb. 13: 4.) being an institution of God, and that in Paradise, (Gen. 2.) Christ also honored marriage by his presence, and at such a solemnity wrought his first miracle, (John 2.) Moreover, it is honorable, as fornication, self-pollution, and seduction, are thereby prevented; the world peopled with inhabitants; families are formed and built up, supplying the important elements of churches and of states; candidates for heaven multiplied; and, by its various duties, life rendered an unspeakable blessing.

3. Among the Jews, at weddings, the bridegroom had a Paranympus, or bride-man, called by our Savior "the friend of the bridegroom;" John 3: 29. A number of young people kept him company during the days of the wedding, to do him honor; as also young women kept company with the bride all this time. The companions of the bridegroom are expressly mentioned in the history of Samson; (Judg. 14, and Cant. 5: 1. 8: 13.) also the companions of the bride; Cant. 1: 4. 2: 7. 3: 5. 8: 4. Ps. 45: 9, 14, 15. The office of the bride-man was to perform the ceremonies of the wedding, instead of the bridegroom, and to obey his orders. Some think that the Architrictinus or governor of the feast, at the marriage in Cana, was the bride-man, Paranympus, or friend of the bridegroom, who presided at the feast, and had the care of providing for the guests, John 2: 9. The friends and companions of the bride sang the Epithalamium, or wedding song, at the door of the bride the evening before the wedding. Psalm 45. is a sacred Epithalamium, entitled "a song of rejoicing of the well-beloved." The ceremony of the wedding was performed with great decorum, the young people of each sex being kept separate, in distinct apartments, and at different tables. The reservedness of the Eastern people towards their women required this; and we see proofs of it in the marriage of Samson, in that of Esther, and in the Canticles. The young men diverted themselves sometimes in proposing riddles, and the bridegroom appointed the prize to those who could explain them, Judg. 14: 14.

The wedding ceremonies commonly lasted seven days for a maid, and three days for a widow. So Laban says to Jacob, respecting Leah—"fulfil her week;" Gen. 29: 27. The ceremonies of Samson's wedding continued seven whole days, (Judg. 14: 17, 18.) as also those of that of Tobias, ch. 11: 12. These seven days of rejoicing were commonly spent in the house of the woman's father, after which they conducted the bride to her husband's home. (See MARRIAGE CEREMONY.)

The procession accompanying the bride from the house of her father to that of the bridegroom was generally one of great pomp, according to the circumstances of the married couple; and for this they often chose the night. "At a marriage, the procession of which I saw some years ago," says Mr. Ward, (View of Hist. of Hindoos, vol. iii. p. 171, 172.) "the bridegroom came from a distance, and the bride lived at Serampore, to which place the bridegroom was to come by water. After waiting two or three hours, at length, near midnight, it was announced, as if in the very words of Scripture, "Behold! the bridegroom cometh, go ye out to meet him." All the persons employed now lighted their lamps, and ran with them in their hands to fill up their stations in the procession; some of them had lost their lights, and were unprepared, but it was then too late to seek them, and the cavalcade moved forward to the house of the bride, at which place the company entered a large and splendidly illuminated area, before the house, covered with an awning, where a great multitude of friends, dressed in their best apparel, were seated upon mats. The bridegroom was carried in the arms of a friend, and placed in a superb seat in the midst of the company, where he sat a short time, and then went into the house, the door of which was immediately shut, and guarded by Sepoys. I and others expostulated with the door-keepers, but in vain. Never was I so struck with our Lord's beautiful parable, as at this moment:—and the door was shut." See Matt. 25: 1—13.

From a parable of Christ, in which a great king is represented as making a most magnificent entertainment at the marriage of his son, (Matt. 22.) we learn that all the guests, who were honored with an invitation, were expected to be dressed in a manner suitable to the splendor of such an occasion, and as a token of just respect to the new married couple; and that after the procession, in the evening, from the bride's house was concluded, the guests, before they were admitted into the hall where the entertainment was served up, were examined, that it might be known if any stranger had intruded, or if any of the company were apparelled in raiment unsuitable to the genial solemnity they were going to celebrate; and such, if found, were expelled the house with every mark of ignominy and disgrace. From the knowledge of this custom the following passage receives great light and lustre. When the king came in to see the guests, he discovered among them a person who had not on a wedding garment. He called him and said: Friend, how came you to intrude into my palace in a dress so unsuitable to this occasion?—The man was struck dumb; he had no apology to offer for this disrespectful neglect. The king then called to his servants, and bade them bind him hand and foot—to drag him out of the room—and thrust him out into the midnight darkness. (See HABITS IN DRESS.)

3. When this important contract is once made, then certain rights are acquired by the parties mutually, who are also bound by reciprocal duties, in the fulfilment of which the practical virtue of each consists. And here the superior character of the morals of the New Testament, as well as their higher authority, is illustrated. It may, indeed, be within the scope of mere moralists to show that fidelity, and affection, and all the courtesies necessary to maintain affection, are rationally obligatory upon those who are connected by the nuptial bond; but in Christian nuptial fidelity is guarded by the express law, "Thou shalt not commit adultery," and by our Lord's exposition of the spirit of that law which forbids the indulgence of loose thoughts and desires, and places the purity of the heart under the guardianship of that hallowed fear which his authority tends to inspire. Affection, too, is made a matter of diligent cultivation upon considerations, and by a standard, peculiar to our religion. Husbands are placed in a relation to their wives, similar to that which Christ bears to his church, and his example is thus made their rule. As Christ loved the church, so husbands are to love their wives; as Christ "gave himself," his life, "for the church," (Eph. 4: 25.) so are they to hazard life for their wives; as Christ saves his church, so is it the bounden duty of husbands to endeavor, by every possible means, to promote the religious edification and salvation of their wives. The connexion is thus exalted into a religious one; and when love which knows no abatement, protection at the hazard of life, and a tender and constant solicitude for the salvation of a wife, are thus enjoined, the greatest possible security is established for the exercise of kindness and fidelity. The reciprocal duties on the part of the wife are, affectionate reverence, subjection, obedience, assistance, sympathy, modesty, love, chaste, single, Christian, constant and faithful unto death, Eph. 5: 32, 33. Tit. 2: 5. 1 Tim. 5: 11, 12. Ruth 1: 16. (See articles DIVORCE; PARENT.) Grove's Mor. Phil., vol. ii. p. 470; *Paley's Mor. MARRIAGE, (CHRISTIAN RULE OF.) The importance of regulating the conjugal alliance on religious principles, was, according to the record of the Old Testament, practically recognised at a very early period. The intermixture, by marriage, of the professed servants and worshippers of God, with those by whom his authority was disowned, was first branded, and afterwards positively forbidden by divine authority; denounced as an evil, the results of which were most injurious to the interests of religion, and which exposed those who fell into it to the condign and awful displeasure of the Most High. Now, although there were some circumstances attending the marriages in this manner denounced, which do not directly apply to the state of society in our own country, (especially the circumstance that the people with whom such intercourse was forbidden, were idolaters,) yet there is much, as must be evident to every pious observer, that illustrates the sin and danger of forming so intimate and permanent a union in life with the ungodly. The general fact is hence clearly deducible, that there is an influence in marriage strongly affecting the character, which demands from those who are anxious for moral rectitude and improvement, much of caution as to the manner in which their affections are fixed; and that unequal alliances—alliances where the parties are actuated by different spiritual habits and desires, and where good is made to meet and combine with bad, encountering most imminently the danger of seduction and pollution—are guilty, unnatural, and monstrous. The expression of the divine authority, in application to the Jews, is to be regarded as comprehending the principle of his people in all ages, that here they ought not to walk in the counsel of the ungodly, nor to stand in the way of sinners.

What we thus are enabled to conclude from the Old Testament, will be still more distinctly exemplified from the New. The evangelical writings do not indeed frequently offer directions expressly on the subject of marriage; the point appearing rather to be assumed than argued, that in Christian marriage, the husband and wife ought both, in the emphatic terms of the apostle Peter, to be and walk as being "heirs together of the grace of life."

In the first epistle to the Corinthians, the apostle Paul applies himself to a question which seems at that time have been agitated—whether Christians, who, previous to their conversion, had contracted marriages with unbelievers, ought not to be actually divorced from the wives or husbands remaining in unbelief, because of the evil and peril attending the continuance of the alliance. Such an extreme, advocated by some, he considers as uncalled for 1 Cor. 7: 10—17. But respecting the formation of a new matrimonial connexion by a believer, (the case taken being that of a believing widow, though the rule of course extends to all,) this is the direction:—"She is at liberty to be married to whom she will, only in the Lord," 1 Cor. 7: 39. Here is a simple proclamation, the force of which is permanent, and in submission to which Christians, in every period, should act. They are to marry "only in the Lord." They, being themselves "in the Lord,"—united to the Lord Jesus by the Divine Spirit, and possessing an interest in the redeeming blessings he has purchased, are to marry only on Christian principles, and of course only such as are thus also "in the Lord"—believer with believer, and with none else. This is the obvious meaning of the passage, which no sophism can evade or fritter away.

It would be easy to employ the attention further, on the general statements contained in the word of God, respecting the character of separation from the world, which ought to be sustained by his church, the ends for which it is called, and the objects it is bound to perform; statements which all bear on the principle as to marriage; operating to enforce and to confirm it. See especially 2 Cor. 6: 14—18. 7: 1. But, without amplifying here, and satisfied that this principle receives, from the testimony already quoted, a convincing and solemn establishment, the reader is requested to ponder a truth, which is as indubitable as it ought to be impressive; namely, that marriages formed by Christians in violation of the religious design of the institute, and of the express principles of their religion, are connected with evils many and calamitous, most earnestly to be deprecated, and most cautiously to be avoided. Is it indeed to be expected on the ground of religion, that an act can be committed against the expressed will of the Most High God, without exposing the transgressor to the scourge of his chastisement? Is it to be expected, on the ground of reason, that an alliance can be formed between individuals whose moral attributes and desires are essentially incompatible, without creating the elements of uneasiness, discord, and disappointment? Excited imagination and passion may delude with the belief of innocence and hope of escape; but religion and reason speak the language of unchangeable veracity, and are ever justified in the fulfilments of experience, and of fact.

The operation of the evil results whose origin is thus deduced, is of course susceptible of modifications from several circumstances in domestic and social life; and, for many reasons, the degrees of public exhibition and of personal pressure may vary. Yet it may be remarked uniformly, respecting these results,—they are such as deeply affect the character. A reference has already been made to the moral influence of marriage; and as the marriages stigmatized under the patriarchal, and forbidden and punished under the Jewish dispensation, were obnoxious on account of the contamination into which they led the professed people of God, so are the marriages of Christians with worldlings in this age, a worldly spirit being still the essence of idolatry, (James 4: 4. Col. 3: 5. 1 John 2: 15—17. Matt. 6: 24.) the objects of censure and deprecation, because of the baneful effect they exert on those who are numbered among the redeemed of the Lord. Such marriages as these present constant and insinuating temptations to seduce Christians to worldly dispositions and pursuits; they enfeeble their spiritual energies; interfere with their communion with God; hinder their growth in the attainments of divine life; check and oppose their performance of duty and their pursuit of usefulness, in the family, the church, and the world. The writer of this article has never known or heard of (what he feels justified in terming) a forbidden marriage, which, if its original character were continued, did not pollute and injure. Some instances have been most palpable and painful; nor can it be considered but as a truth unquestionable and notorious, that whoever will so transgress, invokes a very blighting of the soul. It may be remarked respecting these results, again, they are such as deeply affect happiness. Christian religion and Christian happiness are closely connected: if the one be hurt, the other will not remain untouched. And who sees not in the unhalloved alliance a gathering of the elements of sorrow? Are there not ample materials for secret and pungent accusations of conscience, that agitate the heart with the untold pangs of self-condemnation and remorse? Is there not reason for the bitterness of disappointment, and the sadness of foreboding fear, because the best intercourse is unknown—the purest affection is impossible—the noblest union is wanting—and the being on whom the spirit would repose, is, to all that is the sweetest and most sublime in human sympathies, human joys, and human prospects, an alien and a stranger? And what must be the horror of that anticipation which sets forth the event of a final separation at the bar of God, when, while the hope of personal salvation may be preserved, the partner of the bosom is seen as one to be condemned by the Judge, and banished with everlasting destruction from his presence and the glory of his power! O the infatuation of the folly which leads to unite, where are created evils like these, rather than where God will sanction, and where time and eternity will both combine to bless!

Its effects upon what may be regarded as the supreme end of the marriage relation—the religious education of children, is another most distressing consideration. What must it be! What has it ever been!

That much injury therefore has arisen to the public interests of the church of Christ from this transgression cannot be doubted. Injury done to individual character, is injury done to the community to which the individual is attached. It has always been a fact, that whoever sins in the household of faith, sins not only against himself, but against others; and that this transgression is one peculiarly extended in its influence; operating more than, perhaps, any one else which can be named, to bring religion from its vantage ground, to clog its progress, and to retard its triumph. Cong. Mag., May, 1831; Jay on Marriage; Malcom on the Christian Rule of Marriage; H. More's Catechism in Search of a Wife; and the works referred to under the article MARRIAGE.—Hend. Buck.

MARRIAGE CEREMONY. The forms of solemnizing marriage, even among Christians, differ in different places. In Lutheran countries, as in the United States, it is generally celebrated in private houses. In Scotland, like all other religious services of that country, it is extremely simple, and is performed in the session house, the residence of the minister, or the private house of some friend of one of the parties. But in England, it can only be legally administered at the altar, before which, in the body of the church, the parties are placed, after having mutually joined hands and pledged their mutual troth, according to a set form of words, which they say after the minister. Quakers and Jews are the only exceptions at present; although efforts are now making to so alter the marriage law, as to allow all dissenters the liberty of solemnizing marriage in their own way. See an Appeal to Dissenters, by J. Wilson, Esq. of the Inner Temple, 1832.

The ancient Jews celebrated their marriages in a manner much like that which still prevails in the East. The wedding festival lasted several days, as may be seen in the case of Samson, and of Jacob at an earlier period. On the last day the bride was conducted to the house of the bridegroom's father. The procession generally set off in the evening with much ceremony and pomp. The companions of each attended them with songs and music of instruments. The way as they went along was lighted by numerous torches. In the mean time, another company, consisting of the young friends of the bridegroom, was waiting at the bridegroom's house, ready at the first notice of their approach to go forth and meet them. They joined themselves to the procession, and the whole company moved forward to the house, where an entertainment was provided for them, and the remainder of the evening was spent in cheerful participation of the marriage supper, with such social merriment as suited the joyous occasion. (See MARRIAGE.)

In modern times, the Jews have a regular formal marriage rite by which the union is solemnly ratified. The parties stand up under a canopy, each covered by a veil; some grave person takes a cup of wine, pronounces a short blessing, and hands it to be tasted by both; the bridegroom puts a ring on the finger of the bride, saying, By this ring thou art my spouse according to the custom of Moses and the children of Israel! The marriage contract is then read and given to the bride's relations; another cup of wine is brought and blessed six times, when the married couple taste it, and pour the rest out in token of cheerfulness; and to conclude all, the husband dashes the cup itself against the wall, and breaks it all to pieces, in memory of the sad destruction of their once glorious temple.—Hebd. Buck.

MARRIAGE VEIL. (See VEIL.)

MARROW-MEN; otherwise called the Twelve Brethren, and the Representers; those ministers of the Scotch church who, about the beginning of last century, advocated the evangelical views contained in a book called the "Marrow of Modern Divinity," which at that time had been republished and widely circulated in Scotland, and paved the way for the secession which afterwards followed. This book having been condemned by an act of the general assembly, a representation was drawn up and signed by the following twelve ministers:—James Hogg, Thomas Boston, John Bonnar, James Kidd, Gabriel Wilson, Ebenezer Erskine, Ralph Erskine, James Wardlaw, James Bathgate, Henry Davidson, William Hunter, and John Williamson. This representation they gave in to the Assembly; but after a great deal of vexation and opposition, they were dismissed from its bar with a rebuke and admonition. The Representers were not only accurate and able divines, and several of them learned men, but ministers of the most enlightened and tender consciences, enemies in doctrine and practice to all licentiousness, and shining examples of true holiness in all manner of conversation. They were at the same time zealous adherents to the Confession of Faith and the Catechisms. The term Marrowmen and Anti-Marrowmen now became denominative of evangelical and legal preachers; and from this time may be dated the commencement of an extensive and remarkable revival of religion in Scotland.—Hebd. Buck.

MARS' HILL. (See ATHENS; and AREOPAGUS.)

MARTHA; sister of Lazarus and Mary, and mistress of the house where our Savior was entertained, in the village of Bethany. Martha is always named before Mary, probably because she was the elder sister. Whether she was truly pious, previous to the time referred to Luke 10: 38, is extremely doubtful. That she was afterwards, at the period of her brother's death, is certain, John 11: 1—27. May we not hope that the Savior's well-known reproof was the means of her real conversion from the world to God?

MARTIN, bishop of Rome in the seventh century, was born at Todi, in Italy, and received from his parents an excellent education. Accomplished by the united endowments of divine grace and human science, he was elected in the death of Theodore to succeed him in the church at Rome, by the unanimous voice of the people. His character seems to have well merited the important trust; the duties of which he discharged in the most faithful and affectionate manner. His zeal however in calling a council which condemned the opinion of the Monothelites, incensed the emperor, who seized him under the false pretence of treason; and after various indignities, which he mockingly endured, put him to death, A. D. 665.—Fox, p. 80.

MARTINA, a Christian martyr in the reign of the tyrant Maximinus, was a noble and beautiful virgin of Rome, who for the sake of Christ suffered manifold tortures, which were finished at length by the sword of the executioner, A. D. 235.

Multitudes of Christians in the course of this three years' persecution were slain without trial, and buried indiscriminately in heaps, fifty or sixty being sometimes cast into a pit together.—Fox, p. 25, 26.

MARTYN, (HENRY,) missionary to India and Persia, was born at Truro, in the county of Cornwall, on the 18th of February, 1781. His father educated him piously and respectfully. His residence at St. John's college, where his name had been previously entered in the summer, commenced in the month of October, 1797.

The tenor of Henry Martyn's life, during this and the succeeding year he passed at college, was, to the eye of the world, in the highest degree amiable and commendable. He was outwardly moral; with little exception, was unwearied in application, and exhibited marks of no ordinary talent. But whatever may have been his external conduct, and whatever his capacity in literary pursuits, he seems to have been totally ignorant of spiritual things, and to have lived "without God in the world." At length, however, it pleased God to convince Henry, by a most affecting visitation of his providence, that there was a knowledge far more important to him than any human science; and that, whilst contemplating the heavens by the light of astronomy, he should devote himself to his service, who, having made those heavens, did, in his nature, pass through them as his mediator and advocate. But his conversion did not improperly interfere with his literary pursuits. His decided superiority in mathematics, therefore, soon appeared; and the highest academical honor was adjudged him in January, 1801, a period when he had not completed the twentieth year of his age. Mr. Martyn's engagements consisted chiefly in instructing some pupils, and preparing himself for the examination, which was to take place previous to the election in the month of March, 1802, when he was chosen fellow of St. John's. Soon afterwards, he obtained the first prize for the best Latin prose composition in the university. But with such exertions Mr. Martyn became dissatisfied, and he resolved to devote his future life to the service of God, as a CHRISTIAN MISSIONARY, in connexion with the Church Missionary society. The situation of a chaplain to the East India company, had long appeared to many of those who took a lively interest in him and his work, to be peculiarly eligible, as offering singular facilities for missionary exertions amongst millions of idolaters.

The commencement of Mr. Martyn's ministry, amongst the Europeans at Dinapore, in India, was not of such a kind as either to gratify or encourage him. At first he read prayers to the soldiers at the barracks, on the long drum, and as there was no place for them to sit, was desired to omit his sermon. On Sunday, March 15, 1805, he commenced the performance of divine worship in the vernacular language of India, concluding with an exhortation from the Scripture in the same tongue. The spectacle was as novel as it was gratifying, to behold two hundred women, Portuguese, Roman Catholics, and Mohammedans, crowding to attend the service. In addition to Mr. Martyn's studies in Sanceri, Persian, and Hindostanee, we find him now sedulously employed in reading Leland against the deistical writers; and thence drawing out arguments against the Koran. Throughout the year 1808, Mr. Martyn's life flowed on in the same course of uniformity and usefulness. He continued to minister to the Europeans and the natives at the hospitals, and daily received the more religious part of his flock at his own house, whilst his health permitted: to this was added the revisal of the sheets of the Hindostanee version of the New Testament, which he had completed; the superintendence of the Persian translation, confided to Sabat; and the study of Arabic, that he might be fully competent to superintend another version of the New Testament into that tongue.

Mr. Martyn's removal from Dinapore to Cawnpore was to him, in many respects, a very unpleasant arrangement. He was several hundred miles farther distant from Calcutta, and was far more widely separated than before from his friend Mr. Corrie: he had new acquaintances to form at his new abode; and, after having, with much difficulty, procured the erection of a church at Dinapore, he was transported to a spot where none of the conveniences, much less the decencies and solemnities, of public worship were visible. We find him, soon after he arrived there, preaching to a thousand soldiers, drawn up in a hollow square, when the heat was so great, although the sun had not risen, that many actually dropped down, unable to support it.

The close of the year 1809 was distinguished by the commencement of Mr. Martyn's first public ministrations among the heathen. A crowd of mendicants, whom, to prevent perpetual interruptions, he had appointed to meet on a stated day, for the distribution of alms, frequently assembled before his house in immense numbers, presenting an affecting spectacle of extreme wretchedness. To this congregation he determined to preach the word of life. The following Sunday he preached again to the beggars, in number about five hundred, when all he said was received with great applause. And on the last day of the year he again addressed them, their number amounting to above five hundred and fifty.

The two last years of his life were spent at Shiraz, in Persia, among the Mohammedans. Here, however, his health rapidly declining, after having preached a sermon on the anniversary of the Calcutta Bible society, which was afterwards printed, and entitled, "Christian India; or, an Appeal on behalf of nine hundred thousand Christians in India who want the Bible;" Mr. Martyn departed forever from those shores, where he had fondly and fully purposed to spend all his days. At Teocat, on the 16th of October, 1812, either falling a sacrifice to the plague, which then raged there, or sinking under that disorder, which so greatly reduced him, he surrendered his soul into the hands of his Redeemer. He had not completed the thirty-second year of a life of eminent activity and usefulness, and he died whilst hastening towards his native country, that, having there repaired his shattered health, he might again devote it to the glory of Christ, amongst the nations of the East.

With respect to his labors:—his own "works praise him in the gate," far above human commendation. By him, and by his means, the whole of the New Testament was translated into Hindostanee—a language spoken from Delhi to cape Comorin, and intelligible to many millions of immortal souls. The Psalms of David and the New Testament were rendered into Persian—the vernacular language of two hundred thousand who bear the Christian name, and known over one fourth of the habitable globe. By him, also, the imposture of the prophet of Mecca was daringly exposed, and the truths of Christianity openly vindicated, in the very heart and centre of a Mohammedan empire. A light has been kindled by him there, that will never go out. Even the Persian mollahs say of him, "Henry Martyn was never beat in an argument. He was a good man; a man of God!" But when it is considered, that the Persian and Hindostanee Scriptures are in wide and extensive circulation, who can ascertain the consequences which may have already followed, or foresee what may hereafter accrue, from their dispersion? Mr. Ward, of Scrampore, publicly acknowledged that the most successful missionary that had then visited India, was HENRY MARTYN! See Memoir, by Mr. Sargent, last Am. edition, 1832.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

MARTYR, (PETER,) a celebrated reformer and theologian, whose real name was Vermigli, was born, in 1500, at Florence. He was originally an Augustin monk, and became an eminent preacher, and prior of St. Fridian's, at Lucca. Having, however, embraced the Protestant doctrines, he found it necessary to quit his native country. After having been for some time professor of divinity at Strasburg, he was invited to England, and appointed professor of theology at Oxford. He left England, on the accession of Mary, and died in 1561, theological professor at Zurich. He wrote several works, of great erudition, among which are Commentaries upon parts of the Scriptures. His personal character is said to have been extremely amiable.—Davenport; Middleton, vol. i. p. 499.

MARTYR, is one who lays down his life or suffers death for the sake of his religion. The word is Greek, and properly signifies a "witness." It is applied by way of eminence to those who suffer in witness of the truth of the gospel.

The Christian church is illustrious with martyrs. Prophecy had foretold that so it should be, and history is filled with surprising accounts of their singular constancy and fortitude under the most cruel torments human nature was capable of suffering.

The primitive Christians were accused by their enemies of paying a sort of divine worship to martyrs. Of this we have an instance in the answer of the church of Smyrna to the suggestion of the Jews, who, at the martyrdom of Polycarp, desired the heathen judge not to suffer the Christians to carry off his body, lest they should leave their crucified master, and worship him in his stead. To which they answered, "We can neither forsake Christ, nor worship any other; for we worship him as the Son of God; but love the martyrs as the disciples and followers of the Lord, for the great affection they have shown to their King and Master." A like answer was given at the martyrdom of Fructuosus, in Spain; for when the judge asked Eulogius his deacon, whether he would not worship Fructuosus, as thinking, that, though he refused to worship the heathen idols, he might yet be inclined to worship a Christian martyr, Eulogius replied, "I do not worship Fructuosus, but him whom Fructuosus worships."

The primitive Christians believed that the martyrs enjoyed very singular privileges; that upon their death they were immediately admitted to the beatific vision, and that God would grant to their prayers the hastening of his kingdom, and shortening the times of persecution. Perhaps this consideration might excite many to court martyrdom, as we believe many did. It must be recollected, however, that martyrdom in itself is no proof of the goodness of our cause, only that we ourselves are persuaded that it is so. "It is not the blood, but the cause, that makes the martyr." (Mead.) Yet we may consider the number and fortitude of those who, in the first ages, suffered for Christianity as a collateral proof at least of its truth and excellence; for the thing for which they suffered was not a point of speculation, but a plain matter of fact, in which (had it been false) they could not have been mistaken. The martyrdom, indeed, of so many wise and good men, in succeeding ages, taken with a view of the whole system of Christianity, will certainly afford something considerable in its favor.—Hend. Buck.

MARTYRS, FESTIVALS OF. The festivals of the martyrs are of very ancient date in the Christian church, and may be carried back at least to the time of Polycarp, who suffered martyrdom about the year of Christ 168. On these days the Christians met at the graves of the martyrs, and offered prayers and thanksgivings to God for the example they had afforded them: they celebrated the eucharist, and gave alms to the poor; which, together with a pænegyrical oration or sermon, and reading the acts of the martyrs, were the spiritual exercises of these anniversaries.—Hend. Buck.

MARTYROLOGY; a catalogue or list of martyrs, including the history of their lives and sufferings for the sake of religion. Only a small proportion, however, have been rescued from destruction and oblivion. It is enough that their names are in the Lamb's Book of Life.

The martyrologies generally draw their materials from the calendars of particular churches, in which the several festivals dedicated to them are marked; and which seem to be derived from the practice of the ancient Romans, who inserted the names of heroes and great men in their fasti, or public registers.

The papal martyrologies are very numerous, and contain many ridiculous, and even contradictory narratives; which is easily accounted for, if we consider how many forged and spurious accounts of the lives of saints and martyrs appeared in the first ages of the church, which the legendary writers afterwards adopted, without examining into the truth of them. However, some good critics, of late years, have gone a great way towards clearing the lives of the saints and martyrs from the monstrous heap of fiction they labored under. (See article LEGEND.)

The martyrology of Eusebius of Caesarea was the most celebrated in the ancient church. It was translated into Latin by Jerome; but the learned agree that it is not now extant. The martyrology of Jerome, says Du Sollier, is the great Roman martyrology; from this was made the little Roman one printed by Rosweyde: of this little Roman martyrology was formed that of Bede, augmented by Florus. Ado compiled his in the year 858. The martyrology of Nevelon, monk of Corbie, written about the year 1089, is little more than an abridgment of that of Ado: father Kircher also makes mention of a Coptic martyrology, preserved by the Maronites at Rome.

We have also several Protestant martyrologies, containing the sufferings of the reformed under the papists; viz. an English martyrology, by John Fox; with others by Clark, Bray, &c. (See PERSECUTION.)—Hend. Buck.

MARY; the mother of Jesus, and wife of Joseph. She is called by the Jews the daughter of Eli; and by the early Christian writers, the daughter of Joakim and Anna: but Joakim and Eliakim are sometimes interchanged, (2 Chron. 36: 4.) and Eli, or Heli, is therefore the abridgment of Eliakim, Luke 3: 23. She was of the royal race of David, as was also Joseph her husband; and she was also cousin to Elisabeth, the wife of Zacharias the priest, Luke 1: 5, 36.

Mary being espoused to Joseph, the angel Gabriel appeared to her, to announce to her that she should be by a miracle of divine power, the mother of the Messiah, Luke 1: 26, 27, &c. To confirm this message, and to show that nothing is impossible to God, he added that her cousin Elisabeth, who was old, and had been hitherto barren, was then in the sixth month of her pregnancy. Mary, thus convinced, answered, "Behold the handmaid of the Lord; be it unto me according to thy word." (See LUKE.)

Infidelity has busied itself with the basest conjectures, and most malignant misrepresentations of the extraordinary facts, recorded by the evangelists with such unpretending historical simplicity. But it should never be forgotten that this is but one link in a long chain of undoubted miracles. The subsequent scenes connected with the birth, and the presentation of Christ in the temple, the flight into Egypt, the slaughter of the innocents, and other events in the infancy of our Lord, are plainly related in the gospels. But his mother, it is said—and it marks her character of quiet thoughtfulness, profound piety, and deep maternal love—laid up all these things in her heart, Luke 2: 51, &c.

The gospel speaks nothing more of the virgin Mary till the marriage at Cana of Galilee, at which she was present with her son Jesus. She was at Jerusalem, at the last passover our Savior celebrated there. There she saw all that was transacted; followed him to Calvary; and stood at the foot of his cross with an admirable constancy and courage, though the sword, as Simeon foretold, pierced through her own heart. Jesus seeing his mother, and his beloved disciple near, he said to his mother, "Woman, behold thy son; and to the disciple, Behold thy mother. And from that hour the disciple took her home to his own house." No further particulars of this favored woman are mentioned, except that she was a witness of Christ's resurrection. A veil is drawn over her character and history; as though with the design to prove that wretched idolatry of which she was made the subject when Christianity became corrupt and paganized.

2. MARY, the mother of John Mark, a disciple of the apostles. She had a house in Jerusalem, whither, it is thought, the apostles retired after the ascension of our Lord, and where they received the Holy Ghost. After the imprisonment of St. Peter, the faithful assembled in this house, and were praying there when Peter, delivered by the ministry of an angel, knocked at the door of the house, Acts 12: 12.

3. MARY, of Cleophas. The best critics take Mary mother of James, and Mary wife of Cleophas, to be the same person, Matt. 27: 56. Mark 15: 40, 41. Luke 24: 10. John 19: 25. St. John gives her the name of Mary of Cleophas; and the other evangelists, the name of Mary, mother of James. Cleophas and Alpheus are the same person; as James, son of Mary, wife of Cleophas, is the same as James, son of Alpheus. It is thought she was the sister of the virgin Mary, and that she was the mother of James the Less, of Joseph, of Simon, and of Judas, who in the gospel are named the brethren of Jesus Christ, (Matt. 13: 55. 27: 56. Mark 6: 3.) that is, his cousin-germans. She was an early believer in Jesus Christ, and attended him on his journeys, to minister to him. She was present at the last passover, and at the death of our Savior she followed him to Calvary; and during his passion she was with the mother of Jesus at the foot of the cross. She was also present at his burial; and on the Friday before had, in union with others, prepared the perfumes to embalm him, Luke 23: 59. But going to his tomb very early on the Sunday morning, with other women, they there learned, from the mouth of an angel, that he was risen; of which they carried the news to the apostles, Luke 24: 1—5. Matt. 28: 9. By the way, Jesus appeared to them; and they embraced his feet, worshipping him. This is all we know with certainty concerning Mary, the wife of Cleophas.

4. MARY, sister of Lazarus, who has been preposterously confounded with that female sinner spoken of, Luke 7: 37—39. She lived with her brother and her sister Martha at Bethany; and Jesus Christ, having a particular affection for this family, often retired to their house with his disciples. Six days before the passover, after having raised Lazarus from the dead, he came to Bethany with his disciples, and was invited to sup with Simon the leper, John 12: 1, &c. Matt. 26: 6, &c. Mark 14: 3, &c. Mary, grateful for the recovery of so dear a brother, expressed her feelings in a costly manner. Judas Iscariot murmured; but Jesus justified Mary in what she had done, saying that by this solemn unction she had prevented his embalment, and in a manner had declared his death and burial, which were at hand. From this period the Scriptures make no mention of either Mary or Martha.

5. MARY MAGDALENE; so called, it is probable, from Magdala, a town of Galilee, of which she was a native, or where she had resided during the early part of her life. Out of her, St. Luke tells us, Jesus had cast seven devils, by whose malignant power she had been afflicted, Luke 8: 2. Some, without a shadow of proof, have supposed her to be the sinful woman spoke of, Luke 7: 37—39; as others have as erroneously imagined her to be Mary, the sister of Lazarus.

There is no doubt but that Mary Magdalene, both in character and circumstances, was a woman of good reputation, and high standing in society. She is mentioned by the evangelists as being one of those women that followed our Savior, to minister to him, according to the custom of the Jews. She attended him in the last journey he made from Galilee to Jerusalem, and was at the foot of the cross with the holy virgin; (John 19: 25. Mark 15: 47.) after which she returned to Jerusalem, to buy and prepare with others certain perfumes, that she might embalm him after the Sabbath was over, which was then about to begin. All the Sabbath day she remained in the city; and the next day, early in the morning, went to the sepulchre along with Mary, the mother of James, and Salome, Mark 16: 1, 2. Luke 24: 1, 2. For other particulars respecting her, see also Matt. 28: 1—5. John 20: 11—17.—Watson.

MASCARON, (JULIUS), a distinguished French prelate and pulpit orator, was born in 1634; entered among the priests of the Oratory; and soon became so popular a preacher that multitudes thronged from all quarters to hear him. In 1666, he was called to the court, to preach before Louis XIV.; and in 1671, he was raised to the see of Tulle, whence, in 1679, he was translated to that of Agen. He died in 1703. Of his funeral orations the most admired are those on Henrietta of England, the duke of Beaufort, and marshal Turenne.—Davenport.

MASCHIL; a title, or inscription, at the head of several psalms of David and others, in the book of Psalms. Thus Psalm 32 is inscribed, "A Psalm of David, Maschil;" and Psalm 42, "To the chief musician, Maschil, for the sons of Korah." The word Maschil, in the Hebrew, signifies, "he that instructs;" though some interpreters take it for the name of a musical instrument. Some of the rabbins believe that, in repeating the psalms which have this inscription, it was usual to add an interpretation or explication to them. Others, on the contrary, think it shows the clearness and perspicuity of such psalms, and that they needed no particular explication. The most probable opinion is, that Maschil means an instructive song.—Watson.

MASHAM, (Lady DAMARIS), daughter of the celebrated Cudworth, was born at Cambridge, England, in 1658. Her father perceiving the bent of her genius, took particular care of her education, so that she was early distinguished for piety and uncommon learning. She became the second wife of Sir Francis Masham, of Oates, in Essex; and repaid her father's care of her, in the admirable pains she took in the education of her only son.

In the study of divinity and philosophy she was greatly assisted by Mr. Locke, who lived in her family many of the last years of his life. She wrote a Discourse concerning the Love of God, 1691, 12mo; and Occasional Thoughts in reference to a Virtuous or Christian Life, 1700, 12mo; and drew up the account of Mr. Locke published in the great Historical Dictionary. She died in 1708.—Betham.

MASON, (JOHN MITCHELL, D. D.), a distinguished American divine and pulpit orator, was born in the city of New York, in 1770, and after graduating at Columbia college, prepared himself for the sacred ministry. His theological studies were completed in Europe. In 1792, he returned to New York, and was established in the ministry at that place till 1811, when he accepted the appointment of provost in Columbia college. This situation his ill health obliged him to resign, and he visited Europe to repair his constitution. On his return in 1817, he again resumed his labors in preaching, and in 1821, undertook the charge of Dickinson college, in Pennsylvania. In 1824, he returned to New York, and died in 1829. He was the author of Letters on Frequent Communion; a Plea for Sacramental Communion on Catholic Principles; and a number of Essays, Reviews, Orations, and Sermons, published at different times. They have recently been collected and published, in four volumes, octavo.

The mind of Dr. Mason was of the most robust order; his theology Calvinistic; and his style of eloquence powerful and irresistible as a torrent. When Robert Hall first heard him deliver before the London Missionary Society, in 1802, his celebrated discourse on Messiah's Throne, it is said he exclaimed, "I can never preach again!"—Davenport.

MASORA; a term, in the Jewish theology, signifying a work on the Bible, performed by several learned rabbins, to secure it from any alterations which might otherwise happen.

The work regards merely the letter of the Hebrew text, in which they have first fixed the true reading by vowels and accents; they have, secondly, numbered not only the chapters and sections, but the verses, words, and letters of the text; and they find in the Pentateuch five thousand two hundred and forty-five verses, and in the whole Bible twenty-three thousand two hundred and six. The Masora is called by the Jews the "hedge or fence of the law," because this enumeration of the verses, &c. is a means of preserving it from being corrupted and altered. They have, thirdly, marked whatever irregularities occur in any of the letters of the Hebrew text; such as the different size of the letters, their various positions and inversions, &c.; and they have been fruitful in finding out reasons for these mysteries and irregularities in them. They are, fourthly, supposed to be the authors of the Keri and Chetibh, or the marginal corrections of the text in our Hebrew Bibles.

According to Elias Levita, they were the Jews of a famous school at Tiberias, about five hundred years after Christ, who composed, or at least began, the Masora; whence they are called Masorites, and Masoretic doctors. Aben Ezra makes them the authors of the points and accents in the Hebrew text, as we now find it, and which serve for vowels.

The age of the Masorites, however, has been much disputed. Archbishop Usher places them before Jerome; Capel at the end of the fifth century; father Morin in the tenth century. Basnage says that they were not a society, but a succession of men; and that the Masora was the work of many grammarians, who, without associating and communicating their notions, composed this collection of criticisms on the Hebrew text. It is urged, that there were Masorites from the time of Ezra and the men of the great synagogue, to about the year of Christ 1030; and that Ben Asher and Ben Naphtali, who were the best of the profession, and who, according to Basnage, were the inventors of the Masora, flourished at this time. Each of these published a copy of the whole Hebrew text, as correct, says Dr. Prideaux, as they could make it. The eastern Jews have followed that of Ben Naphtali, and the western that of Ben Asher: and all that has been done since is to copy after them, without making any more corrections or masoretic criticisms.

There is a great and little Masora printed at Venice and at Basil, with the Hebrew text in a different character. Buxtorf has written a work on the Masorites, which he calls Tiberias.—Hend. Buck.

MASS, MISSA; in the church of Rome, the office of prayers used at the celebration of the eucharist; or, in other words, the consecrating the bread and wine so that it is transubstantiated into the body and blood of Christ, and offering them as an expiatory sacrifice for the quick and the dead. Nicod, after Baronius, observes that the word comes from the Hebrew mischach, (oblatum), or from the Latin missa missorum; because in former times the catechumens and excommunicated were sent out of the church, when the deacons said, "Ite, missa est," after sermon and reading of the epistle and gospel; they not being allowed to assist at the consecration. Menage derives the word from missio, "dismissing;" others, from missa, "sending;" because in the mass the prayers of men on earth are sent up to heaven.

As the mass is in general believed to be a representation of the passion of our blessed Savior, so every action of the priest, and every particular part of the service, are supposed to allude to the particular circumstances of his passion and death. The general division of masses is into high and low mass. The first is that sung by the choristers, and celebrated with the assistance of a deacon and sub-deacon: low masses are those in which the prayers are barely rehearsed without singing. There are a great number of different or occasional masses in the Romish church, many of which have nothing peculiar but the name. Such are the masses of the saints: that of St. Mary of the Snow, celebrated on the fifth of August; that of St. Margaret, patroness of lying-in women; that at the feast of St. John the Baptist, at which are said three masses; that of the Innocents, at which the gloria in excelsis and hallelujah are omitted; and, it being a day of mourning, the altar is of a violet color. As to ordinary masses, some are said for the dead, and, as is supposed, contribute to extricate the soul out of purgatory. At these masses the altar is put in mourning, and the only decorations are a cross in the middle of six yellow wax lights; the dress of the celebrant, and the very mass-book, are black; many parts of the office are omitted, and the people are dismissed without the benediction. If the mass be said for a person distinguished by his rank or virtues, it is followed with a funeral oration; they erect a chapelle ardente, that is, a representation of the deceased, with branches and tapers of yellow wax, either in the middle of the church, or near the deceased's tomb, where the priest pronounces a solemn absolution of the deceased. There are likewise private masses said for stolen or strayed goods or cattle, for health, for travellers, &c., which go under the name of votive masses. There is still a further distinction of masses, denominated from the countries in which they were used: thus the Gothic mass, or missa mosarabum, is that used among the Goths when they were masters of Spain, and which is still observed at Toledo and Salamanca; the Ambrosian mass is that composed by St. Ambrose, and used only at Milan, of which city he was bishop; the Gallic mass, used by the ancient Gauls; and the Roman mass, used by almost all the churches in the Roman communion.—Watson.

MASSALIANS, or MESSALIANS; a sect which sprung up about the year 361, in the reign of the emperor Constantius, who maintained that men have two souls, a celestial and a diabolical; and that the latter is driven out by prayer. From these words of our Lord, "Labor not for the meat that perisheth," it is said, that they concluded they ought not to do any work to get their bread. We may suppose, says Dr. Jortin, that this sect did not last long; that these sluggards were soon starved out of the world; or rather, that cold and hunger sharpened their wits, and taught them to be better interpreters of Scripture. It is more probable, however, that they have been misrepresented by their enemies.—Hend. Buck.

MASSILLON, (JEAN BAPTISTE,) the most eloquent of the French divines, was born in 1663, the son of a notary, at Hieres, in Provence. In 1681, he entered into the congregation of the Oratory, and wherever he was sent gained all hearts, by the liveliness of his character, the agreeableness of his wit, and a natural fund of sensible and captivating politeness. These advantages, united with his great talents, excited the envy of his brethren, no less than the admiration of others; and he was sent, by his superiors, to one of their houses, in the diocese of Meaux.

The first efforts of his eloquence were made at Vienne, while he was a public teacher of theology, and his funeral oration on Henri de Villars, archbishop of that city, was universally admired. The fame of this discourse induced father de la Tour, then general of the congregation of the Oratory, to send for him to Paris. After some time, being asked his opinion of the principal preachers in that capital—"They display," said he, "great genius and abilities; but, if I preach, I shall not preach as they do." He kept his word, and took up a style of his own, not attempting to imitate any one, except it was Bourdaloue, whom, at the same time, the natural difference of his disposition did not suffer him to follow very closely. A touching and natural simplicity is the characteristic of his style, and has been thought, by able judges, to reach the heart, and produce its due effects, with much more certainty than all the logic of Bourdaloue. His powers were immediately distinguished when he made his appearance at court; and at Versailles, he received this compliment from Louis XIV.: "My father, when I hear other preachers, I go away much pleased with them; but whenever I hear you, I go away much displeas'd with myself." On one occasion, the effect of a discourse preached by him, "On the Small Number of the Elect," was so extraordinary, that it raised the hearers from their seats, and produced a general, though involuntary murmur of applause in the congregation. The preacher himself was confus'd by it; but the effect was only increased, and the pathetic was carried to the greatest height that can be supposed possible.

His mode of delivery contributed not a little to his success. "We seem to behold him still in imagination," said they who had been fortunate enough to attend his discourses, "with that simple air, that modest carriage, those eyes so humbly directed downwards, that unstudied gesture, that touching tone of voice, that look of a man fully impressed with the truths which he enforced, conveying the most brilliant instruction to the mind, and the most pathetic movements to the heart." The famous actor, Baron, after hearing him, told him to continue as he had begun. "You," said he, "have a manner of your own; leave the rules to others." At another time, he said to an actor who was with him, "My friend, this is the true orator; we are mere players."

Massillon was not the least inflated by the praises he received. His modesty continued unaltered, and the charms of his society attracted those who were likely to be alarmed at the strictness of his lessons. In 1717, the regent, being convinced of his merits, by his own attendance on his sermons, appointed him bishop of Clermont. The French academy received him as a member in 1719. The funeral oration of the duchess of Orleans, in 1723, was the last discourse he pronounced at Paris. From that time he resided altogether in his diocese, where the mildness, benevolence, and piety of his character, gained all hearts. His love of peace led him to make many endeavors to conciliate his brethren of the Oratory and the Jesuits; but he found, at length, that he had less influence over divines, than over the hearts of sinners.

He died, resident on his diocese, in September, 1742, at the age of seventy-nine. His name has since been almost proverbial in France, where he is considered a consummate master of eloquence. His works were published, complete, by his nephew, at Paris, in 1745 and 1746, forming fourteen volumes of a larger, and twelve of a smaller kind of duodecimo.—Jones's Chris. Biog.; D'Alcembert.

MASTER; a person who has servants under him; a ruler or instructor. The duties of masters relate, 1. To the civil concerns of the family. To arrange the several businesses required of servants; to give particular instructions for what is to be done, and how it is to be done; to take care that no more is required of servants than they are equal to; to be gentle in our deportment towards them; to reprove them when they do wrong, to commend them when they do right; to make them an adequate recompense for their services, as to protection, maintenance, wages, and character. 2. As to the morals of servants. Masters must look well to their servants' characters before they hire them; instruct them in the principles and confirm them in the habits of virtue; watch over their morals, and set them good examples. 3. As to their religious interests. They should instruct them in the knowledge of divine things; (Gen. 14: 14. 18: 19.) pray with them, and for them; (Joshua 24: 15.) allow them time and leisure for religious services, &c., Eph. 6: 9. MATERIALISTS; a sect in the ancient church, composed of persons who, being prepossessed with that maxim in philosophy, "ex nihilo nihil fit," out of nothing, nothing can arise, had recourse to an eternal matter, on which they supposed God wrought in the creation, instead of admitting him alone as the sole cause of the existence of all things. Tertulian vigorously opposed them in his treasure against Hermogenes, who was one of their number.

Materialists are also those who maintain that the soul of man is material, or that the principle of perception and thought is not a substance distinct from the body, but the result of corporeal organization. Most of these theorists are sceptics; but some of them are professed believers in Christianity. We shall here state the views of this latter class, with their necessary consequences, and then briefly give the reasonings of their opponents.

1. The followers of the late Dr. Priestley are Materialists, and hence philosophical necessarians. According to the doctor's writings, he believed,

1. That man is no more than what we now see of him: his being commences at the time of his conception, or perhaps at an earlier period. The corporeal and mental faculties, inhering in the same substance, grow, ripen, and decay together; and whenever the system is dissolved, it continues in a state of dissolution till it shall please that Almighty Being who called it into existence, to restore it to life again. For if the mental principle were, in its own nature, immaterial and immortal, all its peculiar faculties would be so too; whereas we see that every faculty of the mind, without exception, is liable to be impaired, and even to become wholly extinct, before death. Since, therefore, all the faculties of the mind, separately taken, appear to be mortal, the substance, or principle, in which they exist, must be pronounced mortal too. Thus we might conclude that the body was mortal, from observing that all the separate senses and limbs were liable to decay and perish.

This system gives a real value to the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead, which is peculiar to revelation; on which alone the sacred writers build all our hope of future life; and it explains the uniform language of the Scriptures, which speak of one day of judgment for all mankind; and represent all the rewards of virtue, and all the punishments of vice, as taking place at that awful day, and not before. In the Scriptures, the heathens are represented as without hope, and all mankind as perishing at death, if there be no resurrection of the dead.

The apostle Paul asserts, in 1 Cor. 15, 16, that "if the dead rise not, then is not Christ risen; and if Christ be not raised, your faith is vain, ye are yet in your sins: then they also who are fallen asleep in Christ are perished." And again, ver. 32, "If the dead rise not, let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die." In the whole discourse, he does not even mention the doctrine of happiness or misery without the body.

If we search the Scriptures for passages expressive of the state of man at death, we find such declarations as expressly exclude any trace of sense, thought, or enjoyment. See Ps. 6: 5. Job 14: 7, &c.

2. That there is some fixed law of nature respecting the will, as well as the other powers of the mind, and every thing else in the constitution of nature; and, consequently, that it is never determined without some real or apparent cause foreign to itself; i. e. without some motive of choice; or that motives influence us in some definite and invariable manner, so that every volition, or choice, is constantly regulated and determined by what precedes it: and this constant determination of mind, according to the motives presented to it, is what is meant by its necessary determination. This being admitted to be fact, there will be a necessary connexion between all things past, present, and to come, in the way of proper cause and effect, as much in the intellectual as in the natural world; so that, according to the established laws of nature, no event could have been otherwise than it has been, or is to be, and therefore all things past, present, and to come, are precisely what the Author of nature really intended them to be, and has made provision for.

To establish this conclusion, nothing is necessary but that throughout all nature the same consequences should invariably result from the same circumstances. For if this be admitted, it will necessarily follow, that at the commencement of any system, since the several parts of it and their respective situations were appointed by the Deity, the first change would take place according to a certain rule established by himself, the result of which would be a new situation; after which, the same laws continuing, another change would succeed, according to the same rules, and so on forever; every new situation invariably leading to another, and every event, from the commencement to the termination of the system, being strictly connected; so that, unless the fundamental laws of the system were changed, it would be impossible that any event should have been otherwise than it was. In all these cases, the circumstances preceding any change, are called the causes of that change; and since a determinate event, or effect, constantly follows certain circumstances, or causes, the connexion between cause and effect is concluded to be invariable, and therefore necessary.

It is universally acknowledged, that there can be no effect without an adequate cause. This is even the foundation on which the only proper argument for the being of a God rests. And the necessarian asserts, that if, in any given state of mind, with respect both to dispositions and motives, two different determinations, or volitions, be possible, it can be on no other principle than that one of them should come under the description of an effect without a cause; just as if the beam of a balance might incline either way, though loaded with equal weights. And if any thing whatever, even a thought in the mind of man, could arise without an adequate cause, any thing else, the mind itself, or the whole universe, might likewise exist without an adequate cause.

This scheme of philosophical necessity implies a chain of causes and effects established by infinite wisdom, and terminating in the greatest good of the whole universe; evils of all kinds, natural and moral, being admitted, as far as they contribute to that end, or are in the nature of things inseparable from it. Vice is productive not of good, but of evil to us, both here and hereafter, though good may result from it to the whole system; and, according to the fixed laws of nature, our present and future happiness necessarily depend on our cultivating good dispositions.

This scheme of philosophical necessity the doctor distinguishes from the Calvinistic doctrine of predestination in the following particulars:—

1. No necessarian supposes that any of the human race will suffer eternally; but that future punishments will answer the same purpose as temporal ones are found to do; all of which tend to good, and are evidently admitted for that purpose. Upon the doctrine of necessity, also, the most indifferent actions of men are equally necessary with the most important; since every volition, like any other effect, must have an adequate cause depending upon the previous state of the mind, and the influence to which it is exposed.

2. The necessarian believes that his own dispositions and actions are the necessary and sole means of his present and future happiness; so that, in the most proper sense of the words, it depends entirely on himself whether he be virtuous or vicious, happy or miserable.

3. The Calvinistic system entirely excludes the popular notion of free will, viz., the liberty or power of doing what we please, virtuous or vicious, as belonging to every person, in every situation; which is perfectly consistent with the doctrine of philosophical necessity, and indeed results from it. [The doctor misrepresents CALVINISM.]

4. The necessarian believes nothing of the posterity of Adam's sinning in him, and of their being liable to the wrath of God on that account; or the necessity of an infinite Being making atonement for them by suffering in their stead, and thus making the Deity propitious to them. He believes nothing of all the actions of any man being necessarily sinful; but, on the contrary, thinks that the very worst of men are capable of benevolent intentions in many things that they do; and, likewise, that very good men are capable of falling from virtue, and consequently of sinking into final perdition. Upon the principles of the necessarian, also, all late repentance, and especially after long and confirmed habits of vice, is altogether and necessarily ineffectual; there not being sufficient time left to produce a change of disposition and character, which can only be done by a change of conduct of proportionably long continuance.

In short, in three doctrines of Materialism, Philosophical Necessity, and Socinianism, are considered as equally parts of one system. The scheme of necessity is the immediate result of the materiality of man; for mechanism is the undoubted consequence of materialism; and that man is wholly material, is eminently subservient to the proper or mere humanity of Christ. For if no man have a soul distinct from his body, Christ, who in all other respects appeared as a man, could not have a soul which had existed before his body: and the whole doctrine of the pre-existence of souls, of which the opinion of the pre-existence of Christ is a branch, will be effectually overturned. Such is the reasoning of Dr. Priestley.

II. Much has been written of late years against the doctrine of Materialism, and the different modifications which it has assumed; but the able and condensed argument of Wollaston, in his "Religion of Nature delineated," if well considered, will furnish every one with a most clear and satisfactory refutation of this antisciptural and irrational error. We can offer only a brief abstract. The soul cannot be mere matter: for if it is, then either all matter must think; or the difference must arise from a peculiar system of organization; or a faculty of thinking must be superadded to some systems of it, which is not superadded to others.

1. But, in the first place, that position which makes all matter to be cogitative, is contrary to all the apprehensions and knowledge we have of the nature of it; nor can it be true, unless our senses and faculties be contrived only to deceive us. Why doth the scene of thinking lie in our heads, and all the ministers of sensation make their reports to something there, if all matter be apprehensive and cogitative? For in that case there would be as much thought and understanding in our heels, and everywhere else, as in our heads. If all matter be cogitative, then it must be so as matter, and thinking must be of the essence and definition of it; but if so, we should not only continue to think always, till the matter of which we consist is annihilated, and so the assessor of this doctrine would stumble upon immortality unawares; but we must also have thought always in time past, ever since that matter was in being; nor could there be any the least intermission of actual thinking; which does not appear to be our case.

2. In the next place, the faculties of thinking, &c., cannot arise from a peculiar system of organization, because by organization bodies can only become greater or less, round or square, rare or dense, &c.; all which ideas are quite different from that of thinking; there can be no relation between them, except that of an instrument to an agent. These modifications and affections of matter are so far from being principles or causes of thinking and acting, that they are themselves but effects, proceeding from the action of some other matter or thing upon it, and are proofs of its passivity, deadness, and utter incapacity of becoming cogitative: this is evident to sense.

3. That faculty of thinking, so much talked of by some as superadded to certain systems of matter, fitly disposed, by virtue of God's omnipotence, though it be so called, must in reality amount to the same thing as another being, or nature, with the faculty of thinking. For a faculty of thinking alone will not make up the idea of a human soul, which is endued with many faculties; apprehending, reflecting, comparing, judging, making deductions and reasonings, willing, putting the body in motion, continuing the animal functions by its presence, and giving life; and therefore, whatever it is that is superadded, it must be something which is endued with all those other faculties. And whether that can be a faculty of thinking, and so these other faculties be only faculties of a faculty, or whether they must not all be rather the faculties of some spiritual nature, which being, by their own concession, superadded to matter, must be different from it, we leave the unprejudiced to determine. If men would but seriously look into themselves, the soul would not appear to them merely as a faculty of the body, or a kind of appurtenance to it, but rather as some intelligent being, properly placed in it, not only to use it as an instrument, and act by it, but also to govern it, or the parts of it, as the tongue, hands, feet, &c., according to its own reason. For we think it is plain enough, that the mind, though it acts under great limitations, doth, however, in many instances govern the body by its own will; and it is monstrous to suppose this governor to be nothing but some fit disposition, or accident, superadded, of that matter which is governed. A ship, it is true, would not be fit for navigation, if it was not built and provided in a proper manner; but then, when it has its proper form, and is become a system of materials fitly disposed, it is not this disposition that governs it: it is the man, that other substance, who sits at the helm, and they who manage the sails and tackle, that do this. So our vessels without a proper organization and conformity of parts would not be capable of being acted as they are; but still it is not the shape, or modification, or any other accident, that can govern them. The capacity of being governed or used can never be the governor, applying and using that capacity. No, there must be at the helm something distinct, that commands the body, and without which the vessel would run adrift, or rather sink.

For the foregoing reasons it is plain, that matter cannot think, cannot be made to think. But if a faculty of thinking can be superadded to a system of matter, without uniting an immaterial substance to it; yet a human body is not such a system, being plainly void of thought, and organized in such a manner as to transmit the impressions of sensible objects up to the brain, where the percipient, and that which reflects upon them, certainly resides; and therefore that which there apprehends, thinks, and wills, must be that system of matter to which a faculty of thinking is superadded. But all the premises well considered, judge whether, instead of saying that this inhabitant of our heads (the soul) is a system of matter to which a faculty of thinking is superadded, it might not be more reasonable to say, it is a thinking nature intimately united to that fine material vehicle, more or less perfectly organized, the brain. During our earthly life, by the will of the Father of spirits, these act in conjunction, that which affects the one affecting the other: the soul is detained in the body till the habitation is spoiled, and their mutual tendency to improvement interrupted, by some hurt or disease, or by the decays and ruins of old age, or the like.

By an accidental blow, the skull is beaten in, the brain is pressed upon, and the patient lies without sense or feeling. No sooner is the pressure removed than the power of thought immediately returns. It is known, again, that the phenomena of fainting arise from a temporary deficiency of blood in the brain; the vessels collapse, and the loss of sense immediately ensues. Restore the circulation, and the sense is as instantly recovered. On the contrary, when the circulation in the brain is too rapid, and inflammation of the organ succeeds, we find that delirium, frenzy, and other disorders of the mind arise in proportion to the inflammatory action, by which they are apparently produced. It is observed, also, that when the stomach is disordered by an excess of wine, or of ardent spirits, the brain is also affected through the strong sympathies of the nervous system, the intellect is disordered, and the man has no longer a rational command over himself or his actions. From these, and other circumstances of a similar nature, it is concluded, that thought is a quality or function of the brain; that it is inseparable from the organ in which it resides; and as Mr. Lawrence, after the French physiologists, represents it, that "medullary matter thinks."

Now it must certainly be inferred from all these circumstances, that there is a close connexion between the power of thinking and the brain; but it by no means follows, that they are, therefore, one and the same. Allowing, however, for a moment, the justice of the inference, from the premises which have been stated, we must remember, that we have not as yet taken in all the circumstances of the case. We have watched the body rather than the mind, and that only in a diseased state; and from this partial and imperfect view of the subject, our conclusions have been deduced.

But let us take the matter in another point of view. We have observed the action of the brain upon thought, and have seen that when the former is unnaturally compressed, the latter is immediately disordered or lost. Let us now turn our attention to the action of thought upon the brain. A letter is brought to a man containing some afflicting intelligence. He casts his eye upon its contents, and drops down without sense or motion. What is the cause of this sudden affection? It may be said that the vessels have collapsed, that the brain is consequently disordered, and that loss of sense is the natural consequence. But let us take one step backward, and inquire what is the cause of the disorder itself, the effects of which are thus visible. It is produced by a sheet of white paper distinguished by a few black marks. But no one would be absurd enough to suppose, that it was the effect of the paper alone, or of the characters inscribed upon it, unless those characters conveyed some meaning to the understanding. It is thought then which so suddenly agitates and disturbs the brain, and makes its vessels to collapse. From this circumstance alone we discover the amazing influence of thought upon the external organ; of that thought which we can neither hear, nor see, nor touch, which yet produces an affection of the brain fully equal to a blow, a pressure, or any other sensible injury. Now this very action of thought upon the brain clearly shows that the brain does not produce it, while the mutual influence which they possess over each other, as clearly shows that there is a strong connexion between them. But it is carefully to be remembered, that connexion is not identity. While we acknowledge then, on the one side, the mutual connexion of the understanding and the brain, we must acknowledge, on the other, their mutual independence. The phenomena which we daily observe lead us of necessity to the recognition of these two important principles.

If then from the observations which we are enabled to make on the phenomena of the understanding and of the brain, we are led to infer mutual independence, we shall find our conclusions still further strengthened by a consideration of the substance and composition of the latter. Not only is the brain a material substance, endowed with all those properties of matter which we have before shown to be inconsistent with thought, but it is a substance, which, in common with the rest of our body, is undergoing a perpetual change. Indeed experiments and observations give us abundant reason for concluding that the brain undergoes within itself precisely the same change with the remainder of the body. A man will fall down in a fit of apoplexy, and be recovered; in a few years he will be attacked by another, which will prove fatal. Upon dissection it will be found that there is a cavity formed by the blood effused from the ruptured vessel, and that a certain action had been going on, which gradually absorbed the coagulated blood. If then an absorbent system exists in the brain, and the organ thereby undergoes, in the course of a certain time, a total change, it is impossible that this flux and variable substance can be endowed with consciousness or thought. If the particles of the brain, either separately or in a mass, were capable of consciousness, then after their removal the consciousness which they produced must forever cease. The consequence of which would be, that personal identity must be destroyed, and that no man could be the same individual being that he was ten years ago. But our common sense informs us, that as far as our understanding and our moral responsibility are involved, we are the same individual beings that we ever were. If the body alone, or any substance subject to the laws of body, were concerned, personal identity might reasonably be doubted: but it is something beyond the brain that makes the man at every period of his life the same: it is consciousness, that, amidst the perpetual change of our material particles, unites every link of successive being in one indissoluble chain. The body may be gradually changed, and yet by the deposition of new particles, similar to those which absorption has removed, it may preserve the appearance of identity. But in consciousness there is real, not an apparent, individuality, admitting of no change or substitution.

So inconsistent with reason is every attempt which has been made to reduce our thoughts to a material origin, and to identify our understanding with any part of our corporeal frame! The more carefully we observe the operation, both of the mind and of the brain, the more clearly we shall distinguish, and the more forcibly shall we feel, the independence of the one upon the other. We know that the brain is the organ or instrument by which the mind operates on matter, and we know that the brain again is the chain of communication between the mind and the material world. That certain disorders therefore in the chain should either prevent or disturb this communication is reasonably to be expected; but nothing more is proved from thence than we knew before, namely, that the link is imperfect. And when that link is again restored, the mind declares its identity, by its memory of things which preceded the injury or the disease; and where the recovery is rapid, the patient awakes as it were from a disturbed dream. How, indeed, the brain and the thinking principle are connected, and in what manner they mutually affect each other, is beyond the reach of our faculties to discover. We must, for the present, be contented with our ignorance of the cause, while from the effects we are persuaded both of their connexion on the one hand, and of their independence on the other. MATHER, (INCREASE, D. D.,) a very pious and learned American divine, was born at Dorchester, in 1639; was educated to the ministry, and was settled in the North church, Boston, in 1664. He continued there for sixty-two years, discharging the duties of his sacred office with zeal and ability. In 1685, he was appointed to the presidency of Harvard college, which he resigned in 1701. He died in 1723. He was an indefatigable student, and published a variety of works on religion, politics, history, and philosophy.—Davenport.

MATHER, (COTTON, D. D.,) son of Increase Mather, and author of the celebrated "Essays to do Good," to which Franklin ascribes his desire to be useful, was born at Boston, Feb. 12, 1662-3. At twelve years old he had made such uncommon progress in the Latin and Greek languages, besides entering on the Hebrew, that it was thought proper to remove him to the university. Accordingly, he was admitted into Harvard college, where the progress he made in his academical studies was no way short of what he had made at school. Here he soon set himself to draw up systems of the sciences as he studied them, which he found to be an excellent means of perfecting himself in them. His systems of logic and physics were so far from contemptible, (though composed at an age when few lads are attempting any thing superior to themes at school,) that they have been valued and used for systems by some others since. Another excellent means of improvement, by the books he read, which he used from the beginning of his studies, was to write remarks upon them. Multitudes of such remarks were found among his papers, after his death. He took his first degree at sixteen years of age, and, in his nineteenth year, he proceeded master of arts. The thesis he exhibited and defended on that occasion was, concerning the divine authority of the Hebrew points, in which he maintained their authority. But the best and brightest ornament of Dr. Mather's character, was his early piety, for which he was no less remarkable than for his natural capacity, and his wonderful progress in learning. When he was grown a little above the age of childhood, he joined himself to a religious society of young men, who met on Lord's day evenings; and he used afterwards to ascribe much of the skill which he had attained in speaking and praying, to his early exercises in that society.

Dr. Mather had, from his cradle, an impediment in his speech, which seemed so opposed to his usefulness as a minister, that, for some time, he quite laid aside all thoughts of the ministry, and applied himself to the study of physic. But, by habituating himself to a deliberate way of speaking, he, in time, got rid of his impediment; and then, by the advice of his friends, he returned to the study of divinity; which he prosecuted with such successful application, that before he was eighteen years old, he was thought to be prepared for public service, and was advised to begin to preach; which accordingly he did, August 22, 1680, and accepted a call from the North church, at Boston.

Though, from the account which has been given of Dr.

Mather's labors in the ministry, one might naturally be led to think, that he could have time for nothing else, yet his heart was so set on doing good, in every possible way, that he redeemed time for several other valuable and useful services. He published a proposal for an evangelical treasury, in order to build churches where they were wanted, distribute books of piety, relieve poor ministers, &c., which his own church, and some others, readily acceded to. That he might the better extend his usefulness beyond the limits of his own country, he applied himself to the study of the modern languages. He learned the French and Spanish; and, in his forty-fifth year, he made himself so far master of the Iroquois Indian tongue, that he wrote and published treatises in each of those languages. In short, it was the great ambition of his whole life to do good. His heart was set upon it; he did not therefore content himself with merely embracing opportunities of doing good, that occasionally offered themselves, but he very frequently set apart much time on purpose to devise good; and he seldom came into any company without having this directly in his view. It was constantly one of his first thoughts in the morning, What good may I do this day? And that he might more certainly attend to the various branches of so large and comprehensive a duty, he resolved this general question, What good shall I do? into several particulars, one of which he took into consideration, while he was dressing himself, every morning; and as soon as he came into his study, he set down some brief hints of his meditations upon it. He had ordinarily a distinct question for each morning in the week. His question for the Lord's day morning constantly was, What shall I do, as a pastor of a church, for the good of the flock under my charge? Upon this he considered, what subjects were most suitable and seasonable for him to preach on; what families of his flock were to be visited, and with what particular view; and how he might make his ministry still more acceptable and useful.

He published, in his lifetime, three hundred and eighty-two books. Though many of them are indeed but small volumes, as single Sermons, Essays, &c. yet there are several among them of a much larger size: as his "Magnalia Christi Americana;" his "Christian Philosopher;" his "Ratio Discipline Fratrum Nov-Anglorum;" his "Directions to a Candidate for the Ministry," a book which brought him as many letters of thanks as would fill a volume. Besides all these, the doctor left behind him several books in manuscript; one of which, viz. his "Biblia Americana, or Illustrations of the Sacred Scriptures," was proposed to be printed in three volumes folio. The true motive that prompted him to write and publish so great a number of books, appears from the motto that he wrote on the outside of the catalogue, which he kept of his own works, viz. John 15: 8, "Herein is my Father glorified, that ye bear much fruit." He received various public honors with a grateful sense of his obligations to those that conferred them: he also considered them as encouragements, which the providence of God designedly ministered to his zeal and diligence in his sacred work; and he begged grace from on high to make a right improvement of them.

It might be said of Dr. Mather, with peculiar propriety, that "he was in the fear of the Lord all the day long," for he was almost continually conversing with God in his thoughts; and there was hardly a single occurrence that he met with in life, but he improved it, to awaken in his mind some pious thoughts, and, very commonly, into an occasion of short ejaculatory prayers. At length the life of Dr. Mather drew to a close, and he was, for a long time, confined to a bed of sickness. Many were the solemn blessings he pronounced on those that came to see him, and the serious charges which he gave them at parting. How earnestly did he wish and pray that the blessing of him, in whom all nations are to be blessed, might rest on the persons and families of his friends. Dr. Mather died the 13th of Feb. 1727-8, which was the next day after he had completed his sixty-fifth year. God was graciously pleased to favor him with an easy dismission out of life, and with a sweet composure of mind to the very last; blessings which he often and earnestly prayed for. the end of that man is peace." See his Life, written by Dr. Jennings.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

MATTHEW, called also Levi, was the son of Alpheus, but probably not of that Alpheus who was the father of the apostle James the Less. He was a native of Galilee; but it is not known in what city of that country he was born, or to what tribe of the people of Israel he belonged. Though a Jew, he was a publican or tax-gatherer under the Romans; and his office seems to have consisted in collecting the customs due upon commodities which were carried, and from persons who passed, over the lake of Gennesareth. St. Matthew, soon after his call, made an entertainment at his house, at which were present Christ and some of his disciples, and also several publicans. After the ascension of our Savior, he continued, with the other apostles, to preach the gospel for some time in Judea; but as there is no farther account of him extant, in any writer of the first four centuries, we must consider it as uncertain into what country he afterwards went, and likewise in what manner and at what time he died, though the general opinion is, that he preached and suffered martyrdom in Persia or Parthia.

2. In the few writings which remain of the apostolical fathers, Barnabas, Clement of Rome, Hermas, Ignatius, and Polycarp, there are manifest allusions to several passages in St. Matthew's gospel. This gospel is repeatedly quoted by Justin Martyr, but without mentioning the name of St. Matthew. It is both frequently quoted, and St. Matthew mentioned as its author, by Irenæus, Origen, Athanasius, Cyril, Epiphanius, Jerome, Chrysostom, and a long train of subsequent writers. It was, indeed, universally received by the Christian church; and we do not find that its genuineness was controverted by any early profane writer. We may therefore conclude, upon the concurrent testimony of antiquity, that this gospel is rightly ascribed to St. Matthew.

It is generally agreed, upon the most satisfactory evidence, that St. Matthew's gospel was the first which was written. Eusebius, who lived a hundred and fifty years after Irenæus, says, that Matthew wrote his gospel just before he left Judea to preach the religion of Christ in other countries; but when that was, neither he nor any other ancient author informs us with certainty. The impossibility of settling this point upon ancient authority has given rise to a variety of opinions among moderns. Of the several dates assigned to this gospel, which deserve any attention, the earliest is A. D. 38.

It appears very improbable that the Christians should be left any considerable number of years without a written history of our Savior's ministry. We may with reason conceive that the apostles would be desirous of losing no time in writing an account of the miracles which Jesus performed, and of the discourses which he delivered, because the sooner such an account was published, the easier it would be to inquire into its truth and accuracy; and, consequently, when these points were satisfactorily ascertained, the greater would be its weight and authority. We must own that these arguments are so strong in favor of an early publication of some history of our Savior's ministry, that we cannot but accede to the opinion of Jones, Wetstein, and Dr. Owen, that St. Matthew's gospel was written A. D. 35.

There has also of late been a difference of opinion concerning the language in which this gospel was originally written. In a question of this sort, however, which is a question of fact, the concurrent voice of antiquity is decisive. Though the fathers are unanimous, in declaring that St. Matthew wrote his gospel in Hebrew, yet they have not informed us by whom it was translated into Greek. It is, however, universally allowed, that the Greek translation was made very early, and that it was more used than the original. This last circumstance is easily accounted for. After the destruction of Jerusalem, the language of the Jews, and every thing which belonged to them, fell into great contempt; and the early fathers, writing in Greek, would naturally quote and refer to the Greek copy of St. Matthew's gospel, in the same manner as they constantly used the Septuagint version of the Old Testament. There being no longer any country in which the language of St. Matthew's original gospel was commonly spoken, that original would soon be forgotten; and the translation into Greek, the language then generally understood, would be substituted in its room. This early and exclusive use of the Greek translation is a strong proof of its correctness, and leaves us but little reason to lament the loss of the original.

"As the sacred writers," says Dr. Campbell, "especially the evangelists, have many qualities in common, so there is something in every one of them, which, if attended to, will be found to distinguish him from the rest. That which principally distinguishes St. Matthew, is the distinctness and particularity with which he has related many of our Lord's discourses and moral instructions. Of these, his sermon on the mount, his charge to the apostles, his illustration of the nature of his kingdom, and his prophecy on mount Olivet, are examples. He has also wonderfully united simplicity and energy in relating the replies of his Master to the cavils of his adversaries. Being early called to the apostleship, he was an eye-witness and ear-witness of most of the things which he relates; and though I do not think it was the scope of any of these historians, to adjust their narratives to the precise order of time wherein the events happened, there are some circumstances which incline me to think, that St. Matthew has approached at least as near that order as any of them." And this, we may observe, would naturally be the distinguishing characteristic of a narrative, written very soon after the events had taken place. The most remarkable things recorded in St. Matthew's gospel, and not found in any other, are the following: the visit of the eastern Magi; our Savior's flight into Egypt; the slaughter of the infants at Bethlehem; the parable of the ten virgins; the dream of Pilate's wife; the resurrection of many saints at our Savior's crucifixion; and the bribing of the Roman guard, appointed to watch at the holy sepulchre, by the chief priests and elders. Horne, and Hug's Introductions.—Watson.

MATTHIAS, the apostle, was first in the rank of our Savior's disciples, and one of those who continued with him from his baptism to his ascension, Acts 1: 21, 22. It is very probable he was of the number of the seventy, as Clemens Alexandrinus and other ancients inform us. We have no particulars of his youth or education, for we may reckon as nothing what is read in Abdias, or Obadiah, concerning this matter. The Greeks believe that Matthias preached and died at Colchis.—Watson.

MAURY, (JOHN SIFFREIN,) a French cardinal and statesman, was born, in 1746, at Vaurens, in the comtat Venaissin, and acquired great reputation by his eloquence as a preacher. He was one of the deputies of the clergy to the states general, and was conspicuous for his opposition to revolutionary measures. In 1791, he quitted France, and the pope made him a cardinal. Napoleon, in 1810, gave him the archbishopric of Paris. Maury died in 1817. He wrote an Essay on Eloquence; and other works.—Davenport.

MAXCY, (JONATHAN, D. D.,) a distinguished Baptist minister, and president of three colleges, was born at Atleborough, Mass., Sept. 2, 1763, and was graduated in 1787, at the college in Providence, of the Baptist church in which town he was ordained the pastor, Sept. 8, 1791. He was also professor of divinity in the college, and eleven years the president, from Sept. 6, 1792. In 1801, he succeeded Dr. Edwards as the president of Union college, Schenectady, in which office he was succeeded by Dr. Nott, in 1804. For the next fifteen years he was the first president of the college of South Carolina, in Columbia, where he died June 4, 1820, aged fifty-two. Dr. Maxcy was one of the most accomplished scholars and pulpit orators this country has produced. His character was very amiable, and his piety sincere. His health through life was delicate, and hence his change of situation. His death was that of the believer in Jesus, and his memory is widely revered. He published a Discourse on the Death of President Manning; on the Existence of God; on the Atonement, 1796; Address to a class, 1797; a Funeral Sermon before the legislature of South Carolina, 1818.—Allen.

MATURIN, (CHARLES ROBERT,) a divine, dramatist, and poet, was born, in 1782, in Ireland, and was educated at Trinity college, Dublin. Though he was popular for his eloquence as a preacher, his only church preferment was the curacy of St. Peter's, in the Irish metropolis. His pen was fertile, but the remuneration which he received could not save him from frequent embarrassments. His first three novels, The Fatal Revenge, The Wild Irish Boy, and The Milesian Chief, were published under the assumed name of Dennis Jasper Murphy. He died in 1825. Besides the works already mentioned, he wrote Sermons; The Universe, a poem; the novels of Melmoth, and Woman; and the tragedies of Bertram, Manuel, and Fredolpho. The genius of Maturin was great, but it was not always under the control of a pure taste.—Davenport.

MAYHEW, (EXPERIENCE,) minister on Martha's Vineyard, was born Jan. 27, 1673. His father, grandfather, and great-grandfather, were all engaged as missionaries to the Indians before him, and several hundred of them were converted to Christ. In March, 1694, about five years after the death of his father, he began to preach to the Indians, taking the oversight of five or six of their assemblies. The Indian language had been familiar to him from infancy, and he was employed by the commissioners of the society for propagating the gospel in New England to make a new version of the Psalms and of John, which work he executed with great accuracy in 1709. He died Nov. 29, 1758, aged eighty-five. He published a sermon, entitled, All Mankind by Nature equally under Sin, 1724; Indian Converts, 8vo, 1727; in which he gives an account of the lives of thirty Indian ministers, and about eighty Indian men, women, and youth, worthy of remembrance on account of their piety; a Letter on the Lord's Supper, 1741; Grace Defended, 8vo, 1744; in which he contends, that the offer of salvation, made to sinners in the gospel, contains in it a conditional promise of the grace given in regeneration. In this, he says, he differs from most Calvinists; yet he supports the doctrines of original sin, of eternal decrees, and of the sovereignty of God in the salvation of man.

His son Zechariah succeeded him in the missionary field, making five generations thus engaged. The age attained by the Mayhews is remarkable; the first, Thomas, died aged ninety; Experience, eighty-four; John, grandson of the first John, eighty-nine; his brother, Jeremiah, eighty-five; Dr. Matthew, eighty-five; Zechariah, seventy-nine. Indian Conv., Appen. 306, 307; Chauncy's Remarks on Landoff's Sermon, 23.—Allen.

MAYHEW, (JONATHAN, D. D.,) a divine of Boston, was born in Martha's Vineyard, in 1720, and educated at Harvard college. In 1747, he was ordained pastor of the West church, in Boston, and continued in this station the remainder of his life. He possessed a mind of great acuteness and energy, and in his principles was a determined republican. He had no little influence in producing the American revolution. His sermons and controversial tracts obtained for him a high reputation, and many of them were republished several times in England. He died in 1766.—Davenport.

MAZZAROTH, Job 38: 32. Our margin supposes this word to denote the twelve signs of the zodiac, a broad circle in the heavens, comprehending all such stars as lie in the path of the sun and moon. As these luminaries appear to proceed throughout this circle annually, so different parts of it progressively receive them every month, and this progression seems to be what is meant by "bringing forth mazzaroth in his season;" q. d. "Canst thou by thy power cause the revolutions of the heavenly bodies in the zodiac, and the seasons of summer and winter, which ensue on their progress into the regular annual or monthly situations?"—Calmet.

M'KEEN, (JOSEPH, D. D.,) first president of Bowdoin college, was born at Londonderry, New Hampshire, Oct. 15, 1757. He was graduated at Dartmouth college in 1774, and after being some time an assistant in the academy at Andover, he directed his attention to theology, and was ordained successor of Dr. Willard, as pastor of the church in Beverly, in May, 1785. Here he continued with reputation and usefulness seventeen years. Being chosen president of Bowdoin college, which had been incorporated eight years, but had not yet been carried into operation, he was inducted into that important office, Sept. 2, 1802. He died July 15, 1807, aged forty-nine, leaving the seminary, over which he had presided, in a very flourishing condition.

Dr. M'Keen possessed a strong and discriminating mind; his manners were conciliating though dignified, and his spirit mild though firm and decided. He was indefatigable in his exertions to promote the interests of science and religion. He was respectable for his learning and exemplary for his Christian virtues, being pious without ostentation, and adhering to evangelical truth without bigotry or superstition. He published several sermons, and some papers in the Transactions of the American academy: his inaugural address, with Mr. Jenks' eulogy, 1802.—Allen.

MEANS OF GRACE; those ordinances God has established as the channels of his mercy in Christ, and which we are to use for the purpose of improving our minds, affecting our hearts, and obtaining spiritual blessings; such are hearing the gospel, reading the Scriptures, self-examination, meditation, prayer, praise, Christian conversation, &c. The means are to be used without any reference to merit, solely with a dependence on the Divine Being; nor can we ever expect happiness in ourselves, nor be good examples to others, while we live in the neglect of them. It is in vain to argue that the divine decrees supersede the necessity of them, since God has as certainly appointed the means as the end. Besides, he himself generally works by them; and the more means he thinks proper to use, the more he displays his glorious perfections. Jesus Christ, when on earth, used means; he prayed, he exhorted, and did good, by going from place to place. Indeed, the systems of nature, providence, and grace, are all carried on by means. The Scriptures abound with exhortations to them, (Matt. 5. Rom. 12.) and none but enthusiasts or immoral characters ever refuse to use them. See Griffin's Park Street Lectures; Dwight's Theology; and Fulter's Works.—Hend. Buck.

MEASURE; that by which any thing is measured, adjusted, or proportioned. See the general table of Weights, Measures, and Money, of the Hebrews, at the end of this work. Also the particular names of each, as SHEKEL, TALENT, BATH, EPHAH, &c.—Calmet.

MEATS. (See FOOD, and ANIMALS.)

MEDAD and ELDAD; two men who were among those whom God inspired with his Holy Spirit, to assist Moses in the government, Num. 11: 26—30. The Jews affirm, that they were brothers by the mother's side to Moses, and sons of Jochbed and Elizaphan. They are divided about the subject of their prophecies; some thinking they prophesied concerning the quails that the Israelites were quickly to receive; others concerning the death of Moses, and the exaltation of Joshua.—Calmet.

MEDAN, or MAOAN, the third son of Abraham and Keturah, (Gen. 25: 2.) is thought, with Midian his brother, to have peopled the country of Midian or Madian, east of the Dead sea.—Calmet.

MEDE, (JOSEPH, B. D.), a learned English divine, was descended from a respectable family at Berden, in Essex, and born in 1586. He became a commoner of Christchurch, Cambridge, in 1602, where he took the degree of master of arts in 1610, having at this time made such progress in all kinds of learning, that he was universally esteemed an accomplished scholar. He was an acute logician, an accurate philosopher, a skilful mathematician, an excellent anatomist, a great philologist, a master of many languages, and a good proficient in history and chronology. He was appointed Greek lecturer on Sir Walter Mildmay's foundation, and particularly employed himself in studying the history of the Chaldeans and Egyptians. In 1627, he published at Cambridge his "Clavis Apocalypica," in quarto, to which he added, in 1632, "In Saucti Joannis Apocalypsin Commentarius, ad amussim Clavis Apocalypicae." An English translation of this celebrated work was published in London in 1650, entitled "The Key of the Revelation searched and demonstrated out of the natural and proper Characters of the Visions, &c., to which is added, a Conjecture concerning Gog and Magog." This work has been honored with high commendation from the learned Dr. Hurd, in his "Introduction to the Study of the Prophecies," vol. ii. p. 122, &c., where he characterizes him as "a sublime genius, without vanity, interest, or spleen, but with a single, unmixed love of truth, dedicating his great talents to the study of the prophetic Scriptures, and unfolding the mysterious prophecies of the Revelation." Mr. Mede died in 1638. A collection of the whole of his works was published in 1677, in two volumes, folio, by Dr. Worthington, who added to them a life of the author. He was a pious and profoundly learned man; and in every part of his works the talents of a sound and learned divine are eminently conspicuous. Biog. Brit.—Jones's Chris. Biog.

MEDIA. It has been commonly thought that Media was peopled by the descendants of Madai, son of Japheth, Gen. 10: 2. The Greeks maintain that this country took its name from Medus, the son of Medea. If, however, Madai and his immediate descendants did not peopple this country, some of his posterity might have carried his name thither, since we find it so often given to Media from the times of the prophets Isaiah and Jeremiah, and from the transportation of the ten tribes, and the destruction of Samaria under Shalmaneser, A. M. 3253.

Media Proper was bounded by Armenia and Assyria Proper on the west, by Persia on the east, by the Caspian provinces on the north, and by Susiana on the south. It was an elevated and mountainous country, and formed a kind of pass between the cultivated parts of eastern and western Asia. Hence, from its geographical position, and from the temperature, verdure, and fertility of its climate, Media was one of the most important and interesting regions of Asia.

Into this country the ten tribes who composed the kingdom of Israel were transplanted, in the Assyrian captivity, by Tiglath-pileser and Shalmaneser, 1 Chron. 5: 26. 2 Kings 17: 6. The geographical position of Media was wisely chosen for the distribution of the great body of the captives; for, it was so remote, and so impeded and intersected with great mountains and numerous and deep rivers, that it would be extremely difficult for them to escape from this natural prison, and return to their own country. They would also be opposed in their passage through Kir, or Assyria Proper, not only by the native Assyrians, but also by their enemies, the Syrians, transplanted thither before them. The superior civilization of the Israelites, also, and their skill in agriculture, and in the arts, would tend to civilize and improve those wild and barbarous regions.—Watson.

MEDIATOR; a person that intervenes between two parties at variance, in order to reconcile them. Thus Jesus Christ is the Mediator between an offended God and sinful man, 1 Tim. 2: 5. Both Jews and Gentiles have a notion of a Mediator: the Jews call the Messiah Amezoa, the Mediator, or Middle One. The Persians call their god Mithras, mesîrê, a mediator; and the demons, with the heathens, seem to be, according to them, mediators between the superior gods and men. Indeed, the whole religion of paganism was a system of mediation and intercession. The idea, therefore, of salvation by a Mediator, is not so novel or restricted as some imagine; and the Scriptures of truth inform us, that it is only by this way human beings can arrive at eternal felicity, Acts 4: 12. John 14: 6.

Man, in his state of innocence, was in friendship with God; but, by sinning against him, he exposed himself to his just displeasure; his powers became enfeebled, and his heart filled with enmity against him: (Rom. 8: 6.) he was driven out of his paradisaical Eden, and totally incapable of returning to God, and making satisfaction to his justice. Jesus Christ, therefore, was the appointed Mediator to bring about reconciliation; (Gen. 3: 12. Col. 1: 21.) and in the fulness of time he came into this world, obeyed the law, satisfied justice, and brought his people into a state of grace and favor; yea, into a more exalted state of friendship with God than was lost by the fall, Eph. 2: 18.

Now, in order to the accomplishing of this work, it was necessary that the Mediator should be God and man in one person. It was necessary that he should be man,—1. That he might be related to those of whom he was a Mediator and Redeemer.—2. That sin might be satisfied for, and reconciliation be made for it, in the same nature which sinned.—3. It was proper that the Mediator should be capable of obeying the law broken by the sin of man, as a divine person could not be subject to the law, and yield obedience to it, Gal. 4: 4. Rom. 5: 19.—4. It was met that the Mediator should be man, that he might be capable of suffering death; for, as God, he could not die, and without shedding of blood there was no remission, Heb. 2: 10, 15: 8: 3.—5. It was fit he should be man, that he might be a faithful high-priest, to sympathize with his people under all their trials, temptations, &c., Heb. 2: 17, 18: 4: 15.—6. It was fit that he should be a holy and righteous man, free from all sin, original and actual, that he might offer himself without spot to God, take away the sins of men, and be an advocate for them, Heb. 7: 26: 9: 14: 1 John 3: 5. (See INCARNATION.)

But it was not enough to be truly man, and an innocent person; he must be more than a man: it was requisite that he should be God also, for,—1. No mere man could have entered into a covenant with God to mediate between him and sinful men.—2. He must be God, to give virtue and value to his obedience and sufferings; for the sufferings of men or angels would not have been sufficient.—3. Being thus God-man, we are encouraged to hope in him. In the person of Jesus Christ the object of trust is brought nearer to ourselves; and those well-known, tender affections which are only figuratively ascribed to the Deity, are in our great Mediator thoroughly realized. Further, were he God, and not man, we should approach him with fear and dread; were he man and not God, we should be guilty of idolatry to worship and trust him at all, Jer. 17: 5. The plan of salvation, therefore, by such a Mediator, is the most suitable to human beings that possibly could be; for here "mercy and truth meet together, righteousness and peace kiss each other." Ps. 85: 10. (See JESUS CHRIST.)

The properties of Christ as Mediator are these:—1. He is the only Mediator, 1 Tim. 2: 4. Praying, therefore, to saints and angels, is an error of the church of Rome, and has no countenance from the Scripture.—2. Christ is a Mediator of men only, not of angels; good angels need not any; and as for evil angels, none is provided nor admitted.—3. He is the Mediator both for Jews and Gentiles, Eph. 2: 18. 1 John 2: 2.—4. He is Mediator both for Old and New Testament saints.—5. He is a suitable, constant, willing, and prevalent Mediator; his mediation always succeeds, and is infallible. MEDICINE, or the healing art, is an invention ascribed by Jesus, son of Sirach, to God himself, Ecclus. 38: 1, &c.

Scripture makes no mention of physicians before the time of Joseph, who commanded his servants, the physicians of Egypt, to embalm the body of Jacob, Gen. 50: 2. The art of medicine, however, was very ancient in Egypt. They ascribed the invention of it to Thaut, or to Hermes, or to Osiris, or to Isis; and some of the learned have thought that Moses having been instructed in all the learning of the Egyptians, must also have known the chief secrets of medicine. They also argue it from his accurate diagnosis, or indications concerning diseases, the leprosy, infirmities of women, animals, clean and unclean, &c. It does not appear that physicians were common among the Hebrews, especially for internal maladies; but for wounds, fractures, bruises, and external injuries, they had physicians, or surgeons, who understood the dressing and binding up of wounds, with the application of medicaments. See Jer. 8: 22. 46: 11. Ezek. 30: 21. But there was no remedy known for the leprosy, or for distempers which were the consequences of incontinence.

The low state of the art of medicine, with the persuasion that distempers were effects of God's anger, or were caused by evil spirits, was the reason that in extraordinary maladies the sufferers applied to various empirics, diviners, magicians, enchanters, or false gods. Sometimes they applied to the prophets of the Lord for cure; or, at least, to know whether they should recover or not, 2 Kings 5: 5, 6. 8: 8. 20: 7. Isa. 28: 21. Asa being diseased in his feet, and having applied to physicians, is upbraided with it, as contrary to that confidence which he ought to have had in the Lord, 1 Kings 15: 23. 2 Chron. 16: 12. And when our Savior appeared in Palestine, although there can be no doubt that there were physicians in the country, it is evident that the people placed but little confidence in them. Compare Mark 5: 26. Luke 8: 43. They brought to our Savior and his apostles multitudes of diseased people from all parts of the land. (See DISEASES.)

Medicine, which may be termed a science of facts, is indebted for its present distinction to observation, and on it must depend for its further advancement. To observation, the physician owes the most exact and valuable part of his knowledge, and upon it he rests the basis of his diagnosis, prognosis, and treatment of disease. It is at the bedside of the patient that the observer must study disease; there he will see it in its true characters, stripped of those false shades by which it is so frequently disguised in books. There, freed from the vagueness and illusion of systems, the student can acquire fixed and definite notions of diseases, and learn the difficult art of distinguishing them. If physicians had always confined themselves within the limits of strict observation—if they had restricted themselves to such conclusions as are fairly deducible from facts, the science of medicine would not now be overloaded, as it is, by hypothesis, and we should possess a sufficient body of materials to enable us to establish sound general principles.

In man, the most artificial of all animals, the most exposed to all the circumstances that can act unfavorably on his frame, diseases are so numerous and diversified as to exhaust the ingenuity of the nosologist, and fatigue the memory of the physician. It is only of late years that pathology—the knowledge of the alterations induced by disease in the organs and textures of which the system is composed—has begun to assume the rank of a special department of medical science. The improved means of investigating diseases which have been devised, by rendering the methods of examination more strict and rigorous, have given a very decided impulse to medicine. Pathological anatomy has raised it to a level with the descriptive sciences, when considered in reference to organic alterations, and the "Consultation Mediate" has placed it among the physical sciences so far as the doctrine of symptoms is concerned. Nosology, or the classifications of diseases, has also been greatly improved.

"Perhaps nosological catalogues," says Dr. Lawrence, "would afford the most convincing argument that man has departed from the way of life to which nature has destined him; unless, indeed, it should be contended that these afflictions are a necessary part of his nature; a distinction from animals, of which he will not be very likely to boast.

"The accumulation of numbers in large cities—the noxious effects of impure air, sedentary habits, and unwholesome employments—the excesses in diet, the luxurious food, the heating drinks, the monstrous mixtures, and the pernicious seasonings, which stimulate and oppress the organs—the unnatural activity of the great cerebral circulation, excited by the double impulse of our luxurious habits and undue mental exertions, the violent passions which agitate and exhaust us, the anxiety, chagrin, and vexation from which few entirely escape, reacting on, and disturbing the whole frame—the delicacy and sensibility to external influences caused by our heated rooms, warm clothing, inactivity, and other indulgences—are so many fatal proofs that our most grievous ills are our own work, and might be obviated by a more simple and uniform way of life."—Lawrence's Lectures; Martinet's Pathology; Good's Study of Medicine; Calmet.

MEDITATION, is an act by which we consider any thing closely, or wherein the soul is employed in the search or consideration of any truth. In religion it is used to signify the serious exercise of the understanding, whereby our thoughts are fixed on the observation of spiritual things, in order to practice. Mystic divines make a great difference between meditation and contemplation: the former consists in discursive acts of the soul, considering methodically and with attention the mysteries of faith and the precepts of morality; and is performed by reflections and reasonings which leave behind them manifest impressions on the brain. The purely contemplative, they say have no need of meditation—as seeing all things in God's glance, and without any reflection. (See BEGINS, and QUIETISTS.)

1. Meditation is a duty which ought to be attended to by all who wish well to their spiritual interests. It ought to be deliberate, close, and perpetual, Ps. 119: 97. 1: 2.

2. The subjects which ought more especially to engage the Christian mind are the works of creation; (Ps. 19.) the perfections of God; (Deut. 32: 4.) the excellencies, offices, characters, and works of Christ; (Heb. 12: 2, 3.) the offices and operations of the Holy Spirit; (John 15: and 16.) the various dispensations of Providence; (Ps. 97: 1, 2.) the precepts, declarations, promises, &c. of God's word; (Ps. 119.) the value, powers, and immortality of the soul; (Mark 8: 36.) the noble, beautiful, and benevolent plan of the gospel; (1 Tim. 1: 11.) the necessity of our personal interest in and experience of its power; (John 3: 3.) the depravity of our nature, and the freedom of divine grace in choosing, adopting, justifying, and sanctifying us; (1 Cor. 6: 11.) the shortness, worth, and swiftness of time; (James 4: 14.) the certainty of death; (Heb. 9: 27.) the resurrection and judgment to come; (1 Cor. 15: 50, &c.) and the future state of eternal rewards and punishments, Matt. 25. These are some of the most important subjects on which we should meditate.

3. To perform this duty aright, we should be much in prayer; (Luke 18: 1.) avoid a worldly spirit; (1 John 2: 15.) beware of sloth; (Heb. 6: 11.) take heed of sensual pleasures; (James 4: 4.) watch against the devices of Satan; (1 Pet. 5: 8.) be often in retirement; (Ps. 4: 4.) embrace the most favorable opportunities—the calmness of the morning; (Ps. 5: 1, 3.) the solemnity of the evening; (Gen. 24: 63.) Sabbath days; (Ps. 118: 24.) sacramental occasions, &c., 1 Cor. 11: 28.

4. The advantages resulting from this are, improvement of the faculties of the soul; (Prov. 16: 22.) the affections are raised to God; (Ps. 39: 1, 4.) an enjoyment of divine peace and felicity; (Phil. 4: 6, 7.) holiness of life is promoted; (Ps. 119: 59, 60.) and we thereby experience a foretaste of eternal glory, Ps. 73: 25, 26. 2 Cor. 5: 1, &c.; Baxter's Saints' Rest.—Hend. Buck.

MEEKNESS; a calm, serene temper of mind, not easily ruffled, or provoked to resentment. In the Greek language it is praos, easiness of spirit, and thus it may be justly called; for by quietly acquiescing in the dispensations and will of God, and leaving to him the avenging of injuries, it accommodates the soul to every occurrence, and so makes a man easy to himself, and to all about him. The Latins call a meek man mansuetus, used to the hand; which alludes to the taming and reclaiming of creatures wild by nature, and bringing them to be tractable and familiar, Jam. 3: 7, 8. So where the great principles of Christianity have disciplined the soul, where the holy grace of meekness reigns, it subdues the impetuous disposition, and teaches it, trusting in God, both to submit and to forgive. It teaches us to govern our own anger whenever we are at any time provoked, and patiently to bear the anger of others, that it may not be a provocation to us. The former is its office, especially in superiors; the latter in inferiors, and both in equals, James 3: 13.

The excellency of such a spirit appears, if we consider that it enables us to gain a victory over corrupt nature; (Prov. 16: 32.) that it is a beauty and an ornament to human beings; (1 Pet. 3: 4.) that it is obedience to God's word, and conformity to the best patterns; Eph. 5: 1, 2. Phil. 4: 8. It is productive of the highest peace to the professor, Luke 21: 19. Matt. 11: 28, 29. It fits us for any duty, instruction, relation, condition, or persecution, Phil. 4: 11, 12.

To obtain this spirit, consider that it is a divine injunction, Zeph. 2: 3. Col. 3: 12. 1 Tim. 6: 11. Observe the many examples of it: Jesus Christ; (Matt. 11: 28.) Abraham; (Gen. 13: 16: 5, 6.) Moses; (Num. 12: 3.) David; (Zech. 12: 8. 2 Sam. 16: 10, 12. Ps. 131: 2.) Paul, 1 Cor. 9: 19. How lovely a spirit it is in itself, and how it secures us from a variety of evils. That peculiar promises are made to such, Matt. 5: 5. Isa. 66: 2. That such give evidence of their being under the influence of divine grace, and shall enjoy the divine blessing, Isa. 57: 15. See Merry on Meekness; Dunlop's Sermons, vol. ii. p. 434; Watts's Sermons on the Christian Temper ser. 29; Tillotson on 1 Pet. 2: 21; and on Matt. 5: 44; Logan's Sermons, vol. i. ser. 10; and Jortin's Sermons, vol. iii. ser. 11.—H. Buck.

MEETING-HOUSE; a place appropriated for the purpose of public worship. (See CHURCH, CHAPEL, and BELL.)—Hend. Buck.

MEGIDDO; a city of Manasseh, (Josh. 17: 11. Judg. 1: 27.) famous for the defeat of king Josiah, 2 Kings 23: 29, 30. It is alluded to under this character, Rev. 16: 16 (See ESDRAELON).—Calmet.

MELANCHOLY; sadness or gloom, arising either from habit of body, or the state of the mind. To remove it, the following remedies may be applied:—1. Early rising. 2. Plain, nourishing food. 3. Strict temperance. 4. Exercise in the open air. (See MEDICINE.)

Or, if it arises particularly from the mind, 1. Associate with the cheerful. 2. Study the Scriptures. 3. Consider the amiable character of God, and the all-sufficient atonement of his Son. 4. Avoid all sin. 5. Be much in prayer, that you may enjoy the promised presence of the Holy Spirit, the infallible Comforter. 6. Be constantly engaged in such employments as combine the sense of duty and the feelings of benevolence. See Burton, Baxter, and Rogers on Melancholy; Cecil's Remains; Fuller's Works; Natural History of Enthusiasm.—Hend. Buck.

MELANCTHON, (PHILIP,) Luther's fellow-laborer in the Reformation, was born February 16, 1497, at Bretten, in the palatinate of the Rhine. He was distinguished, at an early age, by his intellectual endowments. His rapid progress in the ancient languages, during his boyhood, made him a peculiar favorite with Reuchlin. At his advice he changed his name, according to the custom of the learned at that time, from Schwartzerd (Black earth) into the Greek name Melancthon, of the same signification; and, in 1510, went to the university of Heidelberg. Here he was pre-eminent in philological and philosophical studies, so that the following year he was deemed qualified for the degree of bachelor of philosophy, and was made the instructor of several young counts. But as this university denied him the dignity of magister, on account of his youth, he went to Tübingen, in 1512, where, in addition to his former studies, he devoted himself particularly to theology; and, in 1514, after obtaining the degree of master, delivered lectures on the Greek and Latin authors.

In 1518, he received from the great Erasmus the praise of uncommon research, correct knowledge of classical antiquity, and of an eloquent style. On Reuchlin's recommendation, he was appointed, the same year, to be professor of the Greek language and literature, at the university of Wittenberg, where he was brought into contact with Luther; and, by his enlightened mind, ripened judgment, philosophical and critical acumen, the uncommon distinctness and order of his ideas, his extraordinary caution, yet steadfast zeal, contributed greatly to the progress and success of the Reformation, in connexion with the activity, spirit, and enterprise of Luther. His superiority as a scholar, his mild, amiable character, and the moderation and candor with which he treated the opposite party, rendered him peculiarly suitable to be a mediator. No one knew better than he how to soften the rigor of Luther, and to recommend the new doctrines to those who were prepossessed against them. His "Loci Theologici," which first appeared in 1521, opened the path to an exposition of the Christian creed, at once scientific and intelligible, and became the model to all Protestant writers on dogmatics. He urged decidedly, in 1529, the protest against the resolutions of the diet of Spire, which gave his party its name. In 1530, he drew up the celebrated Confession of Augsburg. This and the Apology for it, which he composed soon after, carried the reputation of his name through all Europe. Francis I. invited him to France, in 1535, with the view to a pacific conference with the doctors of the Sorbonne; and he soon after received a similar invitation to England; but political reasons prevented his accepting either of the invitations.

He went to Worms, in 1541, and soon after to Ratisbon, to defend the cause of the Protestants; but failing by his wisdom and moderation to produce the peace which he so earnestly desired, he was reproached by his own party for the steps which he had taken, which they considered as leading to an unworthy compromise with the Catholics.

The same happened to him at Bonn, in 1543; but neither Luther nor any of his friends, how much soever they disapproved of his measures, ever entertained a doubt of the purity of his intentions, or his fidelity to the cause of gospel truth. Much as Melancthon had to suffer from Luther's vehemence, the friendship of these two noble-spirited men, agreeing in their religious belief, remained unbroken till Luther's death, when Melancthon lamented for him with the feelings of a son.

A great part of the confidence which Luther enjoyed, was now transferred to his surviving friend. Germany had already called him her teacher, and Wittemberg revered in him its only support, and the restorer of its university after the Smalcaldic war. The new elector, Maurice, treated him with distinction, and did nothing in religious matters without his advice. But some theologians, who would fain have been the sole inheritors of Luther's glory, attacked his dogmas, and raised suspicions of his orthodoxy. The approximation of his views, on the subject of the Lord's supper, to those of the Swiss reformers, occasioned him much censure, as did still more his acquiescence in the introduction of the Augsburg Interim into Saxony, in 1549. Flacius and Oslander greatly annoyed him: the former on the subject of religious ceremonies, and the latter on that of justification; but the investigation of his orthodoxy, which was instituted at Naumberg, in 1554, resulted in his entire justification. The unity of the church, to promote which he made another attempt at Worms, in 1557, was his last wish. He died at Wittemberg, April 19, 1560, aged sixty-three years.

A more amiable, benevolent, open, and unsuspecting character, never ornamented the Christian name. His endeavors to promote education are never to be forgotten; and while the history of the Reformation continues to be a subject of interest, Melancthon will command respect and esteem. See the admirable Life of Melancthon, lately written by F. A. Cox, LL. D.; Jones' Chris. Biog.—Hend. Bkch.

MELCHIZEDEK, (king of justice;) king of Salem, and priest of the Most High God. Scripture tells us nothing of his father, or of his mother, or of his genealogy, or of his birth, or of his death, Gen. 14: 17. Heb. 7: 1—3. And in this sense he was, as Paul says, a figure of Jesus Christ, who is a priest forever, according to the order of Melchizedek; and not according to the order of Aaron, whose origin, consecration, life, and death, are known.

The person of Melchizedek presents an interesting subject of inquiry. He has been variously and absurdly supposed to be the Holy Spirit, the Son of God, Enoch, or an angel; more probably, Shem. The latter opinion has been elaborately supported by Mr. Taylor, the substance of whose statements and reasonings is as follows:—

From the allusions to the history of Melchizedek in Scripture, we gather, 1. That he had undergone deep distress; had implored the Preserving Power to interfere in his behalf, and had been heard. 2. That he had exemplified great piety and obedience. 3. That he was not a priest by regular official descent, that is, by birth, but by divine appointment. 4. That he was a king. 5. That the Levitical priesthood is very inferior to his; as—(1.) It is comparatively modern.—(2.) It has not equal dignity, wanting royalty.—(3.) It often changes hands; and sometimes is held by persons not very holy.—(4.) It concerns only a single small nation; and does not so much as assume to officiate for mankind in general.

We turn to the Bible history of Shem, a person of conspicuous piety after the deluge; witness his behavior to his father, Noah, whom Ham, his brother, had exposed. It is natural to infer the same pious disposition of character before that catastrophe. His name, imposed, apparently, prior to that event, signifies settled, steady: and, as Noah was "a preacher of righteousness" to the antediluvians, we may think the same of his son Shem, who succeeded in the priesthood. That dreadful event which was coming on the earth was certainly foretold to Noah; and if to Noah to Shem, who also assisted in the preparation of the ark. Deeply pious, and eminently sedate, he could not but look forward with apprehension, and every thing warrants the belief, that both the son and the father would deprecate and deplore the judgment they awaited. In other words—the piety of Shem prompted him, under these trying circumstances, to address with prayers and supplications, with strong cryings and tears, that celestial Power which was able to save him from death; in which this patriarch was the counterpart of our Lord Jesus; who, foreseeing his descent into the silent tomb, (as Shem foresaw his enclosure in the floating tomb of the ark,) prayed, "If it were possible let this cup pass from me;"—but, in the issue, as Shem in obedience to the divine injunction entered the ark, so did Jesus enter the grave:—"nevertheless, not my will, but thine be done." Shem was saved, and revived; so was Jesus; one from the ark, the other from the sepulchre.

The ark discharged its inhabitants on the mountains of Caucasus; whence it is probable the patriarch Shem travelled, in process of time, to Canaan; there he was acknowledged as a royal priest; being, first, king of justice. And who could more properly exercise this office? To promulgate laws, or to apply them; to direct in matters of jurisprudence; to combine the dignity of the magistrate with the affection of the patriarch; to promote the welfare of those communities which were his posterity—who could be more suitable than Shem? he was truly "the king of justice." His tribunal was adjacent to his residence in "the king's valley;" so called, because here sat the king; and here, according to the duty of a king, he administered justice in mercy; "the royal valley, for despatch of public and official affairs."

This not only explains the reason why Abraham visited Shem in triumph; but also why that patriarch takes so great interest in a victory, by which the country was cleared from its Hamite invaders; why he blesses Abraham, and treats him with such distinction; why the tithes of the spoils are presented to Melchizedek; why the tribunal in the king's valley is selected for the solemnities of the occasion; why Abraham takes nothing from his kindred, the kings he had delivered; and, in short, why this history is preserved in the sacred records, as being one of those remarkable events of which posterity ought not to be ignorant.

These hints lead us to contemplate this venerable patriarch, Shem, whom hitherto we have rather considered as a king, in his character of a priest also; a priest of no ordinary description. Many are his qualifications for this office; but natural descent must not be enumerated among them; for the apostle reports him "fatherless, and motherless;" that is, as he immediately explains himself, "without pedigree"—genealogy-less. This was an insuperable blemish in a Levitical priest, and incapacitated from priestly privileges; see Neh. 7: 65. Besides this, it may be said, in conformity to the import of the tradition, that this priest of the Most High God had neither father nor mother, in the postdiluvian world; he was of the former world, of the former people; and now pedigree, descent, was reckoned from him. We prefer, however, the Levitical idea; and suppose the apostle adopts priestly terms, to express the absence of claim to the priestly office by descent; according to another expression of the same sentiment, "he whose pedigree is not reckoned from them (the Levitical orders) received tithes." We know, also, that the principle of respectable descent was so powerful, not only among the Jews, but among the heathen, that the most venerated of their sacred personages—the Vestals, for instance—were ineligible to that dignity, unless both parents were unblemished, and both were living at the time of the election. Such a virgin is described by Aulus Gellius (Noct. Att. i. 12.) as patrima et matrima, or what the Greeks called amphithalés, possessing both parents. And this, probably, was one of the most ancient regulations of patriarchal religion; and, perhaps, coeval with sacerdotal appointments and institutions.

But why had Shem no right, by descent, to the priesthood? We take the fact to be, that Japheth was the eldest by birth; (see JAPHETH;) whence his name, and his double portion, as befitted his birthright; but Shem, being appointed to the priesthood, received an official precedence, and in consequence is named (among his own descendants, at least) before his brother Japheth.

We have now considered those particulars which are usually thought perplexing, except that one which is ad muted to be the most perplexing of all. What is this unchangeable priesthood? Is it unchangeable by reason of the continued life of him who possesses it? In what could originate a conception so extraordinary, so contrary to experience? Providence has interposed, to assist in answering this question also; and when the usual stores of learning are exhausted, has opened fresh repositories to elucidate a subject hitherto impenetrable.

In what sense is it said of Shem that he is living? Observe, the apostle uses a word which does not imply strict demonstration of this; but a current report, general belief: "it is witnessed," not by myself, nor by any to whom I refer confidence; but, it is admitted; this may be taken as the fair import of the term. But how is even this looser sense, this immortality, not strict but popular, to be justified?—The question is answered, by producing from the Purānas the following extract; the tenor of which no one in our part of the world would ever have imagined.

"Atri [Noah] for the purpose of making the Vedas [the sacred books] known to mankind, had three sons; or, as it is [elsewhere] declared in the Purānas, the Trimurti, or Hindoo Triad, was incarnated in his house. The eldest, [son] called Soma, or the moon in a human shape, was a portion, or form, of Brahma. To him the sacred isles in the west were allotted. He is still alive, though invisible, and is acknowledged as the chief of the sacerdotal tribe, to this day." (Asiatic Researches, vol. v. p. 261.) Every word of this testimony is important, and it agrees with the western reports concerning Melchizedek. The comparison is striking, and justifies attention.

The parallel is exact; it assists us even beyond what appears at first sight. No wonder now, that this patriarch, as "king of peace," was a character too sacred to be molested by war; no wonder that Abraham, and in him Levi, paid tithes to this most venerated personage, &c. The multiplicity of names for the same person in the East is notorious: Vishnu has a thousand; Siva also has a thousand; and other ancient characters in proportion: so that no doubt, on the identity of Atri's being Noah, arises from the dissimilarity of appellation. The name Soma is known as Sem, or Shem, in other writings; indeed the Seventy constantly write, Sem, or perhaps Sēm.

This curious history, thus brought to light from a far country, affords several inferences;—as (1.) The apostle says, many things might be uttered respecting Melchizedek, but they were hard to be understood. This hint seems to point at various reports concerning him, which, not improbably, were in traditionary circulation among those Hebrews to whom the writer addressed his epistle. (2.) The priesthood of Shem being exercised in his person during so long a period as five hundred years, suggests, almost naturally, an idea of perpetuity. (3.) The access of Abraham to the divine presence, by means of this royal priest, with the communications this patriarch might make to Abraham, must not be allowed to escape notice. When Abraham was divinely directed to quit Kedem, was Shem the agent? When he offered up Isaac, was it near the Salem of Shem? When Rebekah inquired of the Lord, was it by the ministration of Shem? was he the person who prophetically informed her, "two nations are in thy womb," &c. &c. (4.) This may show the propriety and the bearing of the Psalmist's expression, (Ps. 110: 4.) "A priest forever," like Melchizedek; like him who is "still alive, though invisible; and chief of the sacerdotal tribe," though not acting as such now in a public capacity, [but thought to continue his office in heaven itself.]

It may be proper to anticipate an objection, not new, indeed, but forcible, were it just, by an observation in vindication of the chronology of Shem's life.—That patriarch lived, by the shortest computation, till Isaac was fifty years of age; but other computations add forty or fifty years to his life. At the shortest period, however, he outlived his father Noah about one hundred and fifty years; and his son Arphaxad, sixty years; consequently, no chronological difficulty attends the principles adopted as the basis of these arguments.

If it be asked—Why does not Moses in Genesis, or the apostle to the Hebrews, call Melchizedek by the name of Shem? It may be sufficient to answer, that he was much better known at that time, and in that country, under his title, "King of Justice." He was better known: for though we find him called Shana, Sharna, or Soma, in India, yet that name has not been preserved in the West. Moreover, Bochart says: (p. 784.) The Orientals call the planet Jupiter by the name Zedek, in honor of Shem; as appears by the old Jewish writings. Indeed, that Jewish tradition considered Shem as the same with Melchizedek, is evident from the Targums of Jonathan, and of Jerusalem, the Midrash Agada, as cited by rabbi Solomon; and the Cabalists in Baal-haturim. Now, if this were an article not denied among the Jews, the reason why it needed no elucidation is clear: probably, too, the inhabitants of Jerusalem would have been highly offended with any doubt on the subject; or any question whether the Salem of this king were their own Jerusalem. Is there any allusion to the title of this king, in 2 Sam. 23: 5. Isa. 41: 26. Acts 3: 14. 7: 52. Jam. 5: 7?

It is but fair to apprise the reader, that these principles, if well established, lead to important consequences; for as we have elsewhere supposed the art of writing to be extant, in ages prior to the Abrahamic migration, and confessedly a priestly study, it will follow, that Shem might bring into the west, and communicate to Abraham, and by him to his family, the then extant parts of that volume which we esteem sacred. He might, indeed, communicate much other information, and many additional predictions; while, possibly, only those which referred to the land allotted to Abraham and his posterity are come down to us; those referring to other nations having been neglected among the Jewish historians. This has great effect on the authority of that system of which Moses was the minister. It supersedes tradition; it allows no interval of time wherein the books written could become obsolete, or so much as difficult to a linguist like Moses. It accounts also for the knowledge diffused throughout Canaan, that this country had been authoritatively, that is, divinely, allotted to the Hebrew nation in remote ages.—Calmat.

MELCHITES; the name given to the Syriac, Egyptian, and other Christians of the Levant. The Melchites, excepting some few points of little or no importance, which relate only to ceremonies and ecclesiastical discipline, are, in every respect, professed Greeks; but they are governed by a particular patriarch, who assumes the title of Patriarch of Antioch. The name of Melchites, or Royalists, was given to them because they agreed with the Greeks who submitted to the council of Chalcedon, and was designed by their enemies to brand them with the reproach of having done so merely in conformity to the religion of the emperor. They celebrate mass in the Arabic language. The religious among the Melchites follow the rule of St. Basil, the common rule of all the Greek monks.—Hend. Buck.

MELCHIZEDEKIANS; a denomination which arose about the beginning of the third century. They affirmed that Melchizedek was not a man, but a heavenly power superior to Jesus Christ; for Melchizedek, they said, was the intercessor and mediator of the angels; and Jesus Christ was only so for man, and his priesthood only a copy of that of Melchizedek.—Hend. Buck.

MELETIANS; the name of a considerable party who adhered to the cause of Meletius, bishop of Lycopolis in Upper Egypt, after he was deposed, about the year 360, by Peter, bishop of Alexandria, under the charge of his having sacrificed to the gods, and having been guilty of other heinous crimes; though Epiphanius makes his only failing to have been an excessive severity against the lapsed. This dispute, which was at first a personal difference between Meletius and Peter, became a religious controversy; and the Meletian party subsisted in the fifth century, but was condemned by the first council of Nice. They joined with the Arians against the orthodox party of Athanasius, without, however, adopting their heresy.

Schismatics of the same name arose at Antioch, in 360, when Meletius, of Melitene, in Armenia, was chosen bishop of the Arians, and was afterwards driven out, on account of his orthodoxy. The Roman and Greek churches reckon this Meletius among their saints.—Hend. Buck.

MELITONI; so called from one Melito, who taught that not the soul, but the body of man, was made after God's image.—Hend. Buck.

MELITA, perhaps that now called Malta; an island in the Mediterranean sea, between Africa and Sicily, twenty miles in length and twelve in breadth, formerly reckoned a part of Africa, but now belonging to Europe. St. Paul suffered shipwreck upon the coast, Acts 28: 1—3.

In the opinion of Dr. Hales, the island where this happened was not Malta, but Meleida. His words are: "That this island was Meleida, near the Illyrian coast, not Malta, on the southern coast of Sicily, may appear from the following considerations: 1. It lies confessedly in the Adriatic sea, but Malta a considerable distance from it. 2. It lies nearer the mouth of the Adriatic than any other island of that sea; and would, of course, be more likely to receive the wreck of any vessel driven by tempests towards that quarter. And it lies north-west by north of the south-west promontory of Crete; and came nearly in the direction of a storm from the south-east quarter. 3. An obscure island called Melita, whose inhabitants were 'barbarous,' was not applicable to the celebrity of Malta at that time, which Cicero represents as abounding in curiosities and riches, and possessing a remarkable manufacture of the finest linen; and Diodorus Siculus more fully: 'Malta is furnished with many and very good harbors, and the inhabitants are very rich; for it is full of all sorts of artificers, among whom there are excellent weavers of fine linen. Their houses are very stately and beautiful, adorned with graceful caves, and pargetted with white plaster. The inhabitants are a colony of Phœnicians, who, trading as merchants, as far as the Western ocean, resorted to this place on account of its commodious ports and convenient situation for maritime commerce; and by the advantage of this place, the inhabitants frequently became famous both for their wealth and their merchandise.' 4. The circumstance of the viper, or venomous snake, which fastened on St. Paul's hand, agrees with the damp and woody island of Meleida, affording shelter and proper nourishment for such, but not with the dry and rocky island of Malta, in which there are no serpents now, and none in the time of Pliny. 5. The disease with which the father of Publius was affected, dysentery combined with fever, probably intermittent, might well suit a country woody and damp, and probably, for want of draining, exposed to the putrid effluvia of confined moisture; but was not likely to affect a dry, rocky, and remarkably healthy island like Malta."—Calmet; Watson.

MELON; (abattchim, cingers, Num. 11: 5.) a luscious fruit, so well known that a description of it would be superfluous. It grows to great perfection, and is highly esteemed, in Egypt, especially by the lower class of people, during the hot months.

There are varieties of this fruit; but that more particularly referred to in the text must be the water-melon, which in Egypt is now called battich. It is cultivated, says Haselquist, on the banks of the Nile, in the rich clayey earth, which subsides during the inundation. This serves the Egyptians for meat, drink, and physic. The juice is peculiarly cooling and agreeable in that sultry climate, where it is justly pronounced one of the most delicious refreshments that nature, amidst her constant attention to the wants of man, affords in the season of violent heat. This well explains the regret expressed by the Israelites for the loss of this fruit, whose pleasant liquor had so often quenched their thirst, and relieved their weariness in their servitude, and which would have been exceedingly grateful in a dry, scorching desert.—Harris; Watson.

MEMBER, properly denotes a part of the natural body, 1 Cor. 12: 12—25. Figuratively, sinful habits or affections, which in an unrenewed state compose a system, like a body consisting of many members; (Rom. 7: 23.) also, true believers, members of Christ's mystical body, as forming one society or body, of which Christ is the head, Eph. 4: 25.—Calmet.

MEMORY; a faculty of the mind, or rather that state of the mind, in which ideas or notions of things past are accompanied with a persuasion that the things themselves were formerly real and present to the individual consciousness. When we remember with little or no effort, it is called remembrance simply, or memory, and sometimes passive memory. When we endeavor to remember what does not immediately and of itself occur, it is called active memory, or recollection.

A good memory has these several qualifications: 1. It is ready to receive and admit with great ease the various ideas, both of words and things, which are learned or taught.—2. It is large and copious to treasure up these ideas in great number and variety.—3. It is strong and durable to retain, for a considerable time, those words or thoughts which are committed to it.—4. It is faithful and active to suggest and recollect, upon every proper occasion, all those words or thoughts which it hath treasured up. (See ΑΤΤΕΧΝΟΝ.)

As this faculty may be injured by neglect and slothfulness, we will here subjoin a few of the best rules which have been given for the improvement of it. 1. We should form a clear and distinct apprehension of the things which we commit to memory.—2. Beware of every sort of intemperance, for that greatly impairs the faculties.—3. If it be weak, we must not overload it, but charge it only with the most useful and solid notions.—4. We should take every opportunity of uttering our best thoughts in conversation, as this will deeply imprint them.—5. We should join to the idea we wish to remember, some other idea that is more familiar to us, which bears some similitude to it, either in its nature, or in the sound of the word.—6. We should think of it before we go to sleep at night, and the first thing in the morning, when the faculties are fresh.—7. Method and regularity in the things we commit to memory are necessary.—8. Often thinking, writing, or talking, on the subjects we wish to remember.—9. Fervent and frequent prayer. MENANDRIANS; a denomination in the first century, from Menander, a Samaritan, and supposed disciple of Simon Magus. He pretended to be one of the aimos sent from the pleroma, or celestial regions, to succor the souls that lay groaning under oppression; and to support them against the demons, that hold the reins of empire in this sublunary world. But his notions were so extravagant, that he was rather considered as a lunatic than a heretic, and very justly. Mosheim's E. H. vol. i. p. 143.—Williams.

MENDEÆANS, MENDEAITES, Mendai Ijahi, or disciples of St. John, that is, the Baptist. From twenty to twenty-five thousand families of this sect still remain, chiefly in the neighborhood of Bassora, a city between Arabia and Persia, on the extremity of the desert of Iraq. They are sometimes called Christians of St. John; a name which they probably received from the Turks, and to which they contentedly submit for the sake of the toleration it affords them; but they are better known in ecclesiastical history as Henero (or every day) Baptists, from their frequent washings. (See CHRISTIANS OF ST. JOHN, and HEMERO BAPTISTS.)—Williams.

MENDELSONH, (MOSES), a learned Jewish writer, was born, in 1729, at Dessau, in the principality of Anhalt. Though in his youth he was extremely indigent, yet, by incessant study, he acquired an extensive knowledge of philosophy and languages, and became a celebrated author. He died at Berlin, in 1786. Among his productions are, Phædon, a Dialogue on the Immortality of the Soul, which gained him the title of the Jewish Socrates; Philosophical Works; Morning Hours; and a Letter to Lavater. He was a disciple of Locke.—Davenport; De Sraeli.

MENDICANTS, or BEGGING FRIARS; several orders of religious in popish countries, who, having no settled revenues, are supported by charitable contributions. They were instituted by pope Innocent III. in 1215, for the express purpose of opposing heretics, and maintaining the authority of the pope and the church of Rome. Their affectation of humility and poverty, travelling barefooted, with a cord for a girdle round their loins, and begging from door to door, gave them great influence with the people, which they uniformly employed to the support of ignorance and superstition, and, in many cases, of persecution. They multiplied like locusts in the earth, and formed four great swarms—Dominicans, Franciscans, Carmelites, and Hermits of St. Augustine; which will be found severally noticed in their proper places. Mosheim's E. H., vol. iii. p. 193, &c.—Williams; Hend. Duck.

MENE; a Chaldean word, signifying he has numbered, or he has counted. Daniel explained this ill-boding inscription to the king of Babylon. (See BELSHAZZAR.)—Calmet.

MENI; an idol representing the moon. Jeremiah (7: 18. 44: 17. 18.) speaks of her as queen of heaven, and, with Isaiah, (65: 11. Heb.) shows that her worship was popular in Palestine, and among the Hebrews. Meni is probably Astarte, and Venus Coelestis, who was worshipped by the Phœnicians and Carthaginians, from whom Israel learned her worship. Isaiah reproaches them with setting up a table to Gad—fortune, good fortune, or the lord of fortune—and with making libations to Meni. (See IDOLATRY, GAD, and GODS.)—Calmet.

MENNO, (SIMONS,) one of the illustrious reformers of the sixteenth century, a man whose apostolical spirit and labors have never yet been appreciated, was born at Witmarsum, in Friesland, in 1505. In his twenty-fourth year (1528) he entered into orders as a Romish priest in the village of Pingum, although in utter darkness of mind and worldliness of spirit, yet not without some tenderness of conscience and apparent piety. In 1530, he was induced to examine the New Testament with diligence, in consequence of doubts concerning transubstantiation. He now became through grace gradually enlightened, his preaching changed, and he was called by some an evangelical preacher, though he says of himself that at the time, "the world loved me, and I the world." At length an account of the martyrdom of Sieke Snyder at Leuwarden, for Anabaptism, roused him to a similar inquiry concerning the other sacrament, which resulted in his embracing the views of the persecuted Baptists, though he for several years struggled to suppress his secret convictions, on account of the odium and suffering the avowal must incur. "By the gracious favor of God," he observes, "I have acquired my knowledge, as well of baptism as of the Lord's supper, through the enlightening of the Holy Spirit, attendant on my much reading and contemplating the Scriptures, and not through the efforts and means of seducing sects, as I am accused."

There is the fullest evidence that his change of views and practice was sincere. It was the result of a true conversion of God. There is no color for the injurious assertion of Mosheim, that he held a "clandestine intercourse with the Anabaptists," until he found it convenient to "throw off the mask." Menno asserts in the work from which we quote, (which has recently been translated into English, and published in this country,) that he had no communication whatever with the Baptists, until he had been led by the word and Spirit of God to adopt their principles. After this, he says, "I besought my God with sighing and tears, that to me a troubled sinner he would grant the gift of his grace; that he would endue me with wisdom, spirit, frankness, and manly fortitude, so that I might preach his worthy name and holy word unadulterated, and proclaim his truth to his praise."

"At length the great and gracious Lord, perhaps after the course of nine months, extended to me his fatherly spirit, help, and mighty hand, so that I freely abandoned at once my character, honor, and fame, which I had among men, as also my anti-christian abominations, mass, infant baptism, loose and careless life, and all, and put myself willingly in all trouble and poverty under the pressing cross of Christ my Lord. In my weakness I feared God; I sought pious people, and of these I found some, though few, in good zeal and doctrine. I disputed with the perverted, and some I gained through God's help and power, and led them by his word to the Lord Christ; but the stiff-necked and obdurate I commended to the Lord."

"Thus has the gracious Lord drawn me, through the free favor of his great grace. He first stirred in my heart; he has given me a new mind; he has humbled me in his fear; he has led me from the way of death, and, through mere mercy, has called me upon the narrow path of life into the company of the saints. To him be praise forever. Amen."

About the year 1537, Menno was earnestly solicited by many of the Christians with which he connected himself, to assume among them the rank and functions of a public teacher; and as he looked upon the persons who made this proposal to be exempt from the fanatical phrensy of their brethren at Munster, he yielded to their entreaties. From this period to the end of his life he travelled from one country to another with his wife and children, exercising his ministry, under pressures and calamities of various kinds, that succeeded each other without interruption, and constantly exposed to the danger of falling a victim to the severity of the laws. "East and West Friesland," says Mosheim, "with the province of Groningen, were first visited by this zealous apostle of the Anabaptists; whence he directed his course into Holland, Guelderland, Brabant, and Westphalia; continued it through the German provinces that lie on the coast of the Baltic sea, and penetrated so far as Livonia. In all these places his ministerial labors were attended with remarkable success, and added to his sect a prodigious number of followers. Hence he is deservedly considered as the common chief of almost all the Anabaptists, and the parent of the sect that still subsists under that denomination." Now hear Menno himself.

"And, through our feeble service, teaching, and simple writing, with the careful deportment, labor, and help of our faithful brethren, the great and mighty God has made so known and public, in many cities and lands, the word of true repentance, the word of his grace and power, together with the wholesome use of his holy sacraments, and has given such growth to his churches, and endued them with such invincible strength, that not only many proud, stout hearts have become humble, the impure chaste, the drunken temperate, the covetous liberal, the cruel kind, the godless godly, but also, for the testimony which they bear, they faithfully give up their property to confiscation, and their bodies to torture and to death; as has occurred again and again, to the present hour. These can be no fruits nor marks of false doctrine; (with that God does not co-operate;) nor under such oppression and misery could any thing have stood so long were it not the power and word of the Almighty."

"See, this is our calling, doctrine, and fruit of our service, for which we are so horribly calumniated, and persecuted with so much enmity. Whether all the prophets, apostles, and true servants of God, did not through their service also produce the like fruits, we would gladly let all the pious judge."

"He who bought me with the blood of his love, and called me to his service, unworthy as I am, searches me, and knows that I seek neither gold and goods, nor luxury, nor ease on earth, but only my Lord's glory, my salvation, and the souls of many immortals. Wherefore I have had, now the eighteenth year, to endure so excessive anxiety, oppression, trouble, sorrow, and persecution, with my poor, feeble wife and little offspring, that I have stood in jeopardy of my life and in many a fear. Yes, while the priests lie on soft beds and cushions, we must hide ourselves commonly in secret corners. While they at all nuptials and christenings, and other times, make themselves merry in public with fides, drums, and various kinds of music, we must look out for every dog, lest he be one employed to catch us. Instead of being greeted by all as doctors and masters, we must be called Anabaptists, clandestine holders-forth, deceivers, and heretics. In short, while for their services they are rewarded, in princely style, with great emoluments and good days, our reward and portion must be fire, sword and death."

"What now I, and my true coadjutors in this very difficult, hazardous service, have sought, or could have sought, all the well disposed may easily estimate from the work itself and its fruit. I will then humbly entreat the faithful and candid reader once more, for Jesus' sake, to receive in love this my forced acknowledgment of my enlightening, and make of it a suitable application. I have presented it out of great necessity, that the pious reader may know how it has happened, since I am on all sides calumniated and falsely accused, as if I were ordained and called to this service by a seditious and misleading sect. Let him that fears God read and judge."

Menno was a man of whom the world was not worthy. The age in which he lived was, least of all, fitted and disposed to do justice to his character. He espoused opi nions, which not only provoked the hostility of the Catholic church, but which found little favor among the "powerful large sects," the Lutherans and Calvinists. It is not surprising, therefore, that his conduct has been misunderstood and misrepresented. We take pleasure in assisting to circulate an authentic exposition of his principles; and we offer our thanks to the translator for the service which he has rendered to us and to our readers, as well as to the interests of truth. A good memoir is still a desideratum.

Menno was a man of genius, and sound judgment. He possessed a natural and persuasive eloquence, and such a degree of learning as made him pass with many for an oracle. He appears, moreover, to have been a man of probity, of a meek and tractable spirit, gentle in his manners, affable in his commerce with persons of all ranks and characters, and extremely zealous in promoting practical religion and virtue, which he recommended by his example as well as by his precepts. He died in 1561, in the duchy of Holstein, at the country seat of a certain nobleman not far from the city of Oldesloe, who, moved with compassion by the view of the perils to which Menno was exposed, and the snares that were daily laid for his ruin, took him, with certain of his associates, into his protection, and gave him an asylum. The writings of Menno, which are almost all composed in the Dutch language, were published in folio, at Amsterdam, in the year 1651.—Hend. Buck; Mosheim; Menno's Departure from Popsy.

MENNONITES; a society of Baptists in Holland, so called from Menno Simons. (See MENNO.) This great man, as Mosheim observes, reduced the system of the scattered sect then called Anabaptists, to consistency and moderation. (See ANABAPTISTS, and BAPTISTS.)

The Mennonites maintain that practical piety is the essence of religion, and that the surest mark of the true church is the sanctity of its members. They plead for universal toleration in religion; and debar none from their societies who lead pious lives, and own the Scriptures for the word of God. They teach that infants are not the proper subjects of baptism; that ministers of the gospel ought to receive no salary [from the state.] They also object to the terms, person and trinity, as not consistent with the simplicity of the Scriptures.

They are, like the society of Friends, utterly averse to oaths and war, and to capital punishments, as contrary to the spirit of the Christian dispensation.

In their private meetings every one has the liberty to speak, to expound the Scriptures, and to pray. They assemble (or used to do so) twice every year from all parts of Holland, at Rynsburg, a village two leagues from Leyden, at which time they receive the communion, sitting at a table in the manner of the Independents; but in their form of discipline they are said more to resemble the Presbyterians. [This last statement wants authority.]

The ancient Mennonites professed a contempt of erudition and science, [only when put in competition with piety in their ministers.] and excluded all from their communion who deviated in the least from the most rigorous rules of simplicity and gravity: but this primitive austerity is greatly diminished in their most considerable societies. Those who adhere to their ancient discipline are called Flemings, or Flaudrians. The whole sect were formerly called Waterlandians, from the district in which they lived. An unspeakable number have been martyrs.

The Mennonites in Pennsylvania do not baptize by immersion, though they administer the ordinance to none but believers. Their common method is this: the person to be baptized kneeling, the minister holds his hands over him, into which the deacon pours water, and through which it runs on the head of the baptized; after which follow imposition of hands and prayer. Mosheim; though his account is written with violent prejudices; Edwards' and Benedict's History of American Baptists, vol. i. p. 94.

Such is the account published by Mrs. H. Adams, to which we are now able to make considerable corrections from the Letters of Mr. Ward the missionary, who recently visited both Holland and America:

An "Account of the Origin of the Dutch Baptists," or Mennonites, was published at Breda, in 1819, by Dr. Ypeij, professor of theology at Groningen, and the Rev. J. J. Dermont, chaplain to the king of the Netherlands, learned Pedobaptists. With this account Mr. Ward fills several letters, and from it we shall make some extracts. In the opinion of these learned writers, "the Mennonites are descended from the tolerably pure evangelical Waldenses, who were driven by persecution into various countries; and who during the latter part of the twelfth century fled into Flanders, and into the provinces of Holland and Zealand, where they lived simple and exemplary lives, in the villages as farmers, in the towns by trades, free from the charge of any gross immoralities, and professing the most pure and simple principles, which they exemplified in a holy conversation. They were therefore in existence long before the Reformed church of the Netherlands.

"There were then two sects among them: the one distinguished by the name of the perfect, (who held to a community of goods,) and the other the imperfect. By far the greater part of the first sect, and the whole of the second, were certainly among the most pious Christians the church ever saw, and the worthiest citizens the state ever had. History removes every doubt on this subject.

"In the year 1530, their scattered community obtained a regular state of church order, separate from all Dutch and German Protestants, who at that time had not been formed into one body by any bonds of unity. This advantage was procured them by the sensible management of a Friesland Protestant, Menno Simons, who had formerly been a popish priest. This learned, wise, and prudent man, was chosen by them as their leader, that they might by his paternal efforts, in the eyes of all Christendom, be cleared from the blame which some of them had incurred. This object was accomplished accordingly; some of the perfectionists he reclaimed to order, and others he excommunicated. He purified also the religious doctrines of the Baptists.

"We have now seen that the Baptists who were formerly called Anabaptists, and in later times Mennonites, were the original Waldenses; and who have long in the history of the church received the honor of that origin. On this account the Baptists may be considered as the only Christian community which has stood since the days of the apostles, and as a Christian society which has preserved pure the doctrines of the gospel through all ages. The perfectly correct external and internal economy of the Baptist denomination, tends to confirm the truth, disputed by the Romish church, that the Reformation brought about in the sixteenth century was in the highest degree necessary; and at the same time goes to refute the erroneous notion of the Catholics, that their communion is the most ancient." Thus far, Dr. Ypeij and Dermont.

This testimony, from the highest official authority in the Dutch Reformed church, is certainly a rare instance of liberality towards another denomination. It is conceding all the Mennonites or Baptists claim. It should be added, that they have constantly, but politely, declined the salaries, which the government of Holland offers to all denominations under its authority.

The Mennonites, it appears, form one undivided Christian body. Associations are held at different times, similar to those in England and the United States, though some churches, as among the English and American Baptists, decline all union with any association. The business of the Association connected with Rotterdam is chiefly to provide supplies for destitute churches, and examine into the state of the Mennonite college at Amsterdam. There are no buildings connected with this college; but the students receive theological instruction in a room, containing the library, over the Mennonite chapel. The lectures are delivered in Latin; and each student before his entrance must be acquainted with Latin and Greek. They attend at a literary institution for instruction in Hebrew, ecclesiastical history, physics, natural and moral philosophy, &c. They have private lodgings in different parts of the city. The college was established nearly a century ago, and was at first supported by the Amsterdam Mennonites alone; but lately other churches send in their contributions. Some of the students receive support from the public fund; they are all intended for the Christian ministry.

Divine worship is conducted among the Mennonites as among the churches of the reformed. They have preaching only once on the Sabbath, and the ministers are chosen in some places by the congregation, and in others by the elders and deacons.

With respect to their confession of faith, as stated by one of their ministers, Mr. Gan, of Ryswick, it appears to be moderate orthodox.

On baptism Mr. Gan says, it "consists in immersion or pouring upon of water, in the name," &c. Conversion and faith are necessary; and those "who are the children of Christian parents, and have been educated in the Christian church, are under an obligation to be baptized, as well as converted Jews and heathens. They train up catechumens under their ministers, and, about the age of sixteen, baptize them, taking from the candidate, before the minister and elders, an account of his repentance and faith. They reject infant baptism, and refuse to commune at the Lord's table with any who administer the ordinance to children, unless re-sprinkled." According to Mr. Ward's account, (given him verbally by Rev. N. Messchaert,) the modern Mennonites plead the authority of Menno for the use of pouring and sprinkling as baptism. But in reality it is a wide departure from the views of Menno, who says, "After we have searched ever so diligently, we shall find no other baptism but dipping in water, which is acceptable to God and approved in his word."

With respect to the number of Mennonites in Holland, they are calculated at thirty thousand, including children, and form about one hundred and thirty churches.

In the United States of America, it appears, "there are more than two hundred Mennonite churches, some of which contain as many as three hundred members in each; and," Mr. Ward says, "they are mostly the descendants of the Mennonites, who emigrated in great numbers from Palz.

The Dutch Baptists have published a large history of themselves, and of their numerous martyrs. There is reason to hope, from recent intelligence, that a new and brighter era is beginning among them.—Ward's Farewell Letters, lett. 19—22; Am. Bap. Mag. 1834.

MEN OF UNDERSTANDING. This title distinguished a fanatical sect which appeared in Flanders and Brussels, in the year 1511. They owed their origin to an illiterate man, whose name was Egidius Cantor, and to William of Hildension, a Carmelite monk. With some great truths they mingled egregious errors. They pretended to be honored with celestial visions, denied that any could arrive at perfect knowledge of the Holy Scriptures without the extraordinary succors of a divine illumination, and declared the approach of a new revelation from heaven, more perfect than the gospel of Christ. They said that the resurrection was accomplished in the person of Jesus, and no other was to be expected; that the inward man was not defiled by the outward actions, whatever they were; that the pains of hell were to have an end; and not only all mankind, but even the devils themselves, were to return to God, and be made partakers of eternal felicity.

This denomination appears to have been a branch of the Brethren and Sisters of the Free Spirit.—Hend. Buck.

MENOLOGIUM, (from mēnē, the moon, and logos, a discourse,) in the Greek church, nearly corresponds to the martyrologium of the Roman church. It is a book in which the festivals of every month are recorded, with the names and biographies of the saints and martyrs, in the order in which they are read in the masses, &c.—Hend. Buck.

MEPHIBOSHETH; a son of Jonathan, whose proper name was Meribbaal. (See BAAL.) Mephibosheth was very young when his father was killed in the battle of Gilboa, (2 Sam. 4: 4.) and his nurse was in such consternation at the news, that she let the child fall, who from this accident was lame all his life. When David found himself in peaceable possession of the kingdom, he sought for all that remained of the house of Saul, that he might show them kindness, in consideration of the friendship between him and Jonathan. He told Mephibosheth, that for the sake of Jonathan his father he should have his grandfather's estate, and eat always at the royal table, 2 Sam. 9: 1, &c. See also 1 Chron. 8: 34.—Calmet.

MERAB, or MEROB, the eldest daughter of king Saul, was promised to David in marriage, in reward for his victory over Goliath; but was given to Adriel, son of Barzilai the Meholathite, 1 Sam. 14: 49. 18: 17, 19. Merab had six sons by him, who were delivered to the Gibeonites and hanged before the Lord. The text intimates, that the six men delivered to the Gibeonites were sons of Michal, daughter of Saul, and wife of Adriel; but it is thought, that the name of Michal has slipped into the text instead of Merab; for (1.) Michal did not marry Adriel, but Phaltiel; and (2.) we nowhere read that Michal had six sons. Others think, these were six sons of Merab by birth, but of Michal by adoption.—Calmet.

MERCURY; a fabulous god of the ancient heathen, the messenger of the celestials, and the deity that presided over learning, eloquence, and traffic. The Greeks named him Hermes, an interpreter, because they considered him as interpreter of the will of the gods. Probably, it was for this reason that the people of Lystra, having heard Paul preach, and having seen him heal a lame man, would have offered sacrifice to him, as to their god Mercury; and to Barnabas as Jupiter, because of his venerable aspect, Acts 14: 11. (See JUPITER, and LYSTRA.)—Calmet.

MERCY; that particular species or modification of goodness which has for its objects beings who are in circumstances of misery and distress, and which consists in commiserating and pitying them under their sufferings, and in affording them such relief as can be extended to them consistently with the relative situation of him by whom the disposition is felt.

Divine mercy is that attribute which compassionates the family of man, considered as miserable in consequence of the guilt which they have contracted by their voluntary and unprovoked rebellion against the moral government of Jehovah; and which is exercised in such a way, and to such an extent, as the end and rectitude of that government require. It is not the simple act of pity which one individual in private life may display towards another individual, or a number of individuals, but it is a commiseration which, though infinite with respect to its source, and unlimited in its nature, abstractedly considered, is nevertheless combined in its exercise with the due influence of every consideration arising out of the public and official station which is occupied by God as the ruler of an universe of intelligent beings, whose interests as a whole cannot in justice be left out of view in the treatment of individuals. That a due regard is ever to be had to the good of the whole in every thing that is done for the benefit of any of the parts, is one of the firmest and most undoubted principles of all enlightened and equitable legislation. Mercy, in the sense in which it is so commonly taken, as exercised without any rational end or inducement, besides the bare impulse of the affections towards an isolated object, and consequently without the guidance and direction of an intelligent mind properly attentive to all conceivable results, would be no proof of moral excellence, but a blind and undistinguishing act, which in numberless instances would be productive of infinitely greater misery than it actually relieved, and thus deserve the name of cruelty rather than that of mercy.

In Jehovah, this attribute is ever regulated by the highest intelligence; its exercise is invariably accompanied with suitable displays of the divine purity; and its consequences combine with the relief and eternal felicity of its objects, the maintenance of the claims of divine moral government, and the advancement of the divine glory. That mercy is extended to any of the guilty children of men, is to be ascribed to the pure benevolence of the Deity; that it is not extended to all miserable offenders must be attributed to the same benevolence, in the character of the love of rectitude, or a just regard to the claims which are put forth by the vast community of intelligent existences over which he presides; and that it is shown to one sinner rather than another, is to be resolved into his all-wise, holy, and benevolent sovereignty: "He will have mercy on whom he will have mercy."

What completely establishes these views of the mercy of God, is the consideration of the peculiar and exclusive medium through which he has chosen to dispense it—the atonement made by the infinitely precious blood of his Son when he died as the substitute of sinners. While every feature in this wondrous transaction is calculated to afford the most illustrious comment on the declaration, "He delighteth in mercy," the whole plan is most obviously designed to secure and uphold the pillars of the divine government, and to unite in its grand results the glory of God and the happiness of his obedient creatures. (See the articles ATONEMENT; ABOUND; JUSTICE.)

According to the circumstances and wants of those who are its objects, the divine mercy may be regarded as enlightening, renewing, forgiving, relieving, comforting, and strengthening. It is rich, efficient, unmerited, absolutely free, immutable, and eternal.—Jones; Hend. Buck.

MERCY-SEAT, (ilasterion, propitiatory.) This word is properly an adjective, agreeing with epithema, a lid, understood, which is expressed by the Seventy, Ex. 25: 17. In that version, ilasterion generally answers to the Hebrew caphrah, from the verb caphar, to cover, expiate, and was the lid or covering of the ark of the covenant, made of pure gold, on and before which the high-priest was to sprinkle the blood of the expiatory sacrifices on the great day of atonement, and where God promised to meet his people, Ex. 25: 17, 22, 29, 42, 30: 36. Lev. 16: 2, 14.

St. Paul, by applying this name to Christ, (Rom. 3: 25.) assures us that he is the true mercy-seat, the reality of what the caphrah represented to the ancient believers; by him our sins are covered or expiated, and through him God communes with us in mercy. The mercy-seat also represents our approach to God through Christ; we come to the "throne of grace;" which beautiful designation is only a variation of the term "mercy-seat."—Watson.

MERIBAH, (strife, or contention;) the name given to the station at or near Rephidim, where the people murmured for water, and Moses struck the rock, where it gushed out, Ex. 17: 1—7. Dr. Shaw feels confident that he has discovered this extraordinary stone, at Rephidim, and has furnished a particular account of it in his Travels. Mr. Taylor, however, has shown that this idea proceeds upon a total misapprehension of the history, as well as of the reference made to it by the apostle Paul, 1 Cor. 10: 4. (Fragment 281.) (See REPHIDIM).—Calmet.

MERIT, signifies desert, or the earning of a fair title to a reward. Originally the word was applied to soldiers and other military persons, who, by their labors in the field, and by the various hardships they underwent during the course of a campaign, as also by other services they might occasionally render the commonwealth, were said, merere stipendia, to merit, or earn their pay; which they might properly be said to do, because they yielded in real service an equivalent to the state for the stipend they received, which was therefore due to them in justice. Here, then, we come at the true meaning of the word merit; from which it is very clearly to be seen that there can be no such thing as merit in our best obedience. One man may merit of another, but all mankind together cannot merit from the hand of God, because, being originally his, all possible service is but a duty, the failing of which is sin. This still more evidently appears, if we consider the imperfections of all our services, and the express declarations of the divine word, Luke 17: 10. Eph. 2: 5, 9. Rom. 11: 5, 6. Tit. 3: 5. Rom. 10: 1, 4. The Doctrine of Merit stated, vol. iii. ser. 1; South's Sermons; Toplady's Works, vol. iii. p. 471; Hervey's Eleven Letters to Wesley; Robinson's Claude, vol. ii. p. 218; Dwight's Theology; Fuller's Works.—Hend. Buck.

MERITS OF CHRIST; a term used to denote the active and passive obedience of Christ; all that he wrought and all that he suffered for the salvation of mankind. See ATONEMENT; IMPUTATION; OBEDIENCE; RIGHTEOUSNESS OF CHRIST.—Hend. Buck.

MERODACH; an ancient king of Babylon, placed among the gods, and worshipped by the Babylonians. Jeremiah (50: 2.) speaking of the ruin of Babyloa says, "Babylon is taken, Bel is confounded, Merodach is broken in pieces, her idols are confounded, her images are broken in pieces." We find certain kings of Babylon, whose names comprise that of Merodach; as Evil-Merodach, and Merodach-Baladan.—Calmet.

MEROM, the waters of Merom, (Josh. 11: 5.) or lake of Semechon, is the most northern of the three lakes supplied by the river Jordan. It is situate in a valley, called the Ard Houle, formed by the two branches of mount Hebron. The lake is now called, after the valley, the lake of Houle. In summer this lake is for the most part dry, and covered with shrubs and grass, in which lions, bears, and other wild beasts conceal themselves. (See JORDAN).—Calmet.

MEROZ; a place in the neighborhood of the brook Kishon, whose inhabitants, refusing to come to the assistance of their brethren, when they fought with Sisera, were put under an anathema, Judg. 5: 23.—Watson.

MERRICK, (JAMES), a poet and divine, was born, in 1720, at Reading; was educated at the school of that place, and at Trinity college, Oxford; and died in 1769. Bishop Lowth speaks of him as being one of the best of men and most eminent of scholars. Among his works are, Poems on Sacred Subjects; Annotations on the Psalms, and on the Gospel of St. John; a translation of Tryphiodorus; and a metrical version of the Psalms.—Davenport.

MESHA; (Gen. 10: 27—30.) the same, probably, as mount Masius. The sons of Joktan possessed the whole country between mount Masius and the mountains of Sephar, or Sepharvaim.—Calmet.

MESHECH, (Μεσσηχ or Μεσσηχ.) Meshech was the sixth son of Japheth, and is generally mentioned in conjunction with his brother Tubal; and both were first seated in the north-eastern angle of Asia Minor, from the shores of the Euxine, along to the south of Caucasus; where were the Montes Moschisi, and where, in after times, were the Iberi, Tibareni, and Moschi. There appears also to have been in the same neighborhood, namely, in Armenia, a river and country termed Rosh; for so, Bochart says, the river Araxes is called by the Arabs; and that there was a people in the adjoining country called Rhossi. That passage in Ezek. 38, also, which in our Bibles is rendered "the chief prince of Meshech and Tubal," is, in the Septuagint, "the prince of Rosh, Meshech, and Tubal." These Rhossi and Moschi, who were neighbors in Asia, dispersed their colonies jointly over the vast empire of Russia; and preserve their names still in those of Russians and Muscovites.—Watson.

MESOPOTAMIA; an extensive province of Asia, the Greek name of which denotes "between the rivers," and on this account Strabo says, that "it was situated between the Euphrates and the Tigris." In Scripture this country is often called Aram, and Aramea. But as Aram also signifies Syria, it is denominated Aram Nabaraim, or the Syria of the rivers, Judg. 3: 8. 2 Sam. 10. Dan. 1: 2. Zech. 5: 11.

This province, which inclines from the south-east to the north-west, commenced at thirty-three degrees twenty minutes north latitude, and terminated near thirty-seven degrees thirty minutes north latitude. Towards the south it extended as far as the bend formed by the Jordan at Cunaxa, and to the wall of Semiramis, which separated it from Mesene. The northern part of Mesopotamia is occupied by chains of mountains passing from north-west to south-east, in the situation of the rivers. The central parts of these mountains were called Singare Montes. In the western part were Edessa, called also Callio-Rhe, (Orfa,) Charra, (Harran,) Niephorium, (Racca,) Circesium at the mouth of the Chaboras, Anatholi, (Anah,) Neharda, (Hadith Unnour,) upon the right of the Euphrates. There are several other towns of less importance. According to Strabo, this country was fertile in vines, and afforded abundance of good wine. According to Ptolemy, Mesopotamia had on the north a part of Armenia, on the west the Euphrates on the side of Syria, on the east the Tigris on the borders of Assyria, and on the south the Euphrates, which joined the Tigris. Mesopotamia was a satrapy under the kings of Syria. It is now comprised in modern Persia.

"On the fifth or sixth day after leaving Aleppo," says Campbell, in his Overland Journey to India, "we arrived at the city of Diarbeker, the capital of the province of that name; having passed over an extent of country of between three and four hundred miles, most of it blessed with the greatest fertility, and abounding with as rich pastures as I ever beheld, covered with numerous herds and flocks. The air was charmingly temperate in the daytime, but, to my feeling, extremely cold at night. Yet notwithstanding the extreme fertility of this country, the bad administration of government, conspiring with the indolence of the inhabitants, leaves it unpeopled and uncultivated. Diarbeker Proper, called also Mesopotamia from its lying between two famous rivers, and by Moses called PADAN-ARAM, that is, 'the fruitful Syria,' abounds with corn, wine, oil, fruits, and all the necessaries of life. It is supposed to have been the seat of the earthly paradise; and all geographers agree that here the descendants of Noah settled immediately after the flood. To be treading that ground which Abraham trod, where Nabor the father of Rebecca lived, where holy Job breathed the pure air of piety and simplicity, and where Laban the father-in-law of Jacob resided, was to me a circumstance productive of delightful sensations." (See ABRAHAM.)—Watson.

MESSIAH. The Greek word Christos, from whence comes Christ and Christian, exactly answers to the Hebrew Messiah, which signifies him that hath received unction, a king, a prophet, or a priest. (See JESUS CHRIST.)

The ancient Jews had just notions of the Messiah, which came gradually to be corrupted, by expecting a temporal monarch and conqueror; and finding Jesus Christ to be poor, humble, and of an unpromising appearance, they rejected him. Most of the modern rabbins, according to Buxtorf, believe that the Messiah is come, but that he lies concealed because of the sins of the Jews. Others believe he is not yet come, fixing different times for his appearance, many of which are elapsed; and, being thus baffled, have pronounced an anathema against those who shall pretend to calculate the time of his coming. To reconcile the prophecies concerning the Messiah that seemed to be contradictory, some have had recourse to a twofold Messiah; one in a state of poverty and suffering, the other of splendor and glory. The first, they say, is to proceed from the tribe of Ephraim, who is to fight against Gog, and to be slain by Armillius; (Zech. 12: 10.) the second is to be of the tribe of Judah and lineage of David, who is to conquer and kill Armillius; to bring the first Messiah to life again, to assemble all Israel, and rule over the whole world.

That Jesus Christ is the true Messiah, and actually come in the flesh, is evident, if we consider (as Mr. Fuller observes) that it is intimated that whenever he should come, the sacrifices and ceremonies of the Mosaic law were to be superseded by him, Ps. 40: 6—8. 1 Sam. 15: 22. Dan. 9: 27. Jer. 31: 31, 34. Heb. 8: 13. Now sacrifice and oblation have ceased. They virtually ceased when Jesus offered himself a sacrifice, and in a few years after, they actually ceased. A few of the ancient ceremonies are indeed adhered to, but, as one of the Jewish writers acknowledges, "the sacrifices of the holy temple have ceased." Let every Jew therefore ask himself this question: Should Messiah the Prince come at some future period, how are the sacrifice and oblation to cease on his appearance, when they have already ceased near eighteen hundred years? (See CHRISTIANITY; JESUS CHRIST.)

There have been numerous false Messiahs which have arisen at different times. Of these the Savior predicted, Matt. 24: 14. Some have reckoned as many as twenty-four, of whom we shall here give an account.

1. Caziba was the first of any note who made a noise in the world. Being dissatisfied with the state of things under Adrian, he set himself up at the head of the Jewish nation, and proclaimed himself their long-expected Messiah. He was one of those banditti that infested Judea, and committed all kinds of violence against the Romans; and had become so powerful, that he was chosen king of the Jews, and by them acknowledged their Messiah. However, to facilitate the success of this hold enterprise, he changed his name from Caziba, which it was at first, to that of Barchocheba, alluding to the star foretold by Balaam; for he pretended to be the star sent from heaven to restore his nation to its ancient liberty and glory. He chose a forerunner, raised an army, was anointed king, coined money inscribed with his own name, and proclaimed himself Messiah and prince of the Jewish nation. Adrian raised an army, and sent it against him. He retired into a town called Bither, where he was besieged. Barchocheba was killed in the siege, the city was taken, and a dreadful havoc succeeded. The Jews themselves allow, that, during this short war against the Romans in defence of this false Messiah, they lost five or six hundred thousand souls. This was in the former part of the second century.

2. In the reign of Theodosius the younger, in the year of our Lord 434, another impostor arose, called Moses Cretensis. He pretended to be a second Moses, sent to deliver the Jews who dwelt in Crete, and promised to divide the sea, and give them a safe passage through it. Their delusion proved so strong and universal, that they neglected their lands, houses, and all other concerns, and took only so much with them as they could conveniently carry. And on the day appointed, this false Moses, having led them to the top of a rock, men, women, and children threw themselves headlong down into the sea, without the least hesitation or reluctance, till so great a number of them were drowned, as opened the eyes of the rest, and made them sensible of the cheat. They then began to look out for their pretended leader, but he disappeared, and escaped out of their hand.

3. In the reign of Justin, about 520, another impostor appeared, who called himself the son of Moses. His name was Dunna. He entered into a city of Arabia Felix, and there he greatly oppressed the Christians; but he was taken prisoner, and put to death by Elesban, an Ethiopian general.

4. In the year 529, the Jews and Samaritans rebelled against the emperor Justinian, and set up one Julian for their king; and accounted him the Messiah. The emperor sent an army against them, killed great numbers of them, took their pretended Messiah prisoner, and immediately put him to death.

5. In the year 571, was born Mohammed, in Arabia. At first he professed himself to be the Messiah who was promised to the Jews. By this means he drew many of that unhappy people after him. In some sense, therefore, he may be considered in the number of false Messiahs. (See MOHAMMEDANISM.)

6. About the year 721, in the time of Leo Isaurus, arose another false Messiah in Spain; his name was Serenus. He drew great numbers after him, to their no small loss and disappointment, but all his pretensions came to nothing.

7. The twelfth century was fruitful in false Messiahs; for about the year 1137, there appeared one in France, who was put to death, with many of those who followed him.

8. In the year 1138, the Persians were disturbed with a Jew, who called himself the Messiah. He collected together a vast army. But he, too, was put to death, and his followers treated with great inhumanity.

9. In the year 1157, a false Messiah stirred up the Jews at Corduba, in Spain. The wiser and better sort looked upon him as a madman, but the great body of the Jews in that nation believed in him. On this occasion almost all the Jews in Spain were destroyed.

10. In the year 1167, another false Messiah arose in the kingdom of Fez, which brought great troubles and persecution upon the Jews that were scattered through that country.

11. In the same year an Arabian set up there for the Messiah, and pretended to work miracles. When search was made for him, his followers fled, and he was brought before the Arabian king. Being questioned by him, he replied, that he was a prophet sent from God. The king then asked him what sign he could show to confirm his mission? "Cut off my head," said he, "and I will return to life again." The king took him at his word, promising to believe him if his prediction came to pass. The poor wretch, however, never returned to life again, and the cheat was sufficiently discovered. Those who had been deluded by him were grievously punished, and the nation condemned to a very heavy fine.

12. Not long after this, a Jew who dwelt beyond Euphrates, called himself the Messiah, and drew vast multitudes of people after him. He gave this for a sign of it; that he had been leprous, and was cured in the course of one night. He, like the rest, perished in the attempt, and brought great persecution on his countrymen.

13. In the year 1174, a magician and false Christ arose in Persia, who was called David Almusser. He pretend ed that he could make himself invisible; but he was soon taken, and put to death, and a heavy fine laid upon his brethren the Jews.

14. In the year 1176, another of these impostors arose in Moravia, who made similar pretensions; but his frauds being detected, and not being able to elude the efforts that were made to secure him, he was likewise put to death.

15. In the year 1199, a famous cheat and rebel exerted himself in Persia, called David el David. He was a man of learning, a great magician, and pretended to be the Messiah. He raised an army against the king, but was taken and imprisoned; and, having made his escape, was afterwards seized again, and beheaded. Vast numbers of the Jews were butchered for taking part with this impostor.

16. We are told of another false Christ in this same century by Maimonides and Solomon; but they take no notice either of his name, country, or good or ill success.

Here we may observe, that no less than ten false Christs arose in the twelfth century, and brought prodigious calamities and destruction upon the Jews in various quarters of the world.

17. In the year 1497, we find another false Christ, whose name was Ismael Sophus, who deluded the Jews in Spain. He also perished, and as many as believed in him were dispersed.

18. In the year 1500, rabbi Lemlem, a German Jew of Austria, declared himself a forerunner of the Messiah, and pulled down his own oven, promising his brethren that they should bake their bread in the Holy Land next year.

19. In the year 1509, one whose name was Pfefferkorn, a Jew of Cologne, pretended to be the Messiah. He afterwards affected, however, to turn Christian.

20. In the year 1534, rabbi Salomo Malcho, giving out that he was the Messiah, was burnt to death by Charles V. of Spain.

21. In the year 1615, a false Christ arose in the East Indies, and was greatly followed by the Portuguese Jews who were scattered over that country.

22. In the year 1621, another in the Low Countries pretended to be the Messiah, of the family of David, and of the line of Nathan. He promised to destroy Rome, and to overthrow the kingdom of Antichrist, and the Turkish empire.

23. In the year 1666, appeared the false Messiah Sabatai Sevi, who made so great a noise, and gained such a number of proselytes. He was born at Aleppo, imposed on the Jews for a considerable time; but afterwards, with a view of saving his life, turned Mohammedan, and was at last beheaded.

24. The last false Christ that made any considerable number of converts was one rabbi Mordecai, a Jew of Germany: he appeared in the year 1682. It was not long before he was found out to be an impostor, and was obliged to fly from Italy to Poland, to save his life. What became of him afterwards does not seem to be recorded.

This may be considered as true and exact an account of the false Christs that have arisen since the crucifixion of our blessed Savior, as can well be given. MESS-JOHNS; a name given upwards of a century ago, in England, to chaplains kept by the nobility and others in high life; whose situation in the family appears to have been any thing but agreeable. They were generally expected to rise from table after the second course; and if they ever attempted to sit the dinner out, it generally cost them their place. At an annual dinner given at that time, on St. Stephen's day, by the archbishop of Canterbury, the chaplain used to come in and say grace, and retired immediately, till wanted to bless after dinner.

METEMPSYCHOSIS; the doctrine of the transmigra-tion of souls into other bodies. This tenet has been attributed to the sect of the Pharisees. Josephus, who was himself a Pharisee, gives this account of their doctrine in these points:—"Every soul is immortal; those of the good only enter into another body, but those of the bad are tormented with everlasting punishment." From whence it has been pretty generally concluded, that the resurrection they held was only a Pythagorean one, namely, the transmigration of the soul into another body; from which they excluded all that were notoriously wicked, who were doomed at once to eternal punishment; but their opinion was, that those who were guilty only of lesser crimes were punished for them in the bodies into which their souls were next sent. It is also supposed, that it was upon this notion the disciples asked our Lord, "Did this man sin, or his parents, that he was born blind?" (John 9: 2.) and that some said, Christ was "John the Baptist, some Elias, others Jeremias, or one of the prophets." Matt. 16: 14.

The transmigration of souls into other bodies was undoubtedly the opinion of the Pythagoreans and Platonists, and was embraced by some among the Jews; as by the author of the book of Wisdom, who says, that "being good, he came into a body undefiled," 8: 20. Nevertheless, it is questioned whether the words of Josephus, before quoted, are a sufficient evidence of this doctrine of the metempsychosis being received by the whole sect of the Pharisees; for, "passing into another or different body," may only denote its receiving a body at the resurrection; which will be another, not in substance, but in quality; as it is said of Christ at his transfiguration, "the fashion of his countenance was" another, or, as we render it, was "altered," Luke 9: 29.

As to the opinion which some entertained concerning our Savior, that he was either John the Baptist, or Elias, or Jeremias, or one of the prophets, (Matt. 16: 14.) it is not ascribed to the Pharisees in particular, and if it were, one cannot see how it could be founded on the doctrine of the metempsychosis; since the soul of Elias, now inhabiting the body of Jesus, would no more make him to be Elias, than several others had been, in whose bodies the soul of Elias, according to this doctrine, is supposed to have dwelt since the death of that ancient prophet, near a thousand years before. Besides, how was it possible any person that saw Christ, who did not appear to be less than thirty years old, should, according to the notion of the metempsychosis, conceive him to be John the Baptist, who had been so lately beheaded? Surely this apprehension must be grounded on the supposition of a proper resurrection. It was, probably, therefore, upon the same account, that others took him to be Elias, and others Jeremias. Accordingly, St. Luke expresses it thus:—"Others say, that one of the old prophets is risen from the dead," Luke 9: 19. It may farther be observed, that the doctrine of the resurrection, which St. Paul preached, was not a present metempsychosis, but a real future resurrection, which he calls "the hope and resurrection of the dead," Acts 23: 6. This he professed as a Pharisee, and for this profession the partisans of that sect vindicated him against the Sadducees, Acts 23: 7-9. Upon the whole, therefore, it appears most reasonable to adopt the opinion of Reland, though in opposition to the sentiments of many other learned men, that the Pharisees held the doctrine of the resurrection in a proper sense.

The doctrine of the metempsychosis prevails at the present day almost universally among the heathen nations of the East. (See BODHISM, HINDOOISM, and LAMAISM.)—Watson.

METHODIST; a term frequently applied in England to a person who becomes religious, without reference to any particular sect or party, and especially to such members of the church of England as are evangelical and zealous in their preaching.—Hend. Buck.

METHODISTS, DIALECTIC; those popish doctors who arose in France about the middle of the seventeenth century, in opposition to the Huguenots, or Protestants. These Methodists, from their different manner of treating the controversy with their opponents, may be divided into two classes. The one comprehends those doctors whose method of disputing with the Protestants was disingen-ous and unreasonable, and who followed the example of those military chiefs who shut up their troops in intrenchments and strong-holds, in order to cover them from the attacks of the enemy. Of this number were the Jesuit Veron, who required the Protestants to prove the tenets of their church by plain passages of Scripture, without being allowed the liberty of illustrating those passages, reasoning upon them, or drawing any conclusions from them; Nihusius, an apostate from the Protestant religion; the two Wallenburgs, and others, who confined themselves to the business of answering objections; and cardinal Richlieu, who confined the whole controversy to the single article of the divine institution and authority of the church.

The Methodists of the second class were of opinion that the most expedient manner of reducing the Protestants to silence, was not to attack them by piecemeal, but to overwhelm them at once by the weight of some general principle, or presumption, or some universal argument, which comprehended or might be applied to all the points contested between the two churches; thus imitating the conduct of those military leaders who, instead of spending their time and strength in sieges and skirmishes, endeavored to put an end to the war by a general and decisive action. Some of these polemics rested the defence of popery upon prescription; others upon the wicked lives of Protestant princes, who had left the church of Rome; others, the crime of religious schism; the variety of opinions among Protestants with regard to doctrine and discipline, and the uniformity of the tenets and worship of the church of Rome; and thus, by urging their respective arguments, they thought they should stop the mouths of their adversaries at once.—Hend. Bick.

METHODISTS, WESLEYAN. Origin. This large and respectable denomination was founded, in the year 1729, by one Mr. Morgan and Mr. John Wesley. (See WESLEY, JOHN.) These constitute the great body of the Arminian Methodists, who hold the chapels, schools, &c., built or founded by the great father of Methodism, and consider themselves as representatives to the present generation of what that system was when originally established.

1. Doctrine. The doctrines of the Wesleyan Methodists, according to their own account, are the same as the church of England, as set forth in her liturgy, articles, and homilies. This, however, has been disputed. Mr. Wesley, in his appeal to men of reason and religion, thus declares his sentiments:—"All I teach," he observes, "respects either the nature and condition of justification, the nature and condition of salvation, the nature of justifying and saving faith, or the Author of faith and salvation. That justification whereof our articles and homilies speak, signifies present forgiveness, and consequently acceptance with God: I believe the condition of this is faith: I mean not only that without faith we cannot be justified, but also that, as soon as any one has true faith, in that moment he is justified. Good works follow this faith, but cannot go before it; much less can sanctification, which implies a continued course of good works, springing from holiness of heart. But it is allowed that sanctification goes before our justification at the last day, Heb. 12: 14. Repentance, and fruits meet for repentance, go before faith. Repentance absolutely must go before faith; fruits meet for it, if there be opportunity. By repentance I mean conviction of sin, producing real desires and sincere resolutions of amendment; by salvation I mean not barely deliverance from hell, but a present deliverance from sin. Faith, in general, is a divine, supernatural evidence, or conviction of things not seen, not discoverable by our bodily senses: justifying faith implies not only a divine evidence or conviction that God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself, but a sure trust and confidence that Christ died for my sins, that he loved me, and gave himself for me. And the moment a penitent sinner believes this, God pardons and absolves him; and as soon as his pardon or justification is witnessed to him by the Holy Ghost, he is saved. From that time (unless he make shipwreck of the faith) salvation gradually increases in his soul.

"The Author of faith and salvation is God alone. There is no more of power than of merit in man; but as all merit is in the Son of God, in what he has done and suffered for us, so all power is in the Spirit of God. And, therefore, every man, in order to believe unto salvation, must receive the Holy Ghost." So far Mr. Wesley. Respecting original sin, free will, the justification of men, good works, and works done before justification, he refers us to what is said on these subjects in the former part of the ninth, the tenth, the eleventh, the twelfth, and thirteenth articles of the church of England. In order that we may form still clearer ideas respecting Mr. Wesley's opinions, we shall here quote a few questions and answers as laid down in the Minutes of Conference. Q. "In what sense is Adam's sin imputed to all mankind?" A. "In Adam all die, i. e. 1. Our bodies then became mortal. 2. Our souls died, i. e. were disunited from God. And hence, 3. We are all born with a sinful, devilish nature; by reason whereof, 4. We are children of wrath, liable to death eternal." Rom. 5: 15. Eph. 2: 3. Q. "In what sense is the righteousness of Christ imputed to all mankind, or to believers?" A. "We do not find it expressly affirmed in Scripture that God imputes the righteousness of Christ to any, although we do find that faith is imputed for righteousness. That text, 'As by one man's disobedience all men were made sinners, so by the obedience of one all were made righteous,' we conceive, means by the merits of Christ all men are cleared from the guilt of Adam's actual sin." Q. "Can faith be lost but through disobedience?" A. "It cannot. A believer first inwardly disobeys; inclines to sin with his heart; then his intercourse with God is cut off, i. e. his faith is lost; and after this he may fall into outward sin, being now weak, and like another man." Q. "What is implied in being a perfect Christian?" A. "The loving the Lord our God with all our heart, and with all our mind, and soul, and strength." Q. "Does this imply that all inward sin is taken away?" A. "Without doubt; or how could we be said to be saved from all our uncleanness?" Ezek. 36: 29. Q. "How much is allowed by our brethren who differ from us with regard to entire sanctification?" A. "They grant, 1. That every one must be entirely sanctified in the article of death. 2. That till then a believer daily grows in grace, comes nearer and nearer to perfection. 3. That we ought to be continually pressing after this, and to exhort all others to do so." Q. "What do we allow them?" A. "We grant, 1. That many of those who have died in the faith, yea, the greater part of those we have known, were not sanctified throughout, not made perfect in love, till a little before death. 2. That the term sanctified is continually applied by St. Paul to all that were justified, that were true believers. 3. That by this term alone he rarely (if ever) means saved from all sin. 4. That consequently it is not proper to use it in this sense, without adding the word 'wholly, entirely,' or the like. 5. That the inspired writers almost continually speak of us to those who were justified, but very rarely either of or to those who were sanctified. 6. That consequently it behooves us to speak in public almost continually of the state of justification; but more rarely in full and explicit terms concerning entire sanctification." Q. "What, then, is the point wherein we divide?" A. "It is this: Whether we should expect to be saved from all sin before the article of death." Q. "Is there any clear Scripture promise of this, that God will save us from all sin?" A. "There is. Ps. 130: 8: 'He shall redeem Israel from all his iniquities.' This is more largely expressed in Ezek. 36: 25, 29. 2 Cor. 7: 1. Deut. 30: 6. 1 John 3: 8. Eph. 5: 25, 27. John 17: 20, 23. 1 John 4: 17."

Thus we have endeavored to give a view of the tenets of the Wesleyan Methodists; and this we have chosen to do in their own words, in order to prevent misrepresentation.

2. Discipline. Mr. Wesley having formed numerous societies in different parts, he, with his brother Charles, drew up certain rules, by which they were, and it seems in many respects still are, governed. They state the nature and design of a Methodist society in the following words:—

"Such a society is no other than a company of men having the form and seeking the power of godliness; united in order to pray together, to receive the word of exhortation, and to watch over one another in love, that they may help each other to work out their salvation.

"That it may be more easily discerned whether they are indeed working out their own salvation, each society is divided into smaller companies, called classes, according to their respective places of abode. There are about twelve persons (sometimes fifteen, twenty, or even more) in each class; one of whom is styled the leader. It is his business, 1. To see each person in his class once a week, at least, in order to inquire how their souls prosper; to advise, reprove, comfort, or exhort, as occasion may require; to receive what they are willing to give to the poor, or towards the gospel. 2. To meet the minister and the stewards of the society once a week, in order to inform the minister of any that are sick, or of any that walk disorderly, and will not be reprov'd; to pay to the stewards what they have received of their several classes in the week preceding; and to show their account of what each person has contributed.

"There is only one condition previously required of those who desire admission into these societies, namely, a desire to flee from the wrath to come; to be saved from their sins: but wherever this is really fixed in the soul, it will be shown by its fruits. It is, therefore, expected of all who continue therein, that they should continue to evidence their desire of salvation,—

"First, by doing no harm; by avoiding evil in every kind; especially that which is most generally practised, such as taking the name of God in vain; the profaning the day of the Lord, either by doing ordinary work thereon, or by buying or selling; drunkenness; buying or selling spirituous liquors, or drinking them, unless in cases of extreme necessity; fighting, quarrelling, brawling; brother going to law with brother; returning evil for evil, or railing for railing; the using many words in buying or selling; the buying or selling uncustomed goods; the giving or taking things on usury; i. e. unlawful interest.

"Uncharitable or unprofitable conversation; particularly speaking evil of magistrates or of ministers.

"Doing to others as we would not they should do unto us.

"Doing what we know is not for the glory of God; as the putting on gold or costly apparel; the taking such diversions as cannot be used in the name of the Lord Jesus.

"The singing those songs, or reading those books, which do not tend to the knowledge or love of God; softness, and needless self-indulgence; laying up treasure upon the earth; borrowing without a probability of paying, or taking up goods without a probability of paying for them.

"It is expected of all who continue in these societies that they should continue to evidence their desire of salvation,— "Secondly, by doing good; by being in every kind merciful after their power, as they have opportunity; doing good of every possible sort, and as far as possible, to all men; to their bodies, of the ability which God giveth; by giving food to the hungry, by clothing the naked, by visiting or helping them that are sick, or in prison; to their souls, by instructing, reprov'ing, or exhorting all we have any intercourse with; trampling under foot that enthusiastic doctrine of devils, that 'We are not to do good, unless our hearts be free to it.'

"By doing good, especially to them that are of the household of faith, or groaning so to be; employing them preferably to others; buying one of another; helping each other in business; and so much the more, because the world will love its own, and them only; by all possible diligence and frugality, that the gospel be not blamed; by running with patience the race set before them, denying themselves, and taking up their cross daily; submitting to bear the reproach of Christ; to be as the filth and offscouring of the world, and looking that men should say all manner of evil of them falsely for the Lord's sake.

"It is expected of all who desire to continue in these societies, that they should continue to evidence their desire of salvation,—

"Thirdly, by attending on all the ordinances of God: such are, the public worship of God; the ministry of the word, either read or expounded; the supper of the Lord; family and private prayer; searching the Scriptures; and fasting and abstinence.

"These are the general rules of our societies, all which we are taught of God to observe, even in his written word: the only rule, and the sufficient rule, both of our faith and practice; and all these we know his Spirit writes on every truly awakened heart. If there be any among us who observe them not, who habitually break any of them, let it be made known unto them who watch over that soul, as they who must give an account. We will admonish him of the error of his ways; and we will bear with him for a season; but then, if he repent not, he hath no more place among us: we have delivered our own souls.

3. Circuits and Conferences. In Mr. Wesley's connexion, they have circuits and conferences, which we find were thus formed:—When the preachers at first went out to exhort and preach, it was by Mr. Wesley's permission and direction; some from one part of the kingdom, and some from another; and though frequently strangers to each other, and those to whom they were sent, yet on his credit and sanction alone they were received and provided for as friends, by the societies wherever they came. But, having little or no communication or intercourse with one another, nor any subordination among themselves, they must have been under the necessity of recurring to Mr. Wesley for directions how and where they were to labor. To remedy this inconvenience, he conceived the design of calling them together to an annual conference; by this means he brought them into closer union with each other, and made them sensible of the utility of acting in concert and harmony. He soon found it necessary, also, to bring their itinerancy under certain regulations, and reduce it to some fixed order, both to prevent confusion, and for his own ease; he therefore took fifteen or twenty societies, more or less, which lay round some principal society in those parts, and which were so situated, that the greatest distance from one to the other was not much more than twenty miles, and united them into what was called a circuit. At the yearly conference he appointed two, three, or four preachers to one of these circuits, according to its extent, which at first was often very considerable, sometimes taking in a part of three or four counties. Here, and here only, were they to labor for one year, that is, until the next conference. One of the preachers on every circuit was called the assistant, because he assisted Mr. Wesley in superintending the societies, and other preachers; he took charge of the societies within the limits assigned him; he enforced the rules everywhere, and directed the labors of the preachers associated with him. Having received a list of the societies forming his circuit, he took his own station in it, gave to the other preachers a plan of it, and pointed out the day when each should be at the place fixed for him, to begin a progressive motion round it, in such order as the plan directed. They now followed one another through all the societies belonging to that circuit, at stated distances of time, all being governed by the same rules, and undergoing the same labor. By this plan, every preacher's daily work was appointed beforehand; each knew, every day, where the others were, and each society when to expect the preacher, and how long he would stay with them. It may be observed, however, that Mr. Wesley's design in calling the preachers together annually, was not merely for the regulation of the circuits, but also for the review of their doctrines and discipline, and for the examination of their moral conduct; that those who were to administer with him in holy things might be thoroughly furnished for every good work.

4. Examination of Preachers. As to their preachers, the following extract from the above-mentioned Minutes of Conference will show us in what manner they are chosen and designated. Q. "How shall we try those who think they are moved by the Holy Ghost to preach?" A. "Inquire, 1. Do they know God as a pardoning God? Have they the love of God abiding in them? Do they desire and seek nothing but God? And are they holy in all manner of conversation? 2. Have they gifts as well as grace for the work? Have they, in some tolerable degree, a clear, sound understanding? Have they a right judgment in the things of God? Have they a just conception of salvation by faith? And has God given them any degree of utterance? Do they speak justly, readily, clearly? 3. Have they fruit? Are any truly convinced of sin, and converted to God, by their preaching?

"As long as these three marks concur in any one, we believe he is called of God to preach. These we receive as sufficient proof that he is moved thereto by the Holy Ghost."

Q. "What method may we use in receiving a new helper?" A. "A proper time for doing this is at a conference, after solemn fasting and prayer. Every person proposed is then to be present, and each of them may be asked,—

"Have you faith in Christ? Are you going on to perfection? Do you expect to be perfected in love in this life? Are you groaning after it? Are you resolved to devote yourself wholly to God and to his work? Have you considered the rules of a helper? Will you keep them for conscience' sake? Are you determined to employ all your time in the work of God? Will you preach every morning and evening? Will you diligently instruct the children in every place? Will you visit them from house to house? Will you recommend fasting both by precept and example?"

"We then may receive him as a probationer, by giving him the Minutes of the Conference, inscribed thus:—'To A. B. You think it your duty to call sinners to repentance. Make full proof hereof, and we shall rejoice to receive you as a fellow-laborer.' Let him then read and carefully weigh what is contained therein, that if he has any doubt it may be removed."

"To the above it may be useful to add," says Mr. Benson, "a few remarks on the method pursued in the choice of the itinerant preachers, as many have formed the most erroneous ideas on the subject, imagining they are employed with hardly any prior preparation. 1. They are received as private members of the society on trial. 2. After a quarter of a year, if they are found deserving, they are admitted as proper members. 3. When their grace and abilities are sufficiently manifest, they are appointed leaders of classes. 4. If they then discover talents for more important services, they are employed to exhort occasionally in the smaller congregations, when the preachers cannot attend. 5. If approved in this line of duty, they are allowed to preach. 6. Out of these men, who are called local preachers, are selected the itinerant preachers, who are first proposed at a quarterly meeting of the stewards and local preachers of the circuit; then at a meeting of the travelling preachers of the district; and, lastly, in the conference; and, if accepted, are nominated for a circuit. 7. Their characters and conduct are examined annually in the conference; and, if they continue faithful for four years of trial, they are received into full connexion. At these conferences, also, strict inquiry is made into the conduct and success of every preacher, and those who are found deficient in abilities are no longer employed as itinerants; while those whose conduct has not been agreeable to the gospel, are expelled, and thereby deprived of all the privileges even of private members of the society."

5. Duties of Preachers. The following extract from "The Larger Minutes," will show what are considered to be the office and duty of a Methodist preacher:—Q. "What is the office of a Christian minister?" A. "To watch over souls, as he that must give an account. To feed and guide the flock." Q. "How shall he be fully qualified for his great work?" A. "By walking closely with God, and having his work greatly at heart; by understanding and loving every branch of our discipline; and by carefully and constantly observing the twelve rules of a helper: viz. 1. Be diligent; never be unemployed; never be triflingly employed; never while away time, nor spend more time at any place than is strictly necessary. 2. Be serious; let your motto be holiness to the Lord; avoid all lightness, jesting, and foolish talking. 3. Converse sparingly and cautiously with women, particularly with young women. 4. Take no step towards marriage without solemn prayer to God, and consulting with your brethren. 5. Believe evil of no one; unless fully proved take heed how you credit it; put the best construction you can on every thing; you know the judge is always supposed to be on the prisoner's side. 6. Speak evil of no one, else your word especially would eat as doth a canker; keep your thoughts within your own breast, till you come to the person concerned. 7. Tell every one what you think wrong in him, lovingly and plainly, and as soon as may be, else it will fester in your own heart; make all haste to cast the fire out of your bosom. 8. Do not affect the gentleman: a preacher of the gospel is the servant of all. 9. Be ashamed of nothing but sin, no, not of cleaning your own shoes when necessary. 10. Be punctual; do every thing exactly at the time; and do not mend our rules, but keep them, and that for conscience' sake. 11. You have nothing to do but to save souls; and therefore spend and be spent in this work; and go always, not only to those who want you, but to those who want you most. 12. Act in all things, not according to your own will, but as a son in the gospel, and in union with your brethren. As such, it is your part to employ your time as our rules direct; partly in preaching and visiting from house to house; partly in reading, meditation, and prayer. Above all, if you labor with us in our Lord's vineyard, it is needful that you should do that part of the work which the conference shall advise, at those times and places which they shall judge most for his glory.

"Observe:—It is not your business to preach so many times, and to take care merely of this and that society; but to save as many souls as you can; to bring as many sinners as you possibly can to repentance; and, with all your power, to build them up in that holiness without which they cannot see the Lord; and, remember, a Methodist preacher is to mind every point, great and small, in the Methodist discipline; therefore you will need all the grace and all the sense you have, and to have all your wits about you."

The discipline of the Wesleyan Methodists is rigidly uniform. No deviation whatever from prescribed rules is permitted. Every preacher, and indeed every member, is to render unqualified obedience to the dictates of the conference; the legal number of the preachers constituting which is one hundred, though it is often attended by about three hundred and fifty ministers. From the minutes of the conference held in 1831, it appears that the number of persons in the societies were as follows:—In Great Britain, 249,119; in Ireland, 22,470; and in foreign stations, 42,743. Their regular preachers were 846, in Great Britain; 143 in Ireland; and 187, exclusive of catechists, in foreign stations.

II. NEW CONNEXIONS. Since Mr. Wesley's death, his people have been divided; but this division, it seems, respects discipline more than sentiment. At the first conference after his death, which was held at Manchester, the preachers published a declaration, in which they said that they would "take the plan as Mr. Wesley had left it." This was by no means satisfactory to many of the preachers and people, who thought that religious liberty ought to be extended to all the societies which desired it. In order to favor this cause, so agreeable to the spirit of Christianity and the rights of Englishmen, several respectable preachers came forward; and by the writings which they circulated through the connexion, paved the way for a plan of pacification, by which it was stipulated, that in every society where a threefold majority of class-leaders, stewards, and trustees desired it, the people should have preaching in church hours, and the sacraments of baptism and the Lord's supper administered to them.

The spirit of inquiry being roused did not stop here; for it appeared agreeable both to reason and the customs of the primitive church, that the people should have a voice in the temporal concerns of the societies, vote in the election of church officers, and give their suffrages in spiritual concerns. This subject produced a variety of arguments on both sides of the question; many of the preachers and people thought that an annual delegation of the general stewards of the circuits, to sit either in the conference or the district meetings, in order to assist in the disbursement of the yearly collection, the Kingswood school collection, and the preachers' fund, and in making new or revising old laws, would be a bond of union between the conference and connexion at large, and do away the very idea of arbitrary power among the travelling preachers.

In order to facilitate this good work, many societies, in various parts of the kingdom, sent delegates to the conference held at Leeds, in 1797: they were instructed to request, that the people might have a voice in the formation of their own laws, the choice of their own officers, and the distribution of their own property. The preachers proceeded to discuss two motions:—Shall delegates from the societies be admitted into the conference? Shall circuit stewards be admitted into the district meetings? Both motions were negative, and consequently all hopes of accommodation between the parties were given up. Several friends of religious liberty proposed a plan for a new itinerancy. In order that it might be carried into immediate effect, they formed themselves into a regular meeting, in Ebenezer chapel; Mr. William Thom being chosen president, and Mr. Alexander Kilham secretary. The meeting proceeded to arrange the plan for supplying the circuits of the new connexion with preachers; and desired the president and secretary to draw up the rules of church government, in order that they might be circulated through the societies for their approbation. Accordingly, a form of church government, suited to an itinerant ministry, was printed by these two brethren, under the title of "Outlines of a Constitution proposed for the Examination, Amendment, and Acceptance, of the members of the Methodist Itinerancy." The plan was examined by select committees in the different circuits of the connexion, and, with a few alterations, was accepted by the conference of preachers and delegates. The preachers and people are incorporated in all meetings for business, not by temporary concession, but by the essential principles of their constitution; for the private members choose the class-leaders; the leaders' meeting nominates the stewards; and the society confirms or rejects the nomination. The quarterly meetings are composed of the general stewards and representatives chosen by the different societies of the circuits, and the fourth quarterly meeting of the year appoints the preacher and delegate of every circuit that shall attend the general conference. For a further account of their principles and discipline, we must refer the reader to a pamphlet, entitled, "General Rules of the United Societies of Methodists in the New Connexion."

In 1829, the New Connexion Methodists had 162 chapels, 59 circuits, and 492 local preachers. Their numbers amounted to 11,777.

III. PRIMITIVE METHODISTS, or RANTERS, who are in general very illiterate, and extremely noisy in their public demeanor, (proceeding, for instance, through the streets singing hymns,) broke off from the grand body of the Methodists, some years ago, on the ground that the original spirit of Methodism was not kept up among its members. They allow females to preach in promiscuous assemblies; a practice condemned by the conference. They have 403 chapels; the number of their preachers, chiefly local, is 2,700; and that of their members 33,720.

IV. INDEPENDENT METHODISTS, and

V. WESLEYAN PROTESTANT METHODISTS, are two minor bodies that have recently separated, in consequence of what they deemed acts of arbitrary and unconstitutional power on the part of the conference, and the claiming of an authority which they conceived to be unwarranted by the New Testament. One of the latter body goes so far as to say, that the power which has hitherto been exercised by the Methodist conference, agrees in all things with that of the princes of this world, who rule over men only for their own honor and advantage; but is utterly incompatible with the power of moral suasion, and the power of Christian charity. The "Independents" have upwards of a hundred lay-preachers, and about 4,000 members; the "Protestants," who reside chiefly in and about Leeds, are rapidly on the increase, and their cause has been warmly espoused by many in London, who were weary of the yoke imposed upon them by the conference. What gave rise to the Independent branch was, we understand, a refusal on the part of the conference to admit lay-members to a share in the administration of the discipline and other affairs of the society.

VI. BRYANITES, so called from a Mr. Bryan, one of their preachers, have about 13,000 members. They differ very little from the Ranters. Coke's, Southey's, and Watson's Life of Wesley; Macgowan's Shaver; Wesley's Works; Benson's Vindication and Apology for the Methodists; Fletcher's Works; Bogue and Bennett's History of the Dissenters, vol. iii.; Walker's Address to the Methodists.—Hend. Buck.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN THE UNITED STATES.* History. The first Methodist class in America was formed in the city of New York, by Mr. Philip Embury, in 1766. The community, however, arising out of the labors of Mr. Wesley and some early preachers, was not regularly formed till 1784, when Dr. Coke, a presbyter of the church of England, having been ordained, was sent out in the capacity of superintendent of the Methodist societies in America.

On the 25th of December, 1784, the preachers, amounting in number to sixty-one, were assembled for conference in Baltimore, at which time the Methodist Episcopal church was duly organized. Agreeably to the instructions received from Mr. Wesley, Mr. Asbury, who was unanimously elected by the suffrages of his brethren, was first ordained deacon, then elder, and afterwards superintendent or bishop, by Dr. Coke, with the assistance of the presbyters present. At the same conference, twelve of the preachers were elected and ordained elders, and sent forth like the apostles of old to preach the word of God, and to administer the holy sacraments. The doings of this conference resulted in giving great satisfaction both to the preachers and people; for their plans of future operation were now so regulated and systematized, that the wants of the societies were promptly met; and the great object of the preachers in spreading the gospel was greatly promoted by a well organized system of itinerancy. At this time, there were 14,988 members in the society, and 83 preachers. (See ASBURY, and COKE.)

Their number having so increased, and their fields of labor being so remote from each other, it was not long before it was impracticable for them all to meet in one conference, as they had been accustomed to do; therefore they found it necessary to divide themselves into annual conferences, each conference including such numbers of the preachers as were so situated as to be able to meet with the least inconvenience to themselves: they always fixing the time of their annual sessions to suit the convenience of the bishops; for it pertains to their office to preside on these occasions; to direct the business of the conference, and to appoint the preachers to their work for the year.

These several annual conferences soon found it necessary, in order to preserve a general harmony in their mode of operation, to appoint a general conference, which was then composed of all the elders belonging to the travelling connexion. This body soon became so large, that it was found expedient to reduce the number; this was done by adopting the plan of having a suitable number of delegates from each conference, fully to represent the wants of the church in their several conferences.

The first delegated general conference was held in the city of New York, in May, 1812. At this time there were 688 travelling preachers, and 196,357 members in the church. The increase of members this year was 10,790. This conference was composed of one member for every five members of each annual conference; but at the last general conference the number was changed to one for every fourteen. For a knowledge of the powers and privileges of this body, we refer the reader to the Discipline of the Church, sec. 3, page 19, edition 1832.

Statistics. There are now (1833) five bishops in the Methodist Episcopal church, who are constantly travelling over our whole extent of country; preaching the gospel, attending the several conferences, ordaining ministers, and taking the general oversight of the whole work.

In the United States there are at present, annual conferences, 22.

Travelling preachers,	2,230

Total preachers and church members,	569,498
Increase this year, (1853,)	46,720

This large number of preachers and people have been raised up in the United States within the short space of sixty-seven years; besides the thousands who have died in the faith, and gone to inherit the promises. In view of the wonderful success that has crowned the labors of the Methodist ministry, we may well exclaim, "What hath God wrought!" Truly, it may be said, "A little one has become a thousand, and a small one a great people; this is the Lord's doings, and it is marvellous in our eyes."

Enterprise. The Methodist Episcopal church has not been indifferent to the benevolent enterprises of the day, but has done much, and now has the prospect of doing much more, for the promotion of the general objects that engross the attention of the Christian world.

In 1819, the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal church was organized; and at the next general conference, in 1820, it received the approval and sanction of that body. Many auxiliary societies have been formed, and the church generally takes a lively and deep interest in the missionary cause.

There are now (1854) employed under the patronage of this society 100 missionaries, who have the charge, as nearly as can be ascertained, of 11,886 church members, and probably preach to five times this number of people. In connexion with these, there are 16 teachers and 672 scholars.

Two missionaries are now in Liberia, (Africa,) and two are sent to the Flat Head Indians, beyond the Rocky mountains.

The funds of the society have greatly increased during the past year. The receipts were $31,361 39, being an increase of $18,603 10 over that of the previous year.

The church has also a Bible, Tract, and Sunday School Society; and every department is in successful operation.

The subject of temperance is regarded by the church as a matter of vital importance to its spiritual interests. There are many conference and church temperance societies formed; and both preachers and people are deeply engaged in doing all in their power to promote the great objects of the temperance cause.

The Methodist Episcopal church has a large book concern, which is located in the city of New York. In this establishment there are thirty presses employed, one of which is a power press. The concern employs three editors, two agents, seven clerks, one superintendent of the printing office, who has under his charge eighty-seven persons, including compositors, pressmen, roller boys, &c.; one superintendent of the bindery, who has under his charge forty-three males, and sixty-one females, making in all two hundred and five persons.

In 1823, there was a publishing fund instituted, the object of which is to enable the book concern to print and sell Bibles, tracts, and Sunday school books at the lowest possible prices.

The chartered fund of the Methodist Episcopal church was originally raised by the voluntary contributions of benevolent friends. It is located in Philadelphia, and is under the management of a board of nine trustees, members of the church. A charter was obtained of the legislature of Pennsylvania for this fund, in 1797, and its income is equally divided among the several conferences, for the benefit of the deficient, superannuated, and supernumerary preachers, their wives and children, and the widows and orphans of deceased preachers. Its capital is only about $25,000; and its income but about $1,500 a year.

Literature has not been overlooked by this church, but has always received the attention that could be possibly spared from the more important work of saving souls. There are at present five colleges, and twelve or more academies under its particular patronage. These are all under good discipline, and are exerting an influence not only favorable to literature, but favorable also to morals and religion.

Doctrine. As the doctrines of the church are embodied in the articles of religion, which give the sentiments of our denomination fully, we would refer the reader to the DISCIPLINE. [See also the article METHODISTS, WESLEYAN.]

A careful perusal of these articles, and a candid comparison of these with the word of God, will enable the inquirer after truth to form an opinion for himself.

Government. The title of the church gives us a correct idea of the character of its government—it is strictly Episcopal. The general rules of government are the same in this country as those given by Mr. Wesley, for the government of the Methodist societies in England. (See Discipline, chap. 2, sec. 1, p. 75, &c.)

All the members are received into the church on a probation of six months; during which time they have ample time to make themselves acquainted with all the doctrines and usages of the church; and the church has also an opportunity of becoming acquainted with the Christian experience and the general character of the probationers: at the end of the probation, if there is a mutual agreement between the probationers and the church, they are received into full connexion; but in case there is a disagreement, probationers can withdraw, or the church can drop them without the formality of a church trial.

Whenever there is a sufficient number of persons in a place, who wish to unite with the Methodist Episcopal church, it is customary for the preacher to form them into a class, and to appoint one of their number a leader, whose duty it is to take a special oversight of them, and to meet them once a week for the purpose of religious instruction and improvement. (See Discipline, chapter 2, section 2, page 81.) Classes thus formed are united into a church, and the church is placed under the charge of a travelling preacher. The churches are situated on circuits or stations, and they are annually supplied by a preacher from the conference.

On each circuit or station there is a quarterly conference, consisting of the presiding elder of the district, all the travelling and local preachers, exhorters, stewards, and leaders of the circuit or station, and none else. This conference possesses an appellate jurisdiction over the members of the church on the circuit or station, who may have appealed from the decisions of the church, and its decisions in all cases are final. It also attends to the general business of the church, both temporal and spiritual, which cannot so well be attended to by the members of the church in their more private capacity. It is properly a connecting link between the church and the annual conference, and all the business of the church with the annual conference is prepared and forwarded by this body.

A number of circuits and stations form districts, over which an elder is appointed to preside. And a number of the districts form a conference, which meets annually for the transaction of its appropriate business. And then, again, delegates from these several annual conferences form a general conference, which meets once in four years.

There are three orders of ministers recognised in the Methodist Episcopal church; bishops, elders, and deacons; and the duties pertaining to each, are plainly defined in the Discipline. [See METHODISTS, WESLEYAN.]

For the election, consecration, and duties of the bishops, see Discipline, chap. 1, sec. 4, p. 25. For the duties of presiding elders, see Dis., sec. 5, p. 28. For the election and ordination of travelling elders, and their duties, see sec. 6, p. 31. For the election and ordination of travelling deacons, see sec. 7, p. 32. And for the method of receiving travelling preachers, and their duties, see sec. 8, p. 33. In addition to the travelling ministry, there is a large and useful class of ministers belonging to the Methodist Episcopal church, denominated local preachers. As these men are so circumstanced in their affairs of life as not to be able to give themselves up exclusively to the work of the ministry, yet they do what they can on Sabbath days, and at other times, in preaching the gospel, and in helping on the great work of evangelizing the world. For a knowledge of their duties, powers, and privileges, see Dis., chap. 1, sec. 20, p. 66. For the particular duties of the preachers to God, to themselves, and each other, see Dis., sec. 12, p. 48.

There are many other things connected with the history, doctrine, and government of this church, which we cannot notice in this article, for the want of room; and even if we had, it would not be necessary, for there are a great plenty of works already before the public, which treat of all these matters in detail.

Distinguished Men. The standard writers of the Methodists are Wesley, Fletcher, Benson, Clarke, and Watson, with many others, too numerous to mention. To these we would refer the reader for a full and particular knowledge of this numerous denomination of Christians. See Zion's Herald, for June, 1834.

METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH. (See PROTESTANT METHODIST CHURCH.)

METHODISTS, WHITFIELD, or CALVINISTIC. Under this term are generally comprised three distinct connexions.

1. The Tabernacle Connexion, or that formed by Mr. Whitfield, and so called from the name given to several of his places of worship, in London, Bristol, &c. (See WHITFIELD.) In some of the chapels in this connexion the service of the church of England is read; in others the worship is conducted much in the same way as among the Congregationalists: while, in all, the system of supply is more or less kept up, consisting in the employment, for a month or six weeks, of ministers from different parts of the country, who either take the whole duty, or assist the resident minister. Some of the congregations consist of several thousand hearers; and, by the blessing of God on the rousing and faithful sermons which are usually delivered to them, very extensive good is effected in the way of conversion. Most of the ministers now employed as supplies in this connexion, are of the Congregational order, to which of late years there appears to be a gradual approximation; and it is not improbable that ere long both bodies will coalesce.

2. Lady Huntingdon's Connexion. For an account of the origin of this section of Calvinistic Methodists, see the article HUNTINGDON, Countess of. The number of chapels belonging to this body, at the present time, is about sixty, in all of which the liturgy of the church of England is read, and most of her forms scrupulously kept up. The ministers, who used formerly to supply at different chapels in the course of the year, are now become more stationary, and have assumed more of the pastoral character. They have a respectable college at Cheshunt, in Hertfordshire.

3. The Welsh Calvinistic Methodists. This body, which is now very numerous, takes its date from the year 1735, much about the time that Methodism began in England; and is to be traced to the zealous labors of Howel Harris, Esq., of Trevecca, in Brecknockshire, who had intended to take orders in the church of England, but was so shocked at the impiety which he witnessed among the students at Oxford, that he abandoned his purpose; and returning to his native place, began to exert himself for the salvation of sinners, both in his own parish and in those which adjoined it. A great revival was the result; and it being found necessary to have private conversations with such as were under concern about their souls, beyond what Mr. Harris could attend to, he formed societies, in which they could be carried on by experienced individuals appointed for the purpose. Notwithstanding the opposition that he met with, he was so successful in his exertions, that in the course of four years, not fewer than three hundred societies were formed in South Wales. It was not long before this zealous servant of Christ was joined by several ministers who left the established church, who became itinerants, and diffused the knowledge of the gospel very widely in the principality.

The first association was held about the year 1743, and since which time associations have been held quarterly. The connexion continued to receive fresh accessions, both from among the ministers and members of the establishment, till the year 1785, when it was joined by the Rev. Thomas Charles, A. B., of Bala, who, in addition to other zealous labors in the gospel, set himself to organize the body, according to a more regular plan; so that to him its members now look as the principal instrument in reducing them to their present order.

Their constitution consists of the following combinations:—1. Private societies. These include such, and such only, as discover some concern about their souls, their need of Christ, a diligent attendance on the means of grace, freedom from doctrinal errors, and an unblamable walk and conversation, together with their children; and who meet once every week privately, under the superintendence of two or more leaders. These societies are subject, as it regards subordination and government, to, 2. The monthly societies, the members of which are exclusively preachers, or leaders of private societies within the county, and such of the officers from neighboring counties as may conveniently attend. These take cognizance of the state of all the private societies within their bounds, particularly that there be nothing, either in doctrine or discipline, contrary to the word of God, or dissonant from the rules of the connexion. 3. The quarterly societies, or associations, which are convened once every quarter of a year, both in South and North Wales. At every such association the whole connexion is supposed to be present, through its representatives, the preachers and leaders; and accordingly the decisions of this meeting are deemed of authority on every subject relating to the body through all its branches.

The number of Calvinistic Methodists in Wales is very great, and is increasing from year to year. Their chapels near stone buildings, built expressly for places of dissenting worship, are to be met with, and most of these belong to this body; and had it not been for their exertions and those of the Independents, &c., the inhabitants of most parts of the principality must have remained in the gross state of ignorance; the gospel being very seldom preached in the pulpits of the establishment.

They are high in their Calvinistic sentiments, taking the strictly commercial view of the atonement of Christ, and regarding the work of redemption as possessing no aspect or bearing but what regards the elect. See History of Methodism; Gillie's Life of Whitfield, and Works; The History, Constitution, Rules of Discipline, and Confession of Faith of the Calvinistic Methodists in Wales.—Hend. Buck. METHUSELAH, son of Enoch, (Gen. 5: 21, 22.) was born A. M. 687; he begat Lamech, A. M. 874, and died A. M. 1656, aged nine hundred and sixty-nine years; the greatest age attained by any man. The year of his death was that of the deluge.—Calmet.

METROPOLITAN; a bishop of a mother-church, or of the chief church in the chief city. (See articles BISHOP; EPISCOPACY.)—Hend. Buck.

METUS; an aged and venerable Christian of Alexandria, who in the persecution in that city A. D. 249, for refusing to blaspheme his Savior, was first beaten with clubs, then pierced with sharp reeds, and finally stoned to death. QUISTA and AFOLLONIA, two Christian females, and many others whose names are not preserved, were fellow-sufferers.—Fox, p. 26.

MEZUZOTH, is a name the Jews give to certain pieces of parchment, which they fix on the door-posts of their houses; taking literally what Moses says, Deut. 6: 9, 11, 13: "Thou shalt never forget the laws of thy God, but thou shalt write them on the posts of thy house, and on thy gates." They pretend, that to avoid making themselves ridiculous, by writing the commandments of God without their doors, or rather to avoid exposing them to profanation, they ought to write them on parchment, and to inclose it. Therefore they write these words on a square piece of prepared parchment, with a particular ink, and a square kind of character, Deut. 6: 4—9: "Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord," &c. Then they leave a little space, and afterwards go on to Deut. 11: 13: "And it shall come to pass, if thou shalt hearken diligently to my commandments," &c. as far as, "thou shalt write them upon the door-posts of thy house." After this they roll up the parchment, put it into a case, and write on it Shadi, (Almighty,) which is one of the names of God, and then attach it to the doors of their houses, and chambers, and to the knocker of the door on the right side. As often as they pass, they touch it in this place with their finger, which they afterwards kiss. The Hebrew mezuza properly signifies a door-post of a house, but is a name also given to this roll of parchment.—Calmet.

MICAH, the seventh in order of the twelve lesser prophets, is supposed to have prophesied about B. C. 750. He was commissioned to denounce the judgments of God against both the kingdoms of Judah and Israel, for their idolatry and wickedness.

The principal predictions contained in this book are, the invasions of Shalmanezar and Sennacherib; the destruction of Samaria and of Jerusalem, mixed with consolatory promises of the deliverance of the Jews from the Babylonian captivity, and of the downfall of the power of their Assyrian and Babylonian oppressors; the cessation of prophecy in consequence of their continued deceitfulness and hypocrisy; and a desolation in a then distant period, still greater than that which was declared to be impending. The birth of the Messiah at Bethlehem is also expressly foretold; and the Jews are directed to look to the establishment and extent of his kingdom, as an unfailing source of comfort amidst general distress.

The style of Micah is nervous, concise, and elegant, often elevated and poetical, but sometimes obscure from sudden transitions of subject; and the contrast of the neglected duties of justice, mercy, humility, and piety, with the punctilious observance of the ceremonial sacrifices, affords a beautiful example of the harmony which subsists between the Mosaic and Christian dispensations, and shows that the law partook of that spiritual nature which more immediately characterizes the religion of Jesus.

The prophecy of Micah, contained in the fifth chapter, is, perhaps, the most important single prophecy in all the Old Testament, and the most comprehensive respecting the personal character of the Messiah, and his successive manifestations to the world. It crowns the whole chain of predictions respecting the several limitations of the promised seed: to the line of Shem; to the family of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob; to the tribe of Judah; and to the royal house of David, terminating in his birth at Bethlehem, "the city of David." It carefully distinguishes his human nativity from his divine nature and eternal existence; foretels the casting off of the Israelites and Jews for a season; their ultimate restoration; and the universal peace which should prevail in the kingdom and under the government of the Messiah. This prophecy, therefore, forms the basis of the New Testament revelation, which commences with the birth of the Messiah at Bethlehem, the miraculous circumstances of which are recorded by St. Matthew and St. Luke in the introduction to their respective histories; the eternal subsistence of Christ as "the Word," in the sublime introduction to St. John's gospel; his prophetic character and second coming, illustrated in the four gospels and in the apostolic epistles.—Jones; Watson.

MICAH, of Ephraim, son of a rich widow, who became an occasion of falling to Israel, (Judg. 17, 18.) by making an ephod (or priestly habit) and images of metal, for a domestic chapel. He made one of his own sons priest; and afterwards a young Levite. It is believed this happened in the interval, after the death of Joshua, and the elders that succeeded him, till Othniel judged Israel. This idolatry took root, and diffused its influence, like the deadly opus, throughout his country. Behold, how great a matter a little fire kindleth.—Calmet.

MICAH, son of Imlah, of Ephraim, and a prophet, who lived in the time of Ahab, 1 Kings 22: 8—38.—Calmet.

MICHAEL, the name given to the archangel who is represented as presiding over the Jewish nation. (See ANGEL and ARCHANGEL.) Jude (9, 10.) speaks of his contending with the devil, and disputing about the body of Moses; an expression which has given rise to many opinions. Without detailing these, we remark, that the opinion of Macknight seems to be the most reasonable, and the least liable to exception.

In Dan. 10: 13—21, and 12: 1, Michael, he remarks, is spoken of as one of the chief angels, who took care of the Israelites as a nation: he may, therefore, he thinks, have "been the angel of the Lord," before whom Joshua the high-priest is said to have stood, "Satan being at his right hand to resist him;" (Zech. 3: 1.) namely, in his design of restoring the Jewish church and state, called by Jude, the body of Moses, just as the Christian church is called by Paul, the body of Christ. Zechariah adds, "And the Lord," that is, the angel of the Lord, as is plain from ver. 1, "said unto Satan, The Lord rebuketh thee, O Satan! even the Lord who hath chosen Jerusalem, rebuketh thee!" Dr. A. Clarke adopts this view of the passage, and adds to the remarks of Macknight the following:—"Among the Hebrews, goph, roov, is often used for a thing itself; so Rom. 7: 24, the body of sin, signifies sin itself. So the body of Moses may signify Moses himself; or that in which he was particularly concerned; namely, his institutes, religion, &c. (See JUDE.)—Calmet.

MICHAELIS, (JOHN HENRY,) a learned divine and Oriental scholar, was born at Kettenberg, in Germany, in 1668. He studied at the university of Leipsic, and afterwards at Halle, where he became professor of Greek literature in 1699. He subsequently obtained the office of librarian to the university, and at length was appointed to the chair of divinity and the Oriental languages. In 1720, he published, at Halle, a valuable edition of the Hebrew Bible, with various readings from manuscripts and printed editions, and the Masoretic Commentary and Annotations of the Rabbins. A kind of appendix to this work at the same time appeared under the title of "Annotationes Philologico-Exegeticae in Hagiographiis;" Halle, 1720, in three vols. 4to. He was also the author of a Hebrew Grammar, and other works. He died in 1738.—Hend. Buck.

MICHAELIS, (SIR JOHN DAVID,) son of Christian Benedict, and nephew of John Henry Michaelis, was born at Halle, in 1717. He was educated at the university of his native place, and devoted himself to the clerical profession. Having visited England, he became acquainted with bishop Lowth, and other learned men, and for a while officiated as minister at the German chapel, St. James' palace. Returning to Germany, he was made professor of theology and Oriental literature at the university of Gottingen, of which he was also librarian. He was appointed director of the Royal Society of Gottingen; and by his writings and lectures he contributed greatly to the celebrity of that university as a school of theological literature. The order of the polar star was conferred upon professor Michaelis in 1775, by the king of Sweden; and in 1786, he was made an aulic counsellor of Hanover. He died in 1791, at the age of seventy-five. His works are very numerous, amounting to about fifty different publications, mostly relating to Scripture criticism, and the Oriental languages and literature. Among the most valued are his "Introduction to the New Testament," which has been translated into English by bishop Marsh; his "Commentaries on the Law of Moses," of which there is an English version by Dr. Smith, a clergyman of the church of Scotland; his "Spicilegium Geographiae Hebraeorum;" his "Supplementa ad Lexica Hebraica;" his "Biblical and Oriental Library;" and his "Translation of the Bible, with Notes; for the Unlearned."

The adherence of Michaelis to the established system of Lutheranism, and his outward respect for the Christian religion, have principally been attributed to the impressions made upon his mind by the intercourse of the Pietists, and especially by the education which he received from his excellent father. Too light-minded, as he himself acknowledges, to adopt their tone of pious feeling, he nevertheless retained a certain conviction of the truth of Christianity; endeavored, by new and singularly ingenious theories, to remove objections to it; and, much to the surprise of his younger contemporaries, whose rationalistic views were ripening apace, he held, to the last, many parts of the older system, which they had either modified or thrown aside. The melancholy consequences, however, of this merely natural persuasion, are abundantly manifest. Destitute of that conviction which can alone give a comprehensive insight into the real character of revelation, and the harmonious relation of its several parts, he had no guide to enable him to perceive what might be safely admitted without detriment to the system itself; he consequently, according to the usual custom of persons taking only a partial view of subjects, frequently opposed the objection, instead of the principle on which the objection was founded; endeavored to remove it by theories in conformity with mere human systems, and strengthened it equally by his concessions and by his own inadequate and arbitrary defences. Possessed of no settled principles, every minute difficulty presented itself with intrinsic force and perplexity to his mind; his belief was a reed ready to be shaken by every fresh breeze; all that he had previously gained seemed again staked on the issue of each petty skirmish; and, in the very descriptive comparison of Lessing, he was like the timid soldier who loses his life before an outpost, without once seeing the country of which he would gain possession. The theological opinions of this celebrated man are never to be trusted; and, indeed, the serious student cannot but be disgusted with the levity which too frequently appears in his writings, and the gross obscenity which occasionally defiles them; (as it did much more offensively his oral lectures;) the result of his intemperate habits and low moral character.—Hend. Buck.

MICHMAS; a city of Ephraim, on the confines of Benjamin, (Ezra 2: 27. Neh. 7: 31.) called also Michmash, 1 Sam. 13: 2. Isa. 10: 28. Comp. Neh. 11: 31. Eusebius says, it was, in his time, a considerable place, about nine miles from Jerusalem, towards Rama.—Calmet.

MIDDLETON, (CONVERS, D. D.,) a learned divine and elegant writer, was born, in 1683, at York, and was educated at Trinity college, Cambridge, of which he became a fellow. In the contest between the members of that college and Dr. Bentley he took a prominent part. In 1724, he visited Italy. He was, subsequently, Woolwardian professor of mineralogy, and librarian at Cambridge. His only church preferment was the living of Hascomb, in Surry, for his free spirit of inquiry was not calculated to conciliate clerical patronage. He had, however, a sufficient fortune to render him indifferent to the emoluments of his profession. He died in 1750.

His chief works are, a Life of Cicero, which ranks among the classical productions of our literature; and a Free Inquiry into the Miraculous Powers of the Church, which excited against him a host of vehement opponents; a Refutation of Tindal; a Letter from Rome, showing an exact conformity between Popery and Paganism. It certainly must be admitted that some of Middleton's expressions were incautious, and some of his sentiments controvertible; but Middleton was too good a man to oppose truth, and too wise a man to disbelieve the veracity of the Holy Scriptures. He was an accomplished scholar, and wrote the English language with great elegance; but he was a man of independent mind, and not suited to pace in the trammels of the establishment. He exemplified, in his life and conversation, those Christian principles to which he was attached. His Miscellaneous Pieces form five octavo volumes. See Life of Dr. Middleton.—Davenport; Jones' Chris. Biog.

MIDDLETON, (ERASMUS,) author of the "Biographia Evangelica," was born about 1750, and graduated at King's college, Cambridge. He was a predecessor of Legh Richmond, as rector of Turvey, Bedfordshire, and a man of warm piety, and of a catholic spirit. His great work in biography is a collection of invaluable materials, and must immortalize his memory, while doing immense good. It ought to be better known in this country.

MIDDLETON, (THOMAS FANSHAW, D. D. F. R. S.,) first bishop of Calcutta, was the only son of the rector of Keddleston, in Derbyshire, where he was born in 1769. He received his education at Christ's hospital, and proceeded from thence upon a school exhibition to Pembroke hall, Cambridge, where he took his first degree in 1792. The same year he took orders as curate of Gainsborough, in Lincolnshire, where he wrote for a periodical paper, under the title of "The Country Spectator." In 1808, he took his doctor's degree, and the same year he gave to the public his learned work, entitled, "The Doctrine of the Greek Article, applied to the Illustration of the New Testament," in a large octavo volume, which, after being several years out of print, has been recently republished.

In 1812, he was made archdeacon of Huntingdon; and when government came to the resolution of establishing a resident bishop in India, Dr. Middleton was selected for that eminent station; and, being consecrated at Lambeth, in May, 1814, he sailed for Calcutta, where he arrived in the month of November of the same year. He immediately began to exert himself in his new and authoritative station with zeal and assiduity. In 1820, he laid the foundation-stone of a church at Calcutta, near to which a school was erected for the Christian poor, and soon after a missionary college; towards the erection of which endowment the Societies for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, and for Missions to Africa and the East, contributed five thousand pounds each. In the midst of these labors, the learned bishop was attacked with a fever, of which he died, after a short illness, July 8th, 1822. His sermons and charges have been collected into a volume by Dr. Bonney, to which a biographical memoir is prefixed. Life by Bonney.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

MIDIAN, LAND OF, or country of the Midianites, derived its name and its inhabitants from Midian, the son of Abraham by Keturah. This country extended from the east of the land of Moab, on the east of the Dead sea, southward, along the Eleanitic gulf of the Red sea, stretching some way into Arabia. It further passed to the south of the land of Edom, into the peninsula of mount Sinai, where Moses met with the daughter of Jethro, the priest of Midian, whom he married. The Midianites, together with their neighbors, the Ishmaelites, were early engaged in the trade between the East and the West, as we find the party to whom Joseph was sold, carrying spices, the produce of the East, into Egypt; and taking Gilead in their way, to add the celebrated and highly-prized balm of that country to their merchandise. It appears that, at the time of the passage of the Israelites through the country of the Amorites, the Midianites had been subdued by that people, as the chiefs or kings of their five principal tribes are called dukes of Sihon, and dwell in his country, Josh. 13: 21. It was at this time that the Midianites, alarmed at the numbers and the progress of the Israelites, united with the Moabites in sending into Syria for Balaam, the soothsayer; thinking to do that by incantation which they despaired of effecting by force. The result of this measure, the constraint imposed on Balaam to bless instead of to curse, and the subsequent defeat and slaughter of the Midianites, form one of the most interesting narratives in the early history of the Jews, Num. 22—25, 31.

About two hundred years after this, the Midianites, having recovered their numbers and their strength, were permitted by God to distress the Israelites, for the space of seven years, as a punishment for their relapse into idolatry. But at length their armies, which had encamped in the valley of Jezreel, were miraculously defeated by Gideon, Judg. 6—8. The Midianites appear not to have survived this second discomfiture as a nation; but their remains became gradually incorporated with the Moabites and Arabians.—Jones; Calmet; Watson.

MIGDOL, Exod. 14: 2. It is not known whether Migdol was a city, or only a fortress; probably the latter, in which a garrison was stationed.—Watson.

MILE; a measure of length, containing a thousand paces. Eight stadia or furlongs make a mile. The Romans commonly measured by miles, and the Greeks by furlongs. The furlong was a hundred and twenty-five paces; the pace was five feet. The ancient Hebrews had neither miles, furlongs, nor feet, but only the cubit, the reed, and the line. The rabbins make a mile to consist of two thousand cubits, and four miles make a parasang.—Watson.

MILETUS; a city on the continent of Asia Minor, and in the province of Caria, memorable for being the birth-place of Thales, one of the seven wise men of Greece, of Anaximander and Anaximenes, the philosophers, and of Timotheus, the musician. It was about thirty-six miles south of Ephesus, and the capital of both Caria and Ionia. The Milesians were subdued by the Persians, and the country passed successively into the power of the Greeks and Romans. At present the Turks call it Molas, and it is not far distant from the true Meander, which encircles all the plain with many mazes, and innumerable windings. In it was a magnificent temple of Apollo. It was to this place that St. Paul called the elders of the church of Ephesus, to deliver his last charge to them, Acts 20: 15, &c. There was another Miletus in Crete, mentioned 2 Tim. 4: 20. Whitby; Wells; Culmet; Jones; Smitley.—Watson.

MILITANT; (from militans, fighting;) a term applied to the church on earth, as engaged in a warfare with the world, sin, and the devil; in distinction from the church triumphant in heaven.—Hend. Buck.

MILK. The first natural food or nutriment of infancy. It is pure, sweet, simple, wholesome, and its reception requires no labor of the yet tender organs, either to chew, swallow, or digest, in order to yield nourishment. Paul compares some of his converts to little children, to be fed with milk, and not with solid food; (1 Cor. 3: 2, Heb. 5: 12.) and Peter exhorts the faithful universally, "As newborn babes, desire the sincere milk of the word, that ye may grow thereby;" 1 Pet. 2: 2. SUCH IS THE SIMPLE TESTIMONY OF GOD, TO HIS CHILDREN.—Whatever requires an effort of the reasoning powers, on the other hand, is called "strong meat," and is adapted to the mature stage of Christian knowledge and experience. Hence it is evident that the doctrines of human sinfulness and condemnation; of justification by faith in Christ only; of the Deity, incarnation, and atonement of the Savior; of the necessity of regeneration by the Holy Spirit; of gratuitous election to salvation, according to God's eternal purpose and irrevocable calling; and of the everlasting tenure of future retribution; with their kindred truths, belong strictly and properly to the first class, not the latter. They are to be received on divine testimony, without reasoning, in all their integrity, simplicity and sweetness, by the weakest believer; not as strong meat, but as the pure milk of the word. When thus received, their nourishing properties, as the sustenance of the divine life, will soon be conspicuous in the growth, health, and cheerful activity of the believer. Then in due time he will acquire the power of reasoning with a sound judgment on spiritual things, 1 Cor. 2: 15.

A land flowing with milk and honey, is a country of extraordinary fertility. In the prophets the kingdom of the Messiah is represented as a time of great abundance, "when the mountains should flow with milk and honey;" Joel 3: 18. And Isaiah says to the church, (60: 16.) "Thou shalt also suck the milk of the Gentiles, and shalt suck the breasts of kings."—Calmet.

MILL. In the first ages they parched or roasted their grain; a practice which the people of Israel, as we learn from the Scriptures, long continued: afterwards they pounded it in a mortar, to which Solomon thus alludes: "Though thou shouldst bray a fool in a mortar among wheat with a pestle, yet will not his foolishness depart from him;" Prov. 27: 22. This was succeeded by mills, of which there were two sorts: the first were large, and turned by the strength of horses or asses; the second were smaller, and wrought by women, or by slaves condemned to this hard labor, as a punishment for their crimes. Most of their corn is ground by these little mills. Chardin remarks, in his manuscript, that the persons employed are generally female slaves, who are least regarded, or are least fitted for any thing else; for the work is extremely laborious, and esteemed the lowest employment about the house. Hence we may see the propriety of the expression in the declaration of Moses: "And all the first-born in the land of Egypt shall die, from the first-born of Pharaoh that sitteth upon his throne, even unto the first-born of the maid-servant that is behind the mill," Exod. 11: 5.

The manner in which the hand-mills are worked is well described by Dr. E. D. Clarke, in his Travels: "Scarcely had we reached the apartment prepared for our reception, when, looking from the window into the court-yard belonging to the house, we beheld two women grinding at the mill, in a manner most forcibly illustrating the saying of our Savior: 'Two women shall be grinding at the mill, the one shall be taken and the other left.' They were preparing flour to make our bread, as it is always customary in the country when strangers arrive. The two women, seated upon the ground opposite to each other, held between them two round flat stones, such as are seen in Lapland, and such as in Scotland are called querns. In the centre of the upper stone was a cavity for pouring in the corn, and by the side of this an upright wooden handle for moving the stone. As this operation began, one of the women opposite received it from her companion, who pushed it towards her, who again sent it to her companion; thus communicating a rotatory motion to the upper stone, their left hands being all the while employed in supplying fresh corn, as fast as the bran and flour escaped from the sides of the machine."

When they are not impelled, as in this instance, to premature exertions by the arrival of strangers, they grind their corn in the morning at break of day: the noise of the mill is then to be heard everywhere, and is often so great as to rouse the inhabitants of the cities from their slumbers; for it is well known they bake their bread every day, and commonly grind their corn as it is wanted. The females engaged in this operation, also endeavored to beguile the lingering hours of toilsome exertion with a song. We learn from an expression of Aristophanes, preserved by Athenæus, that the Grecian maids accompanied the sound of the millstones with their voices. The noise of the millstone is therefore, with great propriety, selected by the prophets as one of the tokens of a populous and thriving country: "Moreover, I will take from them the voice of mirth, and the voice of gladness, the voice of the bridegroom and the voice of the bride, the sound of millstones and the light of a candle, and their whole land shall be a desolation," Jer. 25: 10. Isa. 47: 1, 2. Rev. 18: 22. The morning shall no more be cheered with the joyful sound of the mill, nor the shadows of evening by the light of a candle; the morning shall be silent, and the evening dark and melancholy, where desolation reigns.

The custom of daily grinding their corn for the family, shows the propriety of the law: "No man shall take the nether or the upper millstone to pledge, for he taketh a man's life to pledge;" because if he take either the upper or the nether millstone, he deprives him of his daily provision, which cannot be prepared without them. The fact that it was done only by women and menials, displays, also, the vindictive contempt which suggested the punishment of Samson, the captive ruler of Israel, that the Philistines, with barbarous contumely, compelled him to perform the meanest service of a female slave; they sent him to grind in the prison, (Judg. 16: 21.) but not for himself alone; this, although extremely mortifying to the hero, had been more tolerable; they made him grinder for the prison, perhaps while the vilest malefactor was permitted to look on, and join in the mockery. Samson, the ruler and avenger of Israel, labors, as Isaiah foretold the virgin daughter of Babylon should labor: "Come down, and sit in the dust, O virgin daughter of Babylon: there is no throne," no seat for thee, "O daughter of the Chaldeans. Take the millstones and grind meal," but not with the wonted song: "sit thou silent, and get thee into darkness," there to conceal thy vexation and disgrace, Isa. 47: 1, 2, 5.—Watson.

MILL, (JOHN, D. D.,) a learned English divine and biblical critic, was born at Shapp, in Westmoreland, in 1645. He became a servitor in Queen's college, Oxford, in 1661, where he graduated master of arts in 1669. Being afterwards elected a fellow, he became an eminent tutor, and having entered into orders, was greatly admired for his pulpit eloquence. In 1680, he received from his college the living of Blethingdon, in Oxfordshire; and proceeding D. D. became chaplain in ordinary to Charles II. The valuable edition of the New Testament, on which Dr. Mill employed thirty years of his life, appeared in 1707, under the title of "Novum Testamentum Græcum, cum Lectionibus variantibus, ex MSS.," &c. Of the great learning and critical acumen of Dr. Mill, this laborious work forms an indisputable testimony. The collection of such a mass of various readings, (gathered, it is said, from more than thirty thousand MSS.) instead of supplying arms for Infidelity, as some seem to have feared, has served to place the uncorrupted integrity of the Scriptures in a stronger light than ever. Cavil and suspicion on this point is forever precluded, and set at defiance. Dr. Bentley has ably vindicated the labors of Dr. Mill, in his "Remarks." He survived the publication of his great work only a fortnight, dying of an apoplexy, in 1708, in the sixty-third year of his age.—Biog. Brit.; Jones' Chris. Biog.

MILLS, (SAMUEL J.,) was the son of the minister of Torrington, Connecticut, and was born April 21, 1783. At an early period he had such a sense of his sins, that for two years he regarded his existence as a curse; but in answer to the fervent prayers of his pious parents he was cheered with the Christian hope.

He graduated at Williams' college, in 1809. While in that seminary his mind was deeply impressed with the importance of foreign missions, and he endeavored to awaken a similar feeling in the hearts of his fellow-students. At the theological seminary in Andover he united with Judson, Newell, Nott, and Hall, in a resolution to undertake a foreign mission. In 1812 and 1813, he and J. F. Schermerhorn made a missionary tour in the western states. He was ordained with other missionaries at Newburyport, June 21, 1815. He made a second tour with Mr. Smith in 1814 and 1815. He ascertained in March, 1815, that not a Bible could be found for sale or to be given away in New Orleans: in this city he distributed many Bibles in French and English, and visited the sick soldiers. Finding that seventy or eighty thousand families at the south and west were destitute of a Bible, he suggested at the close of his report the establishment of a national society like that of the British. His efforts contributed to the establishment of the American Bible Society, May 8, 1816. The plan of the United Foreign Mission Society, which, however, accomplished but little, originated with him, while residing with Dr. Griffin, at Newark, as did also the African school, which existed a few years at Parsippany, near Newark.

He attended the first meeting of the Colonization society, January 1, 1817, which was established by the exertions of Dr. Finley. Appointed, with Mr. Burgess, to visit England and explore the coast of Africa for the society, he sailed in November, 1817, and in a wonderful manner escaped shipwreck on the coast of France. He sailed from England for Africa, February 2, 1818, and arrived on the coast March 12th. After a laborious inspection of more than two months, he embarked on his return in the brig Success, May 22, 1818. A severe cold, which he took early in June, was succeeded by a fever, of which he died, June 16, 1818, aged thirty-four. He was buried in the depths of the ocean.

Samuel J. Mills was a Christian, eminently pious and benevolent; and, when the sea gives up its dead, he will rise to heavenly glory. Memoirs, by Rev. Gardiner Spring, D. D.—Allen.

MILLENARIANS, or CHILIASTS; a name given to those who believe that the saints will reign on earth with Christ a thousand years. See next article.—Hend. Buck.

MILLENNIUM, "a thousand years;" generally employed to denote the thousand years during which, according to an ancient tradition in the church, grounded on some doubtful texts in the Apocalypse and other Scriptures, our blessed Savior shall reign with the faithful upon earth after the first resurrection, before the final completion of beatitude.

Though there has been no age of the church in which such views of the millennium were not admitted by individual divines, it is yet evident, from the writings of Eusebius, Irenæus, Origen, and others, among the ancients, as well as from the histories of Dupin, Mosheim, and all the moderns, that they were never adopted by the whole church, or made an article of the established creed in any nation.

About the middle of the fourth century, the millenarians held the following tenets: 1. That the city of Jerusalem should be rebuilt, and that the land of Judæa should be the habitation of those who were to reign on the earth a thousand years. 2. That the first resurrection was not to be confined to the martyrs, but that, after the fall of Antichrist, all the just were to rise, and all that were on the earth were to continue for that space of time. 3. That Christ shall then come down from heaven, and be seen on earth, and reign there with his servants. 4. That the saints, during this period, shall enjoy all the delights of a terrestrial paradise.

These opinions were derived from several passages in Scripture, which the millenarians, among the fathers, understood in no other than a literal sense; but which the moderns, who hold that opinion, consider as partly literal and partly metaphorical. Of these passages, that upon which the greatest stress has been laid, we believe to be the following:—"And I saw an angel come down from heaven, having the key of the bottomless pit, and a great chain in his hand; and he laid hold on the dragon, that old serpent, which is the Devil and Satan, and bound him a thousand years, and cast him into the bottomless pit, and shut him up, and set a seal upon him, that he should deceive the nations no more, till the thousand years should be fulfilled; and after that, he must be loosed a little season. And I saw thrones, and they sat upon them, and judgment was given unto them: and I saw the souls of them that were beheaded for the witness of Jesus, and for the word of God, and which had not worshipped the beast, neither his image, neither had received his mark upon their foreheads, nor in their hands; and they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years. But the rest of the dead lived not again till the thousand years were finished. This is the first resurrection," Rev. 20: 1-6. This passage the ancient millenarians took in a sense grossly literal, and taught that, during the millennium, the saints on earth were to enjoy every bodily delight. The moderns, on the other hand, consider the power and pleasures of this kingdom as wholly spiritual; but they represent them as not to commence till after the conflagration of the present earth. This last supposition is, however, a mistake, as the very next verse but one assures us; for we are there told, that, "when the thousand years are expired, Satan shall be loosed out of his prison, and shall go out to deceive the nations which are in the four quarters of the earth;" and we have no reason to believe that he will have such power or such liberty in "the new heavens and the new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness."

These views have recently been revived in England, by the Rev. Edward Irving, and a party who arrogate to themselves the exclusive epithet of "The Students of Prophecy;" and partly in consequence of the fanatical manner in which they have been propounded, partly owing to the absurd notions and practices, such as the pretended gift of tongues, working of miracles, &c., which have been connected with them, have produced a considerable impression, principally on clergymen and laymen of the church of England. The few Dissenters that have been led away by them, are such as originally attended Mr. Irving's ministry.

Respecting the real millennium, we may observe the following things:—1. That the Scriptures afford us ground to believe that the church will arrive at a state of prosperity which it never has yet enjoyed, Rev. 20: 4, 7. Ps. 72: 11. Is. 2: 2, 4. 11: 9. 49: 23. 60. Dan. 7: 27.

2. That this will continue at least a thousand years, or a considerable space of time, in which the work of salvation may be fully accomplished in the utmost extent and glory of it. In this time, in which the world will soon be filled with real Christians, and continue full by early regeneration, to supply the place of those who leave the world, there will be many thousands born and live on the earth, to each one that has been born and lived in the preceding six thousand years; so that, if they who shall be born in that thousand years shall be all, or most of them saved, (as they will be,) there will, on the whole, be many thousands of mankind saved to one that shall be lost.

3. This will be a state of great happiness and glory. The Jews shall be converted, genuine Christianity be diffused through all nations, and Christ shall reign, by his spiritual presence, in a glorious manner. It will be a time of eminent holiness, clear light and knowledge, love, peace, and friendship, agreement in doctrine and worship. Human life, perhaps, will rarely be endangered by the poisons of the mineral, vegetable, and animal kingdoms. Beasts of prey, perhaps, will be extirpated or tamed by the power of man. The inhabitants of every place will rest secure from fear of robbery and murder. War shall be entirely ended. Capital crimes and punishments be heard of no more. Governments placed on fair, just, and humane foundations. The torch of civil discord will be extinguished. Pagans, Turks, Deists, and Jews, will either be entirely converted, or will be as few in number as real Christians are now. Kings, nobles, magistrates, and rulers in churches, shall act with principle, and be forward to promote the best interests of men: tyranny, oppression, persecution, bigotry, and cruelty shall cease. Business will be attended to without contention, dishonesty, and covetousness. Trades and manufactures will be carried on with a design to promote the general good of mankind, and not with selfish interests as now. Merchandise between distant countries will be conducted without fear of an enemy; and works of ornament and beauty, perhaps, shall not be wanting in those days. Learning, which has always flourished in proportion as religion has spread, shall then greatly increase, and be employed for the best of purposes. Astronomy, geography, natural history, metaphysics, and all the useful sciences, will be better understood, and consecrated to the service of God; and by the improvements which have been made, and are making, in ship-building, navigation, electricity, medicine, &c., "the tempest will lose half its force, the lightning lose half its terrors," and the human frame not be nearly so much exposed to danger. Above all, the Bible will be more highly appreciated, its harmony perceived, its superiority owned, and its energy felt by millions of human beings. In fact, the earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea.

4. The time when the millennium will commence cannot be fully ascertained; but the common idea is, that it will be in the seven thousandth year of the world. It will, most probably, come on by degrees, and be in a manner introduced years before that time. And who knows but the present convulsions among different nations, the overthrow which popery has had in places where it has been so dominant for hundreds of years, the fulfilment of prophecy respecting infidels, and the falling away of many in the last times; and yet, in the midst of all, the number of missionaries sent into different parts of the world, together with the increase of gospel ministers; the thousands of ignorant children that have been taught to read the Bible, and the vast number of different societies that have been lately instituted for the benevolent purpose of informing the minds and impressing the hearts of the ignorant; who knows but that these things are the forerunners of events of the most delightful nature, and which may usher in the happy morn of that bright and glorious day, when the whole world shall be filled with his glory, and all the ends of the earth see the salvation of our God?

How delightful then the prospects which open upon the eye of faith in prophetic vision! Christianity prevails universally. Our race assumes the appearance of one vast, virtuous, peaceful family. Our world becomes the seat of one grand, triumphant, adoring assembly. At length, after a brief space of severe trial, the scene mingles with the heavens, and rising in brightness is blended with the glories on high. The mysteries of God on earth are finished, "the times of restitution of all things" are fulfilled. The Son of God descends. The scene closes with divine grandeur; "And I heard as it were the voice of a great multitude, and as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of many thunders, saying, Alleluia; for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth." "The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and his Christ." "And I saw a new heaven and a new earth; for the first heaven and the first earth were passed away; and there was no more sea. And I saw the holy city New Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven. And I heard a great voice out of heaven, saying, Behold the tabernacle of God is with men, and he will dwell with them, and they shall be his people, and God himself shall be with them, and be their God," Rev. 19: 6. 11: 15. 21: 1-4.

MILLET, (dochan; Ezek. 4: 9.) a kind of maize, so called from its thrusting forth such a quantity of grains. Thus in Latin it is called milium, as if one stalk bore a thousand seeds. It has been supposed that the dochan means what is now called in the East durra; which, according to Niebuhr, is a sort of millet, and when made into bad bread with camel's milk, oil, butter, or grease, is almost the only food which is eaten by the common people in Arabia Felix. "I found it so disagreeable," says he, "that I should willingly have preferred plain barley bread to it." This illustrates the appointment of it to the prophet Ezekiel as a part of his hard fare. It is also used in Palestine and Syria, and it is generally agreed that it yields much more than any other kind of grain.—Watson.

MILLO; originally a deep valley, between the old city of Jesus, or Jerusalem, and the city of David, on mount Zion. David and Solomon caused it to be filled up, and here made a place for the people to assemble, 2 Sam. 5: 9. 1 Kings 9: 15. 2 Kings 12: 20. 1 Chron. 11: 8. Solomon, also, on a part of it built a palace for his queen, the daughter of Pharaoh, 1 Kings 9: 24.—Calmat.

MILNER, (ISAAC, D. D.) an Episcopal divine, eminent as a mathematician and natural philosopher, and not less for ardent evangelical piety. He was born at Leeds, in the county of York, of humble parentage, and brought up to the employment of weaving, which he followed for some time, dedicating every moment of leisure to the study of classic literature and the mathematics. He was then employed as an assistant in a grammar-school, and afterwards admitted a student at Queen's college, Cambridge. In 1774, he gained the first mathematical prize; and, becoming a tutor, he had among his pupils Mr. Pitt and Mr. Wilberforce, with whom he travelled abroad, and was the honored instrument of the conversion of the latter. (See WILBERFORCE.)

Returning to the university, he was chosen professor of natural philosophy in 1783, and master of his college in 1788, when he proceeded doctor in divinity; and about the same time he obtained the deanery of Carlisle. He was vice-chancellor of the university in 1792, and six years afterwards he became Lucasian professor of mathematics. He wrote "Animadversions on Dr. Haweis' Impartial History of the Church of Christ," octavo, 1800; "Strictures on some of the publications of the Rev. Herbert Marsh, intended as a Reply to some of his Objections against the Bible Society," octavo, 1813; besides various works of a mathematical kind. He died in 1820. Genl. Mag.: London Christian Observer.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

MILNER, (JOSEPH,) brother of the preceding, was also originally a weaver, but raised himself by the exercise of his talents to eminence in the literary world. He was born at Leeds, in 1741, and educated at the free grammar-school, whence he proceeded to Catharine hall, Cambridge, where he took his bachelor's degree in 1766, and obtained one of the chancellor's medals. Entering into orders, he became master of the grammar-school, and afternoon lecturer at Hull. He subsequently obtained the vicarage of North Ferriby, in Yorkshire, and also that of the Holy Trinity church, in Hull. He died on the 15th of November, 1797, at the age of fifty-two.

His works consist of "A History of the Christian Church," in four volumes octavo; the last volume of which was completed by his brother, dean Milner, who added to it a fifth volume, continuing the History of the Reformation, executed with so much ability, that it is a matter of regret he did not live to continue the history to its completion. He also wrote an "Answer to Mr. Gibbon's Attack on Christianity;" "Essays on the Influences of the Holy Spirit;" and published two volumes of Sermons.

The author of the "Natural History of Enthusiasm," in speaking of the characteristic defects of Mosheim and Milner as historians of Christianity, observes, that Mosheim gives us the mere husk of history, and Milner nothing but some separated particles of pure farina. We may add, that Jones has shown a sounder judgment, Waddington a finer taste, and Neander more learning and philosophic power, than either. Life of Rev. J. Milner, by his brother, prefixed to his Sermons.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

MILNER, (Joan, D. D.) an eminent Romish theologian and antiquary, whose real name was Miller, was born, in 1752, in London; was educated at the schools of Sedgely Park and Edgbaston, and at Douay; and, after having been a priest at Winchester, was appointed, in 1803, vicar apostolic in the midland district, with the title of bishop of Catalba. In 1814, he visited Rome. He remained there for twelve months, and had frequent audiences with pope Pius VII. He died April 19, 1826.

Of all the advocates of the Papal church, no one has displayed more learning and acuteness than Milner, though not unmixed with partisan gall and misrepresentation. Proofs of this will be seen in his Letters to a Prebendary; The End of Religious Controversy; and his other controversial treatises. As an antiquary he fully established his character by the History of Winchester: Dissertation on the modern Style of altering Cathedrals; and Treatise on the Ecclesiastical Architecture of England during the Middle Ages. He was a fellow of the Antiquarian society, and contributed many learned papers to the Archæologia.—Davenport.

MILTON, (John,) the Christian Homer, was born, December 9, 1608, in Bread street, in London, and was educated at St. Paul's school, and Christ's college, Cambridge. His original purpose was to enter the church, but his dislike to subscription and to oaths, which in his opinion required what he emphatically termed, "an accommodating conscience," prevented the fulfilment of his intention. After he quitted the university he passed five years of studious retirement at his father's house, at Horton, in Buckinghamshire; during which period he produced Comus, Lycidas, and some of his other poems. In 1638, he went to France, whence he proceeded to Italy. On his return, after an absence of fifteen months, he opened an academy at Aldersgate street, and began also to take a part in the controversies of the time. He married in 1643, but so scanty was his nuptial felicity, his wife leaving him to return to her parents in the course of a month, that he was stimulated to write his Treatise on Divorce, and to take measures for procuring another helpmate. On her becoming penitent, however, he not only received her again, but gave her royalist father and brothers an asylum in his house. He entered twice more into the marriage state. The zeal with which, in his Tenure of Kings and Magistrates, he vindicated the execution of Charles I., induced the council of state to appoint him Latin secretary, and he thus became, in a manner, the literary champion of the popular cause. In behalf of that cause he published his Iconoclastes, in answer to the Icon Basiliké, and his two Defences of the People of England against the libels of Salmasius and Du Moulin. In the execution of this "noble task," as he calls it, he lost his sight; his previous weakness of the eyes terminating in gutta serena.

At the restoration he remained concealed for a while, but the interest of his friends, particularly of Marvell and Davenant, soon enabled him to reappear in safety. The rest of his life was spent in retirement, employed partly in the composition of that noble work which he had long meditated, and by which he at once immortalized his name, and shed a lustre over his country. The Paradise Lost appeared in 1667. The Mæcenas of a bookseller paid him five pounds for the first edition of thirteen hundred copies, and liberally agreed to pay ten more, upon the sale of two subsequent editions of equal magnitude! The Paradise Regained, Samson Agonistes, the History of Britain, were among his latest productions. The date of his recently discovered Treatise of Christian Doctrine is unknown. This work shows Milton to have been an Arian Baptist. His active imagination and impetuous spirit mingle too strongly with his theology, and in several particulars corrupt it; but though like Locke he sometimes mistakes the sense of Scripture, no man had a higher opinion of its supreme authority, or held fast more firmly its most vital truths. His name cannot be classed with modern Unitarians. He died November 8, 1674.

The mists which prejudice and bigotry have spread over the bright name of Milton are not yet wholly scattered, though fast passing away. He was a seraph, burning with a calm love of moral grandeur and celestial purity. He thought not so much of what man is as of what he might become. His own mind was a revelation to him of a higher condition of humanity, and to promote this he thirsted and toiled for freedom, as the element for the growth and improvement of his nature.

"Reformation" was the first word of public warning which broke from his youthful lips, and the hope of it was a fire in his aged breast. Refined and spiritual in his habits, temperate almost to abstemiousness, Milton refreshed himself, after intellectual effort, by music. His life was an echo of the noble sentiments inculcated in his writings. See Milton's Life, by Johnson, Symonds, and Leimey, and his Character by Dr. Channing.—Davenport; Jones' Chris. Biog.

MINA, or maneh; properly, one part or ounce; a species of money, usually translated pound. Ezekiel tells us, (45: 12.) that it was valued at sixty shekels, which, in gold, made of English money, is above fifty-four pounds, and in silver, almost seven pounds. The Greek or Attic mina, which is probably that mentioned in the books of the Maccabees, and in the New Testament, is valued at a hundred drachmæ, or about two pounds seventeen shillings. There was also a lesser mina, valued at seventy-five drachmæ.—Calmet.

MIND; a thinking, intelligent being; or otherwise called spirit, or soul. (See SOUL; and KNOWLEDGE.)

Dr. Watts has given us some admirable thoughts as to the improvement of the mind. "There are five eminent means or methods," he observes, "whereby the mind is improved in the knowledge of things; and these are, observation, reading, instruction by lectures, conversation, and meditation; which last, in a most peculiar manner, is called study. See Locke on the Human Understanding; Brown's Lectures on the Philosophy of the Mind; Reid, Stewart, and Upham; Abercrombie and Chalmers; and especially Watts on the Mind; a book which no student should be without.—Hend. Bush.

MINIMS; a religious order in the church of Rome, founded by St. Francis de Paula, towards the end of the fifteenth century. Their habit is a coarse black woollen stuff, with a woollen girdle of the same color, tied in five knots. They are not permitted to quit their habit and gir-die night nor day. Formerly they went barefooted, but are now allowed the use of shoes.—Hend. Buck.

MINISTER, strictly denotes one who officiates, serves or waits upon another. Thus Joshua is called the minister of Moses, (Exod. 24: 13.) and John Mark, the minister of Paul and Barnabas, Acts 13: 5. But the term is applied variously by the sacred writers, such as to magistrates, (Rom. 13: 6.) to pastors and teachers, (1 Cor. 3: 5. and 4: 1.) to angels, (Ps. 104: 4. Heb. 1: 14.) and to the Son of God, who came into this world "not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many," Matt. 20: 28.

Paul terms Christ "a minister of the circumcision for the truth of God, to confirm the promises made to the fathers," Rom. 15: 8. Jesus Christ was born a Jew, and he exercised his ministry among the Jews; hence his own words, "I am not sent but to the lost sheep of the house of Israel," (Matt. 10: 6, and 15: 24.) and this, in order that God's ancient promise to Abraham, namely, that "all the nations of the earth should be blessed in his seed," might be ratified and confirmed to them. (See MINISTRY OF JESUS CHRIST.) The glad tidings of salvation were first, by Christ's express command, published to the Jews, Luke 24: 47. Acts 3: 26. And by Jewish converts the gospel was first preached among the Gentiles, Acts 15: 7. 26: 16—18. Eph. 3: 8, 9.

The same apostle also terms the Savior "a minister of the sanctuary," (Heb. 8: 2.) that is, of the heavenly sanctuary, the true holy of holies. There he is "set down on the right hand of the Majesty on high," on his glorious throne; to officiate forever as our high-priest, advocate, and intercessor, Heb. 9: 12—24.—Jones.

MINISTRY OF THE GOSPEL; a name applied to those who are pastors of a congregation, or preachers of God's word.

They are also called divines, and may be distinguished into polemic, or those who possess controversial talents; casuistic, or those who resolve cases of conscience; experimental, those who address themselves to the feelings, cases, and circumstances of their hearers; and lastly, practical, those who insist upon the performance of all those duties which the word of God enjoins. An able minister will have something of all these united in him, though he may not excel in all; and it becomes every one who is a candidate for the ministry to get a clear idea of each, that he may not be deficient in the discharge of that work which is the most important that can be sustained by mortal beings. Many volumes have been written on this subject, but we must be content in this place to offer only a few remarks relative to it.

In the first place, then, it must be observed, that ministers of the gospel ought to be sound as to their principles. They must be men whose hearts are renovated by divine grace, and whose sentiments are derived from the sacred oracles of divine truth. A minister without principles will never do any good; and he who professes to believe in a system, should see to it that it accords with the word of God. His mind should clearly perceive the beauty, harmony, and utility of the doctrines, while his heart should be deeply impressed with a sense of their value and importance.

2. They should be mild and affable as to their dispositions and deportment. A haughty, imperious spirit is a disgrace to the ministerial character, and generally brings contempt. They should learn to bear injuries with patience, and be ready to do good to every one; be courteous to all without cringing to any; be affable without levity, and humble without pusillanimity; conciliating the affections without violating the truth; connecting a suavity of manners with a dignity of character; obliging without flattery; and throwing off all reserve without running into the opposite extreme of volubility and trifling.

3. They should be superior as to their knowledge and talents. Though many have been useful without what is called learning, yet none have been so without some portion of knowledge and wisdom. Nor has God Almighty ever sanctified ignorance, or consecrated it to his service; since it is the effect of the fall, and the consequence of our departure from the fountain of intelligence. Ministers, therefore, especially, should endeavor to break these shackles, get their minds enlarged, and stored with all useful knowledge. The Bible should be well studied, and that, especially, in the original languages. The scheme of salvation by Jesus Christ should be well understood, with all the various topics connected with it. And in the present day, a knowledge of history, natural philosophy, logic, mathematics, and rhetoric, are peculiarly requisite. A clear judgment, also, with a retentive memory, inventive faculty, and a facility of communication, should be obtained.

4. They should be diligent as to their studies. Their time especially should be improved, and not lost by too much sleep, formal visits, indolence, reading useless books, studying useless subjects. Every day should have its work, and every subject its due attention. Some advise a chapter in the Hebrew Bible, and another in the Greek Testament, to be read every day. A well-chosen system of civility should be accurately studied. The best definitions should be obtained, and a constant regard paid to all those studies which savor of religion, and have some tendency to public work.

5. Ministers should be extensive as to their benevolence and candor. A contracted, bigoted spirit ill becomes those who preach a gospel which breathes the purest benevolence to mankind. This spirit has done more harm among all parties than many imagine, and is, in our opinion, one of the most powerful engines the devil makes use of to oppose the best interests of mankind; and it is really shocking to observe how sects and parties have all, in their turns, anathematized each other. Now, while ministers ought to contend earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints, they must remember that men always think differently from each other; that prejudice of education has great influence; that difference of opinion as to subordinate things is not of such importance as to be a ground of dislike. Let the ministers of Christ, then, pity the weak, forgive the ignorant, bear with the sincere though mistaken zealot, and love all who love the Lord Jesus Christ.

6. Ministers should be zealous and faithful in their public work. The sick must be visited; children must be catechised; the ordinances administered; and the word of God preached. These things must be taken up, not as a matter of duty only, but of pleasure, and executed with faithfulness; and, as they are of the utmost importance, ministers should attend to them with all that sincerity, earnestness, and zeal which that importance demands. An idle, frigid, indifferent minister is a pest to society, a disgrace to his profession, an injury to the church, and offensive to God himself.

7. Lastly, ministers should be consistent as to their conduct. No brightness of talent, no superiority of intellect, no extent of knowledge, will ever be a substitute for this. They should not only possess a luminous mind, but set a good example. This will procure dignity to themselves, give energy to what they say, and prove a blessing to the circle in which they move. In fine, they should be men of prudence and prayer, light and love, zeal and knowledge, courage and humility, humanity and religion. See Epistles to Timothy and Titus; articles DECLARATION, ELOQUENCE, METHODISTS, PREACHING, and SERMONS, in this work; Dr. Smith's Lect. on the Sacred Office; Gerard's Pastoral Care; Maegill's Address to Young Clergymen; Augustine on Preaching; Chrysostom on the Priesthood; Masillon's Charges; Baxter's Reformed Pastor; Herbert's Country Parson; Bunnet's Pastoral Care; Watts's Humble Attempt; Dr. Edwards's Preacher; Mason's Student and Pastor; Brown's Address to his Students; Gibbon's Christian Minister; Mather's Student and Preacher; Ostervald's Lectures on the Sacred Ministry; Robinson's Claude; Doddridge's Lectures on Preaching; Dwight's Theology; Miller's Letters on Clerical Manners; Campbell's Lectures; Works of Robert Hall; Burder's Hints; Ware's Lecture on the Connexion of Pulpit Eloquence and the Pastoral Care; Review of Cellerier's Three Lectures in Christian Examiner, 1833; and perhaps more comprehensive than all, if but one can be had, Bridge's Christian Ministry.—Hend. Buck.

MINISTERIAL CALL; a term used to denote that right or authority which a person receives to preach the gospel. This call is considered as twofold, divine and eccle- siastical. The following things seem essential to a divine call: 1. A holy, blameless life.—2. An ardent and constant inclination and zeal to do good.—3. Abilities suited to the work: such as knowledge, aptness to teach, courage, &c.—4. An opportunity afforded in providence to be useful. See Prof. Knowles' Premium Treat.

An ecclesiastical call consists in the election which is made of any person to be a pastor. But here the Episcopalian and the Dissenter differ; the former believing that the choice and call of a minister rest with the superior clergy, or those who have the gift of an ecclesiastical benediction; the latter supposes that it should rest on the suffrage of the people to whom he is to minister. Whoever will attentively examine the history of the primitive times, will find that all ecclesiastical officers for the first three hundred years were elected by the people. We must refer the reader for more on this subject to the articles ORDINATION, CHURCH, EPISCOPACY, CONGREGATIONALISTS, and BAPTISTS.—Hend. Buck.

MINISTERIAL EDUCATION. It is said of Jeremy Taylor, that he once urged a negligent mother to be more careful of her child's education, in some such words as these: "Madam, be at the pains to educate your son, or be assured, Satan will do it for you." The parent would seem to have been contenting herself with the thought, that, if her child were not instructed, the whole of the evil would be that he should remain in ignorance. But this in truth was not the state of the question. The inquiry was not, "Shall the child be educated—or shall he not?" Educated he must be. The only question was, by whom he should be instructed, and in what species of learning. Should his teachers be his own casual companions, however vicious, and was his education to become one of profligacy and crime; or should his instructors be select, and their instruction appropriate to his station, and valuable in its character?

That such is the true state of the case would appear, if any parent were now inclined to make the cruel experiment. Preserve your son from the confinement of school, and the drudgery of study. Let him abjure all books, and gather his knowledge and glean his morals in careless freedom from our streets. No school bills would meet you, month after month, with their clamorous demands. No austere teacher would intimidate and repel your child by looks of harshness, and with lessons tedious and difficult. He would not be seen pale and watchful as he bent over the midnight lamp. But gratuitously and imperceptibly, without concern or care on your part, you would find him thoroughly educated. In squalid neglect and vice, in the language of profanity and obscenity, in all dishonesty, in all filthiness, and in all untractableness, he would return to your home an apt scholar, and an early proficient, a grief to your eyes, and the burden of your heart. If parents will not educate their families, the world will. And where no other teachers are provided, evil example and association will furnish them gratuitously, and their teachings will be constant, unwearied, and effectual.

Have not many good men fallen into a similar error with the careless parent? Have they not believed, that with regard to ministerial education, the question was, "Shall our pastors be educated, or shall they remain ignorant?" But this is not the true state of the case, and these are not really the two alternatives between which the church is left to choose. The demands of the churches, the state of society, and the indications of providence, have decided this question. Ministers must be educated.—The only room for inquiry now remaining is found here: "Who shall be their teachers, and what shall be the character and extent of their instructions?" Taught and sent by the spirit of God, our youthful brethren need nevertheless to study the Bible; they need to know the rules, and power, and the right use of their own language; it will not be to their injury should they know somewhat of the languages which God honored by selecting them as the vehicles of his inspiration; and they will not be less prepared to repel the many forms of heresy that now assail the Christian's faith, were they to learn something of the history of error, and the men and the arms by which it has been most successfully combated. The true question is, "Who shall teach our ministers in these useful branches of knowledge?" Shall they be their own instructors, or shall their brethren of greater age, experience, and knowledge, be allowed to aid and guide their efforts? When shall they study? In the scattered and brief remnants of time which they shall be able to save or to steal from other pursuits; or shall they by the kindness of the churches be enabled to pursue their studies in retirement and at leisure? Shall they be compelled by their brethren to gather their education whilst they discharge their ministry; or will they be encouraged in the years of youth to prepare for the active toils of maturer life? Shall they be coolly exhorted to buy, to beg, or to borrow, as they best can, the books they may need, where they may first find them; or shall they be invited to use the well-stored library, aided by the counsel and supervision of the faithful teacher? Shall their instructors be competent or incompetent? Shall they select for themselves, as their models of ministerial character, the men whom they may first meet, or easiest reach; or will the church point them to men of approved piety, wisdom and knowledge, as their pateros and tutors? Shall they study in cheerless and melancholy solitude, with no associate to lighten the toil of research, and share the joy of discovery; or shall they become inmates of those schools of the prophets, where they may aid and urge each one his brother, and where they may form those friendships which shall draw into unity of feeling and effort the churches, over whom they may afterwards be placed? Shall they be left to that unnamable self-confidence and self-complacency which the successful labors of a solitary student are calculated to foster; or shall they be ushered into scenes where they will find rival or superior talent, acquirements more splendid, powers of mind more vigorous or more highly cultivated; where, in short, all will teach them the folly of measuring themselves among themselves? These are in truth the alternatives between which the church is called to make her selection.

We know, and bless God for the fact, that there have been, and yet are, in the ministry, men of the largest usefulness, who have never profited by a theological seminary. They have been self-taught men. Yet nearly with one voice these men of deserved influence, and most competent to judge, have advocated theological schools. Their own struggles and sacrifices in the attainment of knowledge have taught them its value, and made them desirous of its diffusion. Among them stands high and prominent the name of FULLER. But Andrew Fuller, though his own powers had been slowly developed in solitude and neglect, was the friend of ministerial education. Uneducated and self-made men have, by the ascendancy of genius, urged their way into our senate chambers. But are they ever found advocating the general proposition, that it is best to leave a child to educate himself, because the perilous experiment has succeeded in their own case?

If by these institutions it were intended to supersede the teachings of the Holy Spirit; if it were ever to be forgotten that only he can qualify and commission the heralds of the cross, and that his grace is needed to sanctify and to prosper every earthly "aid and appliance," we should unite in execrating, as blasphemous arrogance, the attempt of those who would educate the youthful pastor and missionary. But such is not the intent and spirit of these institutions. Those youth only are instructed, who hopefully, as members of the true church, have shared in divine teachings, and whom the church has deemed qualified for ministerial usefulness. That the teachings of the Spirit do not in such men supersede the employment of human instructors, we learn from the history of Apollos. He was mighty in the Scriptures, and fervent in spirit, and as Luke assures us, "instructed in the way of the Lord;" yet was he taken by Aquila and Priscilla and "taught the way of God more perfectly." And that a period of time may be wisely spent in retirement and preparation before entering upon the active proclamation of the gospel, would seem not unreasonable, when we look to the three years of constant intercourse with their Lord, and instruction from him, which fitted the apostles for evangelizing the world. We find Paul too going down into Arabia. No traces appear of his ministerial labors during the years spent there. Is there any violence in the supposition that he visited the same scenes of savage grandeur and solitude, which centuries before had been traversed by Moses as the guest of Jethro, there in solitary communings with his own heart and his God, to be fitted, like his holy predecessor, for large and lasting usefulness? And in the seclusion of our Savior's youth, and in the solitary buffetings which he endured in the wilderness before commencing his ministry, do we not learn that years past in retirement and meditation are not lost to the teacher or to the interests of his flock?

We know the prejudices which have prevailed against learning. It has been supposed that it necessarily produces pride. But even were this the case, is it true on the other hand that ignorance naturally produces and secures humility? So thought many of the Romanists in the night of the dark ages. They acted with fearless consistency on this, their great discovery. And there existed in Italy an order of friars, whose name was not the "Brothers of Charity," nor yet the "Poor Brothers," as some in the same age were called, but the "BROTHERS OF IGNORANCE." The oath or vow of the order was, that they did not know and would never know any thing; and to every question their constant and sufficient reply was, "Nescio." Was it from the monastery of these men, who thus secured religion under the lock of ignorance, that God selected his own messengers Luther and Calvin, and sent them forth to liberate from the fetters of an unknown language the imprisoned gospel, and to proclaim to those that were bound the opening of their prison doors? On the contrary Luther was "a ripe scholar," and Calvin a man of pre-eminent attainments. And laboring as they did, they found that ignorance, so far from producing piety and smoothing the way of the evangelist, had hedged up their path. It had become the nurse of fanaticism and hypocrisy, and through many a weary day did those faithful and holy men toil in uprooting the weeds of error, that had sprung tall and luxuriant in the fat and heavy soil of ignorance. Knowledge has been abused to the support of pride, and so has power, and so have intellect and health and strength. Shall we therefore abjure strength and health, intellect and power and knowledge?

But it has been objected, that learning is unfriendly to spirituality of mind, and to that devotional character so necessary in the Christian minister. But is this objection sustained by universal experience? Are not some of our most holy, also among our most studious divines? The American church yet kindles into earnest regret and admiration at the name of Payson, and Payson was no indolent student. Who gave more time to study than Jonathan Edwards, and who walked more close and humbly with God? Where shall we find metaphysical acumen and profound study of the human mind more happily displayed than in the auto-biography of Halyburton, and where a more thorough mastery of scriptural quotation, more ardent piety, and more earnest and humble self-examination? Pascal, both as a scholar and a Christian, stands amongst the first names in the history of our race. Of all the various forms of learning, classical knowledge might be deemed the least friendly to simple and fervid piety. Now in many of the works of Leighton, classical allusions are woven into the whole texture of the composition. But difficult were it to find a character of more seraphic piety, and few are the human writings that more wonderfully resemble in every page the transparent purity and simplicity, and the holy but unstudied elevation, that distinguish the sacred Scriptures. Fenelon blended similar qualities in his character as a man and an author. The English non-conformists, certainly men who towered in theological science as in Christiana piety, not only above their contemporaries, but alike over their predecessors and followers, were a race of thorough-bred scholars. And the men who stood in the fore-front of them, Owen, Goodwin, Baxter, Howe, Poole and Gale, were champions, who, in learned encounter, feared not the face of man. Amongst them, were we called upon for an example of ardent piety and holy consistency, whose name would occur more readily to every reader than that of Philip Henry? and Philip Henry was "a ripe scholar and a good," a favorite pupil of the rigid Busby, certainly no partial or merciful critic in matters of scholarship.

Look to the missionaries of our own times, and will it not be found that the most useful and holy have often been also the most eminent in earthly learning? Vanderkemp, distinguished among the early missionaries of the London Missionary society, was a man of rare and varied attainments. Brainerd was not an uneducated man. In the present age his mantle would seem to have fallen on Henry Martyn, a man who brought to the altar of his God the wreaths that he had won in the lists of this world's science; and eminent as a scholar, he was yet more eminent as a Christian. Our own land sent forth a Pliny Fiske, who to much fervor added much simplicity of character, and was withal an unwearied and successful student. Review those now in the field: and for piety as well as for scholarship whom shall we place before Carey, the matchless orientalist; Morrison, who has given to the three hundred millions of China in their own tongue the lively oracles; Wolff, the eccentric but devoted son of Abraham; (of whom a fellow-traveller testified that he spent his days in preaching and disputing, and his nights in digging Hebrew roots;) Gutzlaff, intrepid and enterprising as an apostle, notwithstanding his accomplished scholarship; and our own Judson, who from the halls of Andover came forth not to dream or to declaim, but to write, to labor, to pray and to suffer, until the church in America awoke to her duty, and Burmah is beginning to rejoice in the light of the gospel? But the topic is endless. Were not even the staunchest advocates of ignorance but the last Sabbath confuting themselves, as they sent up their praises to God in the hymns of delightful spirituality furnished them by a learned Watts, and a learned Doddridge?

But it has been feared that theological seminaries will teach men an undue deference to human authority. And here again we may ask, is ignorance any protection against the same abuse? Look to the desolation in many churches at the west. Is not the authority of a name there as great and fatal as if they were the most learned of our community? And is it not on the other hand a characteristic of theological study in our own time, that the authority of the Scriptures, as the standard and source of truth, is continually rising, and the influence of human theory and tradition visibly declining?

But these schools foster heresy. We reply, "look again to the west, and let us learn if ignorance prevents it." On the contrary do not errors in that soil shoot with a luxuriance and rapidity of vegetation which they do not elsewhere display. From the times of Mohammed to the days of Mormonism, ignorance has been found the kindest soil for the growth of error. The men who have thought to preserve piety and truth by banishing knowledge, have unconsciously been acting on a system of philosophy which they have borrowed from the Catholic church. It was held by the ancient hermits that bodily health and strength favored the commission of sin. Who robbed—who murdered—who oppressed? The man in the vigor of his years and health. When did he seem penitent, but when disease had weakened his strength and stretched him on the bed of languishing? To resist sin, the simple and obvious expedient therefore was, to destroy this dangerous strength, and to weaken and chastise the body. Let it fast, let it wear the rough haircloth, let it feel the knotted scourge, and it will not sin. But did they succeed? And did sin never enter the walls of a monastery? Was it an unheard of wonder that it should be found lurking beneath the cowl and the veil? Was holiness the constant inmate of the hermitage? The result is notorious. Their failure was complete. We believe fasting in its proper degree useful and obligatory; but continued fasting and abstinence unaccompanied by prayer never vanquished sin. Now what food is to the bodily strength, that is knowledge to the vigor of the mind. Withhold knowledge and you may starve the mind, but it does not follow of necessity that you will sanctify it. No man was ever yet starved into saintship, and mere ignorance can never seal the diploma of an apostle.

The circumstances of the age show that a greater work is before the church than she has yet ventured to encounter even in imagination. And much as the field of foreign missions needs more generosity in pecuniary contributions, it is well known that in men and not in money the deficiency is greatest and most distressing. Let the churches of Christ arise to consider their duty in this matter to God and to man. Address of W. R. Williams; N. Y. Bap. Rep.

MINISTRY, (GOSPEL,) an ordinance appointed for the purpose of instructing men in the principles and knowledge of the gospel, Eph. 4: 8, 11. Rom. 10: 15. Heb. 5: 4. That the gospel ministry is of divine origin, and intended to be kept up in the church, will evidently appear, if we consider the promises that in the last and best times of the New Testament dispensation there would be an instituted and regular ministry in her; (Eph. 4: 8, 11. Tit. 1: 5. 1 Pet. 5: 1 Tim. 1.) also from the names of office peculiar to some members in the church, and not common to all; (Eph. 4: 8, 11) from the duties which are represented as reciprocally binding on ministers and people; (Heb. 13: 7, 17. 1 Pet. 5: 2, 3, 4.) from the promises of assistance which were given to the first ministers of the new dispensation; (Matt. 28: 20.) and from the importance of a gospel ministry, which is represented in the Scripture as a very great blessing to them who enjoy it, and the removal of it as one of the greatest calamities which can befall any people, Rev. 2. and 3. See books under article MINISTER OF THE GOSPEL.—Head. Buck.

MINISTRY OF JESUS CHRIST. The duration of this has been a subject of dispute among the learned. Sir Isaac Newton and some other critics make it to have lasted five passovers; but the more general opinion is, that it only continued three years, and was included in four passovers. Some reduce it to even a still shorter period. The following chronology of our Lord's public ministry is copied from Bowyer's Conjectures on the New Testament, a work equally learned and curious.

CHRONOLOGY OF CHRIST'S PUBLIC MINISTRY.

The fifteenth of Tiberius began August 19, in the year 4742 of the Julian period. (Tiberius' reign began August 19, An. J. P. 4727, A. D. 14.) So soon as winter was over, and the weather became warm enough, John began to baptize, Luke 3: 1. (Suppose in March.)

A. D. Tib. The First Passover, (John 2: 33.) Wednesday, 31. 16-17. March 28, after Christ's baptism; (which was, we may suppose, in September, the 17th of Tiberius not beginning till August 19;) he came into Judea; staid baptizing there, while John was baptizing in Ænon, John 3: 22, 23.

John cast into prison in November. About the time of the winter solstice, (in December,) four months before the harvest, Jesus Christ went through Samaria into Cana of Galilee, Matt. 4: 12. A nobleman from Capernaum went to him there, and desired he would come and heal his son. He did not go, but said, "Go, thy son liveth," John 4.

After some time there, he passed through the midst of the people, and dwelt in Capernaum, Luke 4.

32. 17-18. The Second Passover, Monday, April 14. He called Peter, Andrew, James, and John; preached the sermon on the mount, (Matt. 5.) whither multitudes followed him from Jerusalem, where he had been at the feast. When the winter was coming on, he went to the feast of tabernacles in September, Matt. 8: 19, 23. Luke 9: 51, 57.

He went about the villages of Galilee, teaching in their synagogues, and working many miracles, Matt. 9. Sent forth the twelve, Matt. 10. Received a message from John the Baptist. Upbraided the cities of Chorazin, Bethsaida, and Capernaum, because they repented not; (Matt. 11.) which shows there was a considerable time from the imprisonment of John till now.

33. 18-19. The Third Passover, Friday, April 3. After which the disciples, going through the cornfields, rubbed the ears in their hands, (Matt. 12. Luke 6: 1.) deuteropruō, "on the second prime Sabbath," that is, the second of the two great feasts of the passover.

A. D. Tib. He healed a man on the Sabbath day, Matt. 12. 9. Luke 5: 6.

The Pharisees consulted to destroy him, when he withdrew himself, Matt. 12: 14.

He spake in a ship three parables; one of the seedsmen sowing the fields, (Matt. 13.) whence we may infer it was now seed-time; and that the feast of the tabernacles, in September or October, was past.

He went into his own country, and taught in the synagogues; but did not any mighty work, because of their unbelief. The twelve returned, having been abroad a year, and told him of John's being beheaded. He departed privately in a ship to Bethsaida. Fed five thousand in the desert, Matt. 14. Luke 9. John 6: 4.

34. 19-20. The Fourth Passover, Friday, April 23, (John 6: 4.) to which he went not up, John 7: 1. Henceforward he was found on the coast of Tyre and Sidon, then by the sea of Galilee, next on the coast of Cesarea Philippi, and lastly, at Capernaum, Matt. 15: 21, 29. 16: 13. 17: 24. Went privately to the feast of tabernacles in autumn, John 7: 2. The Jews thought to stone him, but he escaped, John 8: 59. Went to the feast of dedication in winter, John 10: 22. The Jews seeking to kill him fled beyond Jordan, John 10: 39, 40. Matt. 19: 1. On the death of Lazarus came to Bethany, John 11: 7, 18. Walked no more openly, but retired to Ephraim, a city in the wilderness, till

35. 20. The Fifth and last Passover, Wednesday, April 13, (John 11: 53-55.) in the consulship of Fabius and Vitellius.

MINNI, mentioned Jer. 51: 27, is thought by Calmet to denote Minias, a province of Armenia.—Jones.

MINNITH; a city beyond Jordan, situated four miles from Heshbon, on the road to Philadelphia, Judges 11: 33.—Jones.

MINT; (Matt. 23: 23. Luke 11: 42.) a garden herb well known. The law did not oblige the Jews to give the tithe of this sort of herbs; it only required it of those things which could be comprehended under the name of income or revenue. But the Pharisees, desirous of distinguishing themselves by a more scrupulous and literal observance of the law than others, gave the tithes "of mint, anise, and cummin," Matt. 23: 23.—Watson.

MIRACLES. A miracle, in the popular sense, is a prodigy, or an extraordinary event, which surprises us by its novelty. In a more accurate and philosophic sense, "a miracle is a work effected in a manner unusual, or different from the common and regular method of providence, by the power of God himself, for the proof of some particular message, or in attestation of the authority of some particular divine messenger."

In judging of miracles there are certain criteria, peculiar to the subject, sufficient to conduct our inquiries, and warrant our determination. Assuredly they do not appeal to our ignorance, for they presuppose not only the existence of a general order of things, but our actual knowledge of the appearance which that order exhibits, and of the secondary material causes from which it, in most cases, proceeds. If a miraculous event were effected by the immediate hand of God, and yet bore no mark of distinction from the ordinary effects of his agency, it would impress no conviction, and probably awaken no attention. Our knowledge of the ordinary course of things, though limited, is real; and therefore it is essential to a miracle, both that it differ from that course, and be accompanied with peculiar and unequivocal signs of such difference.

The argument for the divine authority of the Jewish religion, and more especially of Christianity, arising from the miracles that were wrought to confirm them, is a subject of great importance, and deserves the particular attention of the biblical student. Happily for Christians of the present day, the doctrine of miracles has been investigated by a host of able writers during the last century; and by Drs. Campbell, Douglas, Farmer, Paley, Gregory, Chalmers, and others, it has been placed in such a luminous point of view, that little remains to be added by any subsequent writer. The following observations on the subject will be found to exhibit a compendious statement of the question.

I. Statement of the argument from miracles. Let us suppose any man assuming to be an inspired teacher, in any place, to tell his countrymen, that he did not desire them, on his ipse dixit, to believe that he had any preternatural communication with the Deity, but that, for the truth of his assertion, he would give them the evidence of their own senses; and after this declaration, let us suppose him immediately to raise a person from the dead in their presence, merely by calling upon him to come out of his grave. Would not the only possible objection to the man's veracity in making so extraordinary a claim, be removed by this miracle? and his solemn affirmation that he had received such and such doctrines from God be as fully credited as if it related to the most common occurrence? Undoubtedly it would; for when so much preternatural power was visibly communicated to this person, no one could have reason to question his having received an equal portion of preternatural knowledge. A palpable deviation from the known laws of nature in one instance, by the infinitely wise Author of them, implies an end of the utmost importance; and in such a case as this, it is nothing less than the witness of God to the truth of the man.

Miracles, then, under which we include prophecy, are the only direct evidence which can be given of divine inspiration. When a religion, or any religious truth, is to be revealed from heaven, they appear to be absolutely necessary to enforce its reception among men; and this is the only case in which we can suppose them necessary, or believe for a moment that they ever have been or will be performed.

Now the history of almost every religion abounds with relations of prodigies and wonders, and of the intercourse of men with the gods; but we know of no religious system, those of the Jews and Christians excepted, which appealed to miracles as the grand palpable evidence of its truth and divinity. The pretended miracles mentioned by pagan historians and poets, were not even pretended to have been publicly wrought to enforce the truth of a new religion, contrary to the reigning idolatry. Many of them may be clearly shown to have been mere natural events; others of them are represented as having been performed in secret on the most trivial occasions, and in obscure and fabulous ages long prior to the era of the writers by whom they are recorded; and such of them as at first view appear to be best attested, are evidently tricks contrived for interested purposes, to flatter power, or to promote the prevailing superstitions. For these reasons, as well as on account of the immoral character of the divinities by whom they are said to have been wrought, they are altogether unworthy of comparison, not to say of examination, and carry in the very nature of them the completest proofs of falsehood and imposture.

II. Credibility of miracles. If we be asked whether miracles are credible, we reply,

1. That, abstractedly considered, they are not incredible; that they are capable of indirect proof from analogy, and of direct, from testimony; that in the common and daily course of worldly affairs, events, the improbability of which, antecedently to all testimony, was very great, are proved to have happened, by the authority of competent and honest witnesses; that the Christian miracles were objects of real and proper experience to those who saw them; and that whatsoever the senses of mankind can perceive, their report may substantiate. Should it be asked whether miracles were necessary, and whether the end proposed to be effected by them could warrant so immediate and extraordinary an interference of the Almighty, as such extraordinary operations suppose; to this we might answer, that, if the fact be established, all reasonings a priori concerning their necessity must be frivolous, and may be false. We are not capable of deciding on a question which, however simple in appearance, is yet too complex in its parts, and too extensive in its object, to be fully comprehended by the human understanding. God is the best and indeed the only Judge how far miracles are proper to promote any particular design of his providence, and how far that design would have been left unaccomplished, if common and ordinary methods only had been pursued. So, from the absence of miracles, we may conclude, in any supposed case, that they were not necessary; from their existence, supported by fair testimony, in any given case, we may infer with confidence that they are proper.

2. A divine revelation is necessary to mankind. A view of the state of the world in general, and of the Jewish nation in particular, and an examination of the nature and tendency of the Christian religion, will point out very clearly the great expediency of a miraculous interposition; and when we reflect on the gracious and important ends that were to be effected by it, we shall be convinced that it was not an idle and useless display of divine power; but that while the means effected and confirmed the end, the end fully justified and illustrated the means. If we reflect on the extent and importance, as well as the singularity, of the Christian revelation; what was its avowed purpose to effect, and what difficulties it was necessarily called to struggle with, before that purpose could be effected; how much it was opposed by the opinions and the practice of the generality of mankind, by philosophy, by superstition, by corrupt passions and inveterate habits, by pride and sensuality, in short, by every engine of human influence, whether formed by craft, or aided by power; if we reflect on the almost irresistible force of prejudice, and the strong opposition it universally made to the establishment of a new religion on the demolition of rites and ceremonies, which authority had made sacred, and custom had familiarized;—if we seriously reflect on these things, and give them their due force, (and experience shows us that we can scarcely give them too much,) we shall be induced to admit even the necessity of a miraculous interposition, at a time when common means must inevitably, in our apprehensions, have failed of success.

3. Miracles are inseparable from divine revelation. The revelation of the divine will by inspired persons is, as such, miraculous; and therefore, before the adversaries of the gospel can employ with propriety their objections to the particular miracles on which its credibility is based, they should show the impossibility of any revelation. In whatever age the revelation is given, that age can have no other demonstration of its authority but miracles, and succeeding ages can know it only from testimony; and if they admit the one, they cannot deny the other. That the apostles could not be deceived, and that they had no temptation to deceive, has been repeatedly demonstrated. So powerful, indeed, is the proof adduced in support of their testimony, that the infidels of these later days have been obliged to abandon the ground on which their predecessors stood; to disclaim all moral evidences arising from the character and relation of eye-witnesses; and to maintain, upon metaphysical, rather than historical, principles, that miracles are utterly incapable, in their own nature, of existing in any circumstances, or of being supported by any evidence.

Mr. Hume has insidiously or erroneously maintained that a miracle is contrary to experience; but, in reality, it is only different from ordinary experience. That diseases should generally be cured by the application of medicine, and sometimes at the mere word of a prophet, are facts not inconsistent with each other in the nature of things themselves, nor irreconcilable according to our ideas. Each fact may arise from its own proper cause; each may exist independently of the other; and each is known by its own proper proof, whether of sense or testimony. To pronounce, therefore, a miracle to be false, because it is different from ordinary experience, is only to conclude against its existence from the very circumstance which constitutes its specific character; for if it were not different from ordinary experience, where would be its singularity? or what proof could be drawn from it, in attestation of a divine message?

We have been told that the course of nature is fixed and unalterable, and therefore it is not consistent with the immutability of God to perform miracles. But, surely, they who reason in this manner beg the very point in question. We have no right to assume that the Deity has ordained such general laws for his own operations, as will exclude his acting in other modes, and we cannot suppose that he would forbear so to act where any important end could be answered. Besides, if the course of nature implies the whole order of events which God has ordained for the government of the world, it includes both his ordinary and extraordinary dispensations, and among them miracles may have their place, as an inseparable part of the universal plan. This is, indeed, equally consistent with sound philosophy, and with pure religion.

He that acknowledges a God, must, at least, admit the possibility of a miracle. He who admits the creation of the world, believes in the actual occurrence of a miracle. He who concedes that the world is under the control of a wise and beneficent providence, cannot deny that a particular operation of that providence for beneficent purposes is both consistent and desirable.

III. Miracles of the Jewish and Christian dispensations. Miracles may be classed under two heads: those which consist in a train or combination of events, which distinguish themselves from the ordinary arrangements of providence; and those particular operations which are performed by instruments and agents incompetent to effect them without a preternatural power.

1. In the conduct of providence respecting the Jewish people, from the earliest periods of their existence, as a distinct class of society, to the present time, we behold a singularity of circumstance and procedure which we cannot account for on common principles. Comparing their condition and situation with that of other nations, we can meet with nothing similar to it in the history of mankind. So remarkable a difference, conspicuous in every revolution of their history, could not have subsisted through mere accident. There must have been a cause adequate to so extraordinary an effect. Now, what should this cause be, but an interposition of providence in a manner different from the course of its general government? for the phenomenon cannot be explained by an application of those general causes and effects that operate in other cases.

The original propagation of Christianity was likewise an event which clearly discovered a miraculous interposition. The circumstances which attended it were such as cannot rationally be accounted for on any other postulation. (See the article CHRISTIANITY.)

It may now be observed, that the institutions of the law and the gospel may not only appeal for their confirmation to a train of events which, taken in a general and combined view, point out an extraordinary designation, and vindicate their claim to a divine authority; but also to a number of particular operations which, considered distinctly, or in a separate and detached light, evidently display a supernatural power, immediately exerted on the occasion.

2. Particular miracles of our Lord. Since Christ himself constantly appealed to these works as the evidences of his divine mission and character, we may briefly examine how far they justified and confirmed his pretensions. That our Lord laid the greatest stress on the evidence they afforded; nay, that he considered that evidence as sufficient to authenticate his claims to the office of the Messiah with all reasonable and well-disposed inquirers, is manifest, not only from his own words, John 10: 25. Matt 11: 45, but also from a great variety of other passages in the evangelists, especially John 10: 37: "If I do not the works of my Father, believe me not: but if I do, though ye believe not me, believe the works." This appeal to miracles was founded on the following just and obvious grounds:—

First: that they are visible proofs of divine approbation, as well as of divine power: for it would have been quite inconclusive to rest an appeal on the testimony of the latter, if it had not at the same time included an evidence of the former; and it was, indeed, a natural inference, that working of miracles, in defence of a particular cause, was the seal of heaven to the truth of that cause. To suppose the contrary, would be to suppose that God not only permitted his creatures to be deceived, but that he deviated from the ordinary course of his providence, purposely with a view to deceive them. (See APOSTLES.)

Secondly: when our Lord appealed to his miracles, as proofs of his divine mission, it presupposed that those miracles were of such a nature as would bear the strictest examination; that they had all those criteria which could possibly distinguish them from the delusions of enthusiasm, and the artifices of imposture; else the appeal would have been fallacious and equivocal. He appealed to them with all the confidence of an upright mind, totally possessed with a consciousness of their truth and reality. This appeal was not drawn out into any labored argument, nor adorned by any of the embellishments of language. It was short, simple, and decisive. He neither reasoned nor declaimed on their nature or their design: he barely pointed to them as plain and indubitable facts, such as spoke their own meaning, and carried with them their own authority. The miracles which our Lord performed were too public to be suspected of imposture; and, being objects of sense, they were secured against the charge of enthusiasm. An impostor would not have acted so absurdly as to have risked his credit on the performance of what, he must have known, it was not in his power to effect; and though an enthusiast, from the warmth of imagination, might have flattered himself with a full persuasion of his being able to perform some miraculous work, yet, when the trial was referred to an object of sense, the event must soon have exposed the delusion. The impostor would not have dared to say to the blind, Receive thy sight; to the deaf, Hear; to the dumb, Speak; to the dead, Arise; to the raging of the sea, Be still; lest he should injure the credit of his cause, by undertaking more than he could perform; and though the enthusiast, under the delusion of his passions, might have confidently commanded disease to fly, and the powers of nature to be subject to his control; yet their obedience would not have followed his command.

The miracles of Christ then were such as an impostor would not have attempted, and such as an enthusiast could not have effected. They had no disguise; and were in a variety of instances of such a nature as to preclude the very possibility of collusion. They were performed in the midst of his bitterest enemies; and were so palpable and certain, as to extort the acknowledgment of their reality, even from persons who were most eager to oppose his doctrines, and to discredit his pretensions, John 11: 47, 48. They could not deny the facts, but they imputed them to the agency of an infernal spirit. Now, supposing miracles to be in the power of an infernal spirit, can it be imagined that he would communicate an ability of performing them to persons who were counteracting his designs? Would he by them give credit to a cause that tended to bring his own into disgrace? Matt. 12: 24—26. Thus, as our Savior appealed to miracles as proofs of his power, so he appealed to the inherent worth and purity of the doctrines they were intended to bear witness to, as a proof that the power was of God. In this manner do the external and internal evidences give and receive mutual confirmation, and mutual lustre.

3. Particular miracles of the apostles. The truth of the Christian religion does not, however, wholly depend on the miracles wrought by its divine Founder, though sufficient in themselves to establish his claims: but in order to give the evidence of miracles the strongest force they could possibly acquire, that evidence was extended still farther; and the same power that our Lord possessed was communicated to his disciples, and their more immediate successors. Whilst yet on earth he imparted to them this extraordinary gift, as the seal of their commission, when he sent them to preach the gospel: and after his glorious resurrection and ascension into heaven, they were endowed with powers yet more stupendous. Sensible of the validity of this kind of evidence, the apostles of our Lord, with the same artless simplicity, and the same boldness of conscious integrity, which distinguished their great Master, constantly insisted upon the miracles they wrought, as strong and undeniable proofs of the truth of their doctrines. The heathen philosophers imputed them to some occult power of magic: and thus applied what has no existence in nature, in order to account for a phenomenon that existed out of its common course. But if we consider their nature, their greatness, and their number; and if to this consideration we add that which respects their end and design, we must acknowledge, that no one could have performed them, unless God was with him. These miracles were of a nature too palpable to be mistaken. They were the objects of sense, and not the precarious speculations of reason concerning what God might do, or the chimerical suggestions of fancy concerning what he did.

IV. Credibility of the evangelical records. The facts were recorded by those who must have known whether they were true or false. The persons who recorded them were under no possible temptations to deceive the world. We can only account for their conduct on the supposition of their most perfect conviction and disinterested zeal. That they should assert what they knew to be false; that they should publish it with so much ardor; that they should risk every thing dear to humanity, in order to maintain it; and at last submit to death, in order to attest their persuasion of its truth in those moments when imposture usually drops its mask, and enthusiasm loses its confidence; that they should act thus in opposition to every dictate of common sense, and every principle of common honesty, every restraint of shame, and every impulse of selfishness, is a phenomenon not less irreconcilable to the moral state of things than miracles are to the natural constitution of the world.

V. Duration of miracles in the Church. How long miracles were continued in the church, has been a matter of keen dispute, and has been investigated with as much anxiety, as if the truth of the gospel depended upon the manner in which it was decided. Assuming, as we are here warranted to do, that real miraculous power was conveyed in the way detailed by the inspired writers, it is plain, that it may have been exercised in different countries, and may have remained, without any new communication of it, throughout the first, and a considerable part of the second century. The apostles, wherever they went to execute their commission, would avail themselves of the stupendous gift which had been imparted to them; and it is clear, not only that they were permitted and enabled to convey it to others, but that spiritual gifts, including the power of working miracles, were actually conferred on many of the primitive disciples. Allusions to this we find in the epistles of St. Paul; such allusions, too, as it is utterly inconceivable that any man of a sound judgment could have made, had he not known that he was referring to an obvious fact, about which there could be no hesitation.

Of the time at which several of the apostles died, we have no certain knowledge. St. Peter and St. Paul suffered at Rome about A. D. 66, or 67; and it is fully established, that the life of John was much longer protracted, he having died a natural death, A. D. 100, or 101. Supposing that the two former of these apostles imparted spiritual gifts till the time of their suffering martyrdom, the persons to whom they were imparted might, in the course of nature, have lived through the earlier part of the second century; and if John did the same till the end of his life, such gifts as were derived from him might have remained till more than the half of that century had elapsed. That such was the fact, is asserted by ancient ecclesiastical writers.

Whether, after the generation immediately succeeding the apostles had passed away, the power of working miracles was anew communicated, is a question, the solution of which cannot be so satisfactory. The probability is, that there was no such renewal; and this opinion rests upon the ground that the attestation of Christianity was already complete, and that other means were now sufficient to accomplish the end for which miracles are originally designed.

VI. Spurious miracles confirm the reality of the genuine. As to the miracles of the Romish church, it is evident, as Doddridge observes, that many of them were ridiculous tales, according to their own historians; others were performed without any credible witnesses, or in circumstances where the performer had the greatest opportunity for juggling; and it is particularly remarkable, that they were hardly ever wrought where they seem most necessary, i. e. in countries where those doctrines are renounced which that church esteems of the highest importance. It was in fact foretold that such "lying wonders" should be connected with the great apostasy, 2 Thess. 2. These counterfeits, therefore, not only presuppose the existence of the true, but fulfil the voice of prophecy.

MIRAGE. Bishop Lowth translates the first clause of Ps. 33: 7, "And the glowing sand shall become a pool." In his note on the passage, he says, "The word is Arabic, as well as Hebrew, but it means the same thing in both languages, namely, a glowing, sandy plain, which in the hot countries, at a distance, has the appearance of water."

It sometimes tempts thirsty travellers out of their way, but deceives them when they come near; either going forward,—for it always appears at the same distance,—or it quite vanishes.

Dr. E. D. Clarke, in his Travels, has given a very lively view of this wonderful appearance. He says, "We arrived at the wretched, solitary village of Utko, near the muddy shore of the lake of that name, the entrance to which is called Maodic. Here we procured asses for all the party; and setting out for Rosetta, began to scour the desert, now appearing like an ocean of sand, but flatter and firmer as to its surface than before. The Arabs, uttering their harsh guttural language, ran chattering by the side of our asses, until some of them calling out "Raschid," (or Rosetta,) we perceived its domes and turrets, apparently upon the opposite side of an immense lake or sea, that covered all the intervening space between us and the city."

"Not having in my own mind at the time any doubt as to the certainty of its being water, and seeing the tall minarets and buildings of Rosetta, with all its groves of dates and sycamores, as perfectly reflected by it as by a mirror, inasmuch that even the minutest detail of the architecture, and the trees, might have been delineated thence, I applied to the Arabs to know in what manner we were to pass the water. Our interpreter, although a Greek, and therefore likely to have been informed of such a spectacle, was as fully convinced as any of us that we were drawing near to the water's edge, and became indignant when the Arabs maintained that within an hour we should reach Rosetta, by crossing the sands in the direct line we then pursued, and that there was no water. 'What!' said he, giving way to his impatience, 'do you suppose me to be an idiot, to be persuaded contrary to the evidence of my own senses?' The Arabs, smiling, soon pacified him, and completely astonished the whole party, by desiring us to look back at the desert we had already passed, when we beheld a precisely similar appearance. It was in fact the mirage, a prodigy to which every one of us were then strangers; although it afterwards became more familiar. Yet upon no future occasion did we behold this extraordinary illusion so marvellously displayed. The view of it afforded us ideas of the horrible despondency to which travellers must be sometimes exposed, who, in travelling the interminable desert, destitute of water, and perishing with thirst, have sometimes this deceitful prospect before their eyes," Job 6: 15—20.

In striking contrast to this, the prophet, speaking of the blessings to spring from the coming of the Messiah, exclaims,

The desert and the waste shall be glad,
And the wilderness shall rejoice and flourish;
Like the rose shall it beautifully flourish;
Then shall be unclosed the eyes of the blind,
And the ears of the deaf shall be opened;
Then shall the lame bound as the hart;
And the tongue of the dumb shall sing;
For in the wilderness shall burst forth waters,
And torrents in the desert;
And the glouring sand shall become a pool

MIRACULOUS CONCEPTION. By this is meant, that the human nature of Jesus Christ was formed, not in the ordinary method of generation, but out of the substance of the virgin Mary, by the immediate operation of the Holy Ghost. The evidence upon which this article of the Christian faith rests is found in Matt. 1: 18—23, and in the more particular narration which St. Luke has given in the first chapter of his gospel. If we admit this evidence of the fact, we can discern the emphatical meaning of the appellation given to our Savior when he is called "the seed of the woman;" (Gen. 3: 15.) we can perceive the meaning of a phrase which St. Luke has introduced into the genealogy of Jesus, (Luke 3: 23.) "being (as was supposed) the son of Joseph," and of which, otherwise, it is not possible to give a good account; and we can discover a peculiar significancy in an expression of the apostle Paul, (Gal. 4: 4.) "God sent forth his Son, made of a woman."

The conception of Jesus is the point from which we date the union between his divine and human nature; and, this conception being miraculous, the existence of the Person in whom they are united, was not physically derived from Adam. But, as Dr. Horsley speaks in his Sermon on the Incarnation, the union with the uncreated Word is the very principle of personality and individual existence in the Son of Mary. According to this view of the matter, the miraculous conception gives a completeness and consistency to the revelation concerning Jesus Christ. Not only is he the Son of God, but, as the Son of man, he is exalted above his brethren, while he is made like them. He is preserved from the contamination adhering to the race whose nature he assumed; and when the only-begotten Son, who is in the bosom of the Father, was made flesh, the intercourse which, as man, he had with God, is distinguished, not in degree only, but in kind, from that which any prophet ever enjoyed; and it is infinitely more intimate, because it did not consist in communications occasionally made to him, but arose from the manner in which his human nature had its existence. See JESUS CHRIST, INCARNATION, and Horsley's Sermon.—Watson.

MIRIAM, sister of Moses and Aaron, was born about A. M. 2424. She might be ten or twelve years old when her brother Moses was exposed on the banks of the Nile, since Miriam was watching there, and offered herself to Pharaoh's daughter to fetch her a nurse. The princess accepting the offer, Miriam fetched her own mother, to whom the young Moses was given to nurse, Exod. 2: 4, 5, &c. It is thought that Miriam married Hur, of the tribe of Judah; but it does not appear that she had any children by him, Exod. 17: 10, 11. Miriam had the gift of prophecy, as she intimates (Num. 12: 2.) "Hath the Lord indeed spoken only by Moses? hath he not spoken also by us?" See also Exod. 15: 21. Num. 12: and 20.—Watson.

MIRRORS, usually, but improperly, rendered looking-glasses. The Eastern mirrors were made of polished metal, and for the most part convex. So Callimachus describes Venus as "taking the shining brass," that is, to adjust her hair. If they were thus made in the country of Eilihu, the image made use of by him will appear very lively: "Hast thou with him spread out the sky, which is strong, and as a molten looking-glass?" Job 37: 18. Shaw informs us that "in the Levant, looking-glasses are a part of female dress. The Moorish women in Barbary are so fond of their ornaments, and particularly of their looking-glasses, which they hang upon their breasts, that they will not lay them aside, even when, after the drudgery of the day, they are obliged to go two or three miles with a pitcher or a goat's skin, to fetch water." The Israelitish women used to carry their mirrors with them, even to their most solemn place of worship. The word mirror should be used in the passages here referred to. To speak of "looking-glasses made of steel," and "glasses molten," is palpably absurd; whereas the term mirror obviates every difficulty, and expresses the true meaning of the original.—Watson.

MIRTH; joy, gayety, merriment. It is distinguished from cheerfulness thus: Mirth is considered as an act; cheerfulness a habit of the mind. Mirth is short and transient; cheerfulness fixed and permanent. Those are often raised into the greatest transports of mirth who are subject to the greatest depressions of melancholy: on the contrary, cheerfulness, though it does not give such an exquisite gladness, prevents us from falling into any depths of sorrow. Mirth is like a flash of lightning, that breaks through a gloom of clouds, and glitters for a moment; cheerfulness keeps up a kind of daylight in the mind, and fills it with a steady and perpetual serenity.

Mirth is sinful, 1. When men rejoice in that which is evil. 2. When unreasonable. 3. When tending to commit sin. 4. When a hindrance to duty. 5. When it is blasphemous and profane.—Hend. Buck.

MISANTHROPIST; (from the Greek misos, to hate, and anthropos, man;) a hater of mankind; one that abandons society from a principle of discontent. The consideration of the depravity of human nature is certainly enough to raise emotions of sorrow in the breast of every man of the least sensibility; yet it is our duty to bear with the follies of mankind; to exercise a degree of candor consistent with truth; to lessen, if possible, by our exertions, the sum of moral and natural evil; and by connecting ourselves with society, to add to least something to the general interests of mankind. The misanthrope, therefore, is an ungenerous and dishonorable character. Disgusted with life, he seeks a retreat from it; like a coward, he flees from the scene of action, while he increases his own misery by his natural discontent, and leaves others to do what they can for themselves.

The following is his character more at large: "He is a man," says Saurin, "who avoids society only to free himself from the trouble of being useful to it. He is a man, who considers his neighbors only on the side of their defects, not knowing the art of combining their virtues with their vices, and of rendering the imperfections of other people tolerable by reflecting on his own. He is a man more employed in finding out and inflicting punishments on the guilty than in devising means to reform them. He is a man, who talks of nothing but banishing and executing, and who, because he thinks his talents are not sufficiently valued and employed by his fellow-citizens, or rather because they know his foibles, and do not choose to be subject to his caprice, talks of quitting cities, towns, and societies, and of living in dens or deserts." Saurin's Sermons.—Hend. Buck.

MISER, (Lat. unhappy;) a term formerly used in reference to a person in wretchedness or calamity; but it now denotes a parsimonious person, or one who is covetous to extremity; who denies himself even the comforts of life to accumulate wealth.

Avarice, says Saurin, may be considered in two different points of light. It may be considered in those men, or rather those public bloodsuckers, or, as the officers of the Roman emperor Vespasian were called, those sponges of society, who, infatuated with this passion, seek after riches as the supreme good, determine to acquire it by any methods, and consider the ways that lead to wealth, legal or illegal, as the only road for them to travel.

Avarice, however, must be considered in a second point of light. It not only consists in committing bold crimes, but in entertaining mean ideas and practising low methods, incompatible with such magnanimity as our condition ought to inspire. It consists not only in omitting to serve God, but in trying to associate the service of God with that of mammon.

How many forms doth avarice take to disguise itself from the man who is guilty of it, and who will be drenched in the guilt of it till the day he dies! Sometimes it is prudence, which requires him to provide not only for his present wants, but for such as he may have in future. Sometimes it is charity, which requires him not to give society examples of prodigality and parade. Sometimes it is parental love, obliging him to save something for his children. Sometimes it is circumspection, which requires him not to supply people who make ill use of what they get. Sometimes it is necessity, which obliges him to repel artifice by artifice. Sometimes it is conscience, which convinces him, good man, that he hath already exceeded in compassion and alms-giving, and done too much. Sometimes it is equity, for justice requires that every one should enjoy the fruit of his own labors, and those of his ancestors.—Such, alas! are the awful pretexes and subterfuges of the miser. Saurin's Ser., vol. v. ser. 12. (See AVARICE; COVETOUSNESS.)—Hend. Buck.

MISERY; such a state of wretchedness, unhappiness, or calamity, as renders a person an object of compassion.—Hend. Buck.

MISHNA, (from the Heb. meshna, repetition;) a part of the Jewish Talmud.

The Mishna contains the text; and the Gemara, which is the second part of the Talmud, contains the commentaries: so that the Gemara is, as it were, a glossary on the Mishna.

The Mishna consists of various traditions of the Jews, and of explanations of several passages of Scripture: these traditions serving as an explication of the written law, and supplement to it, are said to have been delivered to Moses during the time of his abode on the mount; which he afterwards communicated to Aaron, Eleazer, and his servant Joshua. By these they were transmitted to the seventy elders; by them to the prophets, who communicated them to the men of the great sanhedrim, from whom the wise men of Jerusalem and Babylon received them. Dr. Prideaux, rejecting the Jewish fictions, observes, that after the death of Simeon the Just, about 299 years before Christ, the Mishnaical doctors arose, who by their comments and conclusions added to the number of those traditions which had been received and allowed by Ezra and the men of the great synagogue; so that towards the middle of the second century after Christ, under the empire of Antoninus Pius, it was found necessary to commit these traditions to writing; more especially as their country had considerably suffered under Adrian, and many of their schools had been dissolved, and their learned men cut off; and therefore the usual method of preserving their traditions had failed. Rabbi Judah on this occasion being rector of the school at Tiberias, and president of the sanhedrim in that place, undertook the work, and compiled it in six books, each consisting of several tracts, which altogether make up the number of sixty-three. Prid. Connex., vol. ii. p. 468, &c., ed. 9.

This learned author computes, that the Mishna was composed about the 150th year of our Lord; but Dr. Lightfoot says, that rabbi Judah compiled the Mishna about the year of Christ 190, in the latter end of the reign of Commodus; or, as some compute, in the year of Christ 220. Dr. Lardner is of opinion that this work could not have been finished before the year 190, or later. Thus the book called the Mishna was formed; a book which the Jews have generally received with the greatest veneration. The original has been published with a Latin translation by Surenhusius, with notes of his own, and others from the learned Maimonides, &c., in six vols. fol. Amster. A. D. 1698—1703. (See CABALA, GEMARA, TALMUD.) It is written in a much purer style, and is not nearly so full of dreams and visions as the Gemara.—Hend. Buck.

MISR; a name given to the land of Egypt. (See MIZRAIM.)

MISREPRESENTATION; the act of wilfully representing a thing otherwise than it is.

This, as an elegant writer observes, is one of the greatest mischiefs of conversation. Self-love is continually at work to give to all we say a bias in our own favor. How often in society, otherwise respectable, are we pained with narrations in which prejudice warps, and self-love blinds! How often do we see that withholding part of a truth answers the worst ends of a falsehood! How often regret the unfair turn given to a cause by placing a sentiment in one point of view, which the speaker had used in another! the letter of truth preserved, where its spirit is violated! a superstitious exactness scrupulously maintained in the underparts of a detail, in order to impress such an idea of integrity as shall gain credit for the misrepresenter, while he is designedly mistaking the leading principle! How may we observe a new character given to a fact by a different look, tone, or emphasis, which alters it as much as words could have done! the false impression of a sermon conveyed, when we do not like the preacher, or when through him we wish to make religion itself ridiculous; the care to avoid literal untruths, while the mischief is better effected by the unfair quotation of a passage divested of its context! the bringing together detached portions of a subject, and making those parts ludicrous, when connected, which were serious in their distinct position! the insidious use made of a sentiment by representing it as the opinion of him who had only brought it forward in order to expose it! the relating opinions which had merely been put hypothetically, as if they were the avowed principles of him we would discredit! that subtle falsehood which is so made to incorporate with a certain quantity of truth, that the most skilful moral chemist cannot analyse or separate them! for a good misrepresenter knows that a successful lie must have a certain infusion of truth, or it will not go down. And this amalgamation is the test of his skill; as too much truth would defeat the end of his mischief, and too little would destroy the belief of the hearer. All that indefinable ambiguity and equivocation; all that prudent deceit, which is rather implied than expressed; those more delicate artifices of the school of Loyola and of Chesterfield, which allow us, when we dare not deny a truth, yet so to disguise and discolor it, that the truth we relate shall not resemble the truth we heard; these, and all the thousand shades of simulation and dissimulation, will be carefully guarded against in the conversation of vigilant Christians. Miss H. More on Education, vol. ii. p. 91; Dwight's Theology. (See TRUTH, and LYING.)—Hend. Buck.

MISSAL; the Romish mass-book, containing the several masses to be said on particular days. It is derived from the Latin word missa, which, in the ancient Christian church, signified every part of divine service. It was formed by collecting the separate liturgical books formerly used in the religious services, particularly the Oratorium, Lectionarium, Evangeliarum, Antiphonarium, the Canon, &c., for the convenience of the priest. Some of these prayers and ceremonies are very ancient. Pius V. required, in 1570, that the Missal which had been revised under his direction, should be adopted by the whole Catholic church; and this form has been retained till the present time; the changes introduced by Clement VIII. and Urban VIII., being little more than the alteration of a few sentences, and the addition of some new masses to those already in use. (See LITURGY.)—Hend. Buck.

MISSION; a power or commission to preach the gospel. Thus Jesus Christ gave his disciples their mission when he said, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature." See Mark 16: 16, and Note on the text in the Comprehensive Commentary. See also the two next articles.—Hend. Buck.

MISSION; an establishment of Christians, zealous for the glory of God and the salvation of souls, who go an... preach the gospel in remote countries, and among infidels. No man possessed of the least degree of feeling or compassion for the human race, can deny the necessity and utility of Christian missions. Whoever considers that the major part of the world is enveloped in the grossest darkness, bound with the chains of savage barbarity, and immersed in the awful chaos of brutal ignorance, must, if he be not destitute of every principle of religion and humanity, concur with the design and applaud the principles of those who engage in so benevolent a work. (See HEATHEN, &c.) We shall not, however, in this place, enter into a defence of missions, but shall present the reader with a short view of those that have been established.

1. Papal Missions.—In the sixteenth century, the Romish church particularly exerted herself for the propagation of her religion. The Portuguese and Spaniards pretend to have done mighty exploits in the spread of the Christian faith in Asia, Africa, and America; but, when we consider the superstitions they imposed on some, and the dreadful cruelties they inflicted on others, it more than counterbalances any good that was done. For a time, the Dominicans, Franciscans, and other religious orders, were very zealous in the conversion of the heathen; but the Jesuits outdid them all in their attempts in the conversion of African, Asian, and American infidels. Xavier spread some hints of the Romish religion through the Portuguese settlements in the East Indies, through most of the Indian continent, and of Ceylon. In 1549, he sailed to Japan, and laid the foundation of a church there, which at one time was said to have consisted of about six hundred thousand Christians. After him, others penetrated into China, and founded a church, which continued about one hundred and seventy years. About 1580, others penetrated into Chili and Peru, in South America, and converted the natives. Others bestirred themselves to convert the Greeks, Nestorians, Monophysites, Abyssinians, and the Egyptian Copts. "It is, however," as one observes, "a matter of doubt whether the disciples of a Xavier, or the converts of a Loyola and Dominic, with their partisans of the Romish church, should be admitted among the number of Christians, or their labors be thought to have contributed to the promotion or to the hindrance of the religion of Christ. Certain it is, that the methods these men pursued tended much more to make disciples to themselves and the pontiffs of Rome, than to form the mind to the reception of evangelical truth." With ardent zeal, however, and unwearied industry, these apostles labored in this work. In 1622, we find the pope established a congregation of cardinals, de propaganda fide, and endowed it with ample revenues, and every thing which could forward the missions was liberally supplied. In 1627, also, Urban added the college for the propagation of the faith; in which missionaries were taught the languages of the countries to which they were to be sent. France copied the example of Rome, and formed an establishment for the same purposes. The Jesuits claimed the first rank, as due to their zeal, learning, and devotedness to the holy see. The Dominicans, Franciscans, and others, disputed the palm with them. The new world and the Asiatic regions were the chief field of their labors. They penetrated into the uncultivated recesses of America. They visited the untried regions of Siam, Tonquin, and Cochinchina. They entered the vast empire of China itself, and numbered millions among their converts. They dared affront the dangers of the tyrannical government of Japan. In India they assumed the garb and austerities of the Brahmims, and boasted on the coasts of Malabar of a thousand converts baptized in one year by a single missionary. Their sufferings, however, were very great; and in China and Japan they were exposed to the most dreadful persecutions, and many thousands were cut off, with, at last, a final expulsion from the empires. In Africa the Capuchins were chiefly employed, though it does not appear that they had any considerable success. And in America their laborious exertions have had but little influence, we fear, to promote the real conversion of the natives to the truth.

2. Protestant Missions.—In the year 1621, the Dutch opened a church in the city of Batavia, and from hence ministers were sent to Amboyna. At Leyden, ministers and assistants were educated for the purpose of missions under the famous Waleus, and sent into the East, where thousands embraced the Christian religion at Formosa, Columba, Java, Malabar, &c.; and though the work declined in some places, yet there are still churches in Ceylon, Sumatra, Amboyna, &c.

About 1705, Frederick IV., of Denmark, applied to the university of Halle, in Germany, for missionaries to preach the gospel on the coast of Malabar, in the East Indies; and Messrs. Ziegenbalg and Plutschke were the first employed on this important mission; to them others were soon added, who labored with considerable success. It is said that upwards of eighteen thousand Gentoos have been brought up to the profession of Christianity.

A great work has been carried on among the Indian nations in North America. One of the first and most eminent instruments in this work was the excellent Mr. Elliott, commonly called the Indian apostle, who, from the time of his going to New England, in 1631, to his death, in 1690, devoted himself to this great work by his lips and pen, translating the Bible and other books into the native dialect. Some years after this, Thomas Mayhew, Esq., governor and patentee of the islands of Martha's Vineyard, and some neighboring islands, greatly exerted himself in the attempt to convert the Indians in that part of America. His son John gathered and founded an Indian church, which, after his death, not being able to pay a minister, the old gentleman himself, at seventy years of age, became their instructor for more than twenty years; and his grandson and great-grandson both succeeded him in the same work. Mr. D. Brainerd was also a truly pious and successful missionary among the Susquehanna and Delaware Indians. His journal contains instances of very extraordinary conversions.

But the Moravians have exceeded all in their missionary exertions. They have various missions; and, by their persevering zeal, it is said, upwards of twenty-three thousand of the most destitute of mankind, in different regions of the earth, have been brought to the knowledge of the truth. Vast numbers in the Danish islands of St. Thomas, St. Jan, and St. Croix, and the English islands of Jamaica, Antigua, Nevis, Barbadoes, St. Kitts, and Tobago, have, by their ministry, been called to worship God in spirit and in truth. In the inhospitable climes of Greenland and Labrador, they have met with wonderful success, after undergoing the most astonishing dangers and difficulties. The Arrowack Indians, and the negroes of Surinam and Berbice, have been collected into bodies of faithful people by them. Canada and the United States of North America have, by their instrumentality, afforded happy evidences of the power of the gospel. Even those esteemed the last of human beings, for brutishness and ignorance, the Hottentots, have been formed into their societies; and upwards of seven hundred are said to be worshipping God at Bavians Cloof, near the cape of Good Hope. We might also mention their efforts to illumine the distant East, the coast of Coromandel, and the Nicobar islands; their attempts to penetrate into Abyssinia, to carry the gospel to Persia and Egypt, and to ascend the mountains of Caucasus. In fact, where shall we find the men who have labored as these have? Their invincible patience, their well-regulated zeal, their self-denial, their constant prudence, deserve the meed of highest approbation. Nor are they wearied in so honorable a service; for they have numerous missionaries still employed in different parts of the world. (See MORAVIANS.)

Good has been also done by the Wesleyan Methodists, who are certainly not the least in missionary work. They have several missionaries in the British dominions in America, and in the West Indies. They have some thousands of members in their societies in those parts. (See METHODISTS.)

In 1791, a society was instituted among the Baptists, called "The Particular Baptist Society for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen;" under the auspices of which missionaries were sent to India, where they have had considerable success, particularly in the translation of the Scriptures into many of the Indian languages and dialects. They have also missionaries in the West Indies, where their efforts have been signally blessed in the conversion of the negroes. The annual expenditure is about twenty thousand pounds.

In the year 1795, the London Missionary society was formed. According to its constitution, it is not confined to one body of people, but consists of Episcopalians, Presbyterians, and Independents, who hold an annual meeting in London, in May. Missions have been established by this society in the South seas, the West Indies, South Africa, India, China, and Siberia, in most of which places the labors of its devoted agents have been remarkably blessed, especially in the islands of the Pacific, where as upwards of twenty, on which idolatry has been entirely abolished, several Christian churches have been formed, and some thousands of the natives give satisfactory evidence of genuine conversion. According to the report for 1831, the society had eighty stations, with ninety European missionaries, besides twenty-one printers, schoolmasters, &c., and native teachers, amounting altogether to nearly four hundred. About twenty thousand children and adults receive instruction in the schools. The annual expenditure now amounts to upwards of forty thousand pounds.

Besides the above-mentioned societies, others have been formed, in connexion with the Established church. In 1699, a society was instituted in England for promoting Christian knowledge. In 1701, another was formed for the propagation of the gospel in foreign parts. In Scotland, about the year 1700, a society was instituted for the propagation of Christian knowledge. In 1800, the Church Missionary society was formed. Its stations are fifty-six in number,—in India, West Africa, Australia, the Mediterranean, the West Indies, and British America. Its expenditure for 1831, was forty-four thousand two hundred and sixty-six pounds thirteen shillings and nine-pence.

Societies for spreading the gospel also have been instituted in various other places, especially in the United States; the missionaries of which country are laboring in the Sandwich islands, Africa, Palestine, Armenia, the Greek islands, India, Burmah, Siam, and China. See accounts of the several denominations, and the Missionary Department at the end of this work.

From the whole, it seems evident that the light and knowledge of the glorious gospel will be more diffused than ever throughout the earth. And who is there that has any concern for the souls of men, any love for truth and religion, but what must rejoice at the formation, number, and success of those institutions, which have not the mere temporal concerns of men, but their everlasting welfare, as their object? Whose heart does not overflow with joy, and his eyes with tears, when he considers the happy and extensive effects which are likely to take place. The untutored mind will receive the peaceful principles of religion and virtue; the savage barbarian will rejoice in the copious blessings, and feel the benign effects of civilization; the ignorant idolater will be directed to offer up his prayers and praises to the true God, and learn the way of salvation through Jesus Christ. The habitations of cruelty will become the abodes of peace and security, while ignorance and superstition shall give way to the celestial blessings of intelligence, purity, and joy. Happy men, who are employed as instruments in this cause; who forego your personal comforts, relinquish your native country, and voluntarily devote yourselves to the most noble and honorable of services! MISSIONARY SPIRIT. A question of prime importance will unquestionably be started by a reflecting mind, whether the missionary spirit has its foundation in the religious constitution of the Christian; or in his natural propensity for the romantic, hazardous, and untrodden paths of existence; especially when associated with benevolence to others, either real or apparent. Now this is not only an inquiry of importance, but it is one which leads us directly to the latent springs of moral action; and the only way to arrive at a correct and conclusive answer is, to ascertain whether the legitimate tendency of holy influence and sacred truth is to produce or sustain such views respecting the unconverted nations of the globe.

Previous to entering on this investigation we may remark, that it is by no means necessary to divest the missionary of that degree of passion for new scenes of enterprise, which makes him very willing to forsake old ones. The instability of a rover may make a north-western hunter, but will never keep a man in the wilderness of human society, patiently gathering the chosen vessels of divine mercy into the fold of the Redeemer.—To return to the question;—

First; the genuine spirit of missions exists only in the minds of those whose souls are lighted from above, who have tasted that the Lord is gracious, and are under the impelling influence of the love of God shed abroad in the heart. All this is the very spirit of heaven, of pure benevolence, of impartial love. It was the simple action of these principles that led the Son of God to die for the happiness of millions. It was this that devised and consummated the plan of mercy for earth's unnumbered myriads. The very genius of the gospel; all its eternal provisions; all its promises; all its moral power; all its magnificent and unending rewards, are directed with an undeviating aim to the salvation of sinners; to break down their obduracy, to pour into their minds the light and joy of heaven.

What then, we ask, would be the natural, the inevitable tendency of these all-powerful and intensively active principles, if fully and cordially received into the immortal mind? Quiescent they cannot be; and if they act at all, it must be in a centrifugal direction. They do not centre in the bosom of the recipient alone, but rather in the immense field of sin and suffering discovered on every side; these principles go forth, like the spirits of light, to seek out, and minister to the heirs of salvation. Most evidently then, the spirit of missions is the divine energy of the gospel.

Second; the missionary spirit is most intimately connected with, or rather is composed of those particular feelings, which are said to be the fruits of the spirit. For instance, love, patience, brotherly kindness, hope, peace, meekness, gentleness, &c. And to the cultivation and diffusion of these principles, the missionary consecrates his powers, and this is the way in which he becomes a worker together with God. It is the work of the spirit to convince of sin, and to lead the minds of men into all truth. To these efforts, also, the labors of missionaries are constantly devoted. Thus we see that the spirit of missions finds a correlate in that mighty power wherewith Christ will subdue all things to himself.

Third; the missionary spirit is most strongly entrenched behind the sacred Scriptures, so that it cannot be successfully attacked until a thousand declarations of the Bible are obliterated and forgotten.

The whole life of Christ, and of the apostle Paul, must ever stand as practical illustrations of what a missionary should be; and the very first essay to copy their exalted example would inevitably lead to a missionary life. The farewell commission given just before the heavens received him out of the sight of mortal eye, is a perpetual injunction from the Lord of glory, to foster and maintain the spirit of missions. Because no sooner does the believer ask, what shall I do in reference to souls? than he hears, breaking out of the cloud on Olivet, "Go ye—into all the world—preach the gospel—to every creature,"—four ideas of sufficient interest to move any thing but a man of marble.

Fourth; the organized existence of the church is such, as naturally, and almost necessarily to promote a missionary spirit. At any rate, its present organization would be needless, if we are to have no missionaries to send or support. There must be those to send as well as to go; and in the early ages of the church, particular churches supported foreign and domestic missionaries; and it would now be impossible for the great mass of Christians to do any thing whatever beyond the breath of prayer for the conversion of the heathen, if the missionary spirit were to be extinguished, and they no more be called upon to contribute for their support.

Fifth; we must before closing this article advert to the facts in the case. Let it be recollected that there are now near seven hundred foreign missionaries in the four quarters of the globe, and many of them have grown hoary headed in this work; they have had trials, disappointments, mockery, and death around them, but their hearts never quailed in the work. The novelty of the enterprise has passed away, but they are patiently at their labor of love, winning souls to Christ. A few instances of fickleness may have existed, and it would have been surprising not to have found them; still, it is a delightful and an undisputed fact, that the missionary spark first struck in their hearts has burned with a steadiness which shows that it is fed with inextinguishable material.

And the obvious conclusion is, that a genuine missionary spirit is deeply seated in the constituent parts of the Christian character.—N. Y. Bap. Rep.

MITCHELL, (JONATHAN,) minister of Cambridge, Massachusetts, was born in England, in 1624. He was brought to this country in 1635, by his parents, who sought a refuge from ecclesiastical tyranny in the wilderness. Mr. Mitchell was graduated at Harvard college in 1647, having made great acquisitions in knowledge and improvements in virtue. He was ordained at Cambridge, as the successor of Mr. Shepherd, August 21, 1650. Soon after his settlement president Dunstar embraced the principles of the Baptists. This was a peculiar trial to him; but, though he felt it to be his duty to combat the principles of his former tutor, he did it with such meekness of wisdom, as not to lose his friendship. In 1662, he was a member of the synod, which met in Boston to discuss and settle a question concerning church-membership and church discipline, and the result was chiefly written by him. The determination of the question relating to the baptism of the children of those who did not approach the Lord's table, and the support thus given to what is called the half-way covenant, was more owing to him than to any other man. (See HALF-WAY COVENANT.) Time has shown that the views which this good man labored so hard to establish on this point, cannot be sustained without ruining the purity of the churches. What an instructive lesson!—Mr. Mitchell was eminent for piety, wisdom, humility, and love. He died in the hope of glory, July 9, 1668, aged forty-three. He published several Letters and Sermons. His Life, by C. Mather; Magnalia, iii. 158—165; His. Soc. vii. 23, 27, 47—52.—Allen.

MITE; a small piece of money, in value a quarter of a Roman penny, or denarius; in English money about seven farthings; in our currency, four cents. See Luke 12: 59. 21: 2.—Calmet.

MITRE; a sacerdotal ornament, worn on the head by the ancient Jewish high-priest, and in modern times by bishops and certain abbots, on solemn occasions, being a sort of turban, or cap, pointed and cleft at the top. His holiness the pope uses four different mitres, which are more or less richly adorned, according to the nature of the festivals on which they are assumed. The mitre is frequently met with in early Christian manuscripts, in illuminated missals, and upon the oldest ecclesiastical monuments. A statue of St. Peter, erected in the seventh century, bears this mark of distinction in the shape of a round, high, and pyramidal mitre, such as those which the popes have since worn, and offers, perhaps, one of the earliest instances of its usage in churches.—Hend. Buck.

MITYLENE; the capital of the island of Lesbos, through which Paul passed as he went from Corinth to Jerusalem, A. D. 58, Acts 20: 14.—Calmet.

MIZPAH, or MIZPEH; a city of the tribe of Benjamin, situated in a plain, about eighteen miles west of Jerusalem. Here Samuel dwelt, 1 Sam. 7. Here, also, Saul was anointed king, 1 Sam. 10: 17—25. 1 Kings 15: 22. There was another city of this name in Gilead, (Gen. 31: 49.) and a third in the land of Moab, 1 Sam. 22: 3. It is to be observed, that Mizpeh implies a beacon or watchtower, a pillar or heap of commemoration; and at all the places bearing this name, it is probable that a single pillar, or a rude pile, was erected as the witness and the record of some particular event. These, subsequently, became altars and places of convocation on public occasions, religious and civil.—Watson.

MIZRAIM; son of Ham, and father of Ludim, Ananin, Lehabim, Naphtuhim, Pathrusim, and Caslubim, Gen. 10: 6. He was father of the Mizraim, or Egyptians. Mizraim is also put for the country of Egypt: thus it has three significations, which are perpetually confounded and used promiscuously; sometimes denoting the land of Egypt, sometimes he who first peopled Egypt, and sometimes the inhabitants themselves. (See Egypt.)—Calmet.

M'LEAN, (ARCHIBALD,) an eminent Baptist writer, was born May 1, 1733, Old Style, at East Kilbride, a small village, about eight miles south of Glasgow. He was the third in descent from Brolus, eldest son of Duart, the chief of the clan of the M'Leans.

Mr. M'Lean's parents were members of the Presbyterian church of Scotland, and trained up their son in a veneration for that national establishment of religion. He was brought to a saving acquaintance with the truth as it is in Jesus, under the preaching of the excellent Maclaurin, a minister of the Established church; he consequently entered into the communion of that church, and continued several years a very zealous member of it. In 1746, he was articled as an apprentice to a printer in Glasgow, by whom he was highly prized and esteemed. This was an employment every way congenial to his disposition. The variety of works which were constantly passing through his hands, proved at the same time a source of amusement and information; and he soon made himself perfectly acquainted with every branch of the printing business. His leisure hours were devoted to the study of the languages in which the Scriptures were originally written; and to facilitate his acquaintance with them he constructed several grammars for his own use, some of which are still in the possession of the family. During the term of his apprenticeship, he also applied himself to a course of general reading, and to the particular study of some branches of science connected with theology, which laid the foundation of that extensive acquaintance with the Scriptures which he ultimately attained.

In 1765, Mr. M'Lean became a Baptist, and was baptized by Mr. Carmichael, in Edinburgh. In 1767, having gone to London, he continued there, at his printing business, till the month of December, when, having been applied to, to become overseer of the extensive printing concern of Messrs. Donaldson and Co. in Edinburgh, he acceded to the proposal, and, quitting the metropolis, settled there with his family. He superintended this great establishment eighteen years; a period of extraordinary exertion. In June, 1768, he was chosen colleague to Mr. Carmichael, and besides his pastoral labors, was rising to high distinction as an author.

About the year 1785, in consequence of the varied exertions of Mr. M'Lean, his health was much affected. The spread of the Baptist profession, in various parts of Scotland, and the discriminating principles of the churches formed upon the plan of those of the Scotch Baptists, having extended also to various parts of England, occasioned numerous applications, at this period, to him, not only for information, by letter, on points of difficulty that arose among them, but also for visits, to set societies in order, and ordain elders over them. As his engagements in Mr. Donaldson's printing office precluded the possibility of a compliance with the greater part of these applications, and as the church of Edinburgh was now respectable in point of number, they urged it upon him to give up his secular employ, and accept such a salary from them as their ability enabled them to raise him. He complied with that request; consented to accept a salary from the church, of sixty guineas per annum, at which sum it continued for several years; and though, when an extraordinary rise in all the necessities of life took place, it was gradually augmented, yet it never exceeded a hundred and twenty pounds, which was the sum he was in receipt of at the time of his decease.

The Baptist mission to India was an undertaking which, from 1795, engaged much of Mr. M'Lean's attention, and in furthering it he took a very lively interest. His zeal happily stimulated all classes of his countrymen to co-operate in promoting the interest of the Baptist mission to India. He died December 21, 1812, at the age of eighty, in the hope of that blessed gospel he had recommended so extensively to others.

As a minister, a Christian, and an author, he was alike distinguished. An opinion has, indeed, very generally prevailed among the dissenters throughout England, that Mr. M<sup>r</sup>Lean and those with whom he walked in church fellowship, differed from the Sandemanians in scarcely any thing but the subject of baptism: but this opinion is totally unfounded. A handsome edition of his valuable works was published, in seven volumes, octavo, London, 1823, with a Memoir of his Life, &c. by W. Jones. *Jones' Chris. MOABITES, the descendants of Moab, son of Lot, born A. M. 2108, whose habitation was east of Jordan, and adjacent to the Dead sea, on both sides the river Arnon, on which their capital city was situated. (See AR.) This country was originally possessed by a race of giants called EMIM, (Deut. 2: 11, 12,) whom the Moabites conquered. Afterwards, the Amorites took a part from the Moabites, (Judg. 11: 13,) but Moses reconquered it, and gave it to the tribe of Reuben. The Moabites were spared by Moses, as God had restricted him; (Deut. 2: 9.) but there always was a great antipathy between them and the Israelites, which occasioned many wars. Balaam seduced the Hebrews to idolatry and uncleanness, by means of the daughters of Moab, Num. 25: 1, 2. God ordained that this people should not enter into the congregation of his people, or be capable of office, &c. even to the tenth generation, (Deut. 23: 3.) because they had the inhumanity to refuse the Israelites a passage through their country, nor would supply them with bread and water in their necessity, Judg. 3: 12. 2 Kings 3: 4, 5, 16. Amos 1: 13. 2 Chron. 26: 7, 8. 27: 5. Jer. 9: 26. 12: 14, 15. 25: 11, 12. 48: 47. 49: 3, 6, 39. 50: 16.

The principal deities of the Moabites were Chemosh and Baal-peor. Scripture speaks of Nebo, of Baal-meon, and of Baal-dibon, as gods of the Moabites; but it is likely these are rather names of places where Chemosh and Peor were worshipped: and that Baal-dibon, Baal-meon, and Nebo, are no other than Chemosh adored at Dibon, or at Meon, or on mount Nebo.

The land of Moab lay to the east and south-east of Judea, and bordered on the east, north-east, and partly on the south of the Dead sea. Its early history is nearly analogous to that of Ammon; (see AMMON;) and the soil, though perhaps more diversified, is, in many places where the desert and plains of salt have not encroached on its borders, of equal fertility. Wherever any spot is cultivated the corn is luxuriant; and the riches of the soil cannot perhaps be more clearly illustrated than by the fact, that one grain of Heshbon wheat exceeds in dimensions two of the ordinary sort, and more than double the number of grains grow on the stalk.

The prophecies concerning Moab are numerous and remarkable. There are, says Keith, abundant predictions which refer so clearly to its modern state, that there is scarcely a single feature peculiar to the land of Moab, as it now exists, which was not marked by the prophets in their delineation of the low condition to which, from the height of its wickedness and haughtiness, it was finally to be brought down.

The whole country abounds with ruins; and Burckhardt, who encountered many difficulties in so desolate and dangerous a land, thus records the brief history of a few of them: "The ruins of Eleale, Heshbon, Meon, Medaba, Dibon, Aroer, still subsist to illustrate the history of the sons of Israel." And it might with equal truth have been added, that they still subsist to confirm the inspiration of the Jewish Scriptures, or to prove that the seers of Israel were the prophets of God; for the desolation of each of these very cities was the theme of a prediction. Every thing worthy of observation respecting them has been detailed, not only in Burckhardt's "Travels in Syria," but also by Seetzen, and, more recently, by captains Irby and Mangles, who, along with Mr. Bankes and Mr. Leigh, visited this deserted district.

Mount Nebo was completely barren when Burckhardt passed over it, and the site of the ancient city had not been ascertained. "Nebo is spoiled." None of the ancient cities of Moab now remain as tenanted by men. Kerek, which neither bears any resemblance in name to any of the cities of Moab which are mentioned as existing in the time of the Israelites, nor possesses any monuments which denote a very remote antiquity, is the only nominal town in the whole country, and, in the words of Seetzen, who visited it, "in its present ruined state it can only be called a hamlet; and the houses have only one floor."

But the most populous and fertile province in Europe, especially any situated in the interior of a country like Moab, is not covered so thickly with towns as Moab is plentiful in ruins, deserted and desolate though now it be. Burckhardt enumerates about fifty ruined sites within its boundaries, many of them extensive. In general they are a broken down and undistinguishable mass of ruins; and many of them have not been closely inspected. But, in some instances, there are the remains of temples, sepulchral monuments; the ruins of edifices constructed of very large stones, in one of which buildings some of the stones are twenty feet in length, and so broad that one constitutes the thickness of the wall; traces of hanging gardens; entire columns lying on the ground, three feet in diameter, and fragments of smaller columns; and many cisterns cut of the rock. When the towns of Moab existed in their prime, and were at ease; when arrogance, and haughtiness, and pride prevailed amongst them; the desolation, and total desertion and abandonment of them all, must have utterly surpassed all human conception. "They shall cry of Moab, How is it broken down!"

The strong contrast between the ancient and the actual state of Moab is exemplified in the condition of the inhabitants as well as of the land; and the coincidence between the prediction and the fact is as striking in the one case as in the other. "The days come, saith the Lord, that I will send unto him (Moab) wanderers that shall cause him to wander, and shall empty his vessels." The Bedouin (wandering) Arabs are now the chief and almost the only inhabitants of a country once studded with cities. They prevent any from forming a fixed settlement who are inclined to attempt it; for although the fruitfulness of the soil would abundantly repay the labor of settlers, and render migration wholly unnecessary, even if the population were increased more than tenfold; yet the Bedouins forcibly deprive them of the means of subsistence, compel them to search for it elsewhere, and, in the words of the prediction, literally "cause them to wander." "It may be remarked generally of the Bedouins," says Burckhardt, in describing their extortions in this very country, "that wherever they are the masters of the cultivators, the latter are soon reduced to beggary by their unceasing demands."

"O ye that dwell in Moab, leave the cities and dwell in the rock, and be like the dove that maketh her nest in the sides of the hole's mouth." In a general description of the condition of the inhabitants of that extensive desert which now occupies the place of these ancient flourishing states, Volney, in plain but unmeant illustration of this prediction, remarks, that the "wretched peasants live in perpetual dread of losing the fruit of their labors; and no sooner have they gathered in their harvest, than they hasten to secrete it in private places, and retire among the rocks which border on the Dead sea."

But whether flocks lie down in the city without any to make them afraid, or whether men are to be found dwelling in the rocks, and are "like the dove that maketh her nest in the sides of the hole's mouth," the wonderful transition, in either case, and the close accordance, in both, of the fact to the prediction, assuredly mark it in characters that may be visible to the purblind mind, as the word of that God before whom the darkness of futurity is as light, and without whom a sparrow cannot fall into the ground. Keith on the Evidence of Prophecy.—Calmet; Watson.

MODALISTS; those who resolve the distinction between the persons of the Trinity merely into the manner of their subsistence, as Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. (See NOETIANS; and SABELLIANS).—Williams.

MODERATE; to moderate a call, in the church of Scotland, is, under the presidency of one of the clergy, to publicly announce and give in an invitation to a minister or licentiate to take the charge of a parish; which announcement or invitation, thus given in the hearing of the assembled parishioners, is regarded as the first legal step towards a settlement.—Hend. Buck.

MODERATION; the state of keeping a due medium between extremes; calunness, temperance, or equanimity. It is sometimes used with reference to our opinions, (Rom. 12: 3.) but in general it respects our conduct in that state which comes under the description of ease or prosperity; and ought to take place in our wishes, pursuits, expectations, pleasures, and passions. See Bishop Hall on Moderation, ser. 16; D Blair's Sermons, vol. iii. ser. 12; Toplady's Works, vol. iii. ser. 10.—Hend. Buck.

MODERATOR; a clergyman presiding in the general assembly of the church of Scotland, or in any of the subordinate courts of that church; and likewise the person acting as chairman or president of any church court, or voluntary association.—Hend. Buck.

MODERN QUESTION, (THE). So is called the Question—"Whether it be the duty of all, to whom the gospel is preached, to repent and believe in Christ?" and it is called Modern, because it is supposed never to have been agitated before the early part of the last century.

The following is an abstract of Dr. Ryland's History of this controversy, which he considers to have originated in Northamptonshire, in the churches in which Mr. Davis, of Rothwell, preached; though it does not appear that he took an active part in it. Mr. Maurice, his successor, even strenuously opposed the negative side of the question, which had been maintained by some of Mr. Davis' admirers, particularly by Mr. Lewis Weyman, of Kimbolton; to whom Mr. Maurice wrote a reply, which, on Mr. Maurice dying before it was completed, was published by the celebrated Mr. Bradbury. This was between 1737 and 1739. Mr. Guteridge, of Oundle, took also the affirmative side; and, in 1743, Mr. Brine the negative; as did also the learned Dr. Gill, though he did not write expressly on the subject.

The question, thus started, was pursued by a variety of inferior writers down to the time of Andrew Fuller, who very ably supported the positive side of the question; namely, that faith is the duty of all men, although, through the depravity of human nature, men will not believe, till regenerated by the Holy Spirit. On the other side it was contended, "that faith was not a duty, but a grace;" the exercise of which was not required till it was bestowed. It is both. On this subject, Mr. Fuller published "The Gospel worthy of all acceptance; or the Duty of all Men to believe in Jesus Christ." "The leading design of this performance (says Mr. Morris) is to prove that men are under indispensable obligations to believe whatever God says, and to do whatever he commands; and a Savior being revealed in the gospel, the law in effect requires those to whom he is made known to believe in him, seeing it insists upon obedience to the whole will of God; that the inability of man to comply with the divine requirements is wholly of a moral nature, and consists in the prevalence of an evil disposition, which, being voluntary, is in the highest degree criminal."

On this subject, Mr. Fuller was attacked by Mr. Button, a supralapsarian, on the one hand; and by Mr. Daniel Taylor, an Arminian, on the other; to whom he replied, by "A Defence" of his former tract. There the question seems to rest; and it appears hardly possible in the present state of things, to throw farther light upon the subject.

The late Mr. Robinson shrewdly remarks, that those ministers who will not use applications, lest they should rob the Holy Spirit of the honor of applying the word, should, for the same reason, not use explanations, lest they should deprive him of the honor of illustrating it. Dr. Ryland's Life of Fuller, pp. 6—11; Morris' do., ch. viii.;

MODESTY, is sometimes used to denote humility, and sometimes to express chastity. The Greek word kosmos, signifies neat or well arranged. It suggests the idea of simple elegance. Modesty, therefore, consists in purity of sentiment and manners, inclining us to abhor the least appearance of vice and indecency, and to fear doing any thing which will justly incur censure. An excess of modesty is called bashfulness, and the want of it impertinence, or impudence.

There is a false or vicious modesty, which influences a man to do any thing that is ill or indiscreet; such as, through fear of offending his companions, he runs into their follies or excesses; or it is a false modesty which restrains a man from doing what is good or laudable; such as being ashamed to speak of religion, and to be seen in the exercises of piety and devotion.—Hend. Buck.

MOHAMMED, or MAHOMET, the founder of Islamism, was born in the reign of Anushirwan the Just emperor of Persia, about the end of the sixth century of the Christian era. He came into the world under some disadvantages. His father, Abd'allah, was a younger son of Abd'almotaleb, and dying very young, and in his father's lifetime, left his widow and infant son in mean circumstances, his whole subsistence consisting but of five camels and one Ethiopian female slave. Abd'almotaleb was therefore obliged to take care of his grandchild Mohammed; which he not only did during his life, but at his death enjoined his eldest son, Abu Taleb, who was brother to Abd'allah by the same mother, to provide for him for the future; which he very affectionately did, and instructed him in the business of a merchant, which he followed; and to that end he took him into Syria, when he was but thirteen. He afterwards recommended him to Khadijah, a noble and rich widow, for her factor; in whose service he behaved himself so well, that by making him her husband, she soon raised him to an equality with the richest in Mecca.

It was after he began by this advantageous match to live at his ease, that he formed the scheme of establishing a new religion, or, as he expressed it, of replanting the only true and ancient one professed by Adam, Noah, Abraham, Moses, Jesus, and all the prophets, by destroying the gross idolatry into which the generality of his countrymen had fallen, and weeding out the corruptions and superstitions which the latter Jews and Christians had, as he thought, introduced into their religion, and reducing it to its original purity, which consisted chiefly in the worship of one God.

Before he made any attempt abroad, he rightly judged that it was necessary for him to begin with the conversion of his own household. Having, therefore, retired with his family, as he had done several times before, to a cave in mount Hara, he there opened the secret of his mission to his wife Khadijah; and acquainted her, that the angel Gabriel had just before appeared to him, and told him that he was appointed the apostle of God: he also repeated to her a passage which he pretended had been revealed to him by the ministry of the angel, with those other circumstances of this first appearance which are related by the Mohammedan writers. Khadijah received the news with great joy, swearing by Him in whose hands her soul was, that she trusted he would be the prophet of his nation; and immediately communicated what she had heard to her cousin Warakah Ebn Nawfal, who, being a Christian, could write in the Hebrew character, and was tolerably well versed in the Scriptures; and he readily came into her opinion, assuring her that the same angel who had formerly appeared unto Moses, was now sent to Mohammed. The first overture the prophet made, was in the month of Ramadan, in the fortieth year of his age, which is therefore usually called the year of his mission.

Encouraged by so good a beginning, he resolved to proceed, and try for some time what he could do by private persuasion, not daring to hazard the whole affair by exposing it too suddenly to the public. He soon made proselytes of those under his own roof, viz.: his wife Khadijah, his servant Zeid Ebn Harethia, to whom he gave his freedom on that occasion, (which afterwards became a rule to his followers,) and his cousin and pupil Ali, the son of Abu Taleb, though then very young; but this last, making no account of the other two, used to style himself the first of believers. The next person Mohammed applied to was Abd'allah Ebn Abi Kohafa, surnamed Abu Beer, a man of great authority among the Koreish, and one whose interest he well knew would be of great service to him, as it soon appeared; for Abu Beer, being gained over, prevailed also on Othman Ebn Affan, Abd'alrahman Ebn Awf, Saad Ebn Abbi Wakkus, Al Zoheir, Al Awami, and Telha Ebn Obeid'allah, all principal men of Mecca, to follow his example. These men were six chief companions, who, with a few more, were converted in the space of three years: at the end of which, Mohammed having, as he hoped, a sufficient interest to support him, made his mission no longer a secret, but gave out that God had commanded him to admonish his near relations; and in order to do it with more convenience and prospect of success, he directed Ali to prepare an entertainment, and invited the sons and descendants of Abd'almoatalleb, intending then to open his mind to them. This was done, and about forty of them came; but Abu Laheb, one of his uncles, making the company break up before Mohammed had an opportunity of speaking, obliged him to give them a second invitation the next day; and when they were come, he made them the following speech:—"I know no man in all Arabia who can offer his kindred a more excellent thing than I now do to you; I offer you happiness both in this life and in that which is to come: God Almighty hath commanded me to call you unto him. Who, therefore, among you will be assistant to me herein, and become my brother and my vicegerent?" All of them hesitating and declining the matter, Ali at length rose up, and declared that he would be his assistant, and vehemently threatened those who should oppose him. Mohammed upon this embraced Ali with great demonstrations of affection, and desired all who were present to hearken to and obey him as his deputy; at which the company broke out into a great laughter, telling Abu Taleb that he must now pay obedience to his son.

This repulse, however, was so far from discouraging Mohammed, that he began to preach in public to the people, who heard him with some patience, till he came to upbraid them with the idolatry, obstinacy, and perverseness of themselves and their fathers; which so highly provoked them, that they declared themselves his enemies; and would soon have procured his ruin, had he not been protected by Abu Taleb. The chief of the Koreish warmly solicited this person to desert his nephew, making frequent remonstrances against the innovations he was attempting; which proving ineffectual, they at length threatened him with an open rupture if he did not prevail on Mohammed to desist. At this Abu Taleb was so far moved, that he earnestly dissuaded his nephew from pursuing the affair any further, representing the great danger that he and his friends must otherwise run. But Mohammed was not to be intimidated, telling his uncle plainly, "that if they set the sun against him on his right hand, and the moon on his left, he would not leave his enterprise;" and Abu Taleb, seeing him so firmly resolved to proceed, used no further arguments, but promised to stand by him against all his enemies.

The Koreish, finding they could prevail neither by fair words nor menaces, tried what they could do by force and ill treatment; using Mohammed's followers so very inju-riously, that it was not safe for them to continue at Mecca any longer; whereupon Mohammed gave leave to such of them as had no friends to protect them, to seek for refuge elsewhere. And accordingly, in the fifth year of the prophet's mission, sixteen of them, four of whom were women, fled into Ethiopia; and among them, Othman Ebn Affan, and his wife Rakiyah, Mohammed's daughter. This was the first flight, but afterwards several others followed them, retiring, one after another, to the number of eighty-three men and eighteen women, besides children. These refugees were kindly received by the Nagush, or king of Ethiopia, who refused to deliver them up to those whom the Koreish sent to demand them, and, as the Arab writers unanimously attest, even professed the Mohammedan religion.

In the sixth year of his mission, Mohammed had the pleasure of seeing his party strengthened by the conversion of his uncle Hamza, a man of great valor and merit; and of Omar Ebn al Kattab, a person highly esteemed, and once a violent opposer of the prophet. As persecution generally advances rather than obstructs the spreading of a religion, Islamism made so great a progress among the Arab tribes, that the Koreish, to suppress it effectually, if possible, in the seventh year of Mohammed's mission, made a solemn league or covenant against the Hashemites, and the family of Abd'almoatalleb, engaging themselves to contract no marriages with any of them, and to have no communication with them; and to give it the greater sanction, reduced it into writing, and laid it up in the Kaaba. Upon this the tribe became divided into two factions; and the family of Hassem all repaired to Abu Taleb as their head; except only Abd'al Uzza, surnamed Abu Laheb, who, out of inveterate hatred to his nephew and his doctrine, went over to the opposite party, whose chief was Abu Sossian Ebn Harb, of the family of Ommeyya.

The families continued thus at variance for three years; but in the tenth year of his mission Mohammed told his uncle Abu Taleb, that God had manifestly showed his disapprobation of the league which the Koreish had made against them, by sending a worm to eat out every word of the instrument except the name of God. Of this accident Mohammed had probably some private notice; for Abu Taleb went immediately to the Koreish, and acquainted them with it; offering, if it proved false, to deliver his nephew up to them; but, in case it were true, he insisted that they ought to lay aside their animosity, and annul the league they had made against the Hashemites. To this they acquiesced; and, going to inspect the writing, to their great astonishment found it to be as Abu Taleb had said; and the league was thereupon declared void.

In the twelfth year of his mission it was that Mohammed gave out that he had made his night journey from Mecca to Jerusalem, and thence to heaven, so much spoken of by all that write of him. Dr. Prideaux thinks he invented it either to answer the expectations of those who demanded some miracle as a proof of his mission; or else, by pretending to have conversed with God, to establish the authority of whatever he should think fit to leave behind by way of oral tradition, and make his sayings to serve the same purpose as the oral laws of the Jews. But it does not appear that Mohammed himself ever expected so great a regard should be paid to his sayings as his followers have since done; and, seeing he all along disclaimed any power of performing miracles, it seems rather to have been a fetch of policy to raise his reputation, by pretending to have actually conversed with God in heaven, as Moses had heretofore done in the mount, and to have received several institutions immediately from him; whereas, before, he contented himself with persuading them that he had all by the ministry of Gabriel.

However, this story seemed so absurd and incredible, that several of his followers left him upon it; and had probably ruined the whole design, had not Abu Beer vouched for his veracity, and declared, that if Mohammed affirmed it to be true, he verily believed the whole; which happy incident not only retrieved the prophet's credit, but increased it to such a degree, that he was secure of being able to make his disciples swallow whatever he pleased to impose on them for the future. And this fiction, notwithstanding its extravagance, was one of the most artful contrivances Mohammed ever put in practice, and what chiefly contributed to the raising of his reputation to that great height to which it afterwards arrived.

The next year, being the thirteenth of Mohammed's mission, Masab returned to Mecca, accompanied by seventy-three men, and two women of Medina, who had professed Islamism, besides some others who were as yet unbelievers. On their arrival they immediately sent to Mohammed, and offered him their assistance, of which he was now in great need; for his adversaries were by this time grown so powerful in Mecca, that he could not stay there much longer without imminent danger. Wherefore he accepted their proposal, and met them one night, by appointment, at Al Akaba, north of the city, attended by his uncle, Al Abbas; who, though he was not then a believer, wished his nephew well, and made a speech to those of Medina, wherein he told them, that, as Mohammed was obliged to quit his native city, and seek an asylum elsewhere, and they had offered him their protection, they would do well not to deceive him; that if they were not firmly resolved to defend, and not betray him, they had better declare their minds, and let him provide for his safety in some other manner. Upon their protesting their sincerity, Mohammed swore to be faithful to them, on condition that they should protect him against all insults as heartily as they would their own wives and families. They then asked him what recompense they were to expect if they should happen to be killed in his quarrel; he answered, Paradise. Whereupon they pledged their faith to him, and so returned home, after Mohammed had chosen twelve out of their number, who were to have the same authority among them as the twelve apostles of Christ had among his disciples.

Hitherto Mohammed had propagated his religion by fair means; so that the whole success of his enterprise, before his flight to Medina, must be attributed to persuasion only, and not to compulsion. For before the above oath of fealty or inauguration at Al Akaba, he had no permission to use any force at all; and in several places of the Koran, which he pretended were revealed during his stay at Mecca, he declares his business was only to preach and admonish; that he had no authority to compel any person to embrace his religion; and that, whether people believe or not, was none of his concern, but belonged solely unto God. And he was so far from allowing his followers to use force, that he exhorted them to bear patiently those injuries which were offered them on account of their faith; and, when persecuted himself, chose rather to quit the place of his birth, and retire to Medina, than experience, that his designs would otherwise proceed very slowly, if they were not utterly overthrown; and knowing, on the other hand, that innovators, when they depend solely on their own strength, and can compel, seldom run any risk; from whence, says Machiavel, it follows, that all the armed prophets have succeeded, and the unarmed ones have failed. Moses, Cyrus, Theseus, and Romulus, would not have been able to establish the observance of their institutions for any length of time had they not been armed. The first passage of the Koran which gave Mohammed the permission of defending himself by arms, is said to have been that in the twenty-second chapter; after which a great number to the same purpose were revealed. The flight to Medina begins the Mohammedan era.

Mohammed, being securely settled at Medina, and able not only to defend himself against the insults of his enemies, but to attack them, began to send out small parties to make reprisals on the Koreish; the first party consisting of no more than nine men, who intercepted and plundered a caravan belonging to that tribe, and in the action took two prisoners. But what established his affairs very much, and was the foundation on which he built all his succeeding greatness, was the gaining of the battle of Bedr, which was fought in the second year of the Hegira, and is so famous in the Mohammedan history. Some reckon no less than twenty-seven expeditions, wherein Mohammed was personally present, in nine of which he gave battle, besides several other expeditions in which he was not present. His forces he maintained partly by the contributions of his followers for this purpose, which he called by the name of zecat, or alms, and the paying of which he very artfully made one main article of his religion; and partly by ordering a fifth part of the plunder to be brought into the public treasury for that purpose, in which matter, he likewise pretended to act by the divine direction.

In the seventh year of the Hegira, Mohammed began to think of propagating his religion beyond the bounds of Arabia, and sent messengers to the neighboring princes, with letters to invite them to Mohammedanism. Nor was this project without some success.

The eighth year of the Hegira was a very fortunate year to Mohammed. In the beginning of it, Khaled Ebn al Walid and Amru Ebn al As, both excellent soldiers, the first of whom afterwards conquered Syria and other countries, and the latter Egypt, became proselytes to Mohammedanism. And soon after, the prophet sent three thousand men against the Grecian forces, to revenge the death of one of his ambassadors, who, being sent to the governor of Bosra, on the same errand as those who went to the above-mentioned princes, was slain by an Arab of the tribe of Ghassan, at Muta, a town in the territory of Balka, in Syria, about three days' journey eastward from Jerusalem, near which town they encountered. The Grecians being vastly superior in number, (for, including the auxiliary Arabs, they had an army of one hundred thousand men,) the Mohammedans were repulsed in the first attack, and lost successively three of their generals, viz. Zeid Ebn Haretha, Mohammed's freedman; Jaasar, the son of Ahu Taleb; and Abdallah Ebn Rawahia; but Khaled Ebn al Walid, succeeding to the command, overthrew to make any resistance. But this great passiveness and moderation seem entirely owing to his want of power, and the great superiority of his opposers, for the first twelve years of his mission; for no sooner was he enabled, by the assistance of those of Medina, to make head against his enemies, than he gave out that God had allowed him and his followers to defend themselves against the infidels; and at length, as his forces increased, he pretended to have the divine leave even to attack them, and destroy idolatry, and set up the true faith by the sword; finding, by the Greeks with great slaughter, and brought away abundance of rich spoil; on occasion of which action Mohammed gave him the title of Seif min sayf Allah—"One of the swords of God."

In this year also, Mohammed took the city of Mecca, the inhabitants whereof had broken the truce concluded two years before.

The remainder of this year Mohammed employed in destroying the idols in and around Mecca, sending several of the generals on expeditions for that purpose, and to invite the Arabs to Islamism; wherein it is no wonder if they now met with success.

The next year, being the ninth of the Hegira, the Mohammedans call the year of embassies; for the Arabs had been hitherto awaiting the issue of the war between Mohammed and the Koreish; but as soon as that tribe, the principal of the whole nation, and the genuine descendants of Ishmael, whose prerogatives none offered to dispute, had submitted, they were satisfied that it was not in their power to oppose Mohammed; and, therefore, began to come in to him in great numbers, and to send embassies to make their submissions to him, both to Mecca, while he stayed there, and also to Medina, whither he returned this year. Among the rest, five kings of the tribe of Hamyer professed Mohammedanism, and sent ambassadors to notify the same.

In the tenth year, Ali was sent into Yemen to propagate the Mohammedan faith there; and, as it is said, converted the whole tribe of Hamdan in one day. Their example was quickly followed by all the inhabitants of that province, except only those of Najran, who, being Christians, chose rather to pay tribute.

Thus was Mohammedanism established, and idolatry rooted out, even in Mohammed's lifetime, (for he died the next year,) throughout all Arabia, except only Yamana, where Moseilama, who set up also as a prophet as Mohammed's competitor, had a great party, and was not reduced till the caliphate of Abu Beer; and the Arabs being then united in one faith, and under one prince, found themselves in a condition for making those conquests which extended the Mohammedan faith over so great a part of the world. (See ARABIA; and MOHAMMEDANISM.)

—Hend. Buck.

MOHAMMEDANISM; the system of religion founded and propagated by Mohammed, and still adhered to by his followers. It is professed by the Turks and Persians, and by several nations in Africa and Eastern Asia. It is divided by its adherents into two general parts: faith and practice.

I. RELIGIOUS BELIEF.

1. That they believe both Mohammed, and those among his followers who are reckoned orthodox, had, and continue to have, just and true notions of God and his attributes, appears so plain from the Koran itself, and all the Mohammedan divines, that it would be loss of time to refute those who suppose the God of Mohammed to be different from the true God, and only a fictitious deity or idol of his own creation.

2. The existence of angels and their purity, are absolutely required to be believed in the Koran; and he is reckoned an infidel who denies there are such beings, or hates any of them, or asserts any distinction of sexes among them. They believe them to have pure and subtle bodies, created of fire; that they neither eat nor drink, nor propagate their species; that they have various forms and offices, some adoring God in different postures, others singing praises to him, or interceding for mankind. They hold, that some of them are employed in writing down the actions of men; others in carrying the throne of God, and other services.

3. As to the Scriptures, the Mohammedans are taught by the Koran, that God, in divers ages of the world, gave revelations of his will in writing to several prophets, the whole and every one of which it is absolutely necessary for a good Moslem to believe. The number of these sacred books were, according to them, one hundred and four; of which ten were given to Adam, fifty to Seth, thirty to Edris or Enoch, ten to Abraham; and the other four, being the Pentateuch, the Psalms, the Gospel, and the Koran, were successively delivered to Moses, David,

Jesus, and Mohammed, which last being the seal of the prophets, those revelations are now closed, and no more are to be expected. All these divine books, except the four last, they agree to be now entirely lost, and their contents unknown; though the Sabians have several books which they attribute to some of the antediluvian prophets. And of those four, the Pentateuch, Psalms, and Gospel, they say, have undergone so many alterations and corruptions, that, though there may possibly be some part of the true word of God therein, yet no credit is to be given to the present copies in the hands of the Jews and Christians.

4. The number of the prophets, who have been from time to time sent by God into the world, amounts to no less than two hundred and twenty-four thousand, according to one Mohammedan tradition; or to one hundred and twenty-four thousand, according to another; among whom three hundred and thirteen were apostles, sent with special commissions to reclaim mankind from infidelity and superstition; and six of them brought new laws or dispensations, which successively abrogated the preceding: these were Adam, Noah, Abraham, Moses, Jesus, and Mohammed. All the prophets in general, the Mohammedans believed to have been free from great sins and errors of consequence, and professors of one and the same religion, that is, Islamism, notwithstanding the different laws and institutions which they observed. They allow of degrees among them, and hold some of them to be more excellent and honorable than others. The first place they give to the revealers and establishers of new dispensations, and the next to the apostles.

In this great number of prophets they not only reckon divers patriarchs and persons named in Scripture, but not recorded to have been prophets, (wherein the Jewish and Christian writers have sometimes led the way,) as Adam, Seth, Lot, Ishmael, Nun, Joshua, &c., and introduced some of them under different names, as Enoch, Heber, and Jethro, who are called, in the Koran, Edris, Hud, and Shoab; but several others whose very names do not appear in Scripture, (though they endeavor to find some persons there to fix them on,) as Saleh, Khedr, Dhu'lkef, &c.

5. The belief of a general resurrection and a future judgment.

The time of the resurrection the Mohammedans allow to be a perfect secret to all but God alone; the angel Gabriel himself acknowledging his ignorance in this point, when Mohammed asked him about it. However, they say, the approach of that day may be known from certain signs which are to precede it.

After examination is past, (the account of which is too long and tedious for this place,) and every one's works weighed in a just balance, they say that mutual retaliation will follow, according to which every creature will take vengeance of another, or have satisfaction made them for the injuries which they have suffered. And, since there will then be no other way of returning like for like, the manner of giving this satisfaction will be by taking away a proportional part of the good works of him who offered the injury, and adding it to those of him who suffered it. Which being done, if the angels (by whose ministry this is to be performed) say, "Lord, we have given to every one his due, and there remaineth of this person's good works so much as equalleth the weight of an ant," God will, of his mercy, cause it to be doubled unto him, that he may be admitted into Paradise; but if, on the contrary, his good works be exhausted, and there remain evil works only, and there be any who have not yet received satisfaction from him, God will order that an equal weight of their sins be added unto his, that he may be punished for them in their stead, and he will be sent to hell laden with both. This will be the method of God's dealing with mankind. As to brutes, after they shall have likewise taken vengeance of one another, he will command them to be changed into dust; wicked men being reserved to more grievous punishment, so that they shall cry out, on hearing this sentence passed on the brutes, "Would to God that we were dust also!" As to the genii, many Mohammedans are of opinion that such of them as are true believers, will undergo the same fate as the irrational animals, and have no other reward than the favor of being converted into dust; and for this they quote the authority of their prophet.

The trials being over, and the assembly dissolved, the Mohammedans hold, that those who are to be admitted into Paradise will take the right hand way, and those who are destined for hell-fire will take the left; but both of them must first pass the bridge called in Arabic Al Sirat, which they say is laid over the midst of hell, and describe to be finer than a hair, and sharper than the edge of a sword; so that it seems very difficult to conceive how any one shall be able to stand upon it: for which reason most of the sect of the Motazalites reject it as a fable; though the orthodox think it a sufficient proof of the truth of this article, that it was seriously affirmed by him who never asserted a falsehood, meaning their prophet; who, to add to the difficulty of the passage, has likewise declared, that this bridge is beset on each side with briars and hooked thorns, which will, however, be no impediment to the good; for they shall pass with wonderful ease and swiftness, like lightning, or the wind, Mohammed and his Moslems leading the way; whereas the wicked, what with the slipperiness and extreme narrowness of the path, the entangling of the thorns, and the extinction of the light which directed the former to Paradise, will soon miss their footing, and fall down headlong into hell, which is gaping beneath them.

As to the punishment of the wicked, the Mohammedans are taught, that hell is divided into seven stories or apartments, one below another, designed for the reception of as many distinct classes of the damned. The first, which they call Jehennam, they say will be the receptacle of those who acknowledged one God, that is, the wicked Mohammedans; who, after having been punished according to their demerits, will at length be released; the second, named Ladha, they assign to the Jews; the third, named al Hotama, to the Christians; the fourth, named al Sair, to the Sabians; the fifth, named Sakar, to the Magians; the sixth, named al Jahin, to the idolaters; and the seventh, which is the lowest and worst of all, and is called al Hawyat, to the hypocrites, or those who outwardly professed some religion, but in their hearts were of none. Over each of these apartments they believe there will be set a guard of angels, nineteen in number; to whom the damned will confess the just judgment of God, and beg them to intercede with him for some alleviation of their pain, or that they may be delivered by being annihilated.

Mohammed has, in his Koran and traditions, been very exact in describing the various torments of hell, which, according to him, the wicked will suffer both from intense heat and excessive cold. We shall, however, enter into no detail of them here; but only observe, that the degrees of these pains will also vary in proportion to the crimes of the sufferer, and the apartment he is condemned to; and that he who is punished the most lightly of all will be shod with shoes of fire, the fervor of which will cause his skull to boil like a cauldron. The condition of these unhappy wretches, as the same prophet teaches, cannot be properly called either life or death; and their misery will be greatly increased by their despair of being ever delivered from that place, since, according to that frequent expression in the Koran, "they must remain therein forever." It must be remarked, however, that the infidels alone will be liable to eternity of damnation; for the Moslems, or those who have embraced the true religion, and have been guilty of heinous sins, will be delivered thence after they shall have expiated their crimes by their sufferings. The time which these believers shall be detained there, according to a tradition handed down from their prophet, will not be less than nine hundred years, nor more than seven thousand. And, as to the manner of their delivery, they say that they shall be distinguished by the marks of prostration on those parts of their bodies with which they used to touch the ground in prayer, and over which the fire will therefore have no power; and that, being known by this characteristic, they will be released by the mercy of God, at the intercession of Mohammed and the blessed: whereupon those who shall have been dead will be restored to life, as has been said; and those whose bodies shall have contracted any sootiness or filth from the flames and smoke of hell, will be immersed in one of the rivers of Paradise, called the river of life, which will wash them whiter than pearls.

The righteous, as the Mohammedans are taught to believe, having surmounted the difficulties, and passed the sharp bridge above mentioned, before they enter Paradise, will be refreshed by drinking at the pond of their prophet, who describes it to be an exact square, of a month's journey in compass; its water, which is supplied by two pipes from al Canthay, one of the rivers of Paradise, being whiter than milk or silver, and more odoriferous than musk, with as many cups set around it as there are stars in the firmament; of which water whoever drinks will thirst no more forever. This is the first taste which the blessed will have of their future, and now near approaching felicity.

Though Paradise be so very frequently mentioned in the Koran, yet it is a dispute among the Mohammedans, whether it be already created, or is to be created hereafter; the Motazalites and some other sectaries asserting, that there is not at present any such place in nature, and that the Paradise which the righteous will inhabit in the next life will be different from that from which Adam was expelled. However, the orthodox profess the contrary, maintaining that it was created even before the world, and describe it, from their prophet's traditions, in the following manner:—

They say it is situated above the seven heavens, (or in the seventh heaven,) and next under the throne of God; and to express the amenity of the place, tell us, that the earth of it is of the finest wheat flour, or of the purest musk, or, as others will have it, of saffron; that its stones are pearls and jacinths, the walls of its buildings enriched with gold and silver, and that the trunks of all its trees are of gold; among which the most remarkable is the tree called tuba, or the tree of happiness. Concerning this tree, they fable, that it stands in the palace of Mohammed, though a branch of it will reach to the house of every true believer; that it will be laden with pomegranates, grapes, dates, and other fruits, of surprising bigness, and of tastes unknown to mortals; so that if a man desire to eat of any particular kind of fruit, it will immediately be presented him; or if he choose flesh, birds ready dressed will be set before him, according to his wish. They add, that the boughs of this tree will spontaneously bend down to the hand of the person who would gather of its fruits, and that it will supply the blessed not only with food, but also with silken garments, and beasts to ride on ready saddled and bridled, and adorned with rich trappings, which will burst forth from its fruits; and that this tree is so large, that a person mounted on the fleetest horse would not be able to gallop from one end of its shade to the other in one hundred years.

As plenty of water is one of the greatest additions to the pleasantness of any place, the Koran often speaks of the rivers of Paradise as a principal ornament thereof; some of these rivers, they say, flow with water, some with milk, some with wine, and others with honey; all taking their rise from the root of the tree tuba.

But all these glories will be eclipsed by the resplendent and ravishing girls of Paradise, called, from their large black eyes, Hur al aynan, the enjoyment of whose company will be a principal felicity of the faithful. These, they say, are created not of clay, as mortal women are, but of pure musk; being, as their prophet often affirms in his Koran, free from all natural impurities, defects, and inconveniences incident to the sex; of the strictest modesty, and secluded from public view in pavilions of hollow pearls, so large, that, as some traditions have it, one of them will be no less than four parasangs (or, as others say, sixty miles) long, and as many broad.

The name which the Mohammedans usually give to this happy mansion is al Jannat, or "the Garden;" and sometimes they call it with an addition, Jannat al Ferdaws, "the Garden of Paradise;" Jannat Adan, "the Garden of Eden;" (though they generally interpret the word Eden not according to its acceptation in Hebrew, but according to its meaning in their own tongue, wherein it signifies "a settled or perpetual habitation.") Jannat al Mawa, "the Garden of Abode;" Jannat al Naim, "the Garden of Pleasure," and the like; by which several appellations some understand so many different gardens, or at least places of different degrees of felicity, (for they reckon no less than a hundred such in all,) the very meanest whereof will afford its inhabitants so many pleasures and delights, that one would conclude they must even sink under them, had not Mohammed declared that, in order to qualify the blessed for a full enjoyment of them, God will give to every one the abilities of one hundred men.

6. God's absolute decree and predestination both of good and evil. The orthodox doctrine is, that whatever hath or shall come to pass in this world, whether it be good or whether it be bad, proceedeth entirely from the divine will, and is irrevocably fixed and recorded from all eternity in the preserved table; God having secretly predetermined not only the adverse and prosperous fortune of every person in this world, in the most minute particulars, but also his faith or infidelity, his obedience or disobedience, and consequently his everlasting happiness or misery after death; which fate or predestination it is not possible by any foresight or wisdom to avoid.

II. RELIGIOUS PRACTICE.

1. The first point is prayer, under which are also comprehended those legal washings or purifications which are necessary preparations thereto.

For the regular performance of the duty of prayer among the Mohammedans, it is requisite, while they pray, to turn their faces towards the temple of Mecca; the quarter where the same is situated being, for that reason, pointed out within their mosques by a niche, which they call al Mehrah; and without by the situation of the doors opening into the galleries of the steeples; there are also tables calculated for the ready finding out their Keblah, or part towards which they ought to pray, in places where they have no other direction.

2. Alms are of two sorts, legal and voluntary. The legal alms are of indispensable obligation, being commanded by the law, which directs and determines both the portion which is to be given, and of what things it ought to consist; but the voluntary alms are left to every one's liberty, to give more or less, as he shall see fit. The former kind of alms some think to be properly called zacaat, and the latter sadakah, though this name be also frequently given to the legal alms. They are called zacaat, either because they increase a man's store by drawing down a blessing thereon, and produce in his soul the virtue of liberality; or because they purify the remaining part of one's substance from pollution, and the soul from the filth of avarice; and sadakah, because they are a proof of a man's sincerity in the worship of God. Some writers have called the legal alms tithes; but improperly, since in some cases they fall short, and in others exceed that proportion.

3. Fasting is a duty of so great moment, that Mohammed used to say it was "the gate of religion;" and that the "odor of the mouth of him who fasteth is more grateful to God than that of musk;" and Al Ghazali reckons fasting one-fourth part of the faith. According to the Mohammedan divines, there are three degrees of fasting. 1. The restraining of the belly and other parts of the body from satisfying their lusts.—2. The restraining the ears, eyes, tongue, hands, feet and other members, from sin.—3. The fasting of the heart from worldly cares, and restraining the thought from every thing besides God.

4. The pilgrimage to Mecca is so necessary a point of practice, that, according to a tradition of Mohammed, he who dies without performing it may as well die a Jew or a Christian; and the same is expressly commanded in the Koran. (See PILGRIMAGE.)

III. MOHAMMEDANISM, CAUSES OF THE SUCCESS OF.

The rapid success which attended the propagation of this new religion was owing to causes that are plain and evident, and must remove, or rather prevent our surprise, when they are attentively considered. The terror of Mohammed's arms, and the repeated victories which were gained by him and his successors, were, no doubt, the irresistible arguments that persuaded such multitudes to embrace his religion, and submit to his dominion. Besides, his law was artfully and marvellously adapted to the corrupt nature of man; and, in a most particular manner, to the customs and opinions of the Eastern nations, and the vices to which they were naturally addicted: for the articles of the faith which it proposed were few in number, and extremely simple; and the duties it required were neither many nor difficult, nor such as were incompatible with the empire of appetites and passions. It is to be observed further, that the gross ignorance under which the Arabians, Syrians, Persians, and the greatest part of the Eastern nations, labored at this time, rendered many an easy prey to the artifice and eloquence of this bold adventurer. To these causes of the progress of Mohammedanism we may add the bitter dissensions and cruel animosities that reigned among the Christian sects, particularly the Greeks, Nestorians, Eutyrians, and Monophysites; dissensions that filled a great part of the East with carnage, assassinations, and such detestable enormities, as rendered the very name of Christianity odious to many. We might add here, that the Monophysites and Nestorians, full of resentment against the Greeks, from whom they had suffered the bitterest and most injurious treatment, assisted the Arabians in the conquest of several provinces, into which, of consequence, the religion of Mohammed was afterwards introduced. Other causes of the sudden progress of that religion will naturally occur to such as consider attentively its spirit and genius, and the state of the world at this time.—For the two preceding articles see Prideaux's Life of Mahomet; *Mosheim's Eccl. MOLE. This word, in our version of Lev. 11: 30, answers to the word tenshemeth, which Bochart has shown to be the chameleon; but he conjectures, with great propriety, that choled, translated "weasel," in the preceding verse, is the true word for the mole. The present name of the mole in the East is khuld, which is undeniably the same word as the Hebrew choled. The import of the Hebrew word is, "to creep into," and the same Syriac word implies, "to creep underneath," to creep into by burrowing; which are well known characteristics of the mole. Harris; Abbott—Watson.

MOLINISTS; a sect in the Romish church who follow the doctrine and sentiments of the Jesuit Molina, relating to sufficient and efficacious grace. He taught that the operations of divine grace were entirely consistent with the freedom of the human will; and introduced a new kind of hypothesis to remove the difficulties attending the doctrines of predestination and liberty, and to reconcile the jarring opinions of Augustines, Thomists, Semi-Pelagians, and other contentious divines. He affirmed that the decree of predestination to eternal glory was founded upon a previous knowledge and consideration of the merits of the elect; that the grace, from whose operation these merits are derived, is not efficacious by its own intrinsic power only, but also by the consent of our own will, and because it is administered in those circumstances in which the Deity, by that branch of his knowledge which is called scientia media, foresees that it will be efficacious.

The kind of prescience, denominated in the schools scientia media, is that foreknowledge of future contingents that arises from an acquaintance with the nature and faculties of rational beings, of the circumstances in which they shall be placed, of the objects that shall be presented to them, and of the influence which their circumstances and objects must have on their actions.—Hend. Buck.

MOLINOS, (MICHAEL DE,) founder of the Quietists, (see QUIETISTS,) was a Spaniard, of a rich and honorable family. He entered into priest's orders young, but would accept no preferment in the church. He possessed great talents, and was ardently pious without any of the austerities of the Romish religious orders. He went to Rome, where, in 1675, he published his Spiritual Guide, which gave him universal reputation. The Jesuits and Dominicans, envious at his success, charged him with heresy, and at last succeeded in getting him condemned by the Inquisition. He died of torment in their dungeons, a few years after.—Fox, p. 204.

MOLLAH; a spiritual and judicial officer among the Turks, who has civil and criminal jurisdiction over towns, or whole districts, and is therefore a superior judge, under whom are the cadis, or inferior judges.—Head. Buck.

MOLLIUS, (JOHN), a distinguished Protestant martyr of the sixteenth century, was born at Rome, of reputable parents, and at twelve years of age placed in the monastery of Grey Friars, where he made such rapid progress in arts, sciences, and languages, that at eighteen he was permitted to take priest's orders. After pursuing his studies six years longer at Ferrara, he was made theological lecturer in the university of that city. He was subsequently appointed professor of theology in the university of Bononia. There, on reading several treatises of the reformers, he became at heart a zealous Protestant, and began to expound in its purity the epistle to the Romans. Immense crowds began to attend his lectures, and the report coming to Rome, he was seized by order of the pope, and being denied a public trial, gave an account of his opinions in writing, confirming them by scriptural authority. The pope for political reasons spared him at first, but after a while put him to death for his reformed faith. He was hung, and his body burnt to ashes, A. D. 1553.—Fox, p. 184.

MOLOCH, MOLCH, MELCOM, or MELCHOM, was a god of the Ammonites. The word Moloch signifies "king," and Melchom signifies "their king." Moses in several places forbids the Israelites, under the penalty of death, to dedicate their children to Moloch, by making them pass through the fire in honor of that god, Lev. 18: 21. 20: 2—5. God himself threatens to pour out his wrath against such offenders. There is great probability that the Hebrews were addicted to the worship of this inhuman deity, before their coming out of Egypt, Amos 5: 26. Acts 7: 43. 1 Kings 11: 7. 2 Kings 21: 3—6. (See CHUN.)

Some are of opinion that they contented themselves with making their children leap over a fire sacred to Moloch, by which they consecrated them to some false deity; and by this lustration purified them; this being an usual ceremony among the heathens on other occasions. Some believe that they made them pass through two fires opposite to each other, for the same purpose. But the word translated "to cause to pass through," and the phrase "to cause to pass through the fire," are used in respect to human sacrifices in Deut. 12: 31. 18: 10. 2 Kings 16: 3. 21: 6. 2 Chron. 28: 3. 33: 6. They are synonymous with burn, and to immolate, with which they are interchanged, as may be seen by an examination of Jer. 7: 31. 19: 5. Ezek. 16: 20, 21. Psalm 106: 38.

In the corrupt periods of the Jewish kingdom, this idol was erected in the valley south of Jerusalem, namely, in the valley of Hinnom, and in the part of that valley called Tophet, so named from the drums, which were beaten to prevent the groans and cries of children sacrificed from being heard, Jer. 7: 31, 32. 19: 6—14. Isa. 30: 33. 2 Kings 23: 10.

The rabbins assure us, that the image was of brass, sitting on a throne of the same metal, adorned with a royal crown, having the head of a calf, and his arms extended as if to embrace any one; that when they offered children to him, they heated the statue from within, by a great fire; and when it was burning hot, put the miserable victim within its arms, where it was soon consumed by the violence of the heat; and, that the cries of the children might not be heard, they made a great noise with drums, and other instruments, about the idol. Others say, that his arms were extended, and reaching toward the ground, so that when they put a child within his arms, it immediately fell into a great fire which was burning at the foot of the statue.

The place was so abhorrent to the minds of the more recent Jews, that they applied its name to the place of torment in a future life. The word gehenna is used in this way, namely, for the place of punishment beyond the grave, very frequently in oriental writers, as far as India. (See GEHENNA; and HELL.)

There are various sentiments about the relation that Moloch had to the other pagan divinities. Some believe that Moloch was the same as Saturn, to whom it is well known that human sacrifices were offered; others think it was the same with Mercury; others, Venus; others, Mars, or Mithra. Calmet has endeavored, and we think successfully, to prove that Moloch signified the sun, or the king of heaven.—Watson; Calmet.

MOLOKANS; a numerous sect in Russia, so called from their use of milk or milk diet on the Russian fasts. These fasts they entirely reject, but keep Saturday as a fast day. They are more enlightened than the generality of the members of the Greek church, and doubtless many truly pious people are to be found among them; but they greatly need to be taught the way of God more perfectly.—Head. Buck.

MONACHISM; the history of monks. (See MONK; and MONASTERY.)

MONICA, the mother of the celebrated Augustine, lived towards the latter end of the fourth century. She was brought up when young in a Christian family, and being afterwards married to Patricius, a pagan of Tagasta, in Numidia, endeavored by her amiable manners to win him to her faith. She bore patiently with his passionate temper; when he was angry she was silent, but when he became cool, she would mildly expostulate with him. This course, sanctioned by the word of God, (1 Pet. 3: 1—4,) she also recommended to others, and they followed it with success. Her mother-in-law, who had been strongly prejudiced against Christianity, was entirely won over by her kind, faithful, and conciliating spirit. Her husband also permitted her to bring up her son in her own faith, and at last embraced it himself. After his death, Augustine, who was her only son, became the object of her chief solicitude, and for nine years she prayed and wept for him. A Christian bishop, whom she had importuned to reason with him on one occasion, said to her, "Be gone, good woman; it is not possible that a child of such tears should perish." (See AUGUSTINE.)

At Rome, whither she had followed her son, and where she had the unspeakable happiness to witness his conversion to God, she died, in the fifty-sixth year of her age.

In her last sickness, some one lamented that she was likely to die in a foreign land; to which this amiable woman replied, "Nothing is far from God; and I do not fear that he should not know where to find me at the resurrection." Milner's Church History; Betham's Celebrated Women.

MOMIER, (from momerie, mummy; a term of reproach, applied to the dissenters from the modern church of Geneva. Malan's Swiss Tracts, no. i. p. 20.—Williams.)

MONARCHIANS; a name given to those who seceded from the ancient orthodox faith, because they insisted upon the divine unity, which they considered to be infringed by the common doctrine, which taught that there are three eternal persons in the divine nature. Monarchiam tenemus was their frequent assertion when comparing themselves with the orthodox fathers. This general class, however, comprehended many who differed more from each other than they did even from those reputed orthodox, and who, indeed, had nothing in common but a great zeal for monotheism, and a fear lest the unity of God should be endangered by the hypostases of the Alexandrine fathers. Thus Theodotus, Artemon, and Paul of Samosata, were placed by the side of Praxeus, Noetus, Beryllus of Bostra, and Sabellius, between whom and themselves, on every essential point of Christian doctrine, there was a total opposition. (See ARIANS; UNITARIANS; and PATRIFASCIANS.)—Head. Buck.

MONASTERY; a convent or house built for the reception of religious; whether it be abbey, priory, nunnery, or the like.

Monastery is only properly applied to the houses of monks, mendicant friars, and nuns: the rest are more properly called religious houses. For the origin of monasteries, see MONK.

The houses belonging to the several religious orders which obtained in England and Wales, were cathedrals, colleges, abbeys, priories, preceptories, commanderies, hospitals, friaries, hermitages, chantries, and free chapels. These were under the direction and management of various officers.

The dissolution of houses of this kind began so early as the year 1312, when the Templars were suppressed; and in 1323, their lands, churches, advowsons, and liberties, in England, were given, by 17 Edw. II., stat. 3, to the prior and brethren of the hospital of St. John of Jerusalem. In the years 1390, 1437, 1441, 1459, 1497, 1505, 1508, and 1515, several other houses were dissolved, and their revenues settled on different colleges in Oxford and Cambridge. The motive which induced Wolsey and many others, in the reign of Henry VIII., to suppress these houses, was the desire of promoting learning; and archbishop Cranmer engaged in it with a view of carrying on the Reformation. There were other causes that concurred to bring on their ruin: many of the religious were loose and vicious; the monks were generally thought to be in their hearts attached to the pope's supremacy; their revenues were not employed according to the intent of the donors; many cheats in images, feigned miracles, and counterfeit relics, had been discovered, which brought the monks into disgrace; the Observant friars had opposed the king's divorce from queen Catharine; and these circumstances operated, in concurrence with the king's want of a supply and the people's desire to save their money, to forward a motion in parliament, that, in order to support the king's state, and supply his wants, all the religious houses might be conferred upon the crown, which were not able to spend above two hundred pounds a year; and an act was passed for that purpose, 27 Hen. VIII. c. 28.

The number of houses and places suppressed from first to last, in England, so far as any calculations appear to have been made, seems to be as follows:—

Of lesser monasteries, of which we have the valuation . . . . .	374
Of greater monasteries . . . . .	186
Belonging to the hospitaliers . . . . .	48
Colleges . . . . .	90
Hospitals . . . . .	110
Chantries and free chapels . . . . .	2374
Total	3182

Besides the friars' houses, and those suppressed by Wolsey, and many small houses of which we have no particular account.

The sum total of the clear yearly revenue of the several houses at the time of their dissolution, of which we have any account, seems to be as follows:—

Of the greater monasteries . . . . .	£104,919	13	3
Of all those of the lesser monasteries of which we have the valuation . . . . .	29,702	1	10
Knights hospitaliers, head house in London . . . . .	2,385	12	8
We have the valuation of only twenty-eight of their houses in the country . . . . .	3,026	9	5
Friars' houses, of which we have the valuation . . . . .	751	2	0
Total	£140,784	19	2

If proper allowances are made for the lesser monasteries and houses not included in this estimate, and for the plate, &c. which came into the hands of the king by the dissolution, and for the valuation of money at that time, which was at least six times as much as at present, and also consider that the estimate of the lands was generally supposed to be much under the real worth, we must conclude their whole revenues to have been immense.

It does not appear that any computation hath been made of the number of persons contained in the religious houses.

Those of the lesser monasteries dissolved by 27 Hen. VIII. were reckoned at about 10,000
If we suppose the colleges and hospitals to have contained a proportionable number, these will make about . . . . .	5,347

If we reckon the number in the greater monasteries according to the proportion of their revenues, they will be about thirty-five thousand; but as, probably, they had larger allowances in proportion to their number than those of the lesser monasteries, if we abate upon that account five thousand, they will then be . . . . .	30,000
One for each chantry and free chapel . . . . .	2,374

But as there was probably more than one person to officiate in several of the free chapels, and there were other houses which are not included within this calculation, perhaps they may be computed in one general estimate at about fifty thousand.

As there were pensions paid to almost all those of the greater monasteries, the king did not immediately come into the full enjoyment of their whole revenues; however, by means of what he did receive, he founded six new bishoprics, viz. those of Westminster, (which was changed by queen Elizabeth into a deanery, with twelve prebends and a school,) Peterborough, Chester, Gloucester, Bristol, and Oxford. And in eight other sees he founded deaneries and chapters, by converting the priors and monks into deans and prebendaries; viz. Canterbury, Winchester, Durham, Worcester, Rochester, Norwich, Ely, and Carlisle. He founded also the colleges of Christ church in Oxford, and Trinity in Cambridge, and finished King's college there. He likewise founded professorships of divinity, law, physic, and of the Hebrew and Greek tongues in both the said universities. He gave the house of Grey Friars and St. Bartholomew's hospital to the city of London, and a perpetual pension to the poor knights of Windsor, and laid out great sums in building and fortifying many ports in the channel.

It is observable, upon the whole, that the dissolution of these houses was an act not of the church, but of the state, in the period preceding the Reformation, by a king and parliament of the Roman Catholic communion in all points, except the king's supremacy; to which the pope himself, by his bulls and licences, had led the way.

As to the merits of these institutions, authors are much divided. While some have considered them as beneficial to learning, piety, and benevolence, others have thought them very injurious. We may form some idea of them from the following remarks of Mr. Gilpin. He is speaking of Glastonbury abbey, which possessed the amplest revenues of any religious house in England. "Its fraternity," says he, "is said to have consisted of five hundred established monks, besides nearly as many retainers on the abbey. Above four hundred children were not only educated in it, but entirely maintained. Strangers from all parts of Europe were liberally received, classed according to their sex and nation, and might consider the hospitable roof under which they lodged as their own. Five hundred travellers, with their horses, have been lodged at once within its walls; while the poor from every side of the country waited the ringing of the alms-bell; when they flocked in crowds, young and old, to the gate of the monastery, where they received, every morning, a plentiful provision for themselves and their families. All this appears great and noble.

"On the other hand, when we consider five hundred persons bred up in indolence, and lost to the commonwealth; when we consider that these houses were the great nurseries of superstition, bigotry, and ignorance; the stewards of sloth, stupidity, and perhaps intemperance; when we consider that the education received in them had not the least tincture of useful learning, good manners, or true religion, but tended rather to vilify and disgrace the human mind; when we consider that the pilgrims and strangers who resorted thither were idle vagabonds, who got nothing abroad that was equivalent to the occupations they left at home; and when we consider, lastly, that indiscriminate alms-giving is not real charity, but an avocation from labor and industry, checking every idea of exertion, and filling the mind with abject notions, we are led to acquiesce in the fate of these foundations, and view their ruins, not only with a picturesque eye, but with moral and religious satisfaction." Gilpin's Observations on the Western parts of England, pp. 138, 139; Bigland's Letters on Hist., p. 313.—Hend. Buck.

MONASTIC; something belonging to monks, or the monkish life. (See MONK.)—Hend. Buck.

MONEY. Scripture often speaks of gold, silver, brass, of certain sums of money, of purchases made with money, of current money, of money of a certain weight; but we do not observe coined or stamped money till a late period; which makes it probable that the ancient Hebrews took gold and silver only by weight; that they only considered the purity of the metal, and not the stamp, Gen. 23: 15, 16. 38: 28. 43: 21. 24: 22. Exod. 30: 24. 38: 29. 2 Sam. 14: 26. Isa. 46: 6. Jer. 32: 10. Amos 8: 5.

In all these passages three things only are mentioned: 1. The metal, that is, gold or silver, and never copper, that not being used in traffic as money. 2. The weight, a talent, a shekel, a gerah, or obolus, the weight of the sanctuary, and the king's weight. 3. The alloy (standard) of pure or fine gold and silver, and of good quality, as received by the merchant. The impression of the coinage is not referred to; but it is said they weighed the silver, or other commodities, by the shekel and by the talent. This shekel, therefore, and this talent, were not fixed and determined pieces of money, but weights applied to things used in commerce. Hence those deceitful balances of the merchants, who would increase the shekel, that is, would augment the weight by which they weighed the gold and silver they were to receive, that they might have a greater quantity than was their due; hence the weight of the sanctuary, the standard of which was preserved in the temple to prevent fraud; hence those prohibitions in the law: "Thou shalt not have in thy bag divers weights," in Hebrew, stones, "a great and a small;" (Deut. 25: 13.) hence those scales that the Hebrews wore at their girdles, (Hosea 12: 7.) and the Canaanites carried in their hands, to weigh the gold and silver which they received in payment.

The shekel of silver, or the silverling, (Isa. 7: 23.) originally weighed three hundred and twenty barleycorns; but it was afterwards increased to three hundred and eighty-four barleycorns; its value, being considered equal to four Roman denarii, was two shillings and seven pence, or, according to bishop Cumberland, two shillings and four pence farthing. It is said to have had Aaron's rod on the one side, and the pot of manna on the other. The bekah was equal to half a shekel, Exod. 38: 26. The denarius was one fourth of a shekel, seven pence three farthings English money. The gerah, or meah, (Exod. 30: 13.) was the sixth part of the denarius, or diner, and the twenty-fourth part of the shekel. The assar, or assarion, (Matt. 10: 29.) was the ninety-sixth part of a shekel: its value was rather more than a farthing. The farthing, (Matt. 5: 26.) was in value the thirteenth part of a penny sterling. The mite was the half of a farthing, or the twenty-sixth part of a penny sterling. The mina, or maneh, (Ezek. 45: 12.) was equal to sixty shekels, which, taken at two shillings and seven pence, was seven pounds fifteen shillings. The talent was fifty minas; and its value, therefore, three hundred and eighty-seven pounds ten shillings.

The gold coins were as follows: a shekel of gold was about fourteen and a half times the value of silver, that is, one pound seventeen shillings and five pence half-penny. A talent of gold consisted of three thousand shekels. The drachma was equal to a Roman denarius, or seven pence three farthings of our money. The didrachma, or tribute money, (Matt. 17: 24.) was equal to fifteen pence half-penny. It is said to have been stamped with a harp on one side, and a vine on the other. The stater, or piece of money which Peter found in the fish's mouth, (Matt. 17: 27.) was two half shekels. A daric, dram, (1 Chron. 29: 7. Ezra 8: 27.) was a gold coin struck by Darius the Mede. According to Parkhurst its value was one pound five shillings. A gold penny is stated by <sup>to</sup> have been equal to twenty-five silver pence

Hug derives a satisfactory argument for the veracity of the gospels from the different kinds of money mentioned in them:—The admixture of foreign manners and constitutions proceeded through numberless circumstances of life. Take, for example, the circulation of coin; at one time it is Greek coin; at another, Roman; at another time, ancient Jewish. But how accurately is even this stated according to history, and the arrangement of things! The ancient imposths which were introduced before the Roman dominion were valued according to the Greek coinage; for example, the taxes of the temple, the didrachmon, Matt. 17: 24. The offerings were paid in these, Mark 12: 42. Luke 21: 2. A payment which proceeded from the temple treasury was made according to the ancient national payment by weight; (Matt. 26: 15.) but in common business, trade, wages, sale, &c., the assis and denarius, and Roman coin were usual, Matt. 10: 29. 20: 3. Luke 12: 6. Mark 14: 5. John 12: 5. 6: 7. The more modern state taxes are likewise paid in the coin of the nation which exercises at the time the greatest authority, Matt. 22: 19. Mark 12: 15. Luke 20: 24. Writers, who, in each little circumstance, which otherwise would pass by unnoticed, so accurately describe the period of time, must certainly have had a personal knowledge of it.—Watson.

MONEY-CHANGERS, in the gospels, were persons who exchanged native for foreign coin, to enable those who came to Jerusalem from distant countries to purchase the necessary sacrifices. In our Lord's time they had established themselves in the court of the temple; a profanation which had probably grown up with the influence of Roman manners, which allowed the argentarii to establish their usurious mensas, tables, by the statues of the gods, even at the feet of Janus, in the most holy places, in porticibus Basilicarum, or in the temples, pone adem Castoris.

The following extract from Buckingham's Travels among the Arabs, is illustrative:—"The mosque at the time of our passing through it was full of people, though these were not worshippers, nor was it at either of the usual hours of public prayers. Some of the parties were assembled to smoke, others to play at chess, and some apparently to drive bargains of trade, but certainly none to pray. It was, indeed, a living picture of what we might believe the temple at Jerusalem to have been, when those who sold oxen, and sheep, and doves, and the changers of money sitting there, were driven out by Jesus, with a scourge of cords, and their tables overturned. It was, in short, a place of public resort and thoroughfare, a house of merchandise, as the temple of the Jews had become in the days of the Messiah."—Watson.

MONK, anciently denoted "a person who retired from the world to give himself wholly to God, and to live in solitude and abstinence." The word is derived from the Latin monachus, and that from the Greek monachos, "solitary."

The original of monks seems to have been this:—The persecutions which attended the first ages of the gospel, forced some Christians to retire from the world, and live in deserts and places most private and unfrequented, in hopes of finding that peace and comfort among beasts, which were denied them among men; and this being the case of some very extraordinary persons, their example gave such reputation to retirement, that the practice was continued when the reason of its commencement ceased. After the empire became Christian, instances of this kind were numerous; and those whose security had obliged them to live separately and apart, became afterwards united into societies. We may also add, that the mystic theology, which gained ground towards the close of the third century, contributed to produce the same effect, and to drive men into solitude for the purposes of devotion.

The monks, at least the ancient ones, were distinguished into solitaries, canobites, and sarabites.

The solitaries are those who live alone, in places remote from all towns and habitations of men, as do still some of the hermits. The canobites are those who live in community with several others in the same house, and under the same superiors. The sarabites were strolling monks, having no fixed rule or residence.

The houses of monks, again, were of two kinds, viz., monasteries and lauree.

Those who are now called monks are cœnobites, who live together in a convent or monastery, who make vows of living according to a certain rule established by the founder, and wear a habit which distinguishes their order.

Those that are endowed, or have a fixed revenue, are most properly called monks, monachi; as the Chartreux, Benedictines, Bernardines, &c. The Mendicants, or those that beg, as the Capuchins and Franciscans, are more properly called religious and frriors, though the names are frequently confounded.

The first monks were those of St. Anthony, who, towards the close of the fourth century, formed them into a regular body, engaged them to live in society with each other, and prescribed to them fixed rules for the direction of their conduct. These regulations, which Anthony had made in Egypt, were soon introduced into Palestine and Syria by his disciple Hilarion. Almost about the same time, Aones, or Eugenius, with their companions, Gaddanas and Azyzas, instituted the monastic order in Mesopotamia, and the adjacent countries; and their example was followed with such rapid success, that in a short time the whole East was filled with a lazy set of mortals, who, abandoning all human connexions, advantages, pleasures, and concerns, wore out a languishing and miserable existence, amidst the hardships of want, and various kinds of suffering, in order to arrive at a more close and rapturous communication with God and angels.

From the East this gloomy disposition passed into the West, and first into Italy and its neighboring islands; though it is uncertain who transplanted it thither. St. Martin, the celebrated bishop of Tours, erected the first monasteries in Gaul, and recommended this religious solitude with such power and efficacy, both by his instructions and his example, that his funeral is said to have been attended by no less than two thousand monks. From hence the monastic discipline gradually extended its progress through the other provinces and countries of Europe. There were, besides the monks of St. Basil (called in the East Calogeri, from kalos gerôn, "a good old man") and those of St. Jerome, the hermits of St. Augustine, and afterwards those of St. Benedict and St. Bernard: at length came those of St. Francis and St. Dominic, with a legion of others; all which see under their proper heads.

Towards the close of the fifth century, the monks, who had formerly lived only for themselves in solitary retreats, and had never thought of assuming any rank among the sacerdotal order, were now gradually distinguished from the populace, and endowed with such opulence and honorable privileges, that they found themselves in a condition to claim an eminent station among the pillars and supporters of the Christian community. The fame of their piety and sanctity was so great, that bishops and presbyters were often chosen out of their order; and the passion of erecting edifices and convents, in which the monks and holy virgins might serve God in the most commodious manner, was at that time carried beyond all bounds. However, their licentiousness, even in this century, was become a proverb; and they are said to have excited the most dreadful tumults and seditions in various places. The monastic orders were at first under the immediate jurisdiction of the bishops, from which they were exempted by the Roman pontiff about the end of the seventh century; and the monks, in return, devoted themselves wholly to advance the interest and to maintain the dignity of the bishop of Rome. This immunity which they obtained was a fruitful source of licentiousness and disorder, and occasioned the greatest part of the vices with which they were afterwards so justly charged. In the eighth century the monastic discipline was extremely relaxed, both in the eastern and western provinces, and all efforts to restore it were ineffectual. Nevertheless, this kind of institution was in the highest esteem; and nothing could equal the veneration that was paid about the close of the ninth century to such as devoted themselves to the sacred gloom and indolence of a convent. This veneration caused several kings and emperors to call them to their courts, and to employ them in civil affairs of the greatest moment. Their reformation was attempted by Louis the Meek, but the effect was of short duration. In the eleventh century, they were exempted by the popes from the authority established; insomuch, that in the council of Lateran, that was held in the year 1215, a decree was passed, by the advice of Innocent III., to prevent any new monastic institutions; and several were entirely suppressed. In the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, it appears, from the testimony of the best writers, that the monks were generally lazy, illiterate, profligate, and licentious epicures, whose views in life were confined to opulence, idleness and pleasure. However, the Reformation had a manifest influence in restraining their excesses, and rendering them more circumspect and cautious in their external conduct. (See MONASTERY.)

Monks are distinguished by the color of their habits into black, white, gray, &c. Among the monks, some are called monks of the choir, others professed monks, and others lay monks; which last are destined for the service of the convent, and have neither clericate nor literature.

Cloistered monks are those who actually reside in the house; in opposition to extra monks, who have benefices depending on the monastery.

Monks are also distinguished into reformed, whom the civil and ecclesiastical authority have made masters of ancient convents, and put in their power to retrieve the ancient discipline, which had been relaxed; and ancient, who remain in the convent, to live in it according to its establishment at the time when they made their vows, without obliging themselves to any new reform.

Anciently the monks were all laymen, and were only distinguished from the rest of the people by a peculiar habit, and an extraordinary devotion. Not only the monks were prohibited the priesthood, but even priests were expressly prohibited from becoming monks, as appears from the letters of St. Gregory. Pope Siricius was the first who called them to the clericate, on occasion of some great scarcity of priests that the church was then supposed to labor under; and since that time the priesthood has been usually united to the monastical profession. *Ency. MONOPHYTES, (from monos, "single," and physis, "nature;") a general name given to all those sectaries in the Levant who only own one nature in Jesus Christ; and who maintain that the divine and human nature of Jesus Christ were so united as to form only one nature, yet without any change, confusion, or mixture of the two natures.

The Monophysites, however, properly so called, are the followers of Severus, a learned monk of Palestine, who was created patriarch of Antioch, in 513, and Petrus Fulensis.

The Monophysites were encouraged by the emperor Anastasius, but suppressed by Justin and succeeding emperors. However, this sect was restored by Jacob Baradaeus, an obscure monk; insomuch that when he died bishop of Edessa, A. D. 588, he left it in a most flourishing state in Syria, Mesopotamia, Armenia, Egypt, Nubia, Abyssinia, and other countries. The laborious efforts of Jacob were seconded in Egypt and the adjacent countries by Theodosius, bishop of Alexandria; and he became so famous, that all the Monophysites of the East considered him as their second parent and founder, and are to this day called Jacobites, in honor of their new chief. The Monophysites are divided into two sects or parties, the one African and the other Asiatic: at the head of the latter is the patriarch of Antioch, who resides for the most part in the monastery of St. Athanasius, near the city of Merdin; the former are under the jurisdiction of the patriarch of Alexandria, who generally resides at Grand Cairo, and are subdivided into Copts and Abyssinians. From the fifteenth century downwards, all the patriarchs of the Monophysites have taken the name of Ignatius, in order to show that they are the lineal successors of Ignatius, who was bishop of Antioch in the first century, and consequently the lawful patriarch of Antioch. In the seventeenth century, a small body of Monophysites, in Asia, abandoned for, some time the doctrine and institution of their ancestors, and embraced the communion of Rome; but the African Monophysites, notwithstanding that poverty and ignorance which exposed them to the seductions of sophistry and gain, stood firm in their principles, and made an obstinate resistance to the promises, presents, and attempts employed by the papal missionaries to bring them under the Roman yoke; and in the eighteenth century, those of Asia and Africa have persisted in their refusal to enter into the communion of the Romish church, notwithstanding the earnest entreaties and alluring offers that have been made from time to time by the pope's legates, to conquer their inflexible constancy.

In the present day, the Monophysite churches are, 1. The Syrian Jacobite church. 2. The Coptic church. 3. The Abyssinian church, which, as acknowledging the supremacy of the Jacobite patriarch of Alexandria, may be considered as a branch of the Coptic. 4. The Nestorian-Chaldean church, the head of which is the patriarch of Babylon, residing at Mosul. 5. The Armenian church; and, 6. The Indo-Syrian church, under the metropolitan of Malabar, who acknowledges, however, the supremacy of the patriarch of Antioch.—Hend. Buck; Watson.

MONOTHEISM; (from monos, "single," and theos, "God,") the belief in and worship of one only God, in opposition to polytheism, which acknowledges a plurality of gods. All the different mythologies have, among the host of gods with which they people heaven and earth, some superior or supreme deity, more or less defined, but in every case distinguished above the others; and in the history of all the different nations where polytheism has obtained, we may trace a period when the idea of one God was more or less prevalent. The most ancient traditions concur with the testimony of sacred Scripture in representing this as the primary and uncorrupted religion of mankind.—Hend. Buck.

MONOTHELITES; (compounded of monos, "single," and theōma, "will,") an ancient sect, which sprung out of the Eutychians; thus called, as only allowing of one will in Jesus Christ.

The opinion of the Monothelites had its rise in 630, and had the emperor Heraclius for an adherent: it was the same with that of the acephalous Severians. They allowed of two wills in Christ, considered with regard to the two natures; but reduced them to one, by reason of the union of the two natures, thinking it absurd that there should be two free wills in one and the same person. They were condemned by the sixth general council in 680, as being supposed to destroy the perfection of the humanity of Jesus Christ, depriving it of will and operation. Their sentiments were afterwards embraced by the Maronites.—Hend. Buck.

MONTAIGNE, (MICHAEL DE,) a celebrated French essayist, was born, in 1533, at the castle of Montaigne, in Perigord. The utmost care was taken in his education. Latin and Greek he acquired by their being constantly spoken to him in his childhood. He finished his studies at Gnieune college, in Bordeaux. About 1554, he became one of the counsellors of the parliament of Bordeaux. He was twice mayor of Bordeaux; took a part in the assembly of the states of Blois; and received the order of St. Michael from Charles IX. In 1580, and 1581, he visited Germany, Switzerland, and Italy. His Essays were begun about 1572, and the first edition was published in 1580. He died in 1592. His Essays, of which innumerable editions have appeared, have been translated into English. Pascal, in his Thoughts, &c., contests his principles and morals.—Davenport.

MONTANISTS; a sect which sprung up about the year 171, in the reign of the emperor Marcus Aurelius. They were so called from their leader Montanus, a Phrygian by birth; whence they are sometimes called Phrygians and Cataphrygians.

Montanus, it is said, embraced Christianity, in hopes of rising to the dignities of the church. He pretended to inspiration; and gave out that the Holy Ghost had instructed him in several points which had not been revealed to the apostles. Priscilla and Maximilla, two enthusiastic women of Phrygia, presently became his disciples, and in a short time he had a great number of followers. The bishops of Asia, being assembled together, condemned his prophecies, and excommunicated those that dispersed them. Afterwards they wrote an account of what had passed to the western churches, where the pretended prophecies of Montanus, and his followers were likewise condemned. The Montanists, finding themselves exposed to the censure of the whole church, formed a schism, and set up a distinct society, under the direction of those who called themselves prophets. Montanus, in conjunction with Priscilla and Maximilla, were at the head of this sect.

These sectaries denied the doctrine of the Trinity; but they held that the Holy Spirit made Montanus his organ for delivering a more perfect form of discipline than what was delivered by his apostles. They suffered women to preach and to baptize. They refused communion forever to those who were guilty of notorious crimes, and believed that the bishops had no authority to reconcile them. They held it unlawful to fly in time of persecution. They condoned second marriages, allowed the dissolution of marriage, and observed three lent. According to Robinson, the practice of peulobaptism originated with this sect. See Robinson's History of Baptism, pp. 165—177; Lardner's Heretics, b. ii. c. 19.—Hend. Buck.

MONTE-NEGRINES. The inhabitants of an arid mountainous district, called Monte-negro, in Albania. They profess to be Greek Christians, but hate the pope equally as the Turks. They reject images, crucifixes, and pictures, and will not admit a Catholic without rebaptizing him. Their morals are very depraved: they are very ignorant in religion; yet very superstitious in their religious rites.—Nightingale's Religious Ceremonies, pp. 99—112, from the Travels of Col. L. C. Viella de Sommières.—Williams.

MONTESQUIEU, (Baron de,) an illustrious French writer and magistrate, was born, in 1689, at the castle of Brede, near Bordeaux; became counsellor of the parliament of Bordeaux in 1714; and in 1716 succeeded his uncle as president à mortier. His first published work was his Persian Letters, which appeared in 1721. In 1726, he relinquished his office, in order to devote himself to literature. He then travelled over a considerable part of the continent, and visited England, where he resided for two years. On his return he retired to the castle of Brede. His two principal works, on the Greatness and Decline of the Romans; and the Spirit of Laws; the former given to the world in 1734, and the latter in 1748, were the result of his long studies and meditations. He died in 1755. Burke characterizes him as "a genius not born in every country, or every time; a man gifted by nature with a penetrating aquiline eye; with a judgment prepared with the most extensive erudition; with a Herculean robustness of mind, and nerves not to be broken with labor."—Davenport.

MONTH. The ancient Hebrews had no particular names for their months; they said the first, the second, the third, &c. Critics are not agreed about the origin of the subsequent Hebrew names of the months. Scaliger thought them borrowed from the Phœnicians. Grotius believes they came from the Chaldeans; and Hardouin deduces them from the Egyptians. But after the captivity of Babylon, the people continued the names of the months as they had found them among the Chaldeans and Persians.

Originally, the Hebrews followed the same distribution of their years and months as in Egypt. Their year consisted of three hundred and sixty-five days, and of twelve months, each of thirty days. This appears by the enumeration of the days of the year of the deluge, Gen 7. The twelfth month was to have thirty-five days, and they had no intercalary month, but at the end of one hundred and twenty years; when the beginning of the year following was out of its place thirty whole days.

After the Exodus, which happened in the month of March, God ordained that the holy year, that is, the calendar of religious feasts and ceremonies, should begin at Nisan, the seventh month of the civil year, (the civil year being left unchanged,) which the Hebrews continued to begin at the month Tisri, (September.) But we see plainly by Ecclesiasticus, (43: 6.) by the Maccabees, by Josephus, (Antiq. lib. iii. cap. 10.) and by Philo, (Vit. Mos. lib. iii.) that in their time they followed the custom of the Grecians; that is, their months were lunar, and their years solar. These lunar months were each of twenty-nine days and a half; or, rather, one was of thirty days, the following of twenty-nine, and so on alternately: that which had thirty days was called a full or complete month; that which had but twenty-nine days was called incomplete.

The new moon was always the beginning of the month, and this day they called Neomenia, new-moon day, or new month. They did not begin it from that point of time when the moon was in conjunction with the sun, but from the time at which she first became visible, after that conjunction. And to determine this, it is said, they had people posted on elevated places, to inform the sanhedrim as soon as possible. Proclamation was then made, "The feast of the new moon! The feast of the new moon!" and the beginning of the month was proclaimed by sound of trumpet. For fear of any failing in the observation of that command, which directed certain ceremonies at the beginning of each month, they continued the Neomenia two days; the first was called "the day of the moon's appearance," the other "of the moon's disappearance." So say the rabbins: but there is great probability, that if this was ever practised, it was only in provinces distant from Jerusalem. In the temple, and in the metropolis, there was always a fixed calendar, or at least a fixed decision for festival days, determined by the house of judgment.

Names of the Hebrew months, according to the order of the sacred and civil years.

Sacred.	Civil.
7	1	Nisan, answering to March, O. S.
8	2	Ijar, April.
9	3	Sivan, May.
10	4	Thammuz, June.
11	5	Ab, July.
12	6	Elul, August.
1	7	Tisri, September.
2	8	Marchesvan, October.
3	9	Casleu, November.
4	10	Thebet, December.
5	11	Shebat, January.
6	12	Adar, February.

When we say that the months of the Jews answered to ours, from Nisan to March, Jair to April, &c., we must be understood with some latitude; for the lunar months cannot be reduced exactly to solar ones. The vernal equinox falls between the twentieth and twenty-first of March, according to the course of the solar year. But in the lunar year, the new moon will fall in the month of March, and the full moon in the month of April. So that the Hebrew months will answer partially to two of our months, the end of one, and the beginning of the other.

Twelve lunar months making but three hundred and fifty-four days and six hours, the Jewish year was short of the Roman by twelve days. To recover the equinoctial points, from which this difference of the solar and lunar year would separate the new moon of the first month, the Jews every three years intercalated a thirteenth month, which they called Ve-adar; the second Adar. By this means their lunar year equalled the solar; because in thirty-six solar months there would be thirty-seven lunar months. The sanhedrim regulated this intercalation, and the thirteenth month was placed between Adar and Nisan; so that the passover was always celebrated the first full moon after the equinox.—Calmet.

MOODY, (JOSHUA,) minister of Portsmouth, New Hampshire, was born in England, in 1633. His father, William, one of the early settlers of Newbury, came to this country in 1634. He was graduated at Harvard college in 1653. He began to preach at Portsmouth about the year 1658, but was not ordained till 1671.

In 1684, he accepted of an invitation from the first church in Boston to be an assistant minister, and was so highly esteemed, that upon the death of president Rogers he was invited to take the oversight of the college; but he declined. In the days of the witchcraft delusion in 1692, he manfully resisted the unjust and violent measures towards the imagined offenders. His zeal against this wretched delusion occasioned, however, his dismission from the church where he was preaching. In the following year he returned to Portsmouth, where he spent the rest of his life in usefulness and peace. On the approach of his last sickness he went for advice to Boston, where he died, July 4, 1697, aged sixty-four. Though he was deeply impressed with his unworthiness of the divine mercy, yet he indulged the hope of glory, and was desirous of entering into the presence of the Redeemer, whom he had served in his gospel.

He wrote upwards of four thousand sermons. He published a practical discourse concerning the choice benefit of communion with God in his house, being the sum of several sermons, 12mo, 1665, reprinted 1716; an election sermon, 1692. C. Mather's Funeral Ser.; Magnalia, iv. 192—199.—Allen.

MOODY, (JOSEPH,) a Congregational minister of York, (Maine,) was born in 1701, and died in 1753. He had many eccentricities in his conduct; but he was eminent for piety, and was a remarkably useful minister of the gospel. In his younger years he often preached beyond the limits of his own parish, and wherever he went, the people hung upon his lips. In one of his excursions he went as far as Providence, where his exertions were the means of laying the foundation of a church. Though a zealous friend to the revival of religion, which occurred throughout the country a short time before his death, yet he gave no countenance to separations.

Such was the sanctity of his character, that it impressed the irreligious with awe. To piety he united uncommon benevolence. While with impertunate earnestness he pleaded the cause of the poor, he was very charitable himself. It was by his own choice, that he derived his support from a free contribution, rather than a fixed salary in the usual way. In one of his sermons he mentions, that he had been supported twenty years in a way most pleasing to him, and had been under no necessity of spending one hour in a week in care for the world.

Some remarkable instances of answers to his prayers, and of correspondences between the event and his faith, are not yet forgotten in York. The hour of dinner once came, and his table was unsupplied with provisions; but he insisted upon having the cloth laid, saying to his wife, he was confident that they should be furnished by the bounty of God. At this moment some one rapped at the door, and presented a ready cooked dinner. It was sent by persons who, on that day, had made an entertainment, and who knew the poverty of Mr. Moody.

He was of an irritable temper, though he was constantly watchful against this infirmity. In one of his sermons the doctrine which he drew from the text was this: "When you know not what to do, you must not do you know not what." He published a discourse on the doleful state of the damned, especially of such as go to hell from under the gospel, 1710; election sermon, 1721; a summary account of the life and death of Joseph Quason, an Indian. Sullivan's Maine, 233; a Funeral Ser. on Moody.—Allen.

MOON. The Lord created the sun and the moon on the fourth day of the world, to preside over day and night, and to distinguish times and seasons, Gen. 1: 15, 16. As the sun presides over day, so the moon presides over night; the sun regulates the course of a year, the moon the course of a month; the sun is, at it were, king of the host of heaven, the moon is queen. The moon was appointed for the distinction of seasons, of festival days, and days of assembling, Gen. 1: 14. Ps. 104: 19. (See MOON.)

We do not know whether the Hebrews understood the theory of lunar eclipses; but they always speak of them in terms which intimate that they considered them as wonders, and as effects of the power and wrath of God. When the prophets speak of the destruction of empires, they often say, that the sun shall be covered with darkness; the moon withdraw her light; and the stars fall from heaven, Isa. 13: 10. 24: 23. Ezek. 32: 7, 8. Joel 2: 10. 3: 15. But we cannot perceive that there is any direct mention of an eclipse.

Among the Orientals in general, and the Hebrews in particular, the idolatrous worship of the moon was more extensive, and more famous than that of the sun. In Deut. 4: 19. 17: 3, Moses bids the Israelites take care, when they see the sun, the moon, the stars, and the host of heaven, not to pay them any superstitious worship, because they were only creatures appointed for the service of all nations under heaven. Job (31: 26, 27.) also speaks of the same worship, "If I beheld the sun when it shined, or the moon walking in brightness, and my heart has been secretly enticed, or my mouth hath kissed my hand," as a token of adoration. The Hebrews worshipped the moon, by the name of Meni, of Astarte, of the goddess of the groves, of the queen of heaven, &c. The Syrians adored her as Astarte, Urania, or Cælestis; the Arabians as Ailat; the Egyptians as Isis; the Greeks as Diana, Venus, Juno, Hecate, Bellona, Minerva, &c. The moon was worshipped as a god, and not as a goddess, in Syria, Mesopotamia, and Armenia. The Sepharvites called her Anamelech, the gracious king. Strabo calls her Meen; as doth Isaiah, 65: 11. She was represented clothed like a man; and there are medals extant, on which she is represented in the habit and form of a man armed, having a cock at his feet, covered with a Phrygian or Armenian bonnet.

Several sorts of sacrifices were offered to the moon. We see in Isaiah 65: 11. and Jeremiah 7: 18, that they offered to her in the highways, and upon the roofs of their houses, sacrifices of cakes, and similar offerings. Thus the Greeks honored Hecate, or Trivia, which is the moon. Elsewhere they offered to her human sacrifices. Strabo relates, that in the countries bordering on the Araxes, they especially worshipped the moon, who had there a famous temple. The goddess had several slaves, and every year they offered one of them in sacrifice to her, after having fed him daintily the whole year before. Lucian speaks of like sacrifices, offered to the Syrian goddess, the Dea Cælestis, that is, the moon. Fathers carried their children, tied up in sacks, to the top of the porch of the temple, whence they threw them down upon the pavement; and when the unfortunate victims moaned, the fathers would answer, that they were not their children, but young calves.

The Jews ascribed different effects to the moon. Moses speaks of the fruits of the sun and the moon, (Deut. 33: 14.) these being considered as the two causes which produce the fruits of the earth. Some commentators think, that the fruits of the sun are those that come yearly, as wheat, grapes, &c.; and the fruits of the moon those that may be gathered at different months of the year, as cucumbers, figs, &c.—Calmet.

MOORE, (BENJAMIN, D. D.) bishop of New York, was born at Newton, Long Island, Oct. 16, 1748, and educated at King's college, New York. His father was a farmer. He was chosen the rector of Trinity church in 1800; was president of Columbia college from 1801 to 1811; and was for some years a bishop. He died at Greenwich, Feb. 27, 1816, aged sixty-seven. He published a Sermon before the Convention, 1804; on Disobedience, in Amer. Preacher, vol. i; Iniquity its own Accuser, in volume ii.—Allen.

MOORE, (ZEPHANIAH SWIFT, D. D.) president of Williams' college and first president of Amherst college, was born at Palmer, Mass., Nov. 20, 1770; was graduated at Dartmouth college in 1793; and was the minister of Leicester from 1798 till 1811, when he was appointed professor of languages in Dartmouth college. In Sept. 1815, he was chosen president of Williams' college. Having co-operated in the ineffectual attempt to remove this college to Hampshire county, his situation was rendered unpleasant at Williamstown; so that when the collegiate seminary was established at Amherst, in 1821, and before it was incorporated as a college, he was invited to preside over it. He died of the cholera at Amherst, June 25, 1823, aged fifty-two. He published a sermon at the ordination of Mr. Cotton, at Palmer, 1811; at the election, 1818.—Allen.

MORAL; relating to the actions or conduct of life; or that which determines an action to be good or virtuous. 2. A moral agent is a being capable of those actions that have a moral quality, and which can properly be denominated good or evil. (See MORAL AGENCY.) 3. A moral certainty is a very strong probability, and is used in contradistinction to mathematical probability. 4. Moral fitness is the agreement of the actions of any intelligent being with the nature, circumstances, and relation of things. 5. A moral impossibility is a very great or insuperable difficulty arising from the state of the will; opposed to a natural impossibility. (See INABILITY.) 6. Moral obligation is the necessity of doing or omitting any action in order to be happy and good. (See MORAL OBLIGATION.) 7. Moral philosophy is the science of manners, the knowledge of our duty and felicity. (See PHILOSOPHY.) 8. Moral sense is that whereby we perceive the difference between right and wrong, and approve what is good, virtuous, and beautiful, in actions, manners, and character. Some call this natural conscience, others intuitive perception of right and wrong, &c. (See ARTICLES IN SENSE; CONSCIENCE; MORAL OBLIGATION.) 9. Moral law. (See LAW; EVIDENCE.)—Hend. Buck.

MORAL AGENCY; the capacity of acting voluntarily and deliberately in view of motives; or the action of one under moral obligation, law, and responsibility.

The custom of considering the volitions and agency of man as a matter of abstract science, has favored the supposition, that volition is simple or uniform in its mode of springing up in the mind. But if the real world of sentient beings is looked at, it will at once be seen, both that each species has its peculiar conditions of the voluntary principle, and that volition in each species results, at different times, from very different internal processes. It would appear then to be the most natural course to look out first for the simpler instances of volition; and then to ascend from them to such as are complex, and not so readily analyzed. For, as we may fairly presume, the more complicated orders take up into their mental machinery the elements that have been singly developed in the lower ranks of existence. To this general truth, however, there is one exception. Whatever principle of agency in the animal world is no element of the human constitution, is called INSTINCT; and as this of course throws no light upon the agency of man, it must be excluded from our process of induction.

1. Conditions of Moral Agency. The agency of one class of animals is found to differ from that of another, by all the amount of an additional element. A horse may therefore be managed by means which it would be utterly absurd to address to a pig or a hen. And it would be highly unphilosophical to reason concerning the two classes, as if they were one and the same.

We ascend many degrees on the scale of reason, of moral sensibility, and of complex volition, when we turn from the horse to the dog, who is the object of far more sentiment, and the subject of abundantly more education; not arbitrarily or accidentally, but because he possesses more intellectual faculty, moral feeling, and fitness for social companionship with man. Yet the dog is limited in his intellectual range to a narrow circle; and in comparing his powers with those of man, we discern the more clearly the foundation of that different treatment of which the higher nature is the subject; and discern too the ineffable absurdity of the metaphysical doctrine which assumes the agency of men, of brutes, and of machines, to be one and the same thing!

The want, or at least the extreme limitation of the power of abstraction, and of comparing complex relations, effects, in an essential manner, the moral constitution of these inferior species, even of the most intelligent of them. And the possession of such powers gives to man his responsibility; invests him with the anxious prerogative of being under God master of his destinies; and, in a word transfers him, in a great degree, from the present to a future system of retributive treatment. Man alone can be influenced by motives drawn from eternity.

Accordingly, an inward voluntary reformation of manners is never looked for from the brute. He may indeed be amended in his dispositions by external treatment; he may become more or less bland and tractable, in consequence of changes in his constitution and diet; but he never changes in consequence of a mental process, bringing two abstract moral qualities into comparison, and allowing the one to be chosen and followed, while the other is hated and avoided. If it be asked on what ground we infer these deficiencies of internal structure in the brute mind, we reply that the internal defect may fairly be implied from the absence of the proper outward results of the supposed faculty. In following even the most sagacious animal through his movements, in connexion with new and artificial occasions, we catch him at fault, precisely for the want of the power of abstraction. The internal structure is as good as laid bare in such instances; and we cease to wonder, that a being so deficient should not provide for his welfare by artificial means.

The very same deficiency necessitates his moral condition; and knowing it, though we feel complacency or displacency towards the dog, or the elephant, according to his dispositions, we neither assign to him in the one case the praise of virtue, nor in the other impute to him the blame of vice. The animal that does not observe proportions, nor use instruments, nor construct machines, for the same reason does not turn or remodel his own character; does not, in any degree, educate himself. His is not the power to choose what he shall be, in view of an unlimited futurity.

Virtue, vice, praise, blame, law, government, retribution, are proper conditions of the existence of a being, who, by his use of arbitrary signs, by his employment of complicated means, by his conversion of the powers of nature to his particular advantage, above all by his conscience, or power of introverted, deliberative, directive thought, in connexion with his moral sensibilities, makes it evident that he possesses an agency which renders virtue, vice, praise, blame, law, government, retribution, the true correlatives of his nature, and which must attach to it forever. (See BLAME; ACCOUNTABILITY; MORAL OBLIGATION.)

The sophism which would sever these things from human nature, contains an absurdity of precisely the same degree, as must belong to an argument that would attach them to the brute. It were a whim of the same order, to look for arts and accomplishments among tigers, kites, sharks, as not to look for them among men; and it is nonsense of the same magnitude, to deny that the being who builds, plants, writes, and calculates, can work upon his own dispositions, as to affirm that tigers, kites, and sharks, might, if they so pleased, become more amiable, and less rapacious, than they have hitherto shown themselves. And when metaphysical abstractions of a certain order are attempted to be dovetailed upon the actual constitution of nature, the one set of principles calls the other fool, and both utterly refuse to coalesce. What man can do, and what he will do, are things perfectly distinct. (See DEPRAVITY, HUMAN.)

II. Development of Moral Agency. The conjunction of the higher elements of intellectual and moral being with the common ingredients of animal life, is beautifully developed to the eye that with philosophical attention observes the growth and expansion of the human mind from infancy to manhood. Man, throughout the period of his infancy, is, as an agent, below zero. Though launched as a separate being in the world, he is still an embryo, and exists only within the coil of maternal vigilance. At a very early period, however, the agency of the infant is enriched and extended, by the development of the two correlative emotions, which, in their multiform combinations, are afterwards to constitute the moral life, LOVE and RESENTMENT. These feelings, liable as they are to perversion, are, when properly directed and governed, the conservative elements of existence. The intelligent mother uses her skill incessantly, as manager of the two elementary and antagonist principles of the moral life; and by avoiding as far as possible to excite the irascible emotion, and by giving the fullest play to the loving principle, she strengthens the latter by all the force of habit, and deprives the former of the corresponding advantage. Train up a child in the way he should go, &c. (See RELIGIOUS EDUCATION.)

That development of the reasoning faculty, and that power of complex thought, which are the grounds of intelligent and responsible agency, are not apparently developed, even in the lowest degree, until some time after the habits, both of the animal and moral life, have become firmly settled.

It would be curious and entertaining, if not instructive, to trace by a series of exact observations, the influence of language, and other signs, in eliciting or hastening that last expansion of the mind, which imparts to it a deliberative power; or which constitutes man a voluntary agent in the higher sense of the term; and which, in its matured state, carries him to an immeasurable distance beyond the inferior species of sentient beings. Daily, hourly, occasions arise in that little world of commencements, the nursery, whereon the hasty strides of desire are arrested by maternal vigilance, and other motives placed before the mind, and antagonist considerations urged upon its attention. HERE BEGINS THE PROCESS OF COMPLEX VOLITION. At the moment of its commencement the little being sets foot upon a course that has no limit; is translated from the lower world of animal life, into the higher sphere of rational and moral existence; is introduced into the community of responsible agents, and takes up his heirship of an interminable destiny. (See JUDGMENT, DAY OF.)

For a more full development of this interesting subject, with the true grounds of moral approbation and disapprobation, see an Essay Introductory to Edwards on the Will, by the author of the Natural History of Enthusiasm. Also Fuller's Works; Griffin on the Atonement; Upham on the Will; and Hinton on the Work of the Holy Spirit.

MORAL OBLIGATION. Different opinions have been held as to the ground of moral obligation. Grotius, Balguy, and Dr. Samuel Clarke, place it in the eternal and necessary fitness of things. To this there are two objections. The first is, that it leaves the distinction between virtue and vice, in a great measure, arbitrary and indefinite, dependent upon our perception of fitness and unfitness, which, in different individuals, will greatly differ. The second is, that when a fitness or unfitness is proved, it is no more than the discovery of a natural essential difference or congruity, which alone cannot constitute a moral obligation to choose what is fit, and to reject what is unfit. When we have proved a fitness in a certain course of action, we have not proved that it is obligatory. A second step is necessary before we can reach this conclusion. Cudworth, Butler, Price, and others, maintain, that virtue carries its own obligation in itself; that the understanding at once perceives a certain action to be right, and therefore it ought to be performed. Several objections lie to this notion: 1. It supposes the understandings of men to determine precisely in the same manner concerning all virtuous and vicious actions; which is contrary to fact. 2. It supposes a previous rule, by which the action is determined to be right; but if the revealed word of God is not to be taken into consideration, what common rule exists among men? There is evidently no such rule, and therefore no means of certainly determining what is right. 3. If a common standard were known among men, and if the understandings of men determined in the same manner as to the conformity, or otherwise, of an action to that standard, what renders it a matter of obligation that any one should perform it? The rule must be proved to be binding, or no ground of obligation is established.

An action is obligatory, say others, because it is agreeable to the moral sense. This is the theory of Lord Shaftesbury and Dr. Hutcheson. It may, indeed, be conceded that such is the constitution of the human soul, that when those distinctions between actions, which have been taught by religious tradition or direct revelation, are known in their nature, relations, and consequences, the calm and sober judgments of men will approve of them; and that especially when they are considered abstractedly, that is, as not affecting and controlling their own interests and passions immediately, virtue may command complacency, and vice provoke abhorrence; this is what we mean by conscience, or if you please, "the moral sense." But that, independent of reflection on their nature or their consequences, there is an instinctive principle in man which abhors evil, and loves good, is contradicted by that variety of opinion and feeling on the vices and virtues, which obtains among all un instructed nations. We applaud the forgiveness of an injury as magnanimous; a savage despises it as mean. We think it a duty to support and cherish aged parents; many nations, on the contrary, abandon them as useless, and throw them to the beasts of the field. Innumerable instances of this contrariety might be adduced, which are all contrary to the notion of instinctive sentiment. Instincts operate uniformly, but this assumed moral sense does not. Besides, if it be mere matter of feeling, independent of judgment, to love virtue, and abhor vice, the morality of the exercise of this principle is questionable; for it would be difficult to show, that there is any more morality, properly speaking, in the affections and disgusts of instinct than in those of the palate. If judgment, the knowledge and comparison of things, be included, then this principle supposes a uniform and universal individual revelation as to the nature of things to every man, or an intuitive faculty of determining their moral quality; both of which are too absurd to be maintained.

The only satisfactory conclusion on this subject, is that which refers moral obligation to the will of God manifested first in the moral relations we sustain, and secondly in his written word. "Obligation," says Warburton, "necessarily implies an obliger, and the obliger must be different from, and not one and the same with, the obliged. Moral obligation, that is, the obligation of a free agent, further implies a law, which enjoins and forbids; but a law is the imposition of an intelligent superior, who hath power to exact conformity thereto." This lawgiver is God; and whatever may be the reasons which have led him to enjoin this, and to prohibit that, it is plain that the obligation to obey lies not merely in the fitness and propriety of a creature obeying an infinitely wise and good Creator, (though such a fitness exists,) nor in the useful consequences flowing from obedience, (though such utility really follows,) but in that obedience being enjoined. For, since the question respects the duty of a created being with reference to his Creator, nothing can be more conclusive than that the Creator has an absolute right to the obedience of his creatures; and that the creature is in duty obliged to obey him from whom it not only has received being, but by whom that being is constantly sustained.

It has, indeed, been said, that even if it be admitted, that I am obliged to obey the will of God, the question is still open, "Why am I obliged to obey his will?" and that this brings us round to the former answer; because he can only will what is upon the whole best for his creatures. But this is confounding that which may be, and doubtless is, a rule to God in the commands which he issues, with that which really obliges the creature. Now, that which in truth obliges the creature is not the nature of the commands issued by God; but the relation in which the creature itself stands to God. If a creature can have no existence, nor any power or faculty independently of God, it can have no right to employ its faculties independently of him; and if it have no right to employ its faculties in an independent manner, the right to rule its conduct must rest with the Creator alone; and from this results the obligation of absolute and universal obedience. MORALITIES; allegorical plays, so termed because they consisted of moral discourses in praise of virtue and condemnation of vice. They succeeded the mysteries, which see. The dialogues were carried on by such characters as Good Doctrine, Charity, Faith, Prudence, Discretion, Death, &c., whose discourses were of a serious cast; while the province of making merriment for the spectators was devolved upon Vice, Iniquity, or some bad quality, which was personified and acted its part. Moralities were exhibited as late as the reign of Henry VIII., and, after various modifications, assumed the form of the Mask, which became a favorite entertainment at the court of Elizabeth and her successors.—Hend. Buck.

MORALITY, is that relation or proportion which actions bear to a given rule. (See BLAME.)

It is generally used in reference to a good, civil life. Morality in this sense, is distinguished from religion thus: "Morality is a studious conformity of our actions to the relations in which we stand to each other in civil society. Morality comprehends only a part of religion; but religion comprehends the whole of morality. Morality finds all her motives here below; religion fetches all her motives from above. The highest principle in social morals is a just regard to the rights of men; the first principle in religion is the love of God." The various duties of morality are considered in their respective places in this work. MORAVIANS, Unitas Fratrum, or United Brethren; a body of Christians, generally said to have arisen under Nicholas Lewis, count of Zinzendorf, a German nobleman of the last century, and thus called because the first converts to their system were some Moravian families.

According to the society's own account, however, they derive their origin from the Greek church in the ninth century, when, by the instrumentality of Methodius and Cyrillus, two Greek monks, the kings of Bulgaria and Moravia, being converted to the faith, were, together with their subjects, united in communion with the Greek church. Methodius was their first bishop, and for their use Cyrillus translated the Scriptures into the Sclavonian language.

The antipathy of the Greek and Roman churches is well known, and by much the greater part of the brethren were in process of time compelled, after many struggles, to submit to the see of Rome. A few, however, adhering to the rites of their mother church, united themselves, in 1170, to the Waldenses, and sent missionaries into many countries. In 1547, they were called Fratres legis Christi, or Brethren of the Law of Christ; because, about that period, they had thrown off all reverence for human compilations of the faith, professing simply to follow the doctrines and precepts contained in the word of God.

There being at this time no bishops in the Bohemian church who had not submitted to the papal jurisdiction, three preachers of the society of United Brethren were, about the year 1467, ordained by Stephen, a bishop of the Waldenses, in Austria; (see WALDENSES;) and these, on their return to their own country, ordained ten bishops, or seniors, from among the rest. In 1523, the United Brethren commenced a friendly correspondence, first with Luther, and afterwards with Calvin, and other leaders among the reformers. A persecution, which was brought upon them on this account, and some religious disputes which took place among themselves, threatened for a while the society with ruin; but the disputes were, in 1570, put an end to by a synod, which decreed that differences about non-essentials should not destroy their union; and the persecution ceased in 1575, when the United Brethren obtained an edict for the public exercise of their religion. This toleration was renewed in 1609, and liberty granted them to erect new churches. But a civil war, which, in 1612, broke out in Bohemia, and a violent persecution which followed it in 1621, occasioned the dispersion of their ministers, and brought great distress upon the brethren in general. Some of them fled to England, others to Saxony and Brandenburg; whilst many, overcome by the severity of the persecution, conformed to the rites of the church of Rome. One colony of these, who retained in purity their original principles and practice, was, in 1722, conducted by a brother, named Christian David, from Fulneck, in Moravia, to Upper Lusatia, where they put themselves under the protection of Nicholas Lewis, count of Zinzendorf, and built a village on his estate, at the foot of a hill, called Hutberg, or Watch Hill. They called their settlement Herrnhut, "the watch of the Lord." The count, who, soon after their arrival, removed from Dresden to his estate in the country, showed every mark of kindness to the poor emigrants; but being a zealous member of the church established by law, he endeavored for some time to prevail upon them to unite themselves with it, by adopting the Lutheran faith and discipline. This they declined; and the count, on a more minute inquiry into their ancient history and distinguishing tenets, not only desisted from his first purpose, but became himself a convert to the faith and discipline of the United Brethren.

The synod, which, in 1570, put an end to the disputes which then tore the church of the Brethren into factions, had considered as non-essentials the distinguishing tenets of their own society, of the Lutherans, and of the Calvinists. In consequence of this, many of the reformers of both these sects had followed the Brethren to Herrnhut, and been received by them into communion; but not being endued with the peaceable spirit of the church which they had joined, they started disputes among themselves, which threatened the destruction of the whole establishment. By the indefatigable exertions of count Zinzendorf, these disputes were allayed; and statutes being, in 1727, drawn up and agreed to for the regulation both of the internal and of the external concerns of the congregation, brotherly love and union was again established; and no schism whatever, in point of doctrine, has since that period disturbed the church of the United Brethren.

In 1735, the count, who, under God, had been the instrument of renewing the Brethren's church, was ordained one of their bishops. Dr. Potter, then archbishop of Canterbury, in England, congratulated him upon this event, and promised his assistance to a church of confessors, of whom he wrote in terms of the highest respect, for their having maintained the pure and primitive faith and discipline in the midst of the most tedious and cruel persecutions.

This sect, like many others, has been shamefully misrepresented, and things laid to their charge of which they never were guilty. It must, however, be acknowledged, that some of their converts having previously imbibed extravagant notions, propagated them with zeal among their new friends in a phrasology extremely reprehensible; and that count Zinzendorf himself frequently adopted the very improper language of those fanatics, whom he wished to reclaim from their errors to the soberness of truth; but much of the extravagance and absurdity which has been attributed to the count is not to be charged to him, but to those persons who, writing his extempore sermons in short hand, printed and published them without his knowledge or consent.

This eminent benefactor to the United Brethren died in 1760, and it is with reason that they honor his memory, as having been the instrument by which God restored and built up their church. But they do not regard him as their head, nor take his writings, nor the writings of any other man, as the standard of their doctrines, which they profess to derive immediately from the word of God.

The United Brethren allow to their bishops no elevation of rank or pre-eminant authority; their church having from its first establishment been governed by councils or synods, consisting of deputies from all the congregations, and by other subordinate bodies, which they call conferences. The synods, which are generally held once in seven years, are called together by the elders who were in the former synod appointed to superintend the whole Unity. In the first sitting a president is chosen, and these elders lay down their office; but they do not withdraw from the assembly; for they, together with all bishops, seniores civiles, or lay elders, and those ministers who have the general care or inspection of several congregations in one province, have seats in the synod without any particular election. The other members are, one or more deputies sent by each congregation, and such ministers or missionaries as are particularly called to attend. Women, approved by the congregations, are also admitted as hearers, and are called upon to give their advice in what relates to the ministerial labor among their sex; but they have no decisive vote in the synod. The votes of all the other members are equal.

In questions of importance, or of which the consequences cannot be foreseen, neither the majority of votes nor the unanimous consent of all present can decide; but recourse is had to the lot. For adopting this unusual mode of deciding in ecclesiastical affairs, the Brethren allege as reasons the practices of the ancient Jews and the apostles; the insufficiency of the human understanding, amidst the best and purest intentions, to decide for itself in what concerns the administration of Christ's kingdom; and their own confident reliance on the comfortable promises that the Lord Jesus will approve himself the head and ruler of his church. The lot is never made use of but after mature deliberation and fervent prayer; nor is any thing submitted to its decision which does not, after being thoroughly weighed, appear to the assembly eligible in itself. (See LOT.)

In every synod the inward and outward state of the Unity, and the concerns of the congregations and missions, are taken into consideration. If errors in doctrine or deviations in practice have crept in, the synod endeavors not only to remove them, but, by salutary regulations, to prevent them for the future. It considers how many bishops are to be consecrated to fill up the vacancies occasioned by death; and every member of the synod gives his vote for such of the clergy as he thinks best qualified. Those who have the majority of votes are taken into the lot, and they who are approved are consecrated accordingly; but, by consecration, they are vested with no superiority over their brethren, since it behoves him who is the greatest to be the servant of all.

Towards the conclusion of every synod a kind of executive board is chosen, and called the elders' conference of the Unity. At present it consists of ten elders, and is divided into four committees, or departments. 1. The missions' department, which superintends all the concerns of the missions into heathen countries. 2. The helpers' department, which watches over the purity of doctrine, and the moral conduct of the different congregations. 3. The servants' department, to which the economical concerns of the Unity are committed. 4. The overseers' department, of which the business is to see that the constitution and discipline of the brethren be everywhere maintained. No resolution, however, of any of these departments has the smallest force till it be laid before the assembly of the whole elders' conference, and have the approbation of that body. The powers of the elders' conference are, indeed, very extensive; besides the general care which it is commissioned by the synods to take of all the congregations and missions, it appoints and removes every servant in the Unity, as circumstances may require; authorizes the bishops to ordain presbyters or deacons, and to consecrate other bishops; and, in a word, though it cannot abrogate any of the constitutions of the synod, or enact new ones itself, it is possessed of the supreme executive power over the whole body of the United Brethren, but is responsible to the synod.

Besides this general conference of elders, which superintends the affairs of the whole Unity, there is another conference of elders belonging to each congregation, which directs its affairs, and to which the bishops and all other ministers, as well as the lay members of the congregation, are subject. This body, which is called the elders' conference of the congregations, consists, 1. Of the minister, as president, to whom the ordinary care of the congregation is committed, except when it is very numerous, and then the general inspection of it is intrusted to a separate person, called the congregation helper. 2. Of the warden, whose office it is to superintend, with the aid of his council, all outward concerns of the congregation, and to assist every individual with his advice. 3. Of a married pair, who care particularly for the spiritual welfare of the married people. 4. Of a single clergyman, to whose care the young men are more particularly committed. And, 5. Of those women who assist in caring for the spiritual and temporal welfare of their own sex, and who, in this conference, have equal votes with the men. As the elders' conference of each congregation is answerable for its proceedings to the elders' conference of the Unity, visitations from the latter to the former are held from time to time, that the affairs of each congregation, and the conduct of its immediate governors, may be intimately known to the supreme executive government of the whole church.

In their opinion, episcopal consecration does not confer any power to preside over one or more congregations; and a bishop can discharge no office but by the appointment of a synod, or of the elders' conference of the Unity. Presbyters among them can perform every function of the bishop, except ordination. Deacons are assistants to the presbyters; and in the Brethren's churches, deaconesses are retained for the purpose of privately admonishing their own sex, and visiting them in their sickness; but though they are solemnly blessed to this office, they are not permitted to teach in public, and far less to administer the sacraments. They have likewise seniores civiles, or lay elders, in contradistinction to spiritual elders, or bishops, who are appointed to watch over the constitution and discipline of the Unity of the Brethren, over the observance of the laws of the country in which congregations or missions are established, and over the privileges granted to the Brethren by the governments under which they live. They have economies, or choir houses, where they live together in community; the single men and single women, widows and widowers, apart, each under the superintendence of elderly persons of their own class. In these houses every person who is able, and has not an independent support, labors in their own occupation, and contributes a stipulated sum for their maintenance.

"No marriage takes place without the consent of the board of elders of the congregation. Upon due application this consent is signified to the parties; whereupon they are solemnly betrothed, in presence of the elders and nearest connexions, and the marriage then takes place, according to the forms prescribed by law in each country."

"The education of youth is regarded by the Brethren as worthy of the greatest attention, being persuaded that a good education is the most valuable legacy which parents can leave to their children. It is therefore their principal aim, that their youth, from their tenderest age, be not only screened as far as possible from all pernicious examples, hurtful impressions, and seductions to evil; but that the love of GOD in Christ Jesus may be implanted in the tender hearts of their children; that virtue may be represented to them in the most amiable light; and that they, as the property of the Lord, who created and redeemed them, may live wholly to his joy and honor, and become useful members of human society."

"Whoever does not walk conformably to the rules established, thus losing sight of the aim of his living in a congregation of the Brethren, incurs that church discipline which has been introduced agreeably to the example of the apostolic age and the ancient church of the Brethren."

But what characterizes the Moravians most, and holds them up to the attention of others, is their missionary zeal. In this they are superior to any other body of people in the world. "Their missionaries," as one observes, "are all of them volunteers; for it is an inviolable maxim with them to persuade no man to engage in missions. They are all of one mind as to the doctrines they teach, and seldom make an attempt where there are not half a dozen of them in the mission. Their zeal is calm, steady, persevering. They would reform the world, but are careful how they quarrel with it. They carry their point by address, and the insinuations of modesty and mildness, which commend them to all men, and give offence to none. The habits of silence, quietness, and decent reserve, mark their character. If any of their missionaries are carried off by sickness or casualty, men of the same stamp are ready to supply their place."

The following are the names of the settlements of the United Brethren in heathen countries:—

"Begun in 1732, in the Danish West India islands. In St. Thomas; New Herrnhut, Nisky. In St. Croix; Friedensberg, Friedenthal. In St. Jan; Bethany, Emmaus. In 1733: in Greenland; New Herrnhut, Lichtenfels, Lichtenau. In 1734: in North America; Fairfield in Upper Canada, Goshen on the river Muskingum. In 1736: at the cape of Good Hope; Bavians Kloof, (renewed in 1792.) In 1738: in South America; among the negro slaves at Paramaribo and Sommelsdyk; among the free negroes at Bambej, on the Sarameca; among the native Indians at Hope, on the river Corentyn. In 1754: in Jamaica; two settlements in St. Elizabeth's parish. In 1756: in Antigua; at St. John's, Grace Hill, Grace Bay. In 1760: near Tranquebar, in the East Indies; Brethren's Garden. In 1764: on the coast of Labrador; Nain, Okkah, Hopedale. In 1765: in Barbadoes; Sharon, near Bridgetown. In 1765: in the Russian part of Asia; Sa-repta. In 1775: in St. Kitt's; at Basseterre. In 1789: in Tobago; Signal Hill, (renewed in 1798.) (See also the missionary department of this work.)

"A society for the furtherance of the gospel among the heathen was instituted by the Brethren in London as early as the year 1751, for the more effectual co-operation with and assistance of the said missions' department, in caring for those missionaries who might pass through London to their several posts. The society was, after some interruption in their meetings, renewed in 1756, and took the whole charge of the mission on the coast of Labrador upon themselves; besides continuing to assist the other missions as much as lay in their power, especially those in the British dominions. As no regular communication was kept up with the coast of Labrador by government, a small vessel was employed to convey the necessaries of life to the missionaries once a year.

"In Amsterdam, a similar society was established by the Brethren in 1746, and renewed in 1793, at Zeist, near Utrecht. This society took particular charge of the mission at the cape of Good Hope; but the late troubles in Holland have rendered them unable to lend much assistance for the present. The Brethren in North America established a society for propagating the gospel among the heathen in the year 1787, which was incorporated by the state of Pennsylvania, and has been very active in assisting the missions among the Indians. These three societies do all in their power to help support the great and accumulated burthens of the above-mentioned missions' department, and God has laid a blessing upon their exertions. But they have no power to begin new missions, or to send out missionaries, which, by the synods of the Brethren's church, is vested solely in the elders' conference of the Unity."

The number of converts and persons under instruction in the different missions, amount to about 55,150, and the number of missionaries to about 163.

As to the tenets of the Moravians, though they acknowledge no other standard of truth than the sacred Scriptures, they adhere to the Augsburg confession; (see that article.) They profess to believe that the kingdom of Christ is not confined to any particular party, community, or church; and they consider themselves, though united in one joined body, or visible church, as spiritually in the bond of Christian love to all who are taught of God, and belong to the universal church of Christ, however much they may differ in forms, which they deem non-essentials.

The Moravians are often called Herrnhuters, from Herrnhut, the name of the village where they were first settled. They also go by the name of Unitas Fratrum, or United Brethren. If the reader wish to have a fuller account of this society, he may consult Crantz's Ancient and Modern History of the Church of the United Brethren, 1780; Spangenberg's Exposition of the Christian Doctrine, 1784; Dr. Haweis's Church History, vol. iii. p. 184, &c.; Crantz's History of their Mission in Greenland; The Periodical Accounts of their Missions; Loskiel's History of the North American Indian Missions; Oldendorp's History of the Brethren's Missions in the Danish West Indian Islands; and Choules's History of Missions.—Hend. MORE, (HANNAH,) the most brilliant female ornament of Christian literature, was born in 1744, at the village of Stapleton, Gloucestershire. She was the youngest of five sisters, none of whom entered into the marriage state. Her father, who died while she was young, was a clergyman, eminent for his classical attainments, but equally eminent for the excellence of his character and disposition. Of her mother we know nothing. Very early in life, Hannah evinced a taste for literature, and an insatiable appetite for books. She speedily devoured the contents of her father's library, and then had recourse to those of some friends in the village of Hannam, near Bristol. It is said that Richardson's Pamela was the first book that fell in her way, and that inspired her with a passion for reading. As she grew up towards womanhood, her remarkable attainments and excellent character attracted the esteem and admiration of her neighbors, and becoming more widely known, acquired for her the patronage of several persons of superior station and talents. Her sisters, who, though less gifted than she, were amiable and talented women, had, in the meantime, opened a small school, which, as their reputation increased, was relinquished for one of higher pretensions. While they were engaged in tuition, she was trying her powers in the composition of verse.

About the year 1766, the Misses More had acquired so much celebrity, as instructors of youth, that, on the recommendation of several ladies of fortune and discernment, they removed to Bristol, and opened a boarding-school in Park street. In a short time, it was esteemed the first establishment of the kind in the west of England, and was selected by many persons of rank for the education of their daughters.

Miss Hannah More accompanied her sisters to Bristol, where she acquired the friendship of Dr. Stonehouse, a gentleman from whose urbanity, influence, and general knowledge, she derived material worldly advantages; but it is doubtful whether her acquaintance with him, though he was a clergyman, resulted in her religious improvement. He it was, however, who prepared for the press her first work, "The Search after Happiness." She afterwards turned her attention to dramatic composition. Her first play was "Fatal Falschood," which was "brought out" under the patronage of Garrick, with whom Dr. Stonehouse was intimate. It was tolerably well received; but, "Percy," her second effort in this department, was much more successful. "The Inflexible Captive," the only other drama she prepared for the stage, was greatly inferior to its predecessors. During these engagements, she came in contact with several distinguished men of that day. She was honored with the intimate acquaintance of Johnson, Burke, and Reynolds, and of many other highly eminent individuals, who equally appreciated her amiable qualities and her superior intellect.

The fact that Hannah More wrote for the stage, will, with most religious persons, be deemed proof enough that she was not then so decided a Christian as she afterwards became. She at length began to doubt its propriety.

We are disposed to date the conversion of Hannah More from the period when her publications assumed a decidedly religious character and tendency. Then it was, that, under a deep conviction that to live to the glory of God, and to the good of our fellow-creatures, is the great object of human existence, and the only one which can bring peace at the last, she quitted the bright circle of fashion and literature, and devoted herself to a life of active Christian benevolence, and to the composition of various works, having for their object the real improvement of mankind. Among this class of works, her "Sacred Dramas" must be mentioned as the first; for these, though composed at a very early period of her life, were not printed till the year 1782. The fact that she had written for the stage in the mean time, would have led us to suspect the truth of the declaration, that the "Sacred Dramas" were composed while she was a girl, but that it rests on the evidence of a respectable American, who had it from her own lips. It serves to show that she derived no religious advantage from the notice into which her talents brought her, and to attest the power of divine grace, by which she was ultimately rescued from the dangerous tendency of worldly associations and of public applause. Her first work of a didactic nature was entitled "Essays to Young Ladies." To this, in 1786, succeeded an anonymous volume, "Thoughts on the Manners of the Great," which excited much interest and curiosity. Some attributed it to the bishop of London, and others to the late Mr. Wiberforce. It was at length traced to the masculine pen of Miss Hannah More. Its object was to expose and correct the licentious manners of the great, and it proved that she had not moved in fashionable circles with perfect satisfaction of mind.

In 1799, while residing at Bath, Miss More gave to the public her invaluable "Strictures on the Modern System of Female Education."

Perhaps the highest testimony to the talents and virtues of Hannah More, was borne by bishop Porteus, who strongly recommended her as every way qualified to superintend the education of the princess Charlotte. By those in power, however, the charge was thought too great for an individual without title, though they were willing enough to engage her service in a subordinate capacity. But she declined the offer, and the negotiation ended. That she had indulged the prospect of receiving the higher appointment, may be presumed from the subsequent appearance, in 1805, of her "Hints towards forming the Character of a Young Princess," a work which fully justified the aspirations which her right reverend friend had taught her to indulge, but yet a work of more universal application than the title intimates.

Before this volume appeared, Miss Hannah More and her sisters, by their reputation and industry, first in Bristol and afterwards in Bath, had realized sufficient property to enable them to retire from public life, and purchase a residence called Barley Wood, delightfully situated at the foot of the Mendip hills.

In 1809, she published her "Cælebs in Search of a Wife," a novel of unexceptionable moral tendency, though far from being perfect as a work of art. Her "Practical Piety" appeared in 1811, and her admirable "Essay on the Character and Writings of St. Paul" in 1815.

Besides the works already noticed, Miss More gave to the world several other publications, alike distinguished by the talent they display, and their excellent moral and religious tendency. Her best work, that which deserves to be most widely known, and most highly appreciated, is her "Christian Morals," printed in 1812. This truly valuable work will be read with pleasure and improvement by generations yet unborn.

The last work on which she was engaged, and which was published five or six years since, is a small volume, entitled "The Spirit of Prayer," which is an assemblage of the most devotional passages in her various writings. It opens with a striking definition of prayer, which may be instanced as one of the finest specimens of the author's powers of composition. The motto which she prefixed to this interesting collection, "Knowing that shortly I must put off this my tabernacle," shows that she was then anticipating her dissolution, and that in the temper of mind suited to the Christian character and profession.

But literary occupations did not absorb her whole time in the delightful retirement of Barley Wood. She instituted a number of schools in the vicinity, at which many hundreds of children were educated under her direction. Her constitution, she said, was very strong, for it had carried her, with the blessing of Providence, through the assaults of twenty mortal diseases.

On the death of her sister Martha, which took place a few years since, Miss Hannah More exchanged her residence at Barley Wood for Clifton, near Bristol, where, notwithstanding the increasing infirmities of age, she maintained her wonted cheerfulness of temper, and continued to distribute her superfluous wealth in acts of the purest benevolence and highest charity, until death put an end to her long and useful career. This event occurred on 7th of September, at her residence in Windsor Terrace, Clifton, in the eighty-ninth year of her age; and her remains were interred on Friday the 13th, in the vault at Wrington, which contains those of her beloved sisters. She had endured a painful and protracted illness, accompanied by feverish delirium; but the blessed influence of Christian habit was strikingly exemplified even under the decay of extreme old age and its attendant consequences. She frequently broke forth into earnest prayer and devout ejaculation, and invariably met the affectionate attention of the friends who sedulously watched over her sick bed, by unceasing and most expressive returns of grateful love. An individual who saw her in the day of her last seizure, which was in November, 1832, states that "she expressed to him, in a most impressive manner, the sentiments of an humble, penitent believer in Jesus Christ, assuring him that she reposed her hopes of salvation on his merits alone, and expressing at the same time a firm and joyful alliance on his unchanging promises."—Land. Chris. Obs.; Am. Ed. of her Works.

MORDECAI, was the son of Jair, of the race of Saul, and a chief of the tribe of Benjamin. He was carried captive to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar, with Jehoiachin, or Jeconiah, king of Judah, A. M. 3405, Esther 2: 5, 6. He settled at Shushan, and there lived to the first year of Cyrus, when it is thought he returned to Jerusalem, with several other captives; but he afterwards returned to Shushan. There is great probability that Mordecai was very young when taken into captivity. The book of Esther gives the whole history of Mordecai's elevation, the punishment of Haman, and the wonderful deliverance of the Jews, in clear and regular narrative.

But it may be asked, for what reason did Mordecai refuse to pay that respect to Haman, the neglect of which incensed him against the Jews? Esther 3: 1—6. Some think the reason was, because Haman was an Amalekite; a people whom the Israelites had been commissioned from God to destroy, because of the injuries they had formerly done them, Deut. 25: 17—19. But this scarcely seems to be a sufficient account of Mordecai's refusing civil respect to Haman, who was first minister of state; especially when by so doing he exposed his whole nation to imminent danger. Besides, if nothing but civil respect had been intended to Haman, the king need not have enjoined it on his servants after he had made him his first minister and chief favorite; (Esther 3: 1, 2.) they would have been ready enough to show it on all occasions. Probably, therefore, the reverence ordered to be done to this great man was a kind of divine honor, such as was sometimes addressed to the Persian monarchs themselves; which, being a species of idolatry, Mordecai refused for the sake of a good conscience. And perhaps it was because Haman knew that his refusal was the result of his Jewish principles, that he determined to attempt the destruction of the Jews in general, knowing they were all of the same mind.

2. As to another question, why Haman cast lots, in order to fix the day for the massacre of the Jews, (Esther 3: 7.) from whence the feast of purim, which is a Persian word, and signifies lots, took its name; (Esther 9: 26.) it was no doubt owing to the superstitious conceit which anciently prevailed, of some days being more fortunate than others for any undertaking; in short, he endeavored to find out, by this way of divining, what month, and what day of the month, was most unfortunate to the Jews, and most fortunate for the success of his bloody design against them. It is very remarkable, that while Haman sought for direction in this affair from the Persian idols, the God of Israel so overruled the lot as to fix the intended massacre to almost a year's distance, from Nisan the first month to Adar the last of the year, in order to give time and opportunity to Mordecai and Esther to defeat the conspiracy.

3. We learn from Chardin, (1.) That to inquire what passes in the harem of an Eastern monarch, is a crime. (2.) That it is possible, "by a great deal of art," and weighty reasons, no doubt, to make the black eunuchs "speak," on some occasions. (3.) That a man may walk by the court of the harem a hundred days, one after another yet obtain no intelligence from thence. (4.) That "bloody doings" are occasionally transacted there.

These hints may account for the conduct of Mordecai, who walked every day before the court of the women's house, to gather any intelligence that might chance to come within his cognizance, respecting his niece. We learn also, that there are "bloody doings" in the harem; this agrees with the remark of Mordecai, (chap. 4: 13.) "think not that thou shalt escape in the king's house, more than all the Jews." He certainly means that Haman would procure her death, even in the harem.—Watson; Calmet.

MORE, (HENRY, D. D.) a divine and platonic philosopher, was born, in 1614, at Grantham; was educated at Eton, and Christ college, Cambridge; refused the highest preferments; and died, universally beloved, in 1687.

His works, in which are many fine passages, form two folio volumes. As a poet, he is known by his Pyschozoia, or Song of the Soul, in which, though it is often obscure and prosaic, there is much poetical imagery.—Davenport.

MORGAN, (ABEL,) an eminent Baptist minister of Pennepek, Penn., was born in Wales, in 1637, and came to this country in 1711. He died Dec. 16, 1722. He compiled a folio concordance to the Welsh Bible, printed at Philadelphia; and also translated "Century Confession" into Welch, with additions. Benedict, i. 563.—Allen.

MORIAH, MOUNT. A hill on the north-east side of Jerusalem, once separated from that of Acra by a broad valley, which, according to Josephus, was filled up by the Asmoneans, and the two hills converted into one. In the time of David it stood apart from the city, and was under cultivation; for here was the threshing-floor of Araunah the Jebnite, which David bought, on which to erect an altar to God, 2 Sam. 24: 15—25. On the same spot Solomon afterwards built the temple, (2 Chron. 3: 1.) when it was included within the walls of the city. Here, also, Abraham is supposed to have been directed to offer his son Isaac, Gen. 22: 1, 2. Moriah implies "vision;" and the "Land of Moriah," mentioned in the above passage in the history of Abraham, was probably so called from being seen "afar off." It included the whole group of hills on which Jerusalem was afterwards built.—Watson.

MORMONITES; believers in the "Book of Mormon." This famous book, which its misguided followers regard as a second Bible, or more properly as the Mohammedans do the Koran, is said to be a translation from certain brass plates, found by one Joseph Smith, in the town of Palmyra, (N. Y.) in 1826. They were inclosed in a box, which had to all appearance been used for common sized window glass. Smith pretended to interpret them, with a stone in his hat, and this hat over his face, while one Martin Harris was employed to write down the contents at his dictation. Some disagreement arising between the parties, Harris went away, and Oliver Cowdry came and wrote for Smith, while he interpreted as above described, till the "Book of Mormon" was completed. Smith then gave out that it was a revelation from heaven, and that he himself was a prophet; and thus collected around him a class of simple and credulous people, whom he persuaded to dispose of their property, and follow him to the New Zion which he was commissioned to establish in Missouri, west of the Mississippi river, "in the centre of the world." They accordingly settled in Jackson county, in that state; and there under the guidance of the new prophet established a new society, from which they send out preachers in all directions to collect proselytes. A weekly periodical has also been established, through which new revelations are from time to time circulated among the community. Many of them find their way to New England, and not a few weak, and some pious people, are caught in the snare.

The contents of the book of Mormon are a series of puerile eastern romance, with abundance of names, but no dates, localities, or connexion of any sort with sober history. Its style affects an imitation of Scripture, which, with the ignorant, gives it an air of sacredness, like that of a revelation from heaven. The above account of its origin is taken from a statement affirmed and subscribed to, before Charles Dimon, justice of the peace, March 29, 1834, by Mr. Isaac Hale, father-in-law of Joseph Smith, the pretended prophet. While in common with every friend of humanity we deeply deplore the outrages recently committed by some of the citizens of Missouri on the Mormon community, we deem it important that the facts should be known, which show the real foundation of the imposture.—See the Cross and Baptist Journal, 1834.

MORNAY, (PHILIP DE,) lord of Plessis Marly, an illustrious French Protestant, and governor of Saumur, privy counsellor of Henry IV., was born at Buhl, in Vexen, Nov. 5, 1549. He was designed by his father for the Romish church. His excellent mother, however, took care to inspire his mind with Protestant principles, which she secretly cherished. This circumstance, combined with the perusal of the New Testament, when only twelve years of age, fixed his faith. His literary education was of the first order, and was improved by his travels in almost all parts of Europe. He made that use of travelling which a wise man will ever make, and everywhere, though yet a young man, discovered the spirit of a Christian and a philosopher. In 1572, he visited England, whither his fame had already preceded him, and where his presence was courted by the great and noble. In 1576, he joined the court of Henry, then king of Navarre.

In 1576, he published a treatise concerning Life and Death. In 1578, a treatise concerning the Church, in which he explained his motives for embracing the Protestant faith. In 1582, appeared his justly celebrated book upon the Truth of the Christian Religion. In 1596, came out his Just Procedures of those of the Reformed Religion, and in 1598, his treatise on the Eucharist, which raised his reputation so high that he was called by some of his enemies "the Protestant's pope." In 1607, he published the Mystery of Iniquity, or History of the Papacy, and an Exhortation to the Jews concerning the Messiah. He died in 1623, saying that he was perfectly, though fumbly, persuaded of his future happiness through the Savior, "by a demonstration more powerful, more clear, and certain, than any demonstration of Euclid—the demonstration of the Holy Spirit." (1 Cor. 2: 4. 2 Cor. 5: 5.)

MORNING LECTURES. (See LECTURES.)

MORROW. "But God prepared a worm in the rising of the dawn for the morrow," or, against the morrow, which is in our translation, when the morrow rose the next day, Jonah 4: 7. This phrase shows that the Hebrew morrow did not commence before the light. See also Num. 11: 32. The Anglo-Saxon morrow is, no doubt, derived from the Mewher; and as it is evident from Tacitus and Julius Cæsar, that both the Germans and the Gauls computed time in the manner of the Hebrews, and other Eastern nations, there is the greater reason for supposing that our ancestors used the word morrow according to the idea of the Hebrew Mewher.—Calmet.

MORRIS, (GOVERNEUR,) an eminent statesman and orator, was born at Morrisania, near the city of New York, in 1732, was graduated at King's college in 1768, and licensed to practise law in 1771. In 1775, he was a member of the provincial congress of New York, and was one of the committee which drafted a constitution for the state of New York. In 1777, he was chosen a delegate to the continental congress, and in the following year wrote the celebrated Observations on the American Revolution. In 1781, he accepted the post of assistant superintendent of finance, as colleague of Robert Morris; and in 1787, was a member of the convention which framed the constitution of the United States. In 1792, he was appointed minister plenipotentiary to France, and held this station till his recall by the request of the French government, in 1791. In 1800, he was elected a senator in congress, from the state of New York, and in this body was very conspicuous for his political information and his brilliant eloquence. Many of his speeches in congress and orations have been published; and a selection from his correspondence and other valuable papers, with a biographical sketch, by Mr. Jared Sparks, was issued in 1832.

Mr. Jefferson has represented Mr. Morris as a disbeliever in Christianity. But this is a mistake; or if at one time true, his views altered. He delivered two months before his death an address to the Historical society, in which he points out the superiority of scriptural history to all other history. He regarded religious principle indeed as necessary to national independence and peace. "There must be something more to hope, than pleasure, wealth, and power. Something more to fear than poverty and pain. Something after death more terrible than death. There must be religion. When that ligament is torn, society is disjointed and its members perish."—Davenport; Allen.

MORTALITY; subjection to death. It is a term also used to signify a contagious disease which destroys great numbers of either men or beasts. Bills of mortality are accounts or registers specifying the numbers born, married, and buried, in any parish, town, or district. In general, they contain only these numbers, and even when thus limited are of great use, by showing the degrees of healthiness and prolificness, and the progress of population in the place where they are kept.—Hend. Buck.

MORTAR. There is a remarkable passage in Prov.

27: 22: "Though thou shouldst bray a fool in a mortar among wheat, with a pestle, yet will not his foolishness depart from him." The mode of punishment here referred to may be proved to exist in the East, by the positive testimony of Volney and others.

"Fanaticism has enacted, in Turkey, in favor of the Ulemas, (or body of lawyers,) that their goods shall never be confiscated nor themselves put to death, but by being bruised in a mortar. The honor of being treated in so distinguished a manner, may not, perhaps, be sensibly felt by every one; examples are rare; yet the insolence of the mufti irritated sultan Osman to such a degree, that he ordered the mortars to be replaced, which, having been long neglected, had been thrown down, and almost covered with earth. This order alone produced a surprising effect: the body of Ulemas, justly terrified, submitted." (Baron du Tot, vol. i. page 25.) "As for the guards of the towers, who had led prince Coreiskie [a prisoner] escape, some of them were emptied, and some were pounded, or beaten to pieces, in great mortars of iron, wherein they do usually pound their rice, to reduce it to meal." Knolles' History of the Turks, p. 1374.

This last quotation is the very case in point; except that Solomon seems to suppose the fool was pounded together with the wheat; whereas in this instance the guards were beaten to death, certainly, without any such accompaniment.—Calmet.

MORTIFICATION, among the Romanists, is any severe penance observed on a religious account.

The mortification of sin in believers is a duty enjoined in the sacred Scriptures, Rom. 8: 13. Col. 3: 5. It consists in breaking the league with sin; declaration of open hostility against it; and strong resistance to it, Eph. 6: 10, &c. Gal. 5: 24. Rom. 8: 13. The means to be used in this work are, not macerating the body, seclusion from society, or our own resolutions; but the Holy Spirit is the chief agent, (Rom 8: 13.) while faith, prayer and dependence are subordinate means to this end. The evidences of mortification are, not the cessation from one sin, for that may be only exchanged for another; or it may be renounced because it is a gross sin; or there may not be an occasion to practise it: but if sin be mortified, we shall not yield to temptation; our minds will be more spiritual; we shall find more happiness in spiritual services, and bring forth the fruits of the Spirit. Dr. Owen on the Mortification of Sin, and on the Holy Spirit, ch. viii. book 4; Charnock's Works, vol. ii. p. 1313; Eryson's Sermons on Rom. 8, p. 97, &c.—Hend. Buck.

MOSAIC DISPENSATION; inferior to the gospel dispensation. (See DISPENSATION.)—Hend. Buck.

MOSAIC LAW, or the law of Moses, is the most ancient that we know of in the world, and is of three kinds; the moral law, the ceremonial law, and the civil or judicial law. Some observe, that the different manner in which each of these laws was delivered may suggest to us a right idea of their different natures.

The five books of Moses, called the Pentateuch, are frequently styled, by way of emphasis, the law. This was held by the Jews in such veneration, that they would not allow it to be laid upon the bed of any sick person, lest it should be polluted by touching the dead. (See LAW.)—Hend. Buck.

MOSEROTH, or MOSERAH; (NUM. 32: 30.) a station of the Israelites, probably the same as Hazereth, or Hazerah, near Kadesh, and mount Hor. Burckhardt mentions a valley east of mount Hor, called Wady Mousa, which is probably a corruption of Moserah. (See EXODUS.)—Calmet.

MOSES. This illustrious legislator of the Israelites was of the tribe of Levi, in the line of Koath and Amram, whose son he was, and therefore in the fourth generation after the settlement of the Israelites in Egypt. The time of his birth is ascertained by the exode of the Israelites, when Moses was eighty years old, Exod. 7: 7.

By a singular providence, the infant Moses, when exposed on the river Nile, through fear of the royal decree, after his mother had hid him three months, because he was a goodly child, was taken up and adopted by Pharaoh's daughter, and nursed by his own mother, whom she hired at the suggestion of his sister Miriam. Thus did he find an asylum in the very palace of his intended destroyer; while his intercourse with his own family and nation was still most naturally, though unexpectedly, maintained: so mysterious are the ways of Heaven. And while he was instructed "in all the wisdom of the Egyptians," and bred up in the midst of a luxurious court, he acquired at home the knowledge of the promised redemption of Israel; and, "by faith" in the Redeemer Christ, "refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter; choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season: esteeming the reproach of Christ," or persecution for Christ's sake, "greater riches than the treasures of Egypt: for he had respect to the recompense of reward," or looked forward to a future state, Exod. 2: 1—10. Acts 7: 20—22. Heb. 11: 23—26.

2. When Moses was grown to manhood, and was full forty years old, he was moved by a divine intimation, as it seems, to undertake the deliverance of his countrymen: "for he supposed that his brethren would have understood how that God, by his hand, would give them deliverance; but they understood not." For when, in the excess of his zeal to redress their grievances, he had slain an Egyptian, who injured one of them, in which he probably went beyond his commission, and afterwards endeavored to reconcile two of them that were at variance, they rejected his mediation; and "the man who had done wrong said, Who made thee a judge and a ruler over us? Intendest thou to kill me, as thou killest the Egyptian yesterday?" So Moses, finding it was known, and that Pharaoh sought to slay him, fled for his life to the land of Midian, in Arabia Petraea, where he married Zipporah, the daughter of Jethro, or Reuel, prince and priest of Midian; and, as a shepherd, kept his flocks in the vicinity of mount Horeb, or Sinai, for forty years, Exod. 2: 11—21. 3: 1. 18: 5. Num. 10: 29. Acts 7: 23—30.

During this long exile Moses was trained in the school of humble circumstances for that arduous mission which he had prematurely anticipated; and, instead of the unthinking zeal which at first actuated him, learned to distrust himself. His backwardness, afterwards, to undertake that mission for which he was destined from the womb, was no less remarkable than his forwardness before, Exod. 4: 10—13.

3. At length, when the oppression of the Israelites was come to the full, and they cried to God for succor, and the king was dead, and all the men in Egypt that sought his life, "the God of glory" appeared to Moses in a flame of fire, from the midst of a bush, and announced himself as "the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob," under the titles of Jahoh and Eljeh, expressive of his unity and sameness; and commissioned him first to make known to the Israelites the divine will for their deliverance; and next to go with the elders of Israel to Pharaoh, requiring him, in the name of "the Lord, the God of the Hebrews, to suffer the people to go three days' journey into the wilderness, to sacrifice unto the Lord their God," after such sacrifices had been long intermitted during their bondage; for the Egyptians had sunk into bestial polytheism; and would have stoned them, had they attempted to sacrifice their principal divinities, the apis, or bull, &c., in the land itself: fortelling, also, the opposition they would meet with from the king, the mighty signs and wonders that would finally compel his assent, and their spoiling of the Egyptians, by asking or demanding of them (not borrowing) jewels of silver, and jewels of gold, and raiment, (by way of wages or compensation for their services,) as originally declared to Abraham, that "they should go out from thence with great substance," Gen. 15: 14. Exod. 2: 23—25. 3: 2—22. 8: 25, 26.

4. To vouch his divine commission to the Israelites, God enabled Moses to work three signal miracles: 1. Turning his rod into a serpent, and restoring it again; 2. Making his hand leprous as snow, when he first drew it out of his bosom, and restoring it sound as before when he next drew it out; and, 3. Turning the water of the river into blood. And the people believed the signs, and the promised deliverance, and worshipped. For the conduct of Moses as the deliverer and lawgiver of the Israelites, see PHARAOH, PLAGUES OF EGYPT, RED SEA, and LAW.

5. At mount Sinai the Lord was pleased to make Moses, the redeemer of Israel, an eminent type of the Redeemer of the world. "I will raise them up a prophet from among their brethren, like unto thee, and will put my words in his mouth; and he shall speak unto them all that I shall command him: and it shall come to pass, that whosoever will not hearken unto my words, which he shall speak in my name, I will require it of him:" which Moses communicated to the people. "The Lord thy God will raise up unto thee a prophet, from the midst of thee, of thy brethren, like unto me: unto him shall ye hearken," Deut. 18: 15—19. This prophet like unto Moses was our Lord Jesus Christ, who was by birth a Jew, of the middle class of the people, and resembled his predecessor in personal intercourse with God, miracles, and legislation, which no other prophet did, (Deut. 34: 10—12.) and to whom God, at his transfiguration, required the world to hearken, Matt. 17: 5. See also Acts 3: 22.

6. The offence of Moses, at Meribah, (Num. 20: 1—13. 27: 14.) as far as may be collected from so concise an account, seems to have been, 1. He distrusted or disbelieved that water could be produced from the rock only by speaking to it; which was a higher miracle than he had performed before at Rephidim, Exod. 17: 6. 2. He unnecessarily smote the rock twice; thereby betraying an unwarrantable impatience. 3. He did not, at least in the phrase he used, ascribe the glory of the miracle wholly to God, but rather to himself and his brother: "Must we fetch you water out of this rock?" And he denominated them "rebels" against his and his brother's authority, which, although an implied act of rebellion against God, ought to have been stated, as on a former occasion: "Ye have been rebels against the Lord, from the day that I knew you" (Deut. 9: 24.) which he spake without blame. See Ps. 106: 33. Deut. 3: 23—27.

7. The faculties of this illustrious legislator, both of mind and body, were not impaired at the age of a hundred and twenty years, when he died. "His eye was not dim, nor his natural strength abated;" (Deut. 34: 7.) and the noblest of all his compositions was his Song, or the Divine Ode, which bishop Lowth elegantly styles, Cyanea Oratio, "the Dying Swan's Oration." His death took place after the Lord had shown him, from the top of Pisgah, a distant view of the promised land, throughout its whole extent. "He then buried his body in a valley opposite Beth-peor, in the land of Moab; but no man knoweth his sepulchre unto this day;" observes the sacred historian, probably Ezra, who annexed the circumstances of his death to the book of Deuteronomy, 34: 6. (See EZRA, and MICHAEL.)

8. The history of Moses was so famous for many ages, in almost all countries, that it is no wonder writers of different nations have each represented it after his own manner. The Orientals, the ancient Grecians, the Egyptians, the Chaldeans, the Romans, have all made additions to his history. Some of them have improved on the miracles that the Scripture relates concerning his life; others have disguised his story by adding to it not only false, but mean and trifling circumstances.

His institutes have not only been maintained for several thousands of years, and by Jews, however dispersed in all parts of the globe, but they retain a vigor that promises a perpetuity, unless disturbed by some omnipotent interference. They have withstood the fury of persecution, and the more dangerous snares of seduction. They are essentially the same in China and in India, as in Persia and in Europe. The character and life of this legislator is, indeed, one of the finest subjects for the pen of a philosophical historian, who is at the same time a competent antiquary.

9. So marked and hallowed is the character of this, the most eminent of mere men, that it has often been successfully made the basis of an irresistible argument for the truth of his divine mission. Thus Cellérier observes: "Every imposture has an object in view, and an aim more or less selfish. Men practise deceit for money, for pleasure, or for glory. If, by a strange combination, the love of mankind ever entered into the mind of an impostor, doubtless, even then, he has contrived to reconcile, at least, his own selfish interests with those of the human race. If men deceive others, for the sake of causing their own opinions or their own party to triumph, they may sometimes, perhaps, forget their own interests during the struggle, but they again remember them when the victory is achieved. It is a general rule, that no impostor forgets himself long. But Moses forgot himself, and forgot himself to the last. Yet there is no middle supposition. If Moses was not a divinely inspired messenger, he was an impostor in the strongest sense of the term. It is not, as in the case of Numa, a slight and single fraud, designed to secure some good end, that we have to charge him with, but a series of deceptions, many of which were gross; a profound, dishonest, perfidious, sanguinary dissimulation, continued for the space of forty years. When we consider these several things; when we reflect on all the ministry of Moses, on his life, on his death, on his character, on his abilities, and his success; we are powerfully convinced that he was the messenger of God. If we consider him only as an able legislator, as a Lycurgus, as a Numa, his actions are inexplicable: we find not in him the affections, the interests, the views which usually belong to the human heart. The simplicity, the harmony, the verity of this natural character are gone; they give place to an incoherent union of ardor and imposture; of daring and of timidity, of incapacity and genius, of cruelty and sensibility. No! Moses was inspired by God; he received from God the law which he left his countrymen."—Watson; Calmet; Jones.

MOSES, (Books of.) To Moses we owe that important portion of Holy Scripture, the Pentateuch, which brings us acquainted with the creation of the world, the entrance of sin and death, the first promises of redemption, the flood, the peopling of the postdiluvian earth, and the origin of nations, the call of Abraham, and the giving of the law. We have, indeed, in it the early history of religion, and a key to all the subsequent dispensations of God to man. The genuineness and authenticity of these most venerable and important books have been established by various writers; but the following remarks upon the veracity of the writings of Moses have the merit of compressing much argument into few words:—1. There is a minuteness in the details of the Mosaic writings, which bespeaks their truth; for it often bespeaks the eye-witness, as in the adventures of the wilderness; and often seems intended to supply directions to the artificer, as in the construction of the tabernacle. 2. There are touches of nature in the narrative which bespeak its truth, for it is not easy to regard them otherwise than as strokes from the life; as where "the mixed multitude," whether half-castes or Egyptians, are the first to sigh for the cucumbers and melons of Egypt, and to spread discontent through the camp; (Num. 11: 4.) as the miserable exultation of himself which Aaron attempts, with all the cowardice of conscious guilt: "I cast into the fire, and there came out this calf;" the fire, to be sure, being in the fault, Exod. 32: 24. 3. There are certain little inconveniences represented as turning up unexpectedly, that bespeak truth in the story; for they are just such accidents as are characteristic of the working of a new system and untried machinery. What is to be done with the man who is found gathering sticks on the Sabbath day? Num. 15: 32. (Could an impostor have devised such a trifle?) How is the inheritance of the daughters of Zelophehad to be disposed of, there being no heir-male? (Num. 36: 2.)—either of them inconsiderable matters in themselves, but both giving occasion to very important laws; the one touching life, and the other property. 4. There is a simplicity in the manner of Moses, when telling his tale, which bespeaks its truth; no parade of language, no pomp of circumstance even in his miracles, a modesty and dignity throughout all. Let us but compare him in any trying scene with Josephus; his description, for instance, of the passage through the Red sea, (Exod. 14.) of the murmuring of the Israelites and the supply of quails and manna, with the same as given by the Jewish historian, or rhetorician we might rather say, and the force of the observation will be felt. 5. There is a candor in the treatment of his subject by Moses, which bespeaks his truth; as when he tells of his own want of eloquence, which unfitted him for a leader, (Exod. 4: 10.) his own want of faith, which prevented him from entering the promised land,

(Num. 20: 12.) the idolatry of Aaron his brother, (Exod. 32: 21.) the profaneness of Nadab and Abihu, his nephews, (Lev. 10.) the disaffection and punishment of Miriam, his sister, Num. 12: 1. 6. There is a disinterestedness in his conduct, which bespeaks him to be a man of truth; for though he had sons, he apparently takes no measures during his life to give them offices of trust or profit; and at his death he appoints as his successor one who had no claims upon him, either of alliance, of clanship, or of blood. 7. There are certain prophetical passages in the writings of Moses, which bespeak their truth; as, several respecting the future Messiah, and the very sublime and literal one respecting the final fall of Jerusalem, Deut. 28. 8. There is a simple key supplied by these writings, to the meaning of many ancient traditions current amongst the heathens, though greatly disguised, which is another circumstance that bespeaks their truth: as, the golden age; the garden of the Hesperides; the fruit-tree in the midst of the garden which the dragon guarded; the destruction of mankind by a flood, all except two persons, and those righteous persons, the rainbow, "which Jupiter set in the cloud, a sign to men;" the seventh day a sacred day; with many others, all conspiring to establish the reality of the facts which Moses relates, because tending to show that vestiges of the like present themselves in the traditional history of the world at large. 9. The concurrence which is found between the writings of Moses and those of the New Testament bespeaks their truth; the latter constantly appealing to them, being indeed but the completion of the system which the others are the first to put forth. Surely it is a very improbable thing, that two dispensations, separated by an interval of some fifteen hundred years, each exhibiting prophecies of its own, since fulfilled; each asserting miracles of its own, on strong evidence of its own; that two dispensations, with such individual claims to be believed, should also be found to stand in the closest relation to one another, and yet both turn out impostures after all. 10. Above all, there is a comparative purity in the theology and morality of the Pentateuch, which argues not only its truth, but its high original; for how else are we to account for a system like that of Moses, in such an age and amongst such a people; that the doctrine of the unity, the self-existence, the providence, the perfections of the great God of heaven and earth, should thus have blazed forth (how far more brightly than even in the vaunted schools of Athens at its most refined era!) from the midst of a nation, of themselves ever plunging into gross and grovelling idolatry; and that principles of social duty, of benevolence, and of self-restraint, extending even to the thoughts of the heart, should have been the produce of an age, which the very provisions of the Levitical law itself show to have been full of savage and heinous abominations? Exod. 3: 14. 20: 3—17. Lev. 19: 2, 18. Deut. 6: 4. 30: 6. Such are some of the internal evidences for the veracity of the books of Moses.

Innocuos ambos, outores numinis ambos;

Still, after all, says Mr. Blunt, unbelievers may start difficulties; this I dispute not; difficulties, too, which we may not always be able to answer, though I think we may be always able to neutralize them. It may be a part of our trial, that such difficulties should exist and be encountered; for there can be no reason why temptations should not be provided for the natural pride of our understanding, as well as for the natural lusts of our flesh. To many, indeed, they would be the more formidable of the two; perhaps to the angels who kept not their first estate they proved so. With such facts, however, before me, as these which I have submitted to my readers, I can come to no conclusion but one,—that when we read the writings of Moses, we read no cunningly devised fables, but solemn and safe records of great and marvellous events, which court examination, and sustain it; records of such apparent veracity and faithfulness, that I can understand our Lord to have spoken almost without a figure, when he said that he who believed not Moses, neither would he be persuaded though one rose from the dead.—Watson; Calme

MOSHEIM, (JOHN LAURENCE, D. D.) a German Protestant theologian, was born, in 1695, at Lubeck, and, after having filled professorships in Denmark and Brunswick, died in 1755, professor of theology and chancellor of the university of Gottingen. His sermons were much admired for their pure, elegant, and mellifluous style. In his private character he is said to have resembled Fenelon. He wrote above a hundred and sixty works, among which may be mentioned, The Morality of the Holy Scriptures; and an Ecclesiastical History; the latter of which was translated by Dr. Maclaine, and still more recently in closer conformity to the simple style of the original, by Dr. Murdock, of New Haven, Connecticut.—Davenport.

MOSQUE, (Arab. Mesjed;) a temple or place of religious worship among the Mohammedans. All mosques are square buildings, generally constructed of stone. Before the chief gate there is a square court paved with white marble, and low galleries round it, whose roof is supported by marble pillars. In these galleries the Turks wash themselves before they go into the mosque. In each mosque there is a great number of lamps; and between these hang many crystal rings, ostrich's eggs, and other curiosities, which, when the lamps are lighted, make a fine show. As it is not lawful to enter the mosque with stockings or shoes on, the pavements are covered with pieces of stuff sewed together, each being wide enough to hold a row of men kneeling, sitting, or prostrate. The women are not allowed to enter the mosque, but stay in the porches without. About every mosque there are six high towers, called minarets, each of which has three little open galleries, one above another: these towers, as well as the mosques, are covered with lead, and adorned with gilding and other ornaments; and from thence, instead of a bell, the people are called to prayers by certain officers appointed for that purpose. Most of the mosques have a kind of hospital, in which travellers of what religion soever are entertained three days. Each mosque has also a place called tarbe, which is the burying-place of its founders; within which is a tomb six or seven feet long, covered with green velvet or satin; at the ends of which are two tapers, and round it several seats for those who read the Koran, and pray for the souls of the deceased.—Head. Buck.

NOTE. Small faults and errors discovered in others through the magnifying medium of prejudice, are compared by our Lord to motes in the eye, which the censorious only are proud of detecting, Matt. 7: 1—5. (See EYE, and JUDGING.)

MOTH; (oish, Job 4: 19, and ashsh, Job. 13: 28. 27: 18. Psalm 6: 7. 31: 9, 10. 39: 11. Isaiah 50: 9. Hosea 5: 12.) The clothes moth is the linca argentea; of a white, shining silver, or pearl color. It is clothed with shells, fourteen in number, and these are scaly. Albin asserts this to be the insect that eats woollen stuffs; and says that it is produced from a gray speckled moth, that flies by night, creeps among woollens, and there lays her eggs, which, after a little time, are hatched as worms; and in this state they feed on their habitation, till they change into a chrysalis, and thence emerge into moths. "The young moth, or moth-worm," says the abbé Pluche, "upon leaving the egg which a papilio had lodged upon a piece of stuff commodious for her purpose, finds a proper place of residence, grows and feeds upon the nap, and likewise builds with it an apartment, which is fixed to the ground work of the stuff with several cords and a little glue. From an aperture in this habitation, the moth-worm devours and demolishes all about him; and, when he has cleared the place, he draws out all the fastenings of his tent; after which he carries it to some little distance, and then fixes it with the slender cords in a new situation. In this manner he continues to live at our expense, till he is satisfied with his food, at which period he is first transformed into the nympha, and then changed into the papilio."

The allusions to this insect in the sacred writings are very striking: "Fear ye not the reproach of men, neither be ye afraid of their revilings. For the moth so eateth them up like a garment, and the worm shall eat them like wool." They shall perish with as little noise as a garment under the tooth of a moth, Isaiah 51: 7, 8. In the prophecies of Hosea, God himself says, "I will be as a moth unto Ephraim, and as a lion;" that is, I will send silent and secret judgments upon him, which shall imperceptibly waste his beauty, corrode his power, and diminish his strength, and will finish his destruction with open and irresistible calamities. The same allusion is involved in the direction of our Lord to his disciples: "Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon the earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal. But lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal," Matt. 6: 19, 20. The Jews had treasures of raiment; as well as of fruits, of corn, of wine, of oil, of honey, (Jer. 41: 8.) and of gold, silver, and brass, (Ezek. 33: 4. Dan. 11: 43.) upon which the persevering industry of the moth could make no impression. (See HABRS IN DRESS.) It is also likely, that by "moth" our Lord meant to suggest all the kinds of insects which devour or spoil the different kinds of property, which were treasured up for the future. These, in warm countries, are very numerous and destructive.—Watson.

MOTHER. God has declared in almost every part of his living creation, that the mother for a certain time is the natural protector of her offspring. To woman he has been particularly emphatic, by implanting in her affections which are rarely subdued, and by giving her an organization most wonderfully fitted for the exercise of her best and most enviable feelings. It truly requires all the affection of a fond mother to administer duly to the numerous wants of a young child. The care really essential to its health and comfort, consists in a due attention to its food, clothing, and cleanliness, and the establishment of regular and useful habits, as regards exercise, exposure, sleep, and evacuations; as well as whatever belongs to the higher education of the moral feelings and religious principles. To constitute a mother, therefore, in the best sense of the term, much more is required than giving birth to progeny—it requires qualifications both rare and estimable. It exacts a patient endurance of fatigue, and anxious solicitude for their welfare, as well as a submission to privations, which nothing renders supportable but a mother's love. What a responsibility, also, rests upon her office! It has been said with some truth, that "every man is nothing more nor less than what his mother has made him."

There is nothing indeed more worthy of admiration, than that imperious sentiment, at once so mild and so tender, which unites the mother to her child; and which as it were makes but one existence of two individuals, so different in age, and apparently in necessities. Children would perish, and with them the whole human race would be extinct, did not woman take an active and continual care of them, did she not consecrate to them every moment, did she not sacrifice to them her whole life, health, youth, beauty, ease, every thing.

What wonder then that this vivid sentiment should be so often alluded to in the sacred volume, to illustrate the love of God to his people, and of Christian ministers to the souls of men? See particularly those exquisite passages, Isa. 49: 15. 1 Cor. 3: 2. Gal. 4: 19, 20. 1 Thess. 2: 7, 8. (See MARRIAGE; RELIGIOUS EDUCATION.)

Mother is sometimes used, also, for a metropolis, the capital city of a country, or of a tribe; and sometimes for a whole people, 2 Sam. 20: 19. Isa. 50: 1. Gal. 4: 26. Rev. 17: 5.

"A mother in Israel" signifies a woman, whom God uses to cherish or deliver his people. This name is given to Deborah, Judg. 5: 7. Wisdom in the Apocrypha calls herself the mother of chaste love. The earth, to which at our death we must all return, is called the mother of all men. Job has a still stronger image, Job. 17: 14.—Calmet; Maygrier; Dewees on Children.

MOTIVE, that which moves, excites, or invites the mind to volition. It may be one thing singly, or many things conjunctly. It may be adequate or inadequate; strong or weak. It may also be internal or external. Internal motives, or such as arise from the affections, are again distinguishable into pure and impure. See MORAL AGENCY, and WILL; Edwards, and Upham on the Will; Toplady's Works; Lond. Chris. Observer.—Hend. Buck.

MOTIVITY; the capacity of being influenced by motives; moral agency. (See MORAL AGENCY.)

MOUNTAIN. Judea is a mountainous country, but the mountains are generally beautiful, fruitful, and cultivated. Moses says, (Deut. 32: 13.) that the rocks of its mountains produce oil and honey, by a figure of speech, which elegantly shows their fertility. He says, (Deut. 8: 7, 9.) that in the mountains of Palestine spring excellent fountains; and that their bowels yield iron and brass. He desired earnestly of the Lord, that he might see the fine mountains of Judea and Libanus, Deut. 3: 25. They were sometimes retired to as places of security.

The most famous mountains mentioned in Scripture, are SEIR, in Idumea; HOREB, near Sinai, in Arabia Petrea; SINAI, in Arabia Petrea; HOR, in Idumea; GILBOA, south of the valley of Jezreel; NEBO, a mountain of Abarim; TABOR, in Lower Galilee; EN-GEDI, near the Dead sea; LIBANUS and ANTI-LIBANUS; GERIZIM, in Samaria; EBAL, near to Gerizim; GILEAD, beyond Jordan; AMALEK, in Ephraim; MORIAH, where the temple was built; PARAN, in Arabia Petrea; GAHASH, in Ephraim; OLIVET; PISGAE, beyond Jordan; HERMON, beyond Jordan, near Libanus; CARMEL, near the Mediterranean sea, between Dora and Ptolemais.—Calmet.

MOUNTAIN MEN. (See SYNOD; REFORMED PRESEBYTERIAN.)

MOURNING; sorrow, grief. (See SORROW.)—H. Buck.

MOURNING; a particular dress or habit, worn to signify grief on some melancholy occasion, particularly the death of friends, or of great public characters.

The modes of mourning are various in various countries; as also are the colors that obtain for that end. In Europe, the ordinary color for mourning is black; in China, it is white; in Turkey, blue or violet; in Egypt yellow; in Ethiopia, brown. Each people pretend to have their reasons for the particular color of their mourning. White is supposed to denote purity; yellow, that death is the end of human hopes, as leaves when they fall, and flowers when they fade, become yellow; brown denotes the earth, whither the dead return; black, the privation of life, as being the privation of light; blue expresses the happiness which it is hoped the deceased enjoys; and purple or violet, sorrow on the one side, and hope on the other, as being a mixture of black and blue. For an account of the mourning of the Hebrews, see Lev. 19. and 21. Jer. 16: 6. Num. 20. Deut. 34: 8. (See BURIAL, and DEAD.)

The propriety of following the customs prevalent on this point, has been of late very extensively called in question, by Christians in this country. Many individuals and religious bodies have objected against it. 1. That it is a useless ceremony. 2. That it involves needless expense, especially to the poor. 3. That the bustle of preparing it interferes with the moral and religious purposes of affliction.—Hend. Buck; Chris. Watchman, 1830.

MOUSE; (Heb. achbar, in Chaldee acabar, probably the same with the aiarbai of the Arabians, or the jerboa, described by Bruce, Lev. 11: 29. 1 Sam. 6: 4, 5, 11, 18. Isa. 46: 17.) All interpreters acknowledge that the Hebrew word achbar signifies a "mouse," and more especially a "field mouse." Moses declares it to be unclean, which insinuates that it was sometimes eaten; and, indeed, it is affirmed that the Jews were so oppressed with famine during the siege of Jerusalem by the Romans, that, notwithstanding this prohibition, they were compelled to eat dogs, mice, and rats. Isa. 66: 17, justly reproaches the Jews in his time with eating the flesh of mice and other things that were impure and abominable. It is known what spoil was made by mice in the fields of the Philistines, 1 Sam. 6: 5, 6. Bochart has collected many curious accounts relative to the terrible devastation made by these animals.—Watson.

MOUTH. The Hebrews, by a beautiful pleonasm, often say, he opened his mouth, and spoke, sung, cursed, &c. Also, that God opens the mouth of the prophets, puts words into their mouth, that is, bids them speak what he inspires them with. To inquire at the mouth of the Lord, is to consult him, Josh. 9: 14. To "set their mouth against the heavens," (Psal. 73: 9.) is to speak arrogantly, insolently, and blasphemously of God.

God directs that his law should be always in the mouth of his people; i. e. that they should commune frequently with one another about it, and constantly inculcate it upon their children. "From the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh;" (Matt. 12: 34.) i. e. our discourses are the overflowing, or echo of the sentiments of our hearts.

Isaiah says of the Messiah, (11: 4.) "He shall smite the earth with the rod of his mouth, and with the breath of his lips shall he slay the wicked." These expressions denote his sovereign authority and absolute power, and that it requires only one breath to destroy his enemies; perhaps by his judicial sentence.—Calmet.

MUFTI; the chief of the ecclesiastical order, or prime of the Mussulman religion. The authority of the mufti is very great in the Ottoman empire; for even the sultan himself, if he will preserve any appearance of religion, cannot, without first hearing his opinion, put any person to death, or so much as inflict any corporal punishment. In all actions, and especially criminal ones, his opinion is required, by giving him a writing in which the case is stated under feigned names, which he subscribes with the words Our, or Olmaz, i. e. he shall or sha. not be punished.

Such outward honor is paid to the mufti, that the grand seignor himself rises up to him, and advances seven steps towards him when he comes into his presence. He alone has the honor of kissing the sultan's left shoulder, whilst the prime vizier kisses only the hem of his garment.

When the grand seignor addresses any writing to the mufti, he gives him the following titles:—"To the Esad, the wisest of the wise; instructed in all knowledge; the most excellent of excellents; abstaining from things unlawful; the spring of virtue and true science; heir of the prophetic doctrines; resolver of the problems of faith; revealer of the orthodox articles; key of the treasures of truth; the light to doubtful allegories; strengthened with the grace of the Supreme Legislator of Mankind. May the Most High God perpetuate thy favors."

The election of the mufti is solely in the grand seignor, who presents him with a vest of rich sables, and allows him a salary of a thousand aspers a day, which is about five pounds sterling. Besides fias, he has the disposal of certain benefices belonging to the royal mosques, which he makes no scruple of selling to the best advantage; and, on his admission to his office, he is complimented by the agents of the bashas, who make him the usual presents, which generally amount to a very considerable sum.

Whatever regard was formerly paid to the mufti, it is now become very little more than form. If he interprets the law, or gives sentence contrary to the sultan's pleasure, he is immediately displaced, and a more pious person put in his room. If he is convicted of treason, or any very great crime, he is put into a mortar kept for that purpose in the seven towers of Constantinople, and pounded to death. (See MORTAR.)—Hend. Buck.

MUGGLETONIANS; the followers of Ludovic Muggleton, a journeyman tailor, who, with his companion Reeves, (a person of equal obscurity,) set up for great prophets, in the time of Cromwell. They pretended to absolve or condemn whom they pleased; and gave out that they were the two last witnesses spoken of in the Revelation, who were to appear previous to the final destruction of the world. They affirmed that there was no devil at all without the body of man or woman; that the devil is man's spirit of unclean reason and cursed imagination; that the ministry in this world, whether prophetic or ministerial, is all a lie and abomination to the Lord; with a variety of other vain and inconsistent tenets.—Hend. Buck; Williams.

MUEHLENBERG, (HENRY MELCHIOR, D. D.), the founder of the German Lutheran church in the United States, was born at Einbeck, in Hanover, Germany, in 1711, and came to Philadelphia, where he was the pastor of a German Lutheran church forty-five years, and distinguished for his piety and learning. He died in 1787, aged seventy-six.—Allen.

MUEHLENBERG, (HENRY ERNST, D. D.), a Lutheran divine and botanist, the son of Rev. Henry Muehlenberg, was born in New Providence, Montgomery county, Pennsylvania, November 17, 1753. In 1763, he was sent to Halle with his two elder brothers to finish his education. On his return in 1770, he was ordained at the early age of seventeen, and in 1774 appointed one of the assistants of his father in the Philadelphia congregation. In 1780, he accepted a call from Lancaster, where he lived about thirty-five years in the exemplary discharge of the duties of his office. He died of the apoplexy, May 23, 1815, in the rich peace and hope of the Christian, aged sixty-one.

While he was a learned theologian and well acquainted with the ancient languages, and skilful also in medicine, chemistry, and mineralogy, he was particularly distinguished for his knowledge of botany. He was induced first to cultivate this science in 1777, when he was driven from Philadelphia in consequence of its being occupied by the British. From this time he corresponded with many learned botanists in Europe and America. Of many learned societies he was a member. His herbarium was purchased and presented to the American Philosophical society. He published Catalogus Plantarum Amer. Septentr. 1713; Descriptio Ueberior Graminum. &c. 1816. He left Flora Lancastriensis in manuscript. Ency. Amer.; Benedict's History of all Religions.—Allen.

MULBERRY-TREE; (baca, 2 Sam. 5: 23, 24. 1 Chron. 14: 14, 15. Psalm 84: 7.) The LXX., in Chronicles, render the word by οπίον, "pear-trees;" so Aquila and the Vulgate both in Samuel and Chronicles, "pyrorum." Others translate it the "mulberry-tree." More probably it is the large shrub which the Arabs still call "baca;" and which gave name to the valley where it abounded. Of this *vall*ey Celsius remarks, that it was "rugged and embarrassed with bushes and stones, which could not be passed through without labor and tears;" referring to Psalm 84: 7, and the "rough valley;" (Deut. 21: 4.) and he quotes from a manuscript of Aba'l Fideli a description of the tree which grew there, and mentions it as bearing a fruit of an acrid taste.

The passage in 2 Sam. 5: 23, 24, Dr. Harris thinks should read, "When thou hearest a noise as of many people marching, upon the hills of Bochim, then fall immediately upon the enemy."—Watson.

MULE; the offspring of two animals of different species, as a horse and an ass.

There is no probability that the Jews bred mules, because it was forbidden to couple creatures of different species, Lev. 19: 19. But they were not forbidden to use them. Thus we may observe, especially after David's time, that mules, male and female, were common among the Hebrews: formerly they used only male and female asses, 2 Sam. 13: 29. 18: 9. 1 Kings 1: 33, 38, 44. 10: 25. 18: 5, &c.

Some have thought that Anah, son of Zibeon, of the posterity of Seir, being in the desert, found out the manner of breeding mules. This opinion was much espoused by the ancients. But Jerome, who notices it in his Hebraical questions on Genesis, translates, "that Anah found hot springs." The Syriac says, a fountain; but rather it signifies a people whom Anah surprised and defeated. (See ANAH.)—Calmet.

MUNSON, (ENEAS, M. D.), a Christian physician, was born in New Haven, June 24, 1734; graduated at Yale college in 1753; and, having been a tutor, was a chaplain in the army in 1755 on Long Island. His health induced him to study medicine with John Darby, of East-hampton. He practised physic at Bedford in 1756, and removed in 1760 to New Haven, where he died, June 16, 1826, aged nearly ninety-two.

For more than half a century he had a high reputation as a physician, and was in the practice seventy years. Of the medical society of Connecticut he was the president. He was a man of piety from an early period his life. At the bedside of his patients he was accustomed to commend them to God in prayer. It was with joyous Christian hope that this venerable old man went down to the dead. Thacher.—Allen.

MURDER; the act of wilfully and feloniously killing a person upon malice or forethought. (See LAW.)

Heart murder is the secret wishing or designing the death of any man; yea, the Scripture saith, "Whosoever hateth his brother is a murderer;" 1 John 3: 15. We have instances of this kind of murder in Ahab, (1 Kings 22: 9.) Jezebel, (2 Kings 19: 2.) the Jews, (Mark 11: 18.) David, (1 Samuel 25: 21, 22.) Jonah, ch. 4: 1, 4.

Murder is contrary to the authority of God, the sovereign disposer of life; (Deut. 32: 39.) to the goodness of God, who gives it; (Job 10: 12.) to the law of nature; (Acts 16: 28.) to the love a man owes to himself, his neighbor, and society at large. Not but that life may be taken away, as in lawful war; (1 Chron. 5: 22.) by the hand of the civil magistrate for capital crimes; (Deut. 17: 8, 10.) and in self-defence. (See SELF-DEFENCE.)

According to the divine law, murder is to be punished with death, Gen. 9: 6. Deut. 19: 11, 12. 1 Kings 2: 28, 29. It is remarkable that God often gives up murderers to the torments of a guilty conscience, Gen. 4: 13, 15, 23, 24. Such are followed with many instances of divine vengeance; (2 Sam. 12: 9, 10.) their lives are often shortened; (Psalm 55: 23.) and judgments for their sin are oftentimes transmitted to posterity, Gen. 49: 7. 2 Sam. 21: 1.

When a dead body was found in the fields, and the murderer was unknown, Moses commanded that the elders and judges of the neighboring places should resort to the spot, Deut. 21: 1—8. The elders of the city nearest to it were to take a heifer, which had never yet borne the yoke, and were to lead it into some rude and uncultivated place, which had not been ploughed or sowed, where they were to cut its throat; the priests of the Lord, and the elders and magistrates of the city, were to come near the dead boy, and washing their hands over the heifer that had been slain, they were to say: "Our hands have not shed this blood, nor have our eyes seen it shed. Lord, be favorable to thy people Israel, and impute not to us this blood which has been shed in the midst of our country." This ceremony may inform us what idea they had of the heinousness of murder, and how much horror they conceived at this crime; also, their fear that God might avenge it on the whole country; and the pollution that the country was supposed to contract, by the blood spilt in it, unless it were expiated or avenged on him who had occasioned it, if he could be discovered. Comp. Psalm 73: 13; also the action of Pilate, Matt. 27: 4. Calnet; John; Jones; Dwight's Theology.—Hend. Buck.

MURMURING; a complaint made for wrong supposed to have been received. Paul frequently forbids murmuring, 1 Cor. 10: 10. Phil. 2: 14. God severely punished the Hebrews who murmured in the desert, and was more than once on the point of forsaking them, and even of destroying them, had not Moses appeased his anger by earnest prayer, Num. 11: 33, 31. 12: 14: 30, 31. 16: 3. 21: 4-6. Psal. 78: 30. (See RESTORATION.)—Calnet.

MURRAY, (JOHN,) first Universalist minister in Boston, was born at Alton, Hampshire county, England, about 1741. His father was an Episcopalian; his mother a Presbyterian. They removed from Alton to Ireland. In early life he believed the doctrine of election; then he became a Methodist preacher in Mr. Wesley's connexion; and afterwards he was attached to Mr. Whitfield. Repairing to London, he soon forgot the character of a minister. Good company, music, dancing, Vauxhall, and the play houses intoxicated him. He says, "I plunged into a vortex of pleasure."

Visiting a young lady to convert her from the error of Universalism, the following was the argumentation. She asked, For not believing what is an unbeliever damned? He replied, For not believing that Jesus Christ is his complete Savior. She again asked, Must the unbeliever believe that Jesus Christ is his Savior? Must he believe a lie? Is Christ the Savior of the unbeliever? By this argument he was overwhelmed. His own erroneous definition of faith was indeed refuted by the questions of the lady; but, instead of abandoning that fundamental error, he only followed it out to its natural consequences, and became a Universalist.

Having lost his wife and child, he came to America in poverty, in September, 1770. His talents and eloquent enthusiasm, combined with many just and evangelical sentiments, soon raised him to popularity. He preached at Brunswick, New Jersey, Newport, and Providence, and first in Boston October 30, 1773; afterwards in Newburyport and New London, in New York and Pennsylvania. In May, 1775, he was a chaplain in a Rhode Island regiment. After preaching in Gloucester, he was established in Boston about the year 1785, and passed the remainder of his life there. After six years of helplessness he died in peace, September 3, 1815, aged seventy-four.

Mr. Murray, as well as Mr. Winchester, was a Trinitarian. He regarded Winchester, however, as a believer in purgatorial satisfaction, and as teaching that every man is his own Savior. He himself believed that myriads of men would rise to the resurrection of damnation, and would call on the rocks to hide them from the wrath of the Lamb; yet considered that damnation as ending at the judgment-day. He supposed, that in the day of judgment the devil and his angels would be placed, as the goats, on the left hand of the judge, and all men on the right hand, in most obvious contradiction to the Scripture, which says, that "all nations" will be gathered, to be separated, the just from the unjust. This amounts in fact to a denial of the future judgment.

Since his death Mr. Balfour, with Mr. Ballou and others, has explicitly maintained, that there will be no future reckoning day. See 2 Tim. 3: 13. At last this error of denying a future judgment, and thus subverting the moral government of God, appeared so great and perilous to a number of Universalist ministers, who assert a future retribution and the punishment, though not everlasting, of the wicked, that in August, 1831, they announced their full and entire separation from the denomination of Universalists, and the establishment of a religious community by the name of the "Massachusetts Association of Universal Restorationists." (See UNIVERSAL RESTORATIONISTS.) Mr. Murray published Letters and Sketches of Sermons, 3 vols. His Life, by himself, was published in 1816, and two editions have been published since his death. Life of Murray, ed. 1833.—Allen.

MURRAY, (LINDLEY,) a grammarian, and member of the society of Friends, was born, in 1745, at Smetara, near Lancaster, in Pennsylvania; was originally an American barrister, but quitted the bar to become a merchant; acquired a competency by his mercantile pursuits; settled in England, and became known by his school books; and died January 10, 1826. Among his works are, English Grammar; Exercises; Key; Spelling Book; and Reader; two French Selections; the Power of Religion on the Mind; and the Duty and Benefit of Reading the Scriptures.—Davenport.

MUSCULUS, (WOLFGANGUS,) a celebrated German divine and reformer, was born at Dieuze, upon Lorrain, September 8, 1497. His father was a poor cooper; the son found friends, and was educated in a monastery at Westrick, where the prior treated him as his own son. At the age of twenty he began the study of theology, when a pious old monk said to him, "If you intend to become a good preacher, you must endeavor to be familiar with the Bible." By means of this advice, Musculus became a Christian and a Protestant, and was the instrument of converting to his principles almost all his brother friars in the monastery. After various successful labors in Leixheim, Strasburg, and Augsburg, he was settled as professor of theology at Bern, in 1549, where he died, August 30, 1563. He left many valuable works, chiefly commentaries on the Scriptures. His Dying Hymn in Latin has been much admired.—Middleton, ii. pp. 85-89.

THE DYING HYMN OF MUSCULUS.

1. *Nil superest vite, frigus precordia captat :
Sed tu CHRISTE, mihi vita perennis ades.*
2. *Quid trepidas anima? ad sedes abitura quietis,
En tibi ductor, adest ANGELUS ille tuus.*
3. *Linqe damnum hanc miseram, nunc in sua fata vacentem,
Quam tibi JESU DEX dextera restituit.*
4. *Peccasti? scia: sed CHRISTIVE credentibus in ee
Peccata expurgat sanguine cuncta suo.*
5. *Horribilis mors est? fator: sed proxima vita est,
Ad quam te CHRISTE gratia certa vocat.*
6. Præsto est de Sulana, peccato, et morte triumphans CHRISTOS: ad hunc igitur læta alacrisque nigra.

Of this beautiful effusion of Christian piety and genius the editor of this work begs leave to offer the following

NEW TRANSLATION.

1. The vital flame shall burn no more!
The blood around my heart is cold!
But thou, O CHRIST, my soul shalt warn,
With life of more than mortal mould!
2. Why then, my soul, why tremble thus,
To wing thy flight to seats of rest?
Behold thy guide, thine ANGEL, waits
To lead thee there among the blest.
3. Leave then this wretched mansion, leave,
In ruins it around thee lies:
For God's right hand is faithful still,
And thou shalt see it faster rise.
4. But hast thou sinned? and hence thy fear.
Sad truth! but yet believers know,
That crimson as the stain may be,
The blood of CHRIST doth cleansing flow.
5. Does death a face of horror wear?
Most true, my soul, but life is nigh!
That life to which thy SAVIOR calls,
By grace so sure thou canst not die.
6. Victor o'er Satan, sin, and death,
Yonder thy LORD in triumph reigns;
Stretch, O my soul, thy joyful wings,
And fly to those celestial plains!

MUSIC; the harmonious combination of sounds; an art of great antiquity, and early employed as a medium of religious worship. As practised in public worship among both Jews and Christians, it is of two kinds:—

1. Vocal music. This species, which is the most natural, may be considered to have existed before any other. It was continued by the Jews, and it is the only kind that is permitted in the Greek and Scotch churches, or, with few exceptions, in dissenting congregations in England. The Christian rule requires its use, both for personal and social edification, Ephes. 5. Col. 3. The vocal music of the imperial chorists in St. Petersburg incomparably surpasses, in sweetness and effect, the sounds produced by the combined power of the most exquisite musical instruments.

2. Instrumental music is also of very ancient date, its invention being ascribed to Tubal, the sixth descendant from Cain. That instrumental music was not practised by the primitive Christians, but was an aid to devotion of later times, is evident from church history. The organ was first introduced into the church service by Marianns Saautus, in the year 1290; and the first that was known in the West, was one sent to Pepin, by Constantinus Copronymus, about the middle of the eighth century. Instrumental music is becoming quite common in the churches of this country; nor is this to be regretted, so long as it is made subservient to vocal, not a substitute for it.

Music, indeed, is probably nearly coeval with our race, or, at least, with the first attempts to preserve the memory of transactions. Before the invention of writing, the history of remarkable events was committed to memory, and handed down by oral tradition. The knowledge of laws and of useful arts was preserved in the same way. Rhythm and song were probably soon found important helps to the memory; and thus the muses became the early instructors of mankind. Nor was it long, we may conjecture, before dancing and song united contributed to festivity, or to the solemnities of religion. The first inwhich they called photinx, is also ascribed to the Egyptians. Its shape was that of a horn, of which, no doubt, it was originally made. Before the invention of these instruments, as Dr. Burney justly observes, "music could have been little more than metrical, as no other instruments except those of percussion were known. When the art was first discovered of refining and sustaining tones, the power of music over mankind was probably irresistible, from the agreeable surprise which soft and lengthened sounds must have occasioned." The same learned writer has given a drawing, made under his own eye, of an Egyptian musical instrument, represented on a very ancient obelisk at Rome, brought from Egypt by Augustus. This obelisk is supposed to have been erected at Heliopolis, by Sesostris, near four hundred years before the Trojan war. The most remarkable thing in this instrument is, that it is supplied with a neck, so that its two strings were capable of furnishing a great number of sounds. This is a contrivance which the Greeks, with all their ingenuity, never hit upon. "I have never been able," says the doctor, "to discover in any remains of Greek sculpture, an instrument furnished with a neck; and father Montfaucon says, that in examining the representations of near five hundred ancient lyres, harps, and citharas, he never met with one in which there was any contrivance for shortening the strings during the time of performance, as by a neck and finger-board." From the long residence of the Hebrews in Egypt, it is no improbable conjecture that their music was derived from that source. However that may be, music, vocal and instrumental, made one important part of their religious service. If the excellence of the music was conformable to the sublimity of the poetry which it accompanied, there would be no injustice in supposing it unspeakably superior to that of every other people; and the pains that were taken to render the tabernacle and temple music worthy of the subjects of their lofty odes, leaves little doubt that it was so. That the instruments were loud and sonorous, will appear from what follows; but as the public singing was performed in alternate responses, or the chorus of all succeeded to those parts of the psalm which were sung only by the appointed leaders, instruments of this kind were necessary to command and control the voices of so great a number as was usually assembled on high occasions.

The Hebrews insisted on having music at marriages, on anniversary birthdays, at victories, at the inauguration of their kings, in their public worship, and when they were coming from afar to attend the great festivals of their nation, Isa. 30: 29.

Instrumental music was first introduced into the Jewish service by Moses; and afterward, by the express command of God, was very much improved with the addition of several instruments in the reign of David. When Hezekiah restored the temple service, which had been neglected in his predecessor's reign, "he set the Levites in the house of the Lord, with cymbals, with psalteries, and with harps, according to the commandment of David, and of Gad the king's seer, and Nathan the prophet; for so was the commandment of the Lord by his prophets," 2 Chron. 29: 25.

The harp, or ancient lyre, kinnor, was the most ancient of the class of stringed instruments, Gen. 4: 21. It was sometimes called sambac, or "eight-stringed," (1 Chron. 15: 21. Ps. 6: 1. 12: 1.) although, as we may gather from the coins or medals of the Maccabean age, there were some harps which were furnished with only three strings. The nablum, or psaltery, is first mentioned in the Psalms of David. In Psalms 33: 2, and 144: 9, it is called ashcor, "a ten stringed instrument;" but in Psalm 92:

Musical Instruments.

struments of music were probably of the pulsatile kind; and rhythm, it is likely, preceded the observation of those intervals of sound which are so pleasing to the ear. About five hundred and fifty years after the deluge, or B. C. 1800, according to the common chronology, both vocal and instrumental music are spoken of as things in general use: "And Laban said, What hast thou done, that thou hast stolen away nawares to me, and carried away my daughters, as captives taken with the sword? Wherefore didst thou flee away secretly, and steal away from me; and didst not tell me, that I might have sent thee away with mirth and with songs, with tabret and with harp?" Gen. 31: 26, 27.

Egypt has been called the cradle of the arts and sciences, and there can be no doubt of the very early civilization of that country. To the Egyptian Mercury, or Thoth, who is called Trismegistos, or "thrice illustrious," is ascribed the invention of the lyre, which had at first only three strings. It would be idle to mention the various conjectures how these strings were tuned, or to try to settle the chronology of this invention. The single flute, of David. In Psalms 33: 2, and 144: 9, it is called ashcor, "a ten stringed instrument;" but in Psalm 92:

3, it is distinguished from it. Josephus assigns to it twelve strings, which, taken in connexion with the fact above stated, leaves us to conclude that it sometimes had ten and sometimes twelve strings. It was not played with a bow or fret, but with the fingers. It resembled in form a right angled triangle, or the Greek delta inverted. The body of it was of wood and hollow, and was inclosed with a piece of leather tensely drawn. The chords were extended on the outside of the leather, and were fixed at one end into the transverse part of the triangular body of the instrument. Such is its form at the present day in the East; but it has only five strings in its modern shape, 2 Sam. 6: 5. 1 Kings 10: 12. There was another instrument of this kind used in Babylonia: it was triangular in form. It had originally only four, but subsequently twenty strings, Dan. 3: 5, 7, 10, 15.

Among their wind instruments was the organ, so called in the English version, in Hebrew, huggab, Gen. 4: 21. It may be styled the ancient shepherd's pipe, corresponding most nearly to the surigex, or the pipe of Pan, among the Greeks. It consisted at first of only one or two, but afterwards of about seven pipes, made of reeds, and differing from each other in length. Chalil, nechiloth, and nekeb, are wind instruments made of various materials, such as wood, reeds, horns, and bones. As far as we may be permitted to judge from the three kinds of pipes now used in the East, the Hebrew instrument called nechiloth is the one that is double in its structure; chalil is perhaps the one of simpler form, having a single stem with an orifice through it; while nekeb answers to the one without an orifice, Isa. 5: 12. 30: 29. Jer. 48: 36. Ps. 5: 1. Ezek. 28: 13. The horn, or crooked trumpet, was a very ancient instrument. It was made of the horns of oxen, which were cut off at the smaller extremity, and thus presented an orifice which extended through. In progress of time, rams' horns were hollowed and employed for the same purpose. It is probable that in some instances it was made of brass, fashioned so as to resemble a horn. It was greatly used in war, and its sound resembled thunder. Chatsoroth, the silver trumpet, was straight, a cubit in length, hollow throughout, and at the larger extremity shaped so as to resemble the mouth of a small bell. In times of peace, when the people or the rulers were to be assembled together, this trumpet was blown softly. When the camps were to move forward, or the people to march to war, it was sounded with a deeper note.

There were several sorts of drums. The toph, rendered in the English version tabret and timbrel, (Gen. 31: 27.)

consisted of a circular hoop, either of wood or brass, three inches and six-tenths wide, was covered with a skin tensely drawn, and hung round with small bells. It was held in the left hand, and beaten to notes of music with the right. The ladies through all the East, even to this day, dance to the sound of this instrument, Exod. 15: 20. Job 17: 6. 21: 12. 2 Sam. 6: 5. The cymbals, tsetselim, were of two kinds formerly, as there are to this day, in the East. The first consisted of two flat pieces of metal or plates; the musician held one of them in his right hand, the other in his left, and smote them together, as an accompaniment to other instruments. This cymbal and the mode of using it may be often seen in modern armies. The second kind of cymbals consisted of four small plates attached, two to each hand, which the ladies, as they danced, smote together. But mexilots, (Zech. 14: 20.) rendered in the English version bells, are not musical instruments, as some suppose, nor indeed bells, but concave pieces or plates of brass, which were sometimes attached to horses for the sake of ornament.—Hend. Buck; Watson.

MUSSULMAN. (See ISLAMISM.)

MUSTARD; (sinapi, Matt. 13: 32. 17: 20. Mark 4: 31. Luke 13: 19. 17: 6.) a well-known garden herb. Christ compares the kingdom of heaven to "a grain of mustard-seed, which a man took and sowed in the earth, which indeed," said he, "is the least of all seeds; but when it is grown is the greatest among herbs, and becometh a tree, so that the birds of the air come and lodge in the branches thereof," Matt. 13: 31, 32. "This expression will not appear strange," says Sir Thomas Browne, "if we recollect that the mustard-seed, though it be not simply and in itself the smallest of seeds, yet may be very well believed to be the smallest of such as are apt to grow unto a ligneous substance, and become a kind of tree."

The expression, also, that it might grow into such dimensions that birds might lodge on its branches, may be literally conceived, if we allow the luxuriance of plants in India above our northern regions. And he quotes upon this occasion what is recorded in the Jewish story, of a mustard tree that was to be climbed like a fig-tree. The Talmud also mentions one whose branches were so extensive as to cover a tent. Without insisting on the accuracy of this, we may gather from it that we should not judge of Eastern vegetables by those which are familiar to ourselves. Scheuchzer describes a species of mustard which grows several feet high, with a tapering stalk, and spreads into many branches. Of this arborescent or tree-like vegetable he gives a print; and Linnæus mentions a species whose branches were real wood, which he names sinapi erucoides.

But whatever kind of tree our Lord meant, it is clear, from the fact that he never takes his illustrations from any objects but such as were familiar, and often present in the scene around him, that he spoke of one which the Jews well knew to have minute seeds, and yet to be of so large growth as to afford shelter for the birds of the air.—Watson; Harris; Abbott.

MYCONIUS, (FREDERICK,) an intimate friend of Luther, and one of the reformers of the sixteenth century, was born at Lichtenfeldt, Franconia, in 1491, of religious parents, and educated at Annaberg. At the age of twenty he was persuaded to enter a monastery, where he devoted seven years chiefly to the study of the Bible, the schoolmen, and the works of Augustine. After he entered into orders, he was preacher at Viaria, where Luther's works fell into his hands, and his mind becoming enlightened, he began to proclaim the truth with boldness; and it spread, says his biographer, "as if the angels had been the carriers of it." In 1524, he was called to Gotha, where he labored among the Thuringian churches twenty-two years. He often accompanied the elector of Saxony into the Netherlands, and preached the gospel at the hazard of his life. He was once his ambassador to England. He was also employed to visit and reform the churches of Misnia. His health failing in 1541, he wrote to Luther "that he was sick not unto death, but unto life." But he recovered, and, according to Luther's prayer, outlived him several months. He died in 1546, glorifying God for all the rich mercies of the Reformation. He published numerous works.—Middleton, vol. i. p. 250.

MYRRH; (mir, Exod. 30: 23. Esther 2: 12. Ps. 45: 8. Prov. 7: 17. Cant. 1: 13. 3: 6. 4: 6. 14: 5: 1, 5, 13; smur-na, Eccles. 24: 15. Matt. 2: 11. Mark 15: 23. John 19: 39.) a precious kind of gum, issuing by incision, and sometimes spontaneously, from the trunk and larger branches of a tree growing in Egypt, Arabia, and Abyssinia. Its taste is extremely bitter, but its smell, though strong, is not disagreeable; and among the ancients it entered into the composition of the most costly ointments. As a perfume, it appears to have been used to give a pleasant fragrance to vestments, and to be carried by fœ males in little caskets in the bosoms. The Magi, who came from the East to worship our Savior at Bethlehem, made him a present of myrrh among other things, Matt. 2: 11.

In the gospel (Mark 15: 23.) is mentioned myrrh and wine, or wine mingled with myrrh, which was offered to Jesus, previous to his crucifixion, and intended to deaden in him the anguish of his sufferings. It was a custom among the Hebrews to give such kind of stupefying liquors to persons who were about to be capitally punished, Prov. 31: 6. Some have thought that the myrrhed wine of Mark is the same as the "wine mingled with gall" of Matthew; but others distinguish them. They suppose the myrrhed wine was given to our Lord from a sentiment of sympathy, to prevent him from feeling too sensibly the pain of his sufferings; while the potation, mingled with gall, of which he would not drink, was given from cruelty. Others, however, think that Matthew, writing in Syriac, used the word marra, which signifies either myrrh, bitterness, or gall; which the Greek translator took in the sense of gall, and Mark in the sense of myrrh. Wine mingled with myrrh was highly esteemed by the ancients.—Watson; Calmet.

MYRTLE; (rush, Neh. 8: 15. Isa. 41: 19. 55: 13. Zech. 1: 8—10.) a shrub, sometimes growing to a small tree, very common in Judea. It has a hard woody root, that sends forth a great number of small flexible branches, furnished with leaves like those of box, but much less, and more pointed: they are soft to the touch, shining, smooth, of a beautiful green, and have a sweet smell. The flowers grow among the leaves, and consist of five white petals disposed in the form of a rose: they have an agreeable perfume, and ornamental appearance.

Savary, describing a scene at the end of the forest of Platanea, says, "Myrtles, intermixed with laurel roses, grow in the valleys to the height of ten feet. Their snow-white flowers, bordered with a purple edging, appear to peculiar advantage under the verdant foliage. Each myrtle is loaded with them, and they emit perfumes more exquisite than those of the rose itself. They enchant every one, and the soul is filled with the softest sensations."

The myrtle is mentioned in Scripture among lofty trees, not as comparing with them in size, but as contributing with them to the beauty and richness of the scenery. Thus Isaiah, (41: 19.) intending to describe a scene of varied excellence: "I will plant in the wilderness the cedar, and the shittah tree, and the myrtle, and the oil tree;" that is, I will adorn the dreary and barren waste with trees famed for their stature and the grandeur of their appearance, the beauty of their form, and also the fragrance of their odor. The apocryphal Baruch, (5: 8.) speaking of the return from Babylon, expresses the protection afforded by God to the people by the same image: "Even the woods and every sweet-smelling tree shall overshadow Israel by the commandment of God." Harris.—Watson.

MYSIA; a country of Asia Minor, having the Propontia on the north, Bithynia on the north-east and east, Phrygia on the south-east, Lydia (from which it was separated by the river Hermus) on the south, the Egean sea on the west, and the narrow strait, called the Hellespont, on the north-west. Mysia was visited by St. Paul in his circuit through Asia Minor; but he was not suffered by the Spirit to remain there, being directed to pass over into Macedonia, Acts 16: 7—10. In this country stood the ancient city Troy; as also that of Pergamus, one of the seven churches of Asia. Under the Romans it was made a province of the empire, and called Hellespontus; and its inhabitants are represented by Cicero as base and contemptible to a proverb.—Watson.

MYSTERY; secret; a wonder; (from mucin to stoma, to shut the mouth.) It is taken,—1. For a truth revealed by God which we could not have discovered without revelation; such as the call to the Gentiles, (Eph. 1: 9.) the transforming of some without dying, &c., 1 Cor. 15: 51.—2. The word is also used in reference to things which remain in part incomprehensible after they are revealed; such as the incarnation of Christ, the resurrection of the dead, &c., 1 Tim. 3: 12. Some critics, however, observe that the word in the Scripture does not usually import what is incapable in its own nature of being understood by man, but barely a secret, any thing not disclosed or published to the world, Ephes. 1: 9. 3: 3—12. 1 Cor. 13: 1—3.

In respect to the mysteries of religion, divines have run into two extremes. Some, as one observes, have given up all that was mysterious, thinking that they were not called to believe any thing but what they could comprehend. "Where mystery begins," says Dr. James Foster, "religion ends." But the truth is, as Robert Hall observes, that they begin and end together; a portion of that which is inscrutable to our faculties attaching to every truth of nature and revelation. A religion without mystery is a temple without its God, 1 Cor. 2: 6—10.

But if it can be proved that mysteries make a part of a religion coming from God, it can be no part of piety to discard them, as if we were wiser than he. And besides, upon this principle, a man must believe nothing: the various works of nature, the growth of plants, instincts of brutes, union of body and soul, properties of matter, the nature of spirit, and a thousand other things, are all replete with mysteries. If so in the common works of nature, we can hardly suppose that those things which more immediately relate to the Divine Being himself, can be without mystery. The other extreme lies in an attempt to explain the mysteries of revelation so as to free them from all obscurity. To defend religion in this manner is to expose it to contempt.

The following maxim points out the proper way of defence, by which both extremes are avoided. Where the truth of a doctrine depends not on the evidence of the things themselves, but on the authority of him who reveals it, there the only way to prove the doctrine to be true is to prove the testimony of him that revealed it to be infallible.

Dr. South observes, that the mysteriousness of those parts of the gospel called the credenda, or matters of our faith, is most subservient to the great and important ends of religion, and that upon these accounts:—1. First, because religion in the prime institution of it was designed to make impressions of awe and reverential fear upon men's minds. 2. To humble the pride and haughtiness of man's reason. 3. To engage us in a closer and more diligent search into them. 4. That the full and entire knowledge of divine things may be one principal part of our felicity hereafter. Robinson's Claude, vol. i. pp. 118, 119, 304, 305; Campbell's Preliminary Dissertation to the Gospels, vol. i. p. 383; Stillingfleet's Origines Sacrae, vol. ii. c. 8; Ridgley's Div., qt. 11; Calmet's Dict.; Cruden's Concordance; South's Serm., ser. 6, vol. iii.; Works of Robert Hall.—*Hend. MYSTERIES; a term used to denote the secret rites of the pagan superstition, which were carefully concealed from the knowledge of the vulgar.

The learned bishop Warburton supposed that the mysteries of the pagan religion were the invention of legislators and other great personages, whom fortune or their own merit had placed at the head of those civil societies which were formed in the earliest ages in different parts of the world.

Mosheim was of opinion that the mysteries were entirely commemorative; that they were instituted with a view to preserve the remembrance of heroes and great men, who had been deified in consideration of their martial exploits, useful inventions, public virtues, and especially in consequence of the benefits by them conferred on their contemporaries.

Others, however, suppose that the mysteries were the offspring of bigotry and priestcraft, and that they originated in Egypt, the native land of idolatry. In that country, the priesthood ruled predominant. The kings were engrafted into their body before they could ascend the throne. They were possessed of a third part of the land of all Egypt. The sacerdotal function was confined to one tribe, and was transmitted from father to son. All the Tribes, but more especially the Egyptians, delighted in mysterious and allegorical doctrines. Every maxim of morality, every tenet of theology, every dogma of philosophy, was wrap<sup>d</sup> up in a veil of allegory and mysticism. This propensity, no doubt, conspired with avarice and ambition to dispose them to a dark and mysterious system of religion. Besides, the Egyptians were a gloomy race of men; they delighted in darkness and solitude. Their sacred rites were generally celebrated with melancholy airs, weeping, and lamentation. This gloomy and unsocial bias of mind must have stimulated them to a congenial mode of worship.—Hend. Buck.

MYSTERIES, or, as they were also called, MIRACLES; a kind of rude drama, which was a favorite spectacle in the middle ages, represented at solemn festivals. The subjects were of a religious character, and the ecclesiastics were at first the authors and performers. They received the above name because they professedly taught the mysterious doctrines of Christianity, and represented the miracles of the saints and martyrs. The first play of this sort, mentioned by name, appears to have been St. Catharine, written, according to Matthew Paris, by Geoffrey, a Norman, about 1110. They sometimes lasted several days. One which lasted eight days contained a great part of the Scripture history. The Corpus Christi, or famous Coventry mystery, begins with the creation, and ends with the day of judgment. The slaughter of the children at Bethlehem, the sufferings of Christ, &c. were represented.—Hend. Buck.

MYSTICAL. The mystical sense of Scripture is that which is evidently symbolical or metaphorical. For example, Babylon signifies literally a city of Chaldea, the habitation of kings who persecuted the Hebrews, and who were overwhelmed in idolatry and wickedness. But John, in the Revelations, gives the name of Babylon, mystically, to the city of Rome. So Jerusalem is literally a city of Judea; but mystically, the heavenly Jerusalem; the habitation of the saints, &c.—Calmet.

MYSTICS, who have also been sometimes called Quietists, are those who profess a pure and sublime devotion, accompanied with a disinterested love of God, free from all selfish considerations; and who believe that the Scriptures have a mystic and hidden sense, which must be sought after, in order to understand their true import. Under this name some improperly comprehend all those who profess to know that they are inwardly taught of God.

The system of the Mystics proceeded upon the known doctrine of the Platonic school, which was also adopted by Origen and his disciples, that the divine nature was diffused through all human souls; or that the faculty of reason, from which proceed the health and vigor of the mind, was an emanation from God into the human soul, and comprehended in it the principles and elements of all truth, human and divine. They denied that men could by labor or study excite this celestial flame in their breasts; and, therefore, they disapproved highly of the attempts of those who, by definitions, abstract theorems, and profound speculations, endeavored to form distinct notions of truth, and discover its hidden nature. On the contrary, they maintained that silence, tranquillity, repose, and solitude, accompanied with such acts as might tend to attenuate and exhaust the body, were the means by which the hidden and internal word was excited to produce its latent virtues, and to instruct men in the knowledge of divine things. They reasoned as follows: "Those who behold with a noble contempt all human affairs, who turn away their eyes from terrestrial vanities, and shut all the avenues of the outward senses against the contagious influence of a material world, must necessarily return to God, when the spirit is thus disengaged from the impediments which prevented that happy union. And, in this blessed frame, they not only enjoy inexpressible raptures from that communion with the Supreme Being, but also are invested with the inestimable privilege of contemplating truth undisguised and uncorrupted in its native purity, while others behold it in a vitiated and delusive form." The number of the Mystics increased in the fourth century, under the influence of the Grecian fanatic, who gave himself out for Dionysius the Areopagite, a disciple of St. Paul, and who probably lived about this period; and, by pretending to higher degrees of perfection than other Christians, and practising great austerities, their cause gained ground, especially in the eastern provinces, in the fifth century. A copy of the pretended works of Dionysius was sent by Balbus to Lewis the Meek, A. D. 824, which kindled the holy flame of Mysticism in the western provinces, and filled the Latins with the most enthusiastic admiration of this new system. In the twelfth century, these Mystics took the lead in their method of expounding the Scriptures. In the thirteenth, they were the most formidable antagonists of the schoolmen; and, towards the close of the fourteenth, many of them resided and propagated their tenets in almost every part of Europe. They had, in the fifteenth century, many persons of distinguished merit in their number. In the sixteenth, previously to the Reformation, if any sparks of real piety subsisted under the despotic empire of superstition, they were chiefly to be found among the Mystics; and in the seventeenth, the radical principle of Mysticism was adopted by the Behmists, Bourignonists, and Quietists.

The Mystics propose a disinterestedness of love, without other motives, and profess to feel, in the enjoyment of the temper itself, an abundant reward; and passive contemplation in the state of perfection to which they aspire. They lay little or no stress upon the outward ceremonies and ordinances of religion, but dwell chiefly upon the inward operations of the mind. It is not uncommon for them to allegorize certain passages of Scripture, (at the same time they do not deny the literal sense,) as having an allusion to the inward experience of believers. Thus, according to them, the word Jerusalem, which is the name of the capital of Judea, signifies, allegorically, the church militant; morally, a believer; and mysteriously, heaven. That sublime passage also in Genesis, "Let there be light, and there was light," which is, according to the letter, corporeal light, signifies, allegorically, the Messiah; morally, grace; and mysteriously, beatitude, or the light of glory. All this appears to be harmless; yet we must be careful not to give way to the sallies of a lively imagination in interpreting Scripture. Woolston is said to have been led to reject the Old Testament by spiritualizing and allegorizing the New.

The Mystics are not confined to any particular denomination of Christians, but may be found in most countries, and among many descriptions of religionists. Among the number of Mystics may be reckoned many singular characters, especially Behmen, a shoemaker at Gortitz, in Germany; Molinos, a Spanish priest, in the seventeenth century; Madame Guion, a French lady, who made a great noise in the religious world; and the celebrated Madame Bourignon, who wrote a work, entitled, "The Light of the World," which is full of Mystic extravagancies. Fenelon, also, the learned and amiable archbishop of Cambray, favored the same sentiments, for which he was reprimanded by the pope. His work, entitled, "An Explication of the Maxims of the Saints," which abounds with Mystical sentiments, was condemned; and to the pope's sentence against him the good archbishop quietly submitted, and even read it publicly himself in the cathedral of Cambray. In this whole affair, his chief opponent is said to have been the famous Bossuet, bishop of Meaux. Mr. William Law, author of the "Serious Call," &c., degenerated, in the latter part of his life, into all the singularities of Mysticism. In the best sense, Mysticism is to be regarded as an error arising out of partial views of the truth, or truth made erroneous, as being put out of its proper relation to, and connexion with other truths. As it respects the inward life of religion, its tendency is to a species of fanaticism, and to induce a contempt for divinely appointed ordinances. In many, however, it has been happily tempered by good principles; and too frequently has all scriptural Christianity, in its inward influence, been branded with the name of Mysticism.—Watson; Hend. Buck; Douglas on Errors.

MYTHOLOGY, in its original import, signifies any kind of fabulous doctrine. In its more appropriated sense, it means those fabulous details concerning the objects of worship, which were invented and propagated by men who lived in the early ages of the world, and by them transmitted to succeeding generations, either by written records, or by oral tradition. See articles HEATHEN; PAGANISM; and Gale's Court of the Gentiles; a work calculated to show that the pagan philosophers derived their most sublime sentiments from the Scriptures.—Hend. Buck; Bryant's System of Ancient Mythology; Lempriere's Classical Dictionary; Dwight's Theology; Douglas on Errors

N.

NAAMAH; daughter of Lamech and Zillah, and sister of Tubal-cain, (Gen. 4: 22.) who is believed to have found out the art of spinning wool, and of making or enriching cloth and stuffs.—Calmet.

NAAMAN; a general in the army of Benhadad, king of Syria, who, being afflicted with a leprosy, was cured by bathing seven times in the Jordan, agreeably to the command of Elisha the prophet, 2 Kings 5. Comp. Lev. 14: 7, &c. (See LEPROSY; and ABANA.)

The prophet having refused to receive a present offered to him by Naaman, the latter begged that he might be permitted to carry home two mules' burden of the earth of Canaan, assigning as a reason, that henceforth he would serve no God but Jehovah. It seems that his intention was to build an altar in Syria formed of that holy ground, as he conceived it to be, to which God had assigned the blessing of his peculiar presence, that he might daily testify his gratitude for the great mercy which he had received, that he might declare openly his renunciation of idolatry, and that he might keep a sort of communion, by similitude of worship, with the people who inhabited the land where Elisha dwelt, who had so miraculously cured him. This is perfectly consistent with the precept, (Exod. 20: 24.) "An altar of earth shalt thou make unto me:" and it is very credible, that the temporary altars were usually of earth; especially on the high places. To such an altar, apparently, Elijah, after repairing it, added twelve stones, in allusion to the twelve tribes of Israel, 1 Kings 18: 31.

Elisha having consented to this request, Naaman again addressed the prophet thus: "In this thing the Lord pardon thy servant, that when my master goeth into the house of Rimmon to worship there, and he leaneth on my hand, and I bow myself in the house of Rimmon: when I bow myself in the house of Rimmon, the Lord pardon thy servant in this thing." And Elisha said to him, "Go in peace." This passage has given rise to many scruples. Many commentators think, that Naaman only asks leave to continue those external services to his master Benhadad, which he had been used to render him, when he entered the temple of Rimmon; and that Elisha suffered him to accompany the king into the temple, provided he paid no worship to the idol. Others, with more reason, translating the Hebrew in the past tense, suppose that Naaman mentions only his former sin, and asks pardon for it.—Calmet; Watson; Jones.

NABAL; a rich but churlish man, of the tribe of Judah, and race of Caleb, who dwelt in the south of Judah, and who had a very numerous flock on Carmel, but refused to give David and his followers, in their distress, any provisions, though modestly requested to do so, 1 Sam. 25: 25, &c. His name is proverbial for miserly covetousness.—Calmet.

NABATHEANS, or NABATHENIANS; Arabians descended from Nebajoth. Their country is called Nabathæa, and extends from the Euphrates to the Red sea, the chief cities of which are Petra, the capital of Arabia Deserta, and Medaba.—Calmet.

NABONASSAR; king of Babylon, the same as Balandan. (See BABYLON, HISTORY OF.)—Calmet.

NABOPOLISSAR, father of Nebuchadnezzar the Great, was a Babylonian, and chief of the army of Saracus, king of Assyria. He made a league with Astyages, who gave his daughter Amyitis in marriage to his son Nebuchadnezzar. Ahasuerus and Nabopolassar, joining their forces, revolted against Saracus, king of Nineveh, besieged him in his capital, took him prisoner, and on the destruction of the Assyrian monarchy raised two kingdoms; that of the Medes, possessed by Astyages, or Ahasuerus, and that of the Chaldeans, or of Babylon, founded by Nabopolassar, A. M. 3378. He died A. M. 3399. (See ABYSSINIA; and BABYLON, HISTORY OF.)—Calmet.

NABOTH; an Israelite of the city of Jezreel, who lived under Ahab, king of the ten tribes, and had a fine vineyard near the king's palace. Ahab coveted his property; but Naboth, according to the law, (Lev. 25: 23, 24.) refused to sell it: and besides, it was a disgrace for a Hebrew to alienate the inheritance of his ancestors. Through the arts of Jezebel, Naboth was falsely condemned and stoned for a supposed crime, which brought upon Ahab and Jezebel the severest maledictions, 1 Kings 21. (See AHAB.)—Watson.

NABUCHODONOSOR. (See ASSYRIA.)

NACHON. The floor of Nachon (2 Sam. 6: 6.) was either so called from the name of its proprietor; or, which is more probable, the Hebrew denotes the prepared floor, that is, the floor of Obed-edom, which was near, and was prepared to receive the ark. This place, wherever it might be, was either in Jerusalem, or very near Jerusalem, and near the house of Obed-edom, in that city.—Calmet.

NADAB. (See ABIRU.)

NAHASH; a king of the Ammonites, who, besieging Jabesh-Gilead, was defeated and killed by Saul, 1 Sam. 11. The piece of mutilating barbarity proposed to the inhabitants of Jabesh-Gilead by Nahash, "That I may thrust out all your right eyes, and lay it for a reproach upon Israel," perhaps, by altering the name of the town to that of "those who have lost their right eyes," is worthy of notice.—We must, however, recollect, that the loss of the eyes is a punishment regularly inflicted on rebels and others in the East. Mr. Hanway, in his "Journey in Persia," gives very striking instances of this practice; and the cruelty of which, and the sight of the streaming blood, were felt by that gentleman as a man of humanity and a Christian must feel them.—Calmet.

NAHASH, father of Abigail and Zeruiab, is thought to be the same as Jesse, father of David. Comp. 2 Sam. 17: 25. and 1 Chron. 2: 13, 15, 16. This perhaps might be his surname.—Calmet.

NAHOR; son of Terah, and brother of Abraham, Gen. 11: 26. Neither the year of his birth nor of his death is exactly known. Nahor married Milcah, the daughter of Haran, by whom he had several sons, namely, Huz, Buz, Kemuel, Chesed, Hazo, Pildash, Jidlaph, and Bethuel. Nahor fixed his habitation at Haran, which is therefore called the city of Nahor, Gen. 11: 29. 22: 20—22. 24: 10.—Watson.

NAHUM, is supposed to have been a native of Elcosh, or Elcosha, a village in Galilee, and to have been of the tribe of Simeon. There is great uncertainty about the exact period in which he lived; but it is generally allowed that he delivered his predictions between the Assyrian and Babylonian captivities, and probably about B. C. 715. They relate solely to the destruction of Nineveh by the Babylonians and Medes, and are introduced by an animated display of the attributes of God.

Of all the minor prophets, says bishop Lowth, none seems to equal Nahum in sublimity, ardor, and boldness. His prophecy forms an entire and regular poem. The exordium is magnificent and truly august. The preparation for the destruction of Nineveh, and the description of that destruction, are expressed in the most glowing colors; and at the same time the prophet writes with a per-spicuity and elegance which have a just claim to our highest admiration.—Watson.

NAIL. The nail of Jael's tent with which she killed Sisera, is called itad; it was formed for penetrating earth, or other hard substances, when driven by sufficient force, as with a hammer, &c.; it includes the idea of strength.

The Orientals, in fitting up their houses, were by no means inattentive to the comfort and satisfaction arising from order and method. Their furniture was scanty and plain; but they were careful to arrange the few household utensils they needed, so as not to encumber the apartments to which they belonged. Their devices for this purpose, which, like every part of the structure, bore the character of remarkable simplicity, may not correspond with our ideas of neatness and propriety; but they accorded with their taste, and sufficiently answered their design. One of these consisted in a set of spikes, nails, or large pegs fixed in the walls of the house, upon which they hung up the movables and utensils in common use that belonged to the room. These nails they do not drive into the walls with a hammer or mallet, but fix them there when the house is building; for if the walls are of brick, they are too hard, or if they consist of clay, too soft and mouldering, to admit the action of the hammer. The spikes, which are so contrived as to strengthen the walls, by binding the parts together, as well as to serve for convenience, are large, with square heads like dice, and bent at the ends so as to make them cramp-irons. They commonly place them at the windows and doors, in order to hang upon them, when they choose, veils and curtains, although they place them in other parts of the room, to hang up other things of various kinds.

The care with which they fixed these nails, may be inferred, as well from the important purposes they were meant to serve, as from the promise of the Lord to Eliakim: "And I will fasten him as a nail in a sure place," Isa. 22: 23. It is evident from the words of the prophet, that it was common in his time to suspend upon them the utensils belonging to the apartment: "Will men take a pin of it to hang any vessel thereon?" Ezek. 15: 3. The word used in Isaiah for a nail of this sort, is the same which denotes the stake, or large pin of iron, which fastened down to the ground the cords of their tents. These nails, therefore, were of necessary and common use, and of no small importance in all their apartments; and if they seem to us mean and insignificant, it is because they are unknown to us, and inconsistent with our notions of propriety, and because we have no name for them but what conveys to our ear a low and contemptible idea.

It is evident from the frequent allusions in Scripture to these instruments, that they were not regarded with contempt or indifference by the natives of Palestine. "Grace has been showed from the Lord our God," said Ezra, "to leave us a remnant to escape, and to give us a nail in his holy place;" (Ezra 9: 8.) or, as explained in the margin, a constant and sure abode. The dignity and propriety of the metaphor appear from the use which the prophet Zechariah makes of it: "Out of him cometh forth the corner, out of him the nail, out of him the battle bow, out of him every oppressor together," Zech. 10: 4. The whole frame of government, both in church and state, which the chosen people of God enjoyed, was the contrivance of his wisdom and the gift of his bounty; the foundations upon which it rested, the bonds which kept the several parts together, its means of defence, its officers and executors, were all the fruits of distinguishing goodness; even the oppressors of his people were a rod of correction in the hand of Jehovah, to convince them of sin, and restore them to his service.—Watson.

NAIN; a city of Palestine, where Jesus restored a widow's son to life, as they were carrying him out to be buried. Eusebius says, it was in the neighborhood of Endor and Scythopolis; and elsewhere, that it was two miles from Tabor, south; at the foot of the lesser mount Hermon, near the town of Endor. The brook Kishon ran between Tabor and Nain.—Calmet.

NAKEDNESS; NUDITY. These terms, besides their ordinary and literal meaning, sometimes signify, put to shame, stripped of resources, void of saccor, disarmed.

So, after worshipping the golden calf, the Israelites found themselves naked in the midst of their enemies.

The nakedness of Adam and Eve was unknown in their innocence, that is, unfelt; they were unconscious of shame before they sinned, because concupiscence and irregular desires had not yet excited the flesh against the spirit.

Naked is put for discovered, known, manifest. So Job 26: 6: "Hell is naked before him." The unseen state of the dead is open to the eyes of God. St. Paul says, in the same sense, "Neither is there any creature that is not manifest in his sight; but all things are naked and open unto the eyes of him with whom we have to do," Heb. 4: 13.

"Nakedness of the feet" was a token of respect. Moses put off his shoes to approach the burning bush. Most commentators are of opinion, that the priests served in the tabernacle with their feet naked; and afterwards in the temple. In the enumeration that Moses makes of the habit and ornaments of the priests, he nowhere mentions any dress for the feet. Also the frequent ablutions appointed them in the temple seem to imply that their feet were naked. To uncover the nakedness of any one, is commonly put for a shameful and unlawful conjunction, or an incestuous marriage, Lev. 20: 19. Ezek. 16: 37.

Nakedness is sometimes put for being partly undressed; en dôshabillê. Thus Saul continued naked among the prophets; that is, having only his under garments on. Isaiah received orders from the Lord to go naked; that is, clothed as a slave, half clad. Thus it is recommended to clothe the naked; that is, such as are ill clothed. St. Paul says, that he was in cold, in nakedness; that is, in poverty and want of suitable raiment.—Watson; Calmet.

NAME. A name was given to the male child at the time of its circumcision, but it is probable, previous to the introduction of that rite, that the name was given immediately after its birth.

Among the Orientals the appellations given as names are always significant. In the Old Testament, we find that the child was named in many instances from the circumstances of its birth, or from some peculiarities in the history of the family to which it belonged, Gen. 16: 11. 19: 37. 25: 25, 26. Exod. 2: 10. 18: 3, 4. Frequently the name was a compound one, one part being the name of the Deity, and among idolatrous nations the name of an idol. The following instances may be mentioned among others, and may stand as specimens of the whole; namely, Samuel, "hear God;" Adonijah, "God is lord;" Josedech, "God is just;" Ethbaal, a Canaanitish name, the latter part of the compound being the name of the idol deity, Baal; Belshazzar, "Bel," a Babylonish deity, "is ruler and king." Sometimes the name had a prophetic meaning, Gen. 17: 15. Isa. 7: 14. 8: 3. Hosea 1: 4, 6, 9. Matt. 1: 21. Luke 1: 13, 60, 63.

In the later times, however, names were selected from those of the progenitors of a family; hence in the New Testament hardly any other than ancient names occur, Matt. 1: 12. Luke 1: 61. 3: 23, &c.

The inhabitants of the East very frequently change their names, and sometimes do it for very slight reasons. This accounts for the fact of so many persons having two names in Scripture, Ruth 1: 20, 21. 1 Sam. 11: 49. 31: 2. 1 Chron. 10: 2. Judg. 6: 32. 7: 1. 2 Sam. 23: 8. Kings and princes very often changed the names of those who held offices under them, particularly when they first attracted their notice, and were taken into their employ, and when subsequently they were elevated to some new station, and crowned with additional honors, Gen. 41: 45. 17: 5. 32: 28. 35: 10. 2 Kings 23: 34, 35. 24: 17. Dan. 1: 6. John 1: 42. Mark 3: 17. Hence a name, a new name, occurs tropically, as a token or proof of distinction and honor in the following among other passages: Philip. 2: 9. Heb. 1: 4. Rev. 2: 17. Sometimes the names of the dead were changed; for instance that of Abel, given to him after his death, in allusion to the shortness of his life, Gen. 2: 8. Sometimes proper names are translated into other languages, losing their original form, while they preserve their signification. This appears to have been the case with the proper names which occur in the first eleven chapters of Genesis, and which were translated into the Hebrew from a language still more ancient. The Orientals in some instances, in order to distinguish themselves from others of the same name, added to their own name the name of their father, grandfather, and even great-grandfather.

"To raise up the name of the dead," (Ruth 4: 5, 10, &c.) is said of the brother of a man who died without children, when his brother married the widow of the deceased, and revived his name in Israel, by means of the children which he might beget; and which were deemed to be children of the deceased. In a contrary sense to this, to blot out the name of any one, is to exterminate his memory; to extirpate his race, his children, works, or houses, and in general whatever may continue his name on the earth, Ps. 9: 5. Prov. 10: 7. Isa. 4: 1.

To know any one by his name, (Exod. 33: 12) expresses a distinction, a friendship, a particular familiarity. The kings of the East had little communication with their subjects, and hardly ever appeared in public; so that when they knew their servants by name, vouchsafed to speak to them, to call them, and to admit them into their presence, it was a great mark of favor. In many Eastern countries the true personal name of the king is unknown to his subjects: in Japan, to pronounce the emperor's real name is punishable; his general name, as emperor, is held to be sufficiently sacred. Titles often become names, or parts of names; by these titles many sovereigns are known in history; and varying with incidents and occurrences, they occasion great confusion.

God often complains that the false prophets prophesied in his name; (Jer. 14: 14, 15. 27: 15, &c.) and Christ says, (Matt. 7: 22.) that in the day of judgment many shall say, "Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name, and in thy name cast out devils, and in thy name done many wonderful works?" He also says, (Mark 9: 41.) whosoever shall give a cup of cold water in his name, shall not lose his reward; and he that receives a prophet or a just man, in the name (character) of a prophet or a just man, shall receive a recompense in proportion, Matt. 10: 41. In all these instances the "name" is put for the person, for his commission, his service, his sake, his authority, in a word, his character.

So names of men are sometimes put for persons, especially persons of distinction, Rev. 3: 4. "Thou hast a few names even in Sardis, which have not defiled their garments." And chap. 11: 13. seven thousand men perished in the earthquake—(names of men; Gr.) Perhaps this should be considered as implying men of name, persons of consequence, nobles, &c., Num. 16: 2. It is probable, also, that this phrase contains some allusion to a list or catalogue of names; for we find it in Acts 1: 15.

Of the Messiah it is said, "And he hath on his vesture and on his thigh a name written, King of kings, and Lord of lords," Rev. 19: 16. In illustration of this it may be remarked, that it appears to have been an ancient custom among several nations, to adorn the images of their deities, princes, victors at their public games, and other eminent persons, with inscriptions expressive of their names, character, titles, or some circumstance which might contribute to their honor. There are several such images yet extant, with an inscription written either on the garment, or breast, or one of the thighs.—Watson; Calmet.

NAME OF GOD. By this term we are to understand, 1. God himself, (Ps. 20: 1.) or, whatever unfolds to us the glory of the divine character. 2. His titles peculiar to himself, Exod. 3: 13, 14. 3. His word, Ps. 5: 11. Acts 3: 15. 4. His works, Ps. 8: 1. 5. His worship, Exod. 20: 24. 6. His perfections and excellencies, Exod. 34: 6. John 17: 26.

The properties or qualities of this name are these:—1. A glorious name, Ps. 72: 17. 2. Transcendent and incomparable, Rev. 19: 16. 3. Powerful, Phil. 2: 10. 4. Holy and reverend, Ps. 111: 9. 5. Awful to the wicked. 6. Perpetual, Is. 55: 13. Thus the Psalmist, to illustrate the attractive excellence of the divine character, says, "They that know thy name, will put their trust in thee." So Moses, (Deut. 28: 58.) "That thou mayest fear this glorious and fearful name, THE LORD THY GOD." (See GOD; JERVAH; and LORD, NAME OF, TAKEN IN VAIN.)

Cruden's Concordance; Hannam's Anal. Comp., p. 20.—Hend. Buck.

NANTES, EDICT OF; a decree of Henry IV. in favor of his Huguenot, or Protestant subjects, in the year 1598, about twenty-six years after the horrible Parisian massacre; and the sudden repeal of which decree, by Louis XIV., occasioned the most terrible persecution ever suffered in France. (See ΗΥΓΕΝΟΤΣ; ΠΕΡΣΕΥΣΤΗΝ.)—Williams.

NAOMI. (See RUṬH.)

NAPHTALI; the sixth son of Jacob by Bilhah, Rachel's handmaid. The word Naphtali signifies wrestling, or struggling. When Rachel gave him this name, she said, "With great wrestlings have I wrestled with my sister, and I have prevailed," Gen. 30: 8. (See HIṬH.) Naphtali had but four sons, and yet at the coming out of Egypt his tribe made up fifty-three thousand four hundred men, able to bear arms. Moses, in the blessing he gave to the same tribe, says, "O Naphtali, satisfied with favor, and full with the blessing of the Lord, possess thou the west and the south," Deut. 33: 23. The Vulgate reads it, "the sea and the south," and the Hebrew will admit of either interpretation, that is, the sea of Gennesareth, which was to the south by the inheritance of this tribe. His soil was very fruitful in corn and oil. His limits were extended into Upper and Lower Galilee, having Jordan to the east, the tribes of Asher and Zebulun to the west, Libanus to the north, and the tribe of Issachar to the south.

The residence of the tribe of Naphtali was a beautiful woodland country, which extended to mount Lebanon, and produced fruits of every sort. Of the adjacent district of Kesroun, which Volney says is similar to this side of mount Lebanon, Le Roque says, (p. 220,) "Nothing equals the fertility of the lands in Kesroun: mulberry-trees for the silk-worms; vineyards yielding excellent wine; olive trees tall as oaks; meadows, pasturages, corn, and fruits of all kinds. Such are the riches of this agreeable country, which besides abounds in cattle, large and small, in birds of game, and in beasts of chase. So beautiful a country, situated in a climate which I think is the mildest and most temperate of Syria, seems to contribute, in some manner, to the kindness of disposition, to the gentle inclinations, and to the praiseworthy manners of the inhabitants."

Under Barak, their general, they and the Zebulunites fought with distinguished bravery against the army of Jabin the younger; and at the desire of Gideon they pursued the Midianites, Judg. 4: 10. 5: 18. 7: 23. A thousand of their captains, with thirty-seven thousand of their troops, assisted at David's coronation, and brought great quantities of provision with them, 1 Chron. 12: 34, 40. We find no person of distinguished note among them, save Barak, and Hiram the artificer. Instigated by Asa, Benhadad the elder, king of Syria, terribly ravaged the land of Naphtali; and what it suffered in after invasions by the Syrians we are partly told, 1 Kings 15: 20. The Naphtalites were, many, if not most of them, carried captive by Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, 2 Kings 15: 29. Josiah purged their country from idols. Our Savior and his disciples, during his public ministry, resided much and preached frequently in the land of Naphtali, Isa. 9: 1. Matt. 4: 13, 15.—Watson; Calmet.

NAPHTUHIM; a son, or rather the descendants of a son, of Mizraim, whose proper name is Naphtuch. Naphtuch is supposed to have given his name to Naph, Noph, or Memphis, and to have been the first king of that division of Egypt. He is, however, placed by Bochart in Libya; and is conjectured to be the Aptuchus, or Autuchus, who had a temple somewhere here. He is further conjectured, and not without reason, to be the original of the heathen god Neptune; who is represented to have been a Libyan, and whose temples were generally built near the sea-coast. By others, he is supposed to have peopled that part of Ethiopia between Syene and Meroe, the capital of which was called Napata.—Watson.

NASSARIANS, or Nosairi, a Mohammedan sect of the Shiite party, formed in the two hundred and seventieth year of the Hegira, received its name from Nasar, in the environs of Koufa, the birthplace of its founder. They occupy a strip of mount Lebanon, and are tributary to the Turks. They have about eight hundred villages, and their chief town is Sasita, eight leagues from Tripoli. Here their sheikh resides. Their manners are rude, and corrupted by remnants of heathenish customs, which remind us of the Lingam worship. Although polygamy is not allowed, yet, on certain festival days, they permit the promiscuous intercourse of the sexes, and are divided, after the manner of the Hindoos, into numerous castes, which oppress one another. They profess to be worshippers of Ali, believe in the transmigration of souls, but not in a heaven or hell. They are friendly to Christians, and observe some of their festivals and ceremonies, but without understanding their meaning. A spiritual head, sheikh Khalil, directs their religious concerns, and travels about among them as a prophet.

The opinion formerly current, that this sect were Syrian Sabians, or disciples of St. John, has been completely exploded by Niebuhr, and the accounts of Rosseau, the French consul at Aleppo. (See CHRISTIANS OF ST. JOHN.)—Hand. Buck.

NATHAN; a prophet illustrious for his union of prudence and faithfulness. He lived under David, and had much of the confidence of that prince, whom he served in a number of ways. See 2 Sam. 11, 12, &c.

The time and manner of Nathan's death are not known. 1 Chron. 29: 29. notices that he, with Gad, wrote the history of David. There are several other persons of this name mentioned in Scripture.—Calmet.

NATHANAEL; a disciple of Christ, remarkable for his transparent sincerity of character, the manner of whose conversion is related John 1: 46, &c. Many have thought that Nathanael was the same as Bartholomew. (See BARTHOLOMEW.)—Calmet.

NATION; all the inhabitants of a particular country; (Deut. 4: 34.) a country or kingdom; (Exod. 34: 10. Rev. 7: 9.) countrymen, natives of the same stock; (Acts 26: 4.) the father, head, and original of a people; (Gen. 25: 23.) the heathen or Gentiles, Isa. 55: 5. (See GENTILES; or HÆTHEN.)—Calmet.

NATIVITY OF CHRIST. The birth of our Savior was exactly as predicted by the prophecies of the Old Testament, Isa. 7: 11. Jer. 31: 22. He was born of a virgin, of the house of David, and of the tribe of Judah, Matt. 1: Luke 1: 27. His coming into the world was after the manner of other men, though his generation and conception were extraordinary. The place of his birth was Bethlehem, (Mic. 5: 2. Matt. 2: 4, 6.) where his parents were wonderfully conducted by providence, Luke 2: 1, 7. The time of his birth was foretold by the prophets to be before the sceptre or civil government departed from Judah, Gen. 49: 10. Mai. 3: 1. Hag. 2: 6, 7, 9. Dan. 9: 24. The exact year of his birth is not agreed on by chronologists, but it was about the four thousandth year of the world; nor can the precise season of the year, the month, and day in which he was born be ascertained. The Egyptians placed it in January; Wagenseil in February; Bouchart in March; some, mentioned by Clement of Alexandria, in April; others in May; Epiphanius speaks of some who placed it in June, and of others who supposed it to have been in July; Wagenseil, who was not sure of February, fixed it probably in August; Lightfoot on the 15th of September; Scaliger, Casaubon, and Calvisius, in October; others in November; and the Latin church in December. It does not, however, appear probable that the vulgar account is right; the circumstance of the shepherds watching their flocks by night, agrees not with the winter season. Dr. Gill thinks it was more likely in autumn, in the month of September, at the feast of tabernacles, to which there seems some reference in John 1: 14. The Scripture, however, assures us that it was in the "fulness of time;" (Gal. 4: 4.) and, indeed, the wisdom of God is evidently displayed as to the time when, as well as the end for which Christ came. It was in a time when the world stood in need of such a Savior, and was best prepared for receiving him.

1. About the time of Christ's appearance, says Dr. Robertson, there prevailed a general opinion that the Almighty would send forth some eminent messenger to communicate a more perfect discovery of his will to mankind.

The dignity of Christ, the virtues of his character, the glory of his kingdom, and the signs of his coming, were described by the ancient prophets with the utmost perspicuity. Guided by the sure word of prophecy, the Jews of that age concluded the period predetermined by God to be then completed, and that the promised Messiah would suddenly appear, Luke 2: 25—38. Nor were these expectations peculiar to the Jews. By their dispersion among so many nations, by their conversation with the learned men among the heathen, and the translation of their inspired writings into a language almost universal, the principles of their religion were spread all over the East; and it became the common belief that a Prince would arise at that time in Judea, who should change the face of the world, and extend his empire from one end of the earth to the other. Now, had Christ been manifested at a more early period, the world would not have been prepared to meet him with the same fondness and zeal; had his appearance been put off for any considerable time, men's expectations would have begun to languish, and the warmth of desire, from a delay of gratification, might have cooled and died away.

2. The birth of Christ was also in the fulness of time, if we consider the then political state of the world. The world, in the most early ages, was divided into small independent states, differing from each other in language, manners, laws, and religion. The shock of so many opposite interests, the interfering of so many contrary views, occasioned the most violent convulsions and disorders; perpetual discord subsisted between these rival states, and hostility and bloodshed never ceased. Commerce had not hitherto united mankind, and opened the communication of one nation with another: voyages into remote countries were very rare; men moved in a narrow circle, little acquainted with any thing beyond the limits of their own small territory. At last the Roman ambition undertook the arduous enterprise of conquering the world. They trod down the kingdoms, according to Daniel's prophetic description, by their exceeding strength they devoured the whole earth, Dan. 7: 7, 23. However, by enslaving the world, they civilized it, and while they oppressed mankind, they united them together; the same laws were everywhere established, and the same languages understood; men approached nearer to one another in sentiments and manners, and the intercourse between the most distant corners of the earth was rendered secure and agreeable. Satiated with victory, the first emperors abandoned all thoughts of new conquests; peace, an unknown blessing, was enjoyed through all that vast empire; or if a slight war was waged on an outlying and barbarous frontier, far from disturbing the tranquillity, it scarcely drew the attention of mankind. The disciples of Christ, thus favored by the union and peace of the Roman empire, executed their commission with great advantage. The success and rapidity with which they diffused the knowledge of his name over the world are astonishing. Nations were now accessible which formerly had been unknown. Under this situation, into which the providence of God had brought the world, the joyful sound in a few years reached those remote corners of the earth, into which it could not otherwise have penetrated for many ages. Thus the Roman ambition and bravery paved the way, and prepared the world for the reception of the Christian doctrine.

3. If we consider the state of the world with regard to morals, it evidently appears that the coming of Christ was at the most appropriate time. The Romans, (continues our author,) by subduing the world, lost their own liberty. Many vices engendered or nourished by prosperity, delivered them over to the vilest race of tyrants that ever afflicted or disgraced human nature. The colors are not too strong which the apostle employs in drawing the character of that age. See Eph. 4: 17, 19. In this time of universal corruption did the wisdom of God manifest the Christian revelation to the world. What the wisdom of men could do for the encouragement of virtue in a corrupt world had been tried during several ages, and all human devices were found by experience to be of very small avail; so that no juncture could be more proper for publishing a religion, which, independent of human laws and institutions, explains the principles of morals with admirable perspicuity, and enforces the practice of them by most persuasive arguments.

4. The wisdom of God will still further appear in the time of Christ's coming, if we consider the world with regard to its religious state. The Jews seem to have been deeply tinctured with superstition. Delighted with the ceremonial prescriptions of the law, they utterly neglected the moral. While the Pharisees undermined religion, on the one hand, by their vain traditions and wretched interpretations of the law, the Sadducees denied the immortality of the soul, and overturned the doctrine of future rewards and punishments; so that between them the knowledge and power of true religion were entirely destroyed. But the deplorable situation of the heathen world called still more loudly for an immediate interposal of the divine hand. The characters of their heathen deities were infamous, and their religious worship consisted frequently in the vilest and most shameful rites. According to the apostle's observation, they "were in all things too superstitious." Stately temples, expensive sacrifices, pompous ceremonies, magnificent festivals, with all the other circumstances of show and splendor, were the objects which false religion presented to its votaries; but just notions of God, obedience to his moral laws, purity of heart, and sanctity of life, were not once mentioned as ingredients in religious service. Rome adopted the gods of almost every nation whom she had conquered, and opened her temples to the grossest superstitions of the most barbarous people. Her foolish heart being darkened, she changed the glory of the incorruptible God into an image made like to corruptible man, and to birds, and four-footed beasts, and creeping things, Rom. 1: 21, 23. No period, therefore, can be mentioned when instructions would have been more reasonable and necessary; and no wonder that those who were looking for salvation should joyfully exclaim, "Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, for he hath visited and redeemed his people."

The nativity of Christ is celebrated in England on the 25th day of December, and divine service is performed in the church, and in many places of worship among dissenters; but, alas! the day, we fear, is more generally profaned than improved. Instead of being a season of real devotion, it is a season of great diversion. The luxury, extravagance, intemperance, obscene pleasures, and drunkenness that abound, are striking proofs of the immoralities of the age. It is a matter of just complaint, says a divine, that such irregular and extravagant things are at this time commonly done by many who call themselves Christians; as if, because the Son of God was at this time made man, they were fit for men to make themselves beasts! Manne's Dissertation on the Birth of Christ; Lardner's Cred., p. 1, vol. ii. pp. 796, 963; Gill's Body of Divinity, on Incarnation; Bishop Lee's Theory of Religion; Newton's Review of Ecclesiastical History; Dr. Robertson's Sermon on the Situation of the World at Christ's Appearance; Buckminster's Sermons; Edwards' Redemption, pp. 313, 316; Robinson's Claude, vol. i. pp. 276, 317; John Edwards' Survey of all the Dispensations and Methods of Religion, vol. i. chap. 13; Works of Hannah More.—*Heud. NATURAL, is, (1.) What proceeds from birth and natural causes, 1 Cor. 15: 44. (2.) What is agreeable to natural design, form, or inclination, Rom. 1: 26, 27.—Bronn.

NATURAL MAN, (psuchikos anthropos), is a peculiar designation that occurs in the apostolic writings: "The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned," 1 Cor. 2: 14. See also Jude 19. Here it is plain, first, that by "the natural man" is not meant a person devoid of natural judgment, reason, or conscience, in which sense the expression is often used among men. Nor does it signify one who is entirely governed by his fleshly appetites, or what the world calls a voluptuary, or sensualist. Neither does it signify merely a man in the rude state of nature, whose faculties have not been cultivated by learning and study, and polished by an intercourse with society. The context forbids either of these interpretations. The apostle manifestly takes his "natural man" from among such as the world hold in the highest repute for their natural parts, their learning, and their religion. He selects him from among the philosophers of Greece, who sought after wisdom, and from among the Jewish scribes, who were instructed in the revealed law of God, 1 Cor. 1: 22, 23. These are the persons whom he terms the wise, the scribes, the disputers of this world; men to whom the gospel was a stumbling-block and foolishness, 1 Cor. 1: 20, 23.

The "natural man" is also here evidently opposed to the pneumatikos, "him that is spiritual," (1 Cor. 2: 15.) even as the natural body which we derive from Adam is opposed to the spiritual body which believers will receive from Christ at the resurrection, according to 1 Cor. 15: 44, 45. Now the spiritual man is one who has the Spirit of Christ dwelling in him, (Rom. 8: 9.) not merely in the way of miraculous gifts, as some have imagined, (for these were peculiar to the first age of the Christian church, and even then not common to all the saints, nor inseparably connected with salvation, 1 Cor. 13: 1—4. Heb. 6: 4—7.) but in his saving influences of holiness, light, and consolation, whereby the subject is made to discern the truth and excellency of spiritual things, and so to believe, love, and delight in them as his true happiness. If therefore a man is called "spiritual" because the Spirit of Christ dwells in him, giving him new views, dispositions, and enjoyments, then the "natural man," being opposed to such, must be one who is destitute of the Spirit, and of all his supernatural and saving effects, whatever may be his attainments in human learning and science. It is obviously upon this principle that our Lord insists upon the necessity of the new birth in order to our entering into the kingdom of heaven, John 3: 3, 5.—Watson.

NATURE; the essential properties of a thing, or that by which it is distinguished from all others. It is used also for the system of the world, and the Creator of it; for the specific constitution of the sexes; and for common sense, Rom. 1: 26, 27. 1 Cor. 11: 14. The word is also used in reference to a variety of other objects, which we shall here enumerate. 1. The divine nature is not any external form or shape, but his glory, excellency, and perfections, peculiar to himself. 2. Human nature signifies the state, properties, and peculiarities of man. 3. Good nature is a disposition to please, and is compounded of kindness, forbearance, forgiveness, and self-denial. 4. The law of nature is the will of God relating to human actions, grounded in the moral differences of things. Some understand it in a more comprehensive sense, as signifying those stated orders by which all the parts of the material world are governed in their several motions and operations. 5. The light of nature does not consist merely in those ideas which heathens have actually attained, but those which are presented to men by the works of creation, and which, by the exertion of reason, they may obtain, if they be desirous of retaining God in their mind. (See RELIGION.) 6. By the dictates of nature, with regard to right and wrong, we understand those things which appear to the mind to be natural, fit, or reasonable. 7. The state of nature is that in which men have not by mutual engagements, implicit or express, entered into communities. 8. Depraved nature is that corrupt state in which all mankind are born, and which inclines them to evil. (See DEPRAVITY, HUMAN.)

Peter informs us, (2 Ephes. 1: 4.) that our Savior has made us partakers of a divine nature: he has imparted to us the character of children of God, and grace to practise godliness, &c. like our Father who is in heaven. Comp. 1 John 3: 1.—Heud. Buck; Calmet.

NAVIGATION, was little cultivated among the Hebrews till the days of their kings: Solomon had a fleet, but he had not sailors equal to the management of it; no doubt, but from their want of habit. Moses mentions nothing of navigation, and David, it should seem, rather acquired his great wealth by land commerce, than by sea voyages. It is not easy to say what assistance the wisdom of Solomon contributed to his fleet and officers on the mighty ocean. Perhaps his extensive knowledge of natural things first suggested the plan of these voyages. We know that Judea had ports on the Mediterranean, as Joppa, &c., but probably the coast, during the days of the judges, was in the hands of the Philistines, to the exclusion of Hebrew mariners; and this accounts for the means by which the Philistines, on so narrow a slip of land, could become powerful, and could occasionally furnish immense armies, because they were free to receive reinforcements by sea. In later ages the Greeks and Romans invaded Syria by sea, and the intercourse between Judea and Rome was direct; as we learn from the voyage of Paul, &c. Comp. JOPPA.

There were also many boats and lesser vessels employed in navigating the lakes, or seas, as the Hebrews called them, which are in the Holy Land; and there must have been some embarkations on the Jordan; but the whole of these were trifling; and it appears, that though Providence taught navigation to mankind, yet it was not the design of Providence that the chosen people, and the depositaries of the Messiah, should have been other than a settled or local nation, attached to one country, to which country, and even to certain of its towas, peculiar privileges were attributed in prophecy, and by divine appointment. The legal observances, distinction of meats, &c. were great impediments to Jewish sailors, and prevented their attainment of any great skill in navigation.—Calmet.

NAZARETH; a little city in the tribe of Zebulun, in Lower Galilee, to the west of Tabor, and to the east of Ptolemais. This city is much celebrated in the Scriptures for having been the usual place of the residence of Jesus Christ, during the first thirty years of his life, Luke 2: 51. It was here he lived in obedience to Joseph and Mary, and hence he took the name of Nazarene. After he had begun to execute his mission, he preached here sometimes in the synagogue, Luke 4: 16. But because his countrymen had no faith in him, and were offended at the meanness of his original, he did not many miracles here, (Matt.

13: 54, 58.) nor would he dwell in the city. So he fixed his habitation at Capernaum for the latter part of his life, Matt. 4: 13. The city of Nazareth was situated upon an eminence, and on one side was a precipice, from whence the Nazarenes designed, at one time, to cast Christ down headlong, because he upbraided them for their incredulity, Luke 4: 29.

The present state of this celebrated place is thus described by modern travellers:—Nassara, or Naszera, is one of the principal towns in the pashalic of Acre. Its inhabitants are industrious, because they are treated with less severity than those of the country towns in general. The population is estimated at three thousand, of whom five hundred are Turks; the remainder are Christians. There are about ninety Latin families, according to Burckhardt; but Mr. Connor reports the Greeks to be the most numerous: there is, besides, a congregation of Greek Catholics, and another of Maronites.

The Latin convent is a very spacious and commodious building, which was thoroughly repaired and considerably enlarged in 1730. The remains of the more ancient edifice, ascribed to the mother of Constantine, may be observed in the form of subverted columns, with fragments of capitals and bases of pillars, lying near the modern building. Pooecke noticed, over a door, an old alto-relief of Judith cutting off the head of Holofernes. Within the convent is the church of the Annunciation, containing the house of Joseph and Mary, the length of which is not quite the breadth of the church; but it forms the principal part of it. The columns and all the interior of the church are hung round with damask silk, which gives it a warm and rich appearance. Behind the great altar is a subterranean cavern, divided into small grottoes, where the Virgin is said to have lived. Her kitchen, parlor, and bedroom, are shown, and also a narrow hole in the rock, in which the child Jesus once hid himself from his persecutors! The pilgrims who visit these holy spots are in the habit of knocking off small pieces of stone from the walls, which are thus considerably enlarging.

Burckhardt says that this church, next to that of the holy sepulchre, is the finest in Syria, and contains two tolerably good organs. Within the walls of the convent are two gardens, and a small burying-ground: the walls are very thick, and serve occasionally as a fortress to all the Christians in the town. There are, at present, eleven friars in the convent: they are chiefly Spaniards. To the north-west of the convent is a small church, built over Joseph's workshop. Both Maundrell and Pooecke describe it as in ruins; but Dr. E. D. Clarke says, "This is now a small chapel, perfectly modern, and neatly whitewashed." To the west of this is a small arched building, which, they say, is the synagogue where Christ exasperated the Jews, by applying the language of Isaiah to himself.

Dr. E. D. Clarke remarks that the situation of the modern town answers exactly to the description of St. Luke. "Induced, by the words of the gospel, to examine the place more attentively than we should otherwise have done, we went, as it is written, out of the city, 'to the brow of the hill whereon the city is built,' and came to a precipice corresponding to the words of the evangelist. It is above the Maronite church, and, probably, the precise spot alluded to by the text."—Watson.

NAZARENE; Matt. 2: 23. We find no particular place in the prophets expressly affirming that the Messiah should be called a Nazarene; and Matthew only mentions the prophets in general. Perhaps he would infer that the consecration of Nazarites, and their great purity, was a type and prophecy referring to our Savior; (Num. 6: 18, 19.) or, that the name Nazir, or Nazarite, given to the patriarch Joseph, had some reference to Christ, Gen. 49: 26. Deut. 33: 16. Jerome was of opinion, that Matthew alludes to Isa. 11: 1. 60: 21: "There shall come forth a rod out of the stem of Jesse, and a branch (Heb. Nazer) shall grow out of his roots." This branch, or Nazer, and this rod, are certainly intended to denote the Messiah, by the general consent of the fathers and interpreters.—Or, possibly, in a more general sense, "He shall be vilified, despised, neglected," as every thing was that came from Nazareth; and this might be a kind of prophetic proverb.—Calmet.

NAZARENES; Christians converted from Judaism, whose chief error consisted in defending the necessity or expediency of the works of the law, and who obstinately adhered to the practice of the Jewish ceremonies. The name of Nazarenes, at first, had nothing odious in it, and it was often given to the first Christians. The fathers frequently mention the gospel of the Nazarenes, which differs nothing from that of St. Matthew, which was either in Hebrew or Syriac, for the use of the first converts, but was afterwards corrupted by the Ebionites. These Nazarenes preserved their first gospel in its primitive purity. Some of them were still in being in the time of Jerome, who does not reproach them with any gross errors. They were very zealous observers of the law of Moses, but held the traditions of the Pharisees in very great contempt.

Some have considered the Nazarenes and the Ebionites to have been identical; but this cannot be proved to be fact; and nothing can be more fallacious than the Socinian argument, which is founded on the mere assumption of this identity, and according to which, the Nazarenes, being orthodox judaizing Christians, held that Jesus was a mere man. See EBIONITES, and Bishop Horsley's Reply to Dr. Priestley, and Burton's Early Heresies.

The name Nazarene was given to Jesus Christ and his disciples; and is commonly taken in a sense of derision and contempt in such authors as have written against Christianity.—Head. Buck.

NAZARITES; those under the ancient law who engaged by a vow to abstain from wine and all intoxicating liquors, to let their hair grow, not to enter any house polluted by having a dead corpse in it, nor to be present at any funeral. If, by accident, any one should have died in their presence, they recommenced the whole of their consecration and Nazariteship. This vow generally lasted eight days, sometimes a month, and sometimes their whole lives.

Perpetual Nazarites, as Samson and John the Baptist, were consecrated to their Nazariteship by their parents, and continued all their lives in this state, without drinking wine or cutting their hair. Those who made a vow of Nazariteship out of Palestine, and could not come to the temple when their vow was expired, contented themselves with observing the abstinence required by the law, and cutting off their hair in the place where they were: the offerings and sacrifices prescribed by Moses, to be offered at the temple, by themselves or by others for them, they deferred till a convenient opportunity. Hence it was that St. Paul, being at Corinth, and having made the vow of a Nazarite, had his hair cut off at Cenchrea, a port of Corinth, and deferred the rest of his vow till he came to Jerusalem, Acts 18: 18. 21: 23, 24.

The institution of Nazaritism is involved in much mystery; and no satisfactory reason has ever been given of it. This is certain, that it had the approbation of God, and may be considered as affording a good example of self-denial in order to be given up to the study of the law, and the practice of exact righteousness.—Watson.

NEAL, (DANIEL,) a dissenting minister, was born, in 1678, in London; was educated at Merchant Tailors' school, and at Utrecht; became minister to a congregation in Jewin street; and died in 1743. He wrote a History of the Puritans; and a History of New England.—Davenport.

NEAPOLIS, now called Napoli; (Acts 16: 11.) a city of Macedonia, near the borders of Thrace.—Colmet.

NEAR; at hand. God is near, he is everywhere present, and is ready to help his people in every case; or when he offers to save, uphold, and comfort, Jer. 23: 23. Isa. 5: 6, and 41: 5. Deut. 4: 7. 1 Kings 2: 7. Ps. 69: 18, and 75: 1, and 119: 151, and 32: 9. Lam. 3: 57. He is near in people's mouth, but far from their reins, when they are oft talking of him, but are far from loving, desiring, and delighting in him, Jer. 12: 2. God's name is near; he is closely related to his people and they intimate in their fellowship with him. His work is near, exerted in upholding, protecting, and comforting them. His word is nigh in their mouth, and in their heart, preached to their ear, spoken by their lips, conceived by their mind, and powerfully applied to and believed by their heart. Israel was a people near to God; while the Gentiles were far off, they were closely related to him as his peculiar people; they had his ordinances and symbols of his presence among them; and he was ready to support and defend them, Ps. 148: 14, and 57: 19. We draw near to God when we worship him, and by faith, prayer, &c., have intimate fellowship with him, Lev. 16: 1. 1 Sam. 14: 36.—Brown.

NEBO; the name of an idol of the Babylonians: "Bel boweth down, Nebo stoopeth." Isa. 46: 1. The word Nebo comes from a root that signifies "to prophesy," and therefore may stand for an oracle. There is some probability in the opinion of Calmet, that Bel and Nebo are but one and the same deity, and that Isaiah made use of these names as synonymous. The god Bel was the oracle of the Babylonians. The name Nebo, or Nabo, is found in the composition of the names of several princes of Babylon; as Nabonassar, Nabopolassar, Nebuchadnezzar, Nebuzar-adan, Nebushasban, &c. (See also ABARIM.)—Watson.

NEBUCHADNEZZAR, or NABOPOLASSAR, father of Nebuchadnezzar the Great, was a Babylonian, and chief of the army of Saracus, king of Assyria. He made a league with Astyages, who gave his daughter Amyitis in marriage to his son Nebuchadnezzar. Ahasuerus and Nabopolassar, joining their forces, revolted against Saracus, king of Nineveh, besieged him in his capital, took him prisoner, and on the destruction of the Assyrian monarchy raised two kingdoms; that of the Medes, possessed by Astyages, or Ahasuerus, and that of the Chaldeans, or of Babylon, founded by Nabopolassar, A. M. 3378. He died A. M. 3399.—Calmet.

NEBUCHADNEZZAR, son and successor of Nabopolassar, succeeded to the kingdom of Chaldaea A. M. 3399. (See BABYLON.)

Nebuchadnezzar, being at Babylon, in the second year of his reign, had a mysterious dream, in which he saw a statue composed of several metals; the interpretation of which was given by Daniel, and procured his elevation to the highest post in the kingdom. (See DANIEL, ABBEDNEGO, and BABYLON.) Nebuchadnezzar died A. M. 3442, after having reigned forty-three years.—Calmet.

NECESSITARIANS; an appellation which may be given to all who maintain that moral agents act from necessity. (See next article, and MATERIALISTS.)—Head. Buck.

NECESSITY; constraint, or restraint, by irresistible power; in which sense it is opposed to freedom.

The doctrine of necessity regards the origin of human actions, and the specific mode of the divine government; and it seems to be the immediate result of the materiality of man; for literal mechanism is the undoubted consequence of materialism. Hence all materialists are of course necessitarians; but it does not follow that all necessitarians are or must be materialists.

Whether man is a necessary or a free agent, is a question which has been debated by writers of the first eminence. Hobbes, Collins, Hume, Leibnitz, Kames, Hartley, Priestley, Crombie, Toplady, and Belsham, have written on the side of necessity; while Edwards, Clarke, King, Law, Reid, Butler, Price, Bryant, Wollaston, Horsley, Beattie, Necker, Mackintosh, Gregory, Butterworth, and Dwight, have written against it. To state all their arguments in this place would take up too much room; suffice it to say, that the anti-necessitarians suppose that the doctrine of necessity charges God as the author of sin; that it takes away the freedom of the will, renders man unaccountable, makes sin to be no evil, and morality or virtue to be no good; precludes the use of means, and is of the most gloomy tendency. The necessitarians deny these to be legitimate consequences. All necessity, say they, doth not take away freedom. The actions of a man may be at one and the same time free and necessary too. It was infallibly certain that Judas would betray Christ, yet he did it voluntarily. Jesus Christ necessarily became man, and died, yet he acted freely. A good man doth naturally and necessarily love his children, yet voluntarily. It is part of the happiness of the blessed to love God unchangeably, yet freely, for it would not be their happiness if done by compulsion. Nor does it, says the necessitarian, render man unaccountable, since the Divine Being does no injury to his rational faculties; and man, as his creature, is answerable to him; besides, he has a right to do what he will with his own. That all necessity doth not render actions less morally good, is evident; for if necessary virtue be neither moral nor praiseworthy, it will follow that God himself is not a moral being, because he is a necessary one; and the obedience of Christ cannot be good, because it was necessary. Further, say they, moral necessity does not preclude the use of means; for means are no less appointed than the end. It was ordained that Christ should be delivered up to death; but he could not have been betrayed without a betrayer, nor crucified without crucifiers. That it is not a gloomy doctrine, they allege, because nothing can be more consolatory than to believe that all things are under the direction of an all-wise Being; that his kingdom ruleth over all, and that he doth all things well. So far from its being inimical to happiness, they suppose there can be no solid, true happiness without the belief of it; that it inspires gratitude, excites confidence, teaches resignation, produces humility, and draws the soul to God. It is also observed, that to deny necessity is to deny the foreknowledge of God, and to wrest the sceptre from the hand of the Creator, and to place that capricious and undefinable principle, the self-determining power of man, upon the throne of the universe. Besides, say they, the Scripture places the doctrine beyond all doubt, Job 23: 13, 14. 34: 29. Prov. 16: 4. Isa. 45: 7. Acts 13: 48. Eph. 1: 11. 1 Thess. 3: 3. Matt. 10: 29, 30. 18: 7. Luke 24: 26. John 6: 37.

In these statements, however, as president Edwards remarks, there is obviously a confused use of terms in different meanings, so as to mislead the unwary. For instance: necessity is confounded with certainty; but an action may be certain, though free; that is to say, certain to an omniscient Being, who knows how a free agent will finally resolve; but this certainty is, in fact, a quality of the prescient being, not that of the action, to which, however, men delusively transfer it. Again: God is called a necessary Being, which, if it mean any thing, signifies, as to his moral acts, that he can only act right. But then this is a wrong application of the term necessity, which properly implies such a constraint upon actions, exercised ab extra, as readers choice or will impossible. But such necessity cannot exist as to the Supreme Being. Again: the obedience of Christ unto death was necessary; that is to say, unless he had died guilty men could not have been forgiven; but this could not make the act of the Jews who put him to death a necessary act, that is to say, a forced and constrained one; nor did this necessity affect the act of Christ himself, who acted voluntarily, and might have left man without salvation. That the Jews acted freely, is evident from their being held liable to punishment, although unconsciously they accomplished the great designs of Heaven, which, however, was no excuse for their crime. Finally: as to the allegation, that the doctrine of free agency puts man's self-determining power upon the throne of the universe, that view proceeds upon notions unworthy of God, as though he could not accomplish his plans without compelling and controlling all things by a fixed fate; whereas it is both more glorious to him, and certainly more in accordance with the Scriptures, to say that he has a perfect foresight of the manner in which all creatures will act, and that he, by a profound and infinite wisdom, subordinates every thing without violence to the evolution and accomplishment of his own glorious purposes.

No writer, however, has set this difficult subject in so clear a light as the great but unknown author of the Natural History of Enthusiasm, in his Essay introductory to Edwards on the Will; to which we beg leave to refer the reader. See also the works of the above-mentioned writers on this subject; and articles MATERIALISTS; MORAL AGENCY; DECREES OF GOD; PREDESTINATION.—Watson; H. Buck.

NECHO, king of Egypt, carried his arms to the Euphrates, where he conquered the city of Carchemish. He is known not only in Scripture, but in Herodotus, who says that he was son of Psammetichus, king of Egypt, and that having succeeded him in the kingdom, he raised great armies, and sent out great fleets, as well on the Mediærranean as the Red sea; that he fought the Syrians near the city of Migdol, obtained the victory, and took the city of Cadytis, which some think to be Jerusalem. (See JOSHUA; BABYLON; CARCHEMISH.)—Calmet.

NECK. To harden the neck is a metaphor drawn from the practice of a bullock unaccustomed to the yoke.

NECKER, (JAMES), an eminent financier and religious statesman, the father of Madame De Stael, was born, in 1732, at Geneva, and for many years carried on the business of a banker at Paris. His Eulogy on Colbert, his treatise on the Corn Laws and Trade, and some essays on the Resources of France, inspired such an idea of his talents for finance, that, in 1776, he was appointed director of the treasury, and, shortly after, comptroller-general. Before his resignation, in 1781, he published a statement of his operations, addressed to the king; and, while in retirement, he produced a work on the Administration of the Finances, and another on the Importance of Religious Opinions. The latter work, notwithstanding some imperfections, is worthy of immortality. It has been translated into English. He was reinstated in the comptrollership in 1788, and advised the convocation of the states general; was abruptly dismissed, and ordered to quit the kingdom, in July, 1789; but was almost instantly recalled, on account of the ferment which his departure excited in the public mind. Necker, however, soon became as much an object of antipathy to the fickle people as he had been of their idolatry, and in 1790 he left France forever. M. Necker was a decided Protestant, and worthy of better treatment than papal and infidel France was disposed to give him. In 1798, he published a work of much interest on the French Revolution, and, in 1800, his last great and eloquent work on the Religious View of Morality, in three volumes. Necker and Burke belong to the same class of men. He died, at Copet, in Switzerland, in 1804. The whole of his works form fifteen volumes.—His wife, SUSANNA, whose maiden name was Curchod, was a woman of talent, and wrote Reflections on Divorce; and Miscellanies.—Davenport; Ency. Amer.

NECROLOGY, (formed of nekros, dead, and logos, discourse, or enumeration;) a book anciently kept in churches and monasteries, wherein were registered the benefactors of the same, the time of their deaths, and the days of their commemoration; as also the deaths of the priors, abbots, religious canons, &c. This was otherwise called calendar and obituary.—Hend. Buck.

NECROMANCY, (from nekros and manteia,) is the art of raising up the ghosts of deceased persons, to get information from them concerning future events. This practice, no doubt, the Israelites brought with them from Egypt, which affected to be the mother of such occult sciences; and from thence it spread into the neighboring countries, and soon infected all the East. The injunction of the law is very express against this vice; and the punishment to be inflicted on the practisers of it was stoning to death, Lev. 20: 27. What forms of enchantment were used in the practice of necromancy we are at a loss to know, because we read of none that the pythones of Endor employed; however, that there were several rites, spells, and invocations used upon these occasions, we may learn from almost every ancient author, but from none more particularly than from Lucan in his Pharsalia. Whether the art of conversing with the dead was mere imposture, or grounded upon diabolical agency, is a question which has been disputed in all ages.—Watson.

NEGINOTH; a term which is real before some of the psalms, and signifies stringed instruments of music, to be played on by the fingers, or by female musicians. The titles of these psalms may be translated, A Psalm of David to the master of music, who presides over the stringed instruments.—Calmet.

NEHEMIAH, an illustrious Jewish reformer and ruler, professes himself the author of the book which bears his name, in the very beginning of it, and he uniformly writes in the first person. He was of the tribe of Judah, and was probably born at Babylon during the captivity. He was so distinguished for his family and attainments, as to be selected for the office of cup-bearer to the king of Persia, a situation of great honor and emolument. He was made governor of Judea, upon his own application, by Artaxerxes Longimanus; and his book, which in the Hebrew canon was joined to that of Ezra, gives an account of his appointment and administration through a space of about thirty-six years, to A. M. 3593, at which time the Scripture history closes; and, consequently, the historical books, from Joshua to Nehemiah inclusive, contain the history of the Jewish people from the death of Moses, A. M. 2553, to the reformation established by Nehemiah, after the return from captivity, being a period of one thousand and forty-two years.—Watson.

NEHILOTH; a word found at the beginning of the fifth Psalm, and which signifies the dances, or the flutes. This psalm is addressed to the master who presided over the dances, which were performed in certain religious ceremonies, or the band of music which performed on the flute. The title of the fifth Psalm may be thus translated: "A Psalm of David, addressed to the master of music presiding over the dancers, or over the flutes."—Calmet.

NEHUSHTAN; a name given by Hezekiah, king of Judah, to the brazen serpent that Moses had set up in the wilderness, (Num. 21: 8.) and which had been preserved by the Israelites to that time. The superstitious people having made an idol of this serpent, Hezekiah caused it to be burnt, and in derision gave it the name of Nehushtan, q. d. this little brazen serpent, 2 Kings 18: 4.—Calmet.

NEIGHBOR, signifies a person near; and generally, any man connected with us by the bonds of humanity, and whom charity requires that we should consider as a friend and relation. At the time of our Savior, the Pharisees had restrained the meaning of the word neighbor to those of their own nation, or to their own friends; holding, that to hate their enemy was not forbidden by the law, Matt. 5: 43. Luke 10: 20. But our Savior informed them, that the whole world were neighbors; that they ought not to do to another what they would not have done to themselves; and that this charity extended even to enemies. See the beautiful parable of the good Samaritan, the real neighbor to the distressed, Luke 10: 29. (See LOVE or OUR NEIGHBOR.)

God is called a neighbor [near] to those who fear him, and call upon him, Ps. 85: 9. 145: 18. He gives them tokens of his presence and protection: "Am I a God at hand, and not a God afar off?" am I one of those gods that men have made not above two days ago? am not I an eternal God? Otherwise; I am a neighbor God, that sees every thing, knows every thing, and not an absent or a distant God, Jer. 23: 23. Compare Elijah and Baal's prophets.—Calmet.

NEOLOGY. This term, which signifies new doctrine, has been used to designate a species of theology and biblical criticism which has of late years much prevailed among the Protestant divines of Germany, and the professors of their universities. It is now, however, more frequently termed rationalism, and is supposed to occupy a sort of middle place between the orthodox system and pure deism.

1. Its definitions and forms.—The German divines themselves speak of naturalism, rationalism, and supernaturalism. The term naturalism arose first in the sixteenth century, and was spread in the seventeenth. It was understood to be the system of those who allowed no other knowledge of religion than the natural, which man could shape out by his own strength, and, consequently, excluded all supernatural revelation. As to the different forms of naturalism, theologians say there are three: the first, which they call Pelagianism, and which considers human dispositions and notions as perfectly pure, and the religious knowledge derived from them as sufficiently explicit. A grosser kind denies all particular revelation; and the grossest of all considers the world as God.

Rationalism has been thus explained: "Those who are generally termed rationalists," says Dr. Bretschneider, "admit universally in Christianity, a divine, benevolent, and positive appointment for the good of mankind, and Jesus as a Messenger of divine Providence, believing that the true and everlasting word of God is contained in the Holy Scripture, and that by the same the welfare of mankind will be obtained and extended. But they deny therein a supernatural and miraculous working of God, and consider the object of Christianity to be that of introducing into the world such a religion as reason can comprehend; and they distinguish the essential from the unessential, and what is local and temporary from that which is universal and permanent in Christianity." There is, however, a third class of divines, who, in fact, differ very little from this, though very widely in profession. They affect to allow a revealing operation of God, but establish on internal proofs rather than on miracles the divine nature of Christianity. They allow that revelation may contain much out of the power of reason to explain, but say that it should assert nothing contrary to reason, but rather what may be proved by it. Supernaturalism consists in general in the conviction that God has revealed himself supernaturally and immediately. The notion of a miracle cannot well be separated from such a revelation, whether it happens out of, on, or in men. "What is revealed may belong to the order of nature, but an order higher and unknown to us, which we could never have known without miracles, and cannot bring under the laws of nature.

2. Its principles.—The difference between the naturalists and the rationalists, as Mr. Rose justly remarks, is not quite so wide either as it would appear to be at first sight, or as one of them assuredly wishes it to appear. For if I receive a system, be it of religion, of morals, or of politics, only so far as it approves itself to my reason, whatever be the authority that presents it to me, it is idle to say that I receive the system out of any respect to that authority. I receive it only because my reason approves it; and I should, of course, do so if an authority of far inferior value were to present the system to me. This is what that division of rationalists, which professes to receive Christianity, and at the same time to make reason the supreme arbiter in matters of faith, has done. Their system, in a word, is this: They assume certain general principles, which they maintain to be the necessary deductions of reason from an extended and unprejudiced contemplation of the natural and moral order of things, and to be in themselves immutable and universal. Consequently, any thing which, on however good authority, may be advanced in apparent opposition to them, must either be rejected as unworthy of rational belief, or, at least, explained away till it is made to accord with the assumed principles; and the truth or falsehood of all doctrines proposed is to be decided according to their agreement or disagreement with those principles.

3. Its operation.—It is easy, then, to anticipate, how, with such principles, the biblical critics of Germany, distinguished as many of them have been for learning, would proceed to interpret the Scriptures. Many of the sacred books and parts of others have, of course, been rejected by them as spurious, the strongest external evidence being thought by them insufficient to prove the truth of what was determined to be contradictory to their reason; and the inspiration of the rest was understood in no higher a sense, to use the language of one of their professors, than the expressions of Cicero as to the inspiration of the poets, or those of Quintilian respecting Plato. But where the supernatural and miraculous accounts were not rejected, they were, by many of the most eminent of these writers, explained away by a monstrous ingenuity, which, on any other subject, and applied to any ancient classic or other writer, would provoke the most contemptuous ridicule. When Korah, Dathan, and Abiram were swallowed up, Moses had previously "secretly undermined the earth." Jacob wrestled with the angel "in a dream;" and a rheumatic pain in his thigh during sleep suggested the incident in his dream of the angel touching the sinew of his thigh. In like manner the miracle of feeding the five thousand in the desert is resolved into the opportune passing by of a caravan with provisions, of which the hungry multitude were allowed to partake, according to eastern hospitality; and the apostles were merely employed in conveying it out in baskets. Christ's walking upon the sea is explained by his walking upon the sea-shore, and St. Peter's walking on the sea is resolved into swimming. The miracles of healing were the effect of fancy operating favorably upon the disorders; and Ananias and Sapphira died of a fright; with many other absurdities, half dreams and half blasphemies; and of which the above are given but as a specimen.

These principles of unbelief have, under various modifications, been propagated by means of systems of philosophy, new versions of the Scriptures, commentaries, introductions, works on biblical criticism and interpretation, grammars, lexicons, lectures, sermons, catechisms, tracts, reviews, newspapers, and, in short, through almost every possible vehicle of communication. Their advocates have been found in the professor at the university, the preacher in the pulpit, the village schoolmaster, and even the mother and the nursery-maid. Sometimes they have been propounded with all the gravity of a philosopher, and at other times taught with all the flippancy and levity of a buffoon. With such instruments and such efforts, Christianity has now had to struggle for more than half a century; and awful have been the examples of religious shipwreck which that period of time has presented.

4. Its sources.—The first step in this sorrowful gradation down to a depth of falsehood and blasphemy, into which certainly no body of Christian ministers, so large, so learned, and influential, in any age or period of the church ever before fell, was, contempt for the authority of the divines of the Reformation, and of the subsequent age. They were about to set out on a voyage of discovery; and it was necessary to assume that truth still inhabited some terra incognita, to which neither Luther, Melancthon, nor their early disciples, had ever found access. One of this school is pleased, indeed, to denominate the whole even of the seventeenth and the first half of the eighteenth century, the age of theological barbarism.

The vain conceit that the doctrines of religion were capable of philosophic demonstration, which obtained among the followers of Wolf, is considered by Mr. Rose as having hastened onward the progress of error. The effect in Germany was speedily developed, though Wolf, the founder of this school, and most of his followers, were pious and faithful Christians. By carrying demonstrative evidence beyond its own province, they had nurtured in their followers a vain confidence in human reason; and the next and still more fatal step was, that it was the province of human reason in an enlightened and intellectual age to perfect Christianity, which, it was contended, had hitherto existed in a low and degraded state, and to perfect that system of which the elements only were contained in the Scripture. All restraint was broken by this principle. Philosophy, good and bad, was left to build up these "elements" according to its own views; and as, after all, many of these elements were found to be too untractable and too rudely shaped to accord with the plans of these manifold constructions, formed according to every "pattern," except that "in the mount;" when the stone could not be squared and framed by any art which these builders possessed, it was "rejected."

Semler appears to have been the author of that famous theory of accommodation, which, in the hands of his followers, says Mr. Rose, became "the most formidable weapon ever devised for the destruction of Christianity." (See ACCOMMODATION.) As far as Germany is concerned, this language is not too strong; and we may add, that it was the most impudent theory ever advocated by men professing still to be Christians, and one, the avowal of which can scarcely be accounted for, except on the ground, that as, because of their interests, it was not convenient for these teachers of theology and ministers of the German churches to disavow Christianity altogether, it was devised and maintained, in order to connect the profits of the Christian profession with substantial and almost undisguised deism. Thus the chairs of theology and the very pulpits were turned into "the seats of the scornful;" and where doctrines were at all preached, they were too frequently of this daring and infidel character. It became even, at least, a negative good, that the sermons delivered were often discourses on the best modes of cultivating corn and wine, and the preachers employed the Sabbath and the church in instructing their flocks how to choose the best kinds of potatoes, or to enforce upon them the benefits of vaccination. Undisguised infidelity has in no country treated the grand evidences of the truth of Christianity with greater contumely, or been more offensive in its attacks upon the prophets, or more ridiculous in its attempts to account, on natural principles, for the miracles. Extremes of every kind were produced, philosophic mysticism, pantheism, and atheism.

We have hitherto referred chiefly to Mr. Rose's work on this awful declension in the Lutheran and other continental churches. In a work on the same subject by Mr. Pusey, the stages of the apostasy are more carefully marked, and more copiously and deeply investigated. Our limits will, however, but allow us to advert to two or three points. In Mr. Pusey's account of the state of German theology in the seventeenth century, he opens to us the sources of the evil. Francke, he observes, assigns as a reason for attaching the more value to the opportunities provided at Halle for the study of Scripture, that "in former times, and in those which are scarcely past, one generally found at universities opportunities for every thing rather than a solid study of God's word." "In all my university years," says Knapp, "I was not happy enough to hear a lecture upon the whole of Scripture; we should have regarded it as a great blessing which came down from heaven." It is said to be one only of many instances, that at Leipzig, Carpzoff, having in his lectures for one half year completed the first chapter of Isaiah, did not again lecture on the Bible for twenty years, while Olearius suspended his for ten. Yet Olearius, as well as Alberti, Speuer says, "were diligent theologians, but that most pains were employed on doctrinal theology and controversy." It is, moreover, a painful speaking fact, which is mentioned by Francke, (1709,) that in Leipzig, the great mart of literature as well as of trade, "twenty years ago, in no bookseller's shop was either Bible or Testament to be found." Of the passages in Francke, which prove the same state of things, I will select one or two only: "Youth are sent to the universities with a moderate knowledge of Latin; but of Greek, and especially of Hebrew, next to none. And it would even then have been well, if what had been neglected before, had been made up in the universities. There, however, most are borne, as by a torrent, with the multitude; they flock to logical, metaphysical, ethical, polemical, physical, pneumatical lectures, and what not; treating least of all those things whose benefit is most permanent in their future office, especially deferring, and at last neglecting, the study of the sacred languages."

Yet these were but effects of a still higher cause,—the rapid decay of piety in this century, of which the statements of Mr. Pusey, and the authorities he quotes, present a melancholy picture. Speaking of J. V. Andrea, he says, the want of practical religious instruction in the early schools, the perverted state of all education, the extravagance and dissoluteness of the universities, the total usefulness of the teachers whom they sent forth and authorized, the degraded state of general as well as theological science, the interested motives for entering into holy orders, the canvassing for benefices, the simony in obtaining them, the especial neglect of the poor, the bad lives, the carelessness and bitter controversies of the preachers, and the general corruption of manners in all ranks, are again and again the subjects of his deep regrets or of his censure. Into the state of the clergy Francke enters more fully in another work. "I remember," he says, "that a theologian of no common learning, piety, and practical knowledge, (non ea haereticis.) told me, that a certain monarch, at his suggestion, applied to a university, where there was a large concourse of students of theology, for two candidates for holy orders, who, by the excellence and purity of their doctrine, and by holiness of life, might serve as an example to the congregation committed to their charge; the professors candidly answered that there was no such student of theology among them. Nor is this surprising. I remember that Kortholt used to say with pain, that in the disgraceful strifes, disturbances, and tumults in the universities, which were, alas, but too frequent, it scarcely ever happened that theological students were not found to be accomplices, nay, the chiefs. I remember that another theologian often lamented, that there was such a dearth in the church of such persons as the apostle would alone think worthy of the ministerial functions, that it was to be regarded as a happiness if, of many applicants, some one of outwardly decent life could at length be found."

5. Its effects.—With several happy exceptions, and the raising up of a few pious people in some places, and a partial revival of evangelical doctrines, which, however, often ran at length into mysticism and Antinomianism, the evil, both doctrinally and morally, continued to increase to our own day; for if any ask what has been the moral effect of the appalling apostasy of the teachers of religion, above described, upon the people of Germany, the answer may be given from one of these rationalizing divines themselves, whose statement is not therefore likely to be too highly colored. It is from a pamphlet of Bretschneider, published in 1822, and the substance is, "Indifference to religion among all classes; that formerly the Bible used to be in every house, but now the people either to not possess it, or, as formerly, read it; that few attend the churches, which are now too large, though fifty years ago they were too small; that few honor the Sabbath; that there are now few students of theology, compared with those in law and medicine; that if things go on so, there will shortly not be persons to supply the various ecclesiastical offices; that preaching had fallen into contempt; and that distrust and suspicion of the doctrines of Christianity prevailed among all classes." Melancthy as this picture is, nothing in it can surprise any one, except that the very persons who have created the evil should themselves be astonished at its existence, or even affect to be so.

6. Recent reaction and revival of religion.—At length, however, a powerful reaction has taken place. The high places of literature and influence are no longer exclusively held by men inimical to the truth as it is in Jesus, but are, many of them, occupied by individuals of acknowledged literary and scientific merit, who are bending all their energies to undeceive the public with respect to the unsatisfactory, untenable, and self-contradictory theories of rationalism, falsely so called. A spirit of piety is rapidly spreading among those who are destined to be the future instructors of the people; the Scriptures and evangelical tracts are being extensively circulated; and some able periodicals have recently been set on foot, under the editorial superintendence of men of orthodox principles and high literary attainments.

It has been justly observed, that no men ever undertook to deny the divine origin of Christianity, or to explain away its principal facts and doctrines, under circumstances so favorable for the experiment as those of the neologists of Germany. The hand of power, instead of being against them, was most frequently with them. They had possession of the seats of learning, commanded a vast band of journals which kept any thing of the kind in the shape of orthodox entirely out of the market. They had all the advantages which facilities in literature could give; they had numbers, and wealth, and clamor on their side; they had, in a word, ample room and verge enough to work their will, if that will could have been effected. And yet, in spite of all that metaphysical and mythological researches could effect to get rid of the divine authority of the Bible; in spite of all that sophistry and ridicule could effect to introduce the misnamed religion of reason, it remains precisely where it was; and the religion of reason is being overthrown and rejected. The Bible has laughed its enemies and all their efforts to scorn. "The word of God shall stand forever." NEOMENIA; (Col. 2: 16.) a Greek word, signifying the first day of the moon or month. The Hebrews had a particular veneration for the first day of every month, for which Moses appointed peculiar sacrifices; (Num. 28: 11, 12.) but he gave no orders that it should be kept as a holy day, nor can it be proved that the ancients observed it so; it was a festival of merely voluntary devotion. (See MONIA.) It appears that even from the time of Saul they made, on this day, a sort of family entertainment, since David ought then to have been at the king's table; and Saul took his absence amiss, 1 Sam. 20: 5, 18. Moses insinuates, that besides the national sacrifices then regularly offered, every private person had his particular sacrifices of devotion, Num. 10: 10. The beginning of the month was proclaimed by sound of trumpet, at the offering of solemn sacrifices, ibid. But the most celebrated neomenia was that at the beginning of the civil year, or first day of the month Tisri, Lev. 23: 24. This was a sacred festival, on which no servile labor was performed. In the kingdom of the ten tribes, the people used to assemble at the houses of the prophets, to hear their instructions, 2 Kings 4: 23. Isa. 1: 13, 14. Ezekiel says (45: 17; see also 1 Chron. 23: 31. 2 Chron. 8: 13.) that the burnt-offerings offered on the day of the new moon, were provided at the king's expense, and that on this day was to be opened the eastern gate of the court of the priests, chap. 46: 1, 2.

Spencer has a long dissertation on the neomenia, in which he shows that the Gentiles honored the first day of the month, out of veneration to the moon. He would infer, that the Hebrews borrowed this practice from strange and idolatrous people. But he by no means proves this; and it is much more probable, that without any design of imitating the Hebrews, the Gentiles thought fit to honor the moon at the beginning of the month, that is, her first appearance.—Calmet.

NEONOMIANS; so called from the Greek neos, new, and nomos, law; signifying a new law, the condition whereof is imperfect though sincere and persevering obedience.

Neonomianism seems to be an essential part of the Arminian system. "The new covenant of grace which, through the medium of Christ's death, the Father made with men, consists, according to this system, not in our being justified by faith, as it apprehends the righteousness of Christ; but in this, that God, abrogating the exaction of perfect legal obedience, reposes or accepts of faith itself, and the imperfect obedience of faith, instead of the perfect obedience of the law, and graciously accounts them worthy of the reward of eternal life."—This opinion was examined at the synod of Dort, and has been canvassed between the Calvinists and Arminians on various occasions.

Towards the close of the seventeenth century, a controversy was agitated amongst the English Dissenters, in which the one side, who were partial to the writings of Dr. Crisp, were charged with Antinomianism, and the other, who favored Mr. Baxter, were accused of Neonomianism. Dr. Daniel Williams, who was a principal writer on what was called the Neonomian side, after many things had been said, gives the following as a summary of his faith in reference to those subjects:—"1. God has eternally elected a certain definite number of men whom he will infallibly save by Christ in that way prescribed by the gospel.—2. These very elect are not personally justified until they receive Christ, and yield up themselves to him, but they remain condemned whilst unconverted to Christ.—3. By the ministry of the gospel there is a serious offer of pardon and glory, upon the terms of the gospel, to all that hear it; and God thereby requires them to comply with the said terms.—4. Ministers ought to use these and other gospel benefits as motives, assuring men that if they believe they shall be justified; if they turn to God, they shall live; if they repent, their sins shall be blotted out; and whilst they neglect these duties, they cannot have a personal interest in these respective benefits.—5. It is by the power of the Spirit of Christ freely exerted, and not by the power of free-will, that the gospel becomes effectual for the conversion of any soul to the obedience of faith.—6. When a man believes, yet is not that very faith, and much less any other work, the matter of that righteousness for which a sinner is justified, i. e. entitled to pardon, acceptance and eternal glory, as righteous before God; and it is the imputed righteousness of Christ alone, for which the gospel gives the believer a right to these and all saving blessings, who in this respect is justified by Christ's righteousness alone. By both this and the fifth head it appears that all boasting is excluded, and we are saved by free grace.—7. Faith alone receives the Lord Jesus and his righteousness, and the subject of this faith is a convicted, penitent soul; hence we are justified by faith alone, and yet the impenitent are not forgiven.—8. God has freely promised that all whom he predestinated to salvation shall not only savingly believe, but that he by his power shall preserve them from a total or a final apostasy.—9. Yet the believer, whilst he lives in this world, is to pass the time of his sojourning here with fear, because his warfare is not accomplished, and that it is true, that if he draw back, God will have no pleasure in him; which with the like cautions God blesseth as means to the saints' perseverance, and these by ministers should be so urged.—10. The law of innocence, or moral law, is so in force still as that every precept thereof constitutes duty, even to the believer; every breach thereof is a sin deserving of death. This law binds them by its curse on every unbeliever, and the righteousness for or by which we are justified before God, is a righteousness (at least) adequate to that law, which is Christ's alone righteousness: and this so imputed to the believer as that God deals judicially with them according thereto.—11. Yet such is the grace of the gospel, that it promiseth—and by Christ a freedom from the curse, forgiveness of sin, and eternal life, to every sincere believer; which promise God will certainly perform, notwithstanding the threatening of the law."

Dr. Williams maintains the conditionality of the covenant of grace; but admits, with Dr. Owen, who also uses the term condition, that "Christ undertook that those who were to be taken into this covenant should receive grace enabling them to comply with the terms of it, fulfil its conditions, and yield the obedience which God required therein."

On this subject Dr. Williams further says, "The question is not whether the first (viz. regenerating) grace, by which we are enabled to perform the condition, be absolutely given. This I affirm, though that be dispensed ordinarily in a due use of means, and in a way discountenancing idleness, and fit encouragement given to the use of means."

The following objection, among others, was made by several ministers, in 1692, against Dr. Williams' "Gospel Truth Stated," &c. :—"To supply the room of the moral law, vacated by him, he turns the gospel into a new law, in keeping of which we shall be justified for the sake of Christ's righteousness, making qualifications and acts of ours a disposing subordinate righteousness, whereby we become capable of being justified by Christ's righteousness."

To this among other things he answers, "The difference is not, 1. Whether the gospel be a new law in the Socinian, Popish, or Arminian sense. This I deny. Nor, 2. Is faith, or any other grace or act of ours, any atonement for sin, satisfaction to justice, meriting qualification, or any part of that righteousness for which we are justified at God our Creator's bar. This I deny in places innumerable. Nor, 3. Whether the gospel be a law more new than is implied in the first promise to fallen Adam, proposed to Cain, and obeyed by Abel, to the differing him from his unbelieving brother. This I deny. 4. Nor whether the gospel be a law that allows sin, when it accepts such graces as trae, though short of perfection, to be the conditions of our personal interest in the benefits purchased by Christ. This I deny. 5. Nor whether the gospel be a law, the promises whereof entitle the performers of its conditions to the benefits as of debt. This I deny."

"The difference is, 1. Is the gospel a law in this sense; viz. God in Christ thereby commandeth sinners to repent of sin, and receive Christ by a true operative faith, promising that thereupon they shall be united to him, justified by his righteousness, pardoned, and adopted; and that, persevering in faith and true holiness, they shall be finally saved; also threatening that if any shall die impenitent, unbelieving, ungodly, rejecters of his grace, they shall perish without relief, and endure sorer punishments than if these offers had not been made to them?—2. Hath the gospel a sanction, i. e. doth Christ therein enforce his commands of faith, repentance, and perseverance, by the aforesaid promises and threatenings, as motives of our obedience? Both these I affirm, and they deny; saying the gospel in the largest sense is an absolute promise without precepts and conditions, and a gospel threat is a bull.—3. Do the gospel promises of benefits to certain graces, and its threats that those benefits shall be withheld and the contrary evils inflicted for the neglect of such graces, render those graces the condition of our personal title to those benefits?—This they deny, and I affirm," &c.

It does not appear to have been a question in this controversy, whether God in his word commands sinners to repent and believe in Christ, nor whether he promises life to believers, and threatens death to unbelievers; but whether it be the gospel under the form of a new law that thus commands or threatens, or the moral law on its behalf, and whether its promises to believing, render such believing a condition of the things promised. In another controversy, however, which arose about forty years afterwards among the same description of people, it became a question whether God did by his word (call it law or gospel) command unregenerate sinners to repent and believe in Christ, or to do any thing which is spiritually good. (See CALLING.) Of those who took the affirmative side of this question, one party attempted to maintain it on the ground of the gospel being a new law, consisting of commands, promises, and threatenings, the terms or conditions of which were repentance, faith, and sincere obedience. But those who first engaged in the controversy, though they allowed the encouragement to repent and believe to arise merely from the grace of the gospel, yet considered the formal obligation to do so as arising merely from the moral law, which, requiring supreme love to God, requires acquiescence in any revelation which he shall at any time make known. NERO. The emperor Nero is not named in Scripture; but he is indicated by his title of emperor, and by his surname Caesar. To him St. Paul appealed after his imprisonment by Felix, and his examination by Festus, who was swayed by the Jews. St. Paul was therefore carried to Rome, where he arrived A. D. 64. Here he continued two years, preaching the gospel with freedom, till he became famous even in the emperor's court, in which were many Christians; for he salutes the Philippians in the name of the brethren who were of the household of Caesar, that is, of Nero's court, Philip. 1: 12, 13. 4: 22. We have no particular information how he cleared himself from the accusations of the Jews, whether by answering before Nero, or whether his enemies dropped their prosecutions, which seems probable, Acts 28: 21. However, it appears that he was liberated in the year 63.

Nero, the most cruel and savage of all men, and also the most wicked and depraved, began his persecution against the Christian church, A. D. 64, on pretence of the burning of Rome, of which some have thought himself to be the author. He endeavored to throw all the odium on the Christians: these were seized first that were known publicly as such, and by their means many others were discovered. They were condemned to death, and were even insulted in their sufferings. Some were sewed up in the skins of beasts, and then exposed to dogs to be torn in pieces; some were nailed to crosses; others perished by fire. The latter were sewed up in pitched coverings, which, being set on fire, served as torches to the people, and were lighted up in the night. Nero gave leave to use his own gardens, as the scene of all these cruelties. From this time elicits were published against the Christians, and many martyrs suffered, especially in Italy. St. Peter and St. Paul are thought to have suffered martyrdom, consequent on this persecution, A. D. 65.

The revolt of the Jews from the Romans happened about A. D. 65 and 66, in the twelfth and thirteenth of Nero. The city of Jerusalem making an insurrection, A. D. 66, Florus there slew three thousand six hundred persons, and thus began the war. A little while afterwards, those of Jerusalem killed the Roman garrison. Cestius on this came to Jerusalem to suppress the sedition; but he was forced to retire after having besieged it about six weeks, and was routed in his retreat, A. D. 66. About the end of the same year, Nero gave Vespasian the command of his troops against the Jews. This general carried on the war in Galilee and Judea during A. D. 67 and 68, the thirteenth and fourteenth of Nero. But Nero killing himself in the fourteenth year of his reign, Jerusalem was not besieged till after his death, A. D. 70, the first and second of Vespasian.—Watson.

NESTORIANS; a denomination which arose in the fifth century, from Nestorius, bishop of Constantinople, a man of considerable learning and eloquence, and of an independent spirit. The Catholic clergy were fond of calling the virgin Mary "Mother of God," to which Nestorius objected, as implying that she was mother of the divine nature, which he very properly denied; and this raised against him, from Cyril and others, the cry of heresy, and perhaps led him into some improper forms of expression and explication. It is generally agreed, however, by the moderns, that Nestorius showed a much better spirit in controversy than his antagonist, St. Cyril. As to the doctrine of the Trinity, it does not appear that Nestorius differed from his antagonists, admitting the coequality of the divine persons; but he was charged with maintaining two distinct persons, as well as natures, in the mysterious character of Christ. This, however, he solemnly and constantly denied; and from this, as a foul reproach, he has been cleared by the moderns, and particularly by Martin Luther, who lays the whole blame of this controversy on the turbulent and angry Cyril. (See HYPOSTATICAL UNION.) The discordancy not only between the Nestorians and other Christians, but also among themselves, arose, no doubt, in a great measure, from the ambiguity of the Greek terms hypostasis and prosōpon. The councils assembled at Seleucia on this occasion decreed that in Christ there were two hypostases. But this word, unhappily, was used both for person and nature; hence the difficulty and ambiguity; and of these hypostases it is said the one was divine, and the other human;—the divine Word, and the man Jesus. Now of these two hypostases it is added, they had only one appearance, (barsopa, the original term used by Nestorius, and usually translated by the Greeks, "person.") To avoid the appearance of an express contradiction, Dr. Mosheim translates this barbarous word "aspect," as meaning a union of will and affection, rather than of nature or of person. And thus the Nestorians are charged with rejecting the union of two natures in one person, from their peculiar manner of expressing themselves, though they absolutely denied the charge.

In the earliest ages of Nestorianism, the various branches of that numerous and powerful sect were under the spiritual jurisdiction of the Catholic patriarch of Babylon,—a vague appellation which has been successively applied to the sees of Seleucia, Ctesiphon, and Bagdad,—but who now resides at Mousul. In the sixteenth century the Nestorians were divided into two sects; for in 1551 a warm dispute arose among them about the creation of a new patriarch, Simeon Barmamas, or Barmana, being proposed by one party, and Sulaka, otherwise named Siud, earnestly desired by the other; when the latter, to support his pretensions the more effectually, repaired to Rome, and was consecrated patriarch in 1553, by pope Julius III., whose jurisdiction he had acknowledged, and to whose commands he had promised unlimited submission and obedience. Upon this new Chaldean patriarch's return to his own country, Julius sent with him several persons skilled in the Syriac language, to assist him in establishing and extending the papal empire among the Nestorians; and from that time, that unhappy people have been divided into two factions, and have often been involved in the greatest dangers and difficulties, by the jarring sentiments and perpetual quarrels of their patriarchs. In 1555, Simeon Denha, archbishop of Geln, adopted the party of the fugitive patriarch, who had embraced the communion of the Latin church; and, being afterwards chosen patriarch himself, he fixed his residence in the city of Van, or Ormus, in the mountainous parts of Persia, where his successors still continue, and are all distinguished by the name of Simeon; but they seem of late to have withdrawn themselves from their communion with the church of Rome. The great Nestorian pontiffs who form the opposite party, and who have, since 1559, been distinguished by the general denomination of Elias, and reside constantly at Mousul, look with a hostile eye on this little patriarch; but since 1617 the bishops of Ormus have been in so low and declining a state, both in opulence and credit, that they are no longer in a condition to excite the envy of their brethren at Mousul, whose spiritual dominion is very extensive, taking in a great part of Asia, and comprehending within its circuit the Arabian Nestorians, as also the Christians of St. Thomas, who dwell along the coast of Malabar.—Watson.

NET. Surely in vain the net is spread in the sight of any bird; that is, the very birds of the air are wiser than sinners, since they take warnings which sinners refuse to observe, Prov. 1: 17.

NETHINIM, (given, or offered;) servants dedicated to the service of the tabernacle and temple, to perform the most laborious offices; as carrying of wood and water. At first the Gibeonites were destined to this station; afterwards, the Canaanites who surrendered themselves, and whose lives were spared. We read, in Ezra 8: 20, that the Nethinim were slaves devoted by David, and other princes, to the service of the temple; and in Ezra 2: 58, that they were slaves given by Solomon; the children of Solomon's servants. From 1 Kings 9: 20, 21, we see that he had subdued the remains of the Canaanites, and it is very probable that he gave a good number of them to the priests and Levites, for the temple service. The Nethinim were carried into captivity with the tribe of Judah, and great numbers were placed not far from the Caspian sea, whence Ezra brought two hundred and twenty of them into Judea, chap. 8: 17. Those who followed Zerubbabel, made up three hundred and ninety-two, Neh. 3: 26. This number was but small in regard to their offices; so that we find afterwards a solemnity called xylophoria, in which the people carried wood to the temple, with great ceremony, to keep up the fire of the altar of burnt sacrifices.—Calmet.

NETOPHA; a city and district between Bethleem and Anathoth, Ezra 2: 22. Neh. 7: 26. Jer. 11: 8. 1 Chron. 9: 16.—Calmet.

NETTLES. We find this name given to two different words in the original. The first is cherub, Job 30: 7. Prov. 24: 31. Zeph. 2: 9. It is not easy to determine what species of plant is here meant. From the passage in Job, the nettle could not be intended; for a plant is referred to large enough for people to take shelter under. The following extract from Denon's Travels may help to illustrate the text, and show to what an uncomfortable retreat those vagabonds must have resorted. "One of the inconveniences of the vegetable thickets of Egypt is, that it is difficult to remain in them; as nine-tenths of the trees and the plants are armed with inexorable thorns, which suffer only an unquiet enjoyment of the shadow which is so constantly desirable, from the precaution necessary to guard against them." The kimosh, (Prov. 24: 31. Isa. 34: 13. Hos. 9: 6.) is by the Valgate rendered "urtica," which is well defended by Celsius, and very probably means "the nettle."—Watson.

NEW; fresh; recent; unused before; endowed with new qualities. (See Judg. 5: 8. Num. 16: 30.) God promises a new heaven and a new earth, in the time of the Messiah, (Isa. 65: 17. 66: 22.) that is, a universal renovation of manners, sentiments, and actions, throughout the world. This passage is referred to the end of the world, when will commence a new heaven and a new earth; not that the present heaven and earth will be annihilated; but the air, the earth, and the elements, will be made more perfect, or at least, together with the inhabitants, shall be of a nature superior to those vicissitudes and alterations that now affect these elements. (See CONFLAGRATION.) God also promises to his people "a new covenant, a new spirit, a new heart;" and this promise was fulfilled in the covenant of grace, the gospel, Ezek. 11: 19. 18: 31. 36: 26. Jer. 31: 33. Heb. 8: 10. (See COVENANT, and REGENERATION.)—Calmet.

NEW JERUSALEM CHURCH. (See SWEDENBORGIAN.)

NEWELL, (SAMUEL,) American missionary at Bombay, was graduated at Harvard college, in 1807, and studied theology at Andover. With Judson, Nott, and Mills, he offered himself as a missionary to the General Association of ministers at Bradford, June 27, 1810; was ordained at Salem, with Judson, Nott, and Rice, February 6, 1812; and sailed on the 19th for Calcutta. On his arrival he was ordered by the Bengal government to leave the country. Proceeding first to the Isle of France, he suffered the affliction of losing his wife and child; he afterwards went to Ceylon, and was useful in preparing the way for the subsequent mission in that island. He afterwards joined Mr. Hall at Bombay, and, in 1817, was joined by Mr. Graves and Mr. Nichols. He continued at Bombay, a faithful laborer in the service of Jesus Christ, until his death, by the cholera, May 30, 1821, aged about thirty-five. The same disease in four years had swept over India, Burmah, and the Asiatic islands, and hurried millions to the tomb. At that time, from sixty to one hundred were dying daily in Bombay.

Mr. Newell was very modest and humble, possessed great tenderness of feeling, and was entirely devoted to the arduous and important labors of a missionary. He wrote, with Mr. Hall, The Conversion of the World, or the Claims of Six Hundred Millions, &c., 2d edit. 1818.—Allen; Memoirs of American Missionaries.

NEWELL, (HARRIET,) the wife of the preceding, the daughter of Moses Atwood, of Haverhill, (Mass.) was born October 10, 1793, and received an excellent education. She was naturally cheerful and unreserved; possessed a lively imagination and great sensibility; and, at a very early age, discovered a retentive memory, and a taste for reading. Before the age of thirteen, she received no particular or lasting impressions of religion, but was uniformly obedient, attentive, and affectionate. In the summer of 1806 she was roused to attend to the one thing needful; to turn her eyes from beholding vanity; and to prepare for that important change which, in her, was so soon to take place. At a school, at Bradford, she was the subject of those solid and serious impressions, which laid the foundation of her Christian life. From that time she employed herself assiduously, and with earnestness, in the promotion of her Redeemer's cause; and by her conduct and advice, became an honorable and truly valuable member of society. The uniform piety and seriousness of her mind is forcibly displayed in her letters to her young friends, and in her diary. Her health was delicate, but she bore indistinctly with that calmness and submission to the dictates of Providence which always signalized her character. She complained much of the want of humility, and lamented her deficiency in that Christian grace: she longed for that meek and lowly spirit, which Jesus exhibited in the days of his flesh. At the age of fifteen, she made a profession of religion. She sailed with her husband from Calcutta for the Isle of France, August 4, 1812.

Mrs. Newell died of the consumption, at the Isle of France, November 30, 1812, aged nineteen. She departed in the peace and triumph of an eminent Christian. Her Life, written by Dr. Woods, has passed through many editions. The cause of missions was greatly promoted by the delineation of her character and the description of her sufferings. See her Life.—Allen; Jones' Chris. Biog.

NEWCOME, (Ahp. WILLIAM, D. D.,) a learned prelate, was born, in 1729, at Barton le Clay, in Bedfordshire; was educated at Abingdon school, and at Pembroke college, Oxford; was successively bishop of Dromore, Ossory, and Waterford, in Ireland; was raised to the archbishopric of Armagh; and died in 1800. Of his works the principal are, Observations on the Character of our Lord; A Harmony of the Gospels; An Historical View of the English Biblical Translations; and Attempts towards an improved Version of Ezekiel and the Minor Prophets.—Davenport.

NEW PLATONICS, or AMMONIANS; so called from Ammonius Saccas, who taught with the highest applause in the Alexandrian school, about the conclusion of the second century. This learned man attempted a general reconciliation of all sects, whether philosophical or religious. He maintained that the great principles of all philosophical and religious truth were to be found equally in all sects, and that they differed from each other only in their method of expressing them, in some opinions of little or no importance; and that by a proper interpretation of their respective sentiments they might easily be united in one body.

Ammonius supposed that true philosophy derived its origin and its consistence from the eastern nations, that it was taught to the Egyptians by Hermes, that it was brought from them to the Greeks, and preserved in its original purity by Plato, who was the best interpreter of Hermes and the other Oriental sages. He maintained that all the different religions which prevailed in the world were, in their original integrity, conformable to this ancient philosophy; but it unfortunately happened, that the symbols and fictions under which, according to the ancient manner, the ancients delivered their precepts and doctrines, were in process of time erroneously understood, both by priests and people, in a literal sense; and that in consequence of this, the invisible beings and demous whom the Supreme Deity had placed in the different parts of the universe as the ministers of his providence, were by the suggestions of superstition converted into gods, and worshipped with a multiplicity of vain ceremonies. He therefore insisted that all the religions of all nations should be restored to their primitive standard: viz. the ancient philosophy of the East; and he asserted that his project was agreeable to the intentions of Jesus Christ, whom he acknowledged to be a most excellent man, the friend of God; and affirmed that his sole view in descending on earth, was to set bounds to the reigning superstition, to remove the errors which had crept into the religion of all nations, but not to abolish the ancient theology from which they were derived.

Taking these principles for granted, Ammonius associated the sentiments of the Egyptians with the doctrines of Plato; and to finish this conciliatory scheme, he so interpreted the doctrines of the other philosophical and religious sects, by art, invention, and allegory, that they seemed to bear some semblance to the Egyptian and Platonic systems.

With regard to moral discipline, Ammonius permitted the people to live according to the law of their country, and the dictates of nature; but a more sublime rule was laid down for the wise. They were to raise above all terrestrial things, by the towering efforts of holy contemplation, those souls whose origin was celestial and divine. They were ordered to extenuate by hunger, thirst, and other mortifications, the sluggish body, which restrains the liberty of the immortal spirit, that in this life they might enjoy communion with the Supreme Being, and ascend after death, active and unencumbered, to the universal parent, to live in his presence forever. NEW TESTAMENT. (See BIBLE; GOSPELS; ACTS; EPISTLES; INSPIRATION; and SCRIPTURE.)

NEWTON, (SIR ISAAC,) the greatest of philosophers, was born, December 25, 1642, at Colsterworth, in Lincolnshire, and early displayed a talent for mechanics and drawing. On one occasion, having been sent to market with corn and other products of the farm, young Newton left the sale of his goods to a servant, while he himself retired to a hay-loft at an inn in Grantham, to ruminate over the problems of Euclid, and the laws of Kepler, in which situation the uncle happened to find him, probably meditating discoveries of his own, which should eclipse the glory of his predecessors. He was educated at Grantham school, and at Trinity college, Cambridge, and studied mathematics with the utmost assiduity. In 1667, he obtained a fellowship; in 1669, the mathematical professorship; and in 1671, he became a member of the Royal society. It was during his abode at Cambridge that he made his three great discoveries, of fluxions, the nature of light and colors, and the laws of gravitation. To the latter of these his attention was first turned by his seeing an apple fall from a tree. The Principia, which unfolded to the world the theory of the universe, was not published till 1687. In that year also Newton was chosen one of the delegates, to defend the privileges of the university against James II.; and in 1688 and 1701 he was elected one of the members of the university. He was appointed warden of the mint in 1696; was made master of it in 1699; was chosen president of the Royal society in 1703; and was knighted in 1705. He died March 20, 1727.

His "Observations on the Prophecies of Daniel and the Apocalypse" appeared in 1733, in quarto. "It is astonishing," says Dr. Hutton, "what care and industry Newton employed about the papers relating to chronology, church history, &c.; as, on examining them, it appears that many are copies over and over again, often with little or no variation." All the works of this eminent philosopher were published by Dr. Samuel Horsley, in 1779, in five volumes, quarto; and an English translation of his "Philosophiæ Naturalis Principia Mathematica" is extant.

The character of this great man has been thus drawn by Mr. Hume, at the close of his History of England: "In Newton, this island may boast of having produced the greatest and rarest genius that ever rose for the ornament and instruction of the human species. Cautious in admitting no principles but such as were founded on experiment; but resolute to adopt every such principle, however new or unusual: from modesty, ignorant of his superiority above the rest of mankind; and thence less careful to accommodate his reasonings to common apprehensions: more anxious to merit than acquire fame: he was, from these causes, long unknown to the world; but his reputation at last broke out with a lustre, which scarcely any writer, during his own lifetime, had ever before attained. While Newton seemed to draw off the veil from some of the mysteries of nature, he showed at the same time the imperfections of the mechanical philosophy; and thereby restored her ultimate secrets to that obscurity in which they ever did and ever will remain."

The remains of Sir Isaac Newton were interred in Westminster abbey, where a magnificent monument is erected to his memory, with a Latin inscription, concluding thus:—"Let mortals congratulate themselves, that so great an ornament of human nature has existed." His character is shown by Dr. Brewster to have been that of the orthodox, humble and sincere Christian. Of nature, antiquity, and the Holy Scriptures, he was a diligent, sagacious, and faithful interpreter. He maintained, by his philosophy, the dignity of the SUPREME BEING, and in his manners he exhibited the simplicity of the gospel. "I seem to myself," he said, "to be like a child, picking up a shell here and there, on the shore of the great ocean of truth." Martin's Biog. Philos.; Hutton's Math. Dict.; Brewster's Life of Sir Isaac Newton.—Davenport; Jones' Chris. Biog.; Chalmers' Works.

NEWTON, (Bp. THOMAS,) a learned prelate, was born, in 1701, at Litchfield; was educated there, at Westminster, and at Trinity college, Cambridge; and, after having filled various minor preferments, was made bishop of Bristol, in 1761. He died in 1782. His principal works is, Dissertations on the Prophecies. He also published editions, with notes, of Paradise Lost, and Paradise Regained.—Davenport.

NEWTON, (JOHN,) rector of St. Mary Woolnoth, and St. Mary Woolchurch Haw, was born in London, on the 24th of July, 1722, O. S. His parents, though not wealthy, were respectable. His father was for many years master of a ship in the Mediterranean trade. His mother was a dissenter, a pious woman, and a member of the late Dr. Jennings' church, but, unfortunately, she died before he had attained the age of seven years. When he was four years old, he could read well, repeat the Assembly's Shorter Catechism, with the proofs, all Dr. Watts' smaller catechisms, and his Children's Hymns. He was never at school longer than two years, from his eighth to his tenth year; it was a boarding-school at Stratford, in Essex. When he was eleven years of age, he made five voyages with his father to the Mediterranean; during his last voyage he left him with a friend at Alicante, in Spain. In 1742, his father left the sea, and he afterwards made one voyage to Venice, before the mast, and on his return was impressed on board the Harwich. Becoming, in process of time, master of a vessel employed in the slave trade, he made several voyages to the coast of Africa, for the purpose of carrying on that abominable traffic, during which time he contracted habits of dissipation and vice, which the brutalizing scenes he witnessed tended to originate and confirm.

After spending several years in this disgusting employment, his heart grew sick of it; and the conspicuous visitings of conscience, seconded and enforced by the word of Cod, determined him to abandon it. He grew serious and fond of study, and having relinquished the occupation of a mariner, he, in 1775, obtained the office of tide surveyor of the port of Liverpool. When he had been about three years in that situation he turned his attention towards the profession of a clergyman in the established church, and made an unsuccessful effort to obtain episcopal ordination from the archbishop of York, having been complimented with a title to a curacy by a friend. Disappointed, however, in his hopes, he began to exercise himself in the way of exhorting or expounding the Scriptures at Liverpool, wherever providence opened a door to him, we suppose, among the dissenters. In this way he appears to have passed seven or eight years of his life; until, in 1764, having an offer made him of the curacy of Olney, in Bucks, he renewed his application for ordination, and, on the 29th of April, obtained it from the hands of Dr. Green, bishop of Lincoln, at the palace of Buckden. During a residence of fifteen years at that place, he formed an intimate friendship with the poet Cowper, whence originated a volume of hymns, well known under the title of "Olney Hymns," their joint composition.

In 1779 Mr. Newton removed to London, having been presented, by the late Mr. John Thornton, with the rectory of the united parishes of St. Mary Woolnoth, and St. Mary Woolchurch Haw, in Lombard street. Here a new and wide field of usefulness opened before him, which he continued to fill for about twenty-seven years, until the 21st of December, 1807, when he departed this life, at the advanced age of eighty-five; but, for the last ten or twelve years, his mental powers were greatly impaired.

Mr. Newton was a man of real originality, and his habits of observation were eminently philosophical. His doctrinal sentiments were moderately Calvinistic, and his writings have been collected, and frequently printed, in six volumes octavo, or twelve volumes duodecimo. Few theologians of the last century contributed more to the recommendation and advancement of experimental religion. A handsome stereotype edition of his Works, compressed in two volumes octavo, with his Life by Mr. Cecil prefixed, appeared in Philadelphia in 1831. The price of this edition puts it within the reach of the poor.—Jones' Chris. Biog.; Hand. Buck.

NIBHAZ; a god of the Hivites. (See ANUBIS.)

NICANDER and MARCIAN; two Christian martyrs of the fourth century. Both were Roman military officers of great ability, and great efforts were made to induce them to renounce Christianity, but in vain. Crowds of people attended their execution. The wife of Nicander, being herself a Christian, encouraged her husband to suffer patiently for Christ; but the wife of Marcian, being a pagan, entreated her husband to save his life for the sake of her, and of his child. Marcian embraced her and her babe, gently reproving her idolatry and unbelief; and then, together with Nicander, who also in the most affectionate manner had taken leave of his Christian wife, submitted joyfully to the fatal stroke, which conferred on them the crown of martyrdom. A. D. 306.—Fox, p. 56.

NICENE CREED. (See CREED.)

NICETAS, a Christian martyr of the fourth century, was of Gothic descent, born near the Danube. Though he had long been a Christian, he met with no molestation on that account until the persecution under Athanarick, in A. D. 370. That monarch of the eastern Goths ordered an idol to be drawn about on a chariot, through all the places where Christians lived. The chariot stopped at the door of every professed Christian, and he was ordered to pay it adoration. Upon a refusal the house was immediately set on fire, and all within were burnt. This was the case with Nicetas, who became a martyr to his Christian constancy, being consumed to ashes in his own house, September 15, A. D. 372.—Fox, p. 71.

NICHOLS, (JOHN,) American missionary to Bombay, was born at Antrim, (N. H.) June 20, 1790; graduated at Dartmouth college in 1813. Two years before, during a revival of religion in college, his mind became permanently affected with religious truth. He yielded his heart to Christ, and on being convinced that it was his duty to serve him in the gospel, entered the theological seminary at Andover, in Oct. 1813. He was ordained at Boston, with the missionaries, Swift, Graves, Parsons, and Buttrick, Aug. 2, 1817. He sailed for Bombay with his wife, Sept. 5, 1817, and arrived Feb. 23, 1818. After toiling in his benevolent work nearly seven years, he died of a fever at Bombay, Dec. 10, 1824. Memoirs of Am. Miss.—Allen.

NICODEMUS; a disciple of Jesus Christ, a Jew by nation, and by sect a Pharisee. He was one of the senators of the sanhedrim, (John 3.) and at first concealed his belief in the divine character of our Lord. Afterwards, however, he avowed himself a believer, when he came with Joseph of Arimathea to pay the last duties to the body of Christ, which they took down from the cross, embalmed, and laid in the sepulchre.—Calmet.

NICOLAITANS; heretics who assumed this name from Nicolas of Antioch; who, being a Gentile by birth, first embraced Judaism and then Christianity; when his zeal and devotion recommended him to the church of Jerusalem, by whom he was chosen one of the first deacons. Many of the primitive writers believed that Nicolas was rather the occasion than the author of the infamous practices of those who assumed his name, who were expressly condemned by the Spirit of God himself, Rev. 2: 6. And, indeed, their opinions and actions were highly extravagant and criminal. They allowed a community of wives, and made no distinction between ordinary meats and those offered to idols. According to Eusebius, they subsisted but a short time; but Tertullian says, that they only changed their name, and that their heresies passed into the sect of the Cainites.

We have the testimony of St. John, (Rev. 2: 14, 20.) as well as of the fathers, that the lives of the Nicolaitans were profligate and vicious; to which we may add, that they ate things sacrificed to idols. This is expressly said of Basilides and Valentius, two celebrated leaders of Gnostic sects: and we perhaps are not going too far, if we infer from St. John, that the Nicolaitans were the first who enticed the Christians to this impious practice, and obtained from thence the distinction of their peculiar celebrity. Their motive for such conduct is very evident. They wished to gain proselytes to their doctrines; and they therefore taught that it was lawful to indulge the passions, and that there was no harm in partaking of an idol-sacrifice. This had now become the test to which Christians must submit, if they wished to escape persecution; and the Nicolaitans sought to gain converts by telling them that they might still believe in Jesus, though "they ate of things sacrificed unto idols." The fear of death would shake the faith of some; others would be gained over by sensual arguments: and thus many unhappy Christians of the Asiatic churches were found by St. John in the ranks of the Nicolaitans. We might wish perhaps to know at what time the sect of the Nicolaitans began; but we cannot define it accurately. If Irenæus is correct in saying that it preceded by a considerable time the heresy of Cerinthus, and that the Cerinthian heresy was a principal cause of St. John writing his gospel, it follows, that the Nicolaitans were in existence at least some years before the time of their being mentioned in the Revelation; and the persecution under Domitian, which was the cause of St. John being sent to Patmos, may have been the time which enabled the Nicolaitans to exhibit their principles. Irenæus indeed adds, that St. John directed his gospel against the Nicolaitans as well as against Cerinthus; and the comparison which is made between their doctrine and that of Balaam, may perhaps authorize us to refer to this sect what is said in the second epistle of St. Peter. The whole passage contains marked allusions to Gnostic teachers.—Watson; Calmet.

NICOLAS; a proselyte of Antioch, that is, converted from paganism to the religion of the Jews. He afterwards embraced Christianity, and was among the most zealous and most holy of the first Christians; so that he was chosen for one of the first seven deacons of the church at Jerusalem, Acts 6: 5.

His memory has been tarnished in the church by a blemish, from which it has not been possible hitherto to clear him. Certain heretics were called Nicolaitans from his name; and though perhaps he had no share in their errors, nor their irregularities, yet he is suspected to have given some occasion to them. (See NICOLAITANS.)—Calmet.

NICOMEDES; a Christian of some distinction at Rome, who, during the rage of Domitian's persecution, A. D. 98, did all he could to serve the afflicted followers of Christ; comforting the poor, visiting the confined, exhorting the wavering, and confirming the faithful. For thus acting, he was seized by the ferocious hand of power, sentenced as a Christian, and scourged to death; through which he passed to meet the approving sentence of his Lord, Matt. 25: 40.—Fox, p. 14.

NICOPOLIS; a city of Epirus, on the gulf of Ambracia, whither, as some think, St. Paul wrote to Titus, then in Crete, to come to him; (Titus 3: 12.) but others, with greater probability, are of opinion, that the city of Nicopolis, where St. Paul was, was not that of Epirus, but that of Thrace, on the borders of Macedonia, near the river Nessus. Emmaus in Palestine was also called Nicopolis by the Romans.—Watson.

NIDDUI; the lesser sort of excommunication used among the Hebrews. He who had incurred this, was to withdraw himself from his relations, at least to the distance of four cubits. It commonly continued thirty days. If it was not then taken off, it might be prolonged for sixty, or even ninety days. But if within this term the excommunicated person did not give satisfaction, he fell into the cherem, which was the second sort of excommunication; and thence into the third sort, called shammatha, the most terrible of all. (See ANATHEMA.)—Calmet.

NIEBUHR, (CARSTEN,) a celebrated traveller, was born in 1733, at Ludingsworth, in the duchy of Lauenberg; was sent, in company with four other learned men, by the Danish government, in 1761, to explore Arabia; was employed for six years on that mission, and was the only one who returned; was liberally rewarded by the Danish monarch; and died in 1815. Among his works are, a Description of Arabia; and Travels in Arabia, and the neighboring Countries. Bib. Repos. no. viii.—Davenport.

NIEBUHR, (G. B.,) a son of the foregoing, was, successively, professor at the university of Berlin, counsellor of state, and Prussian ambassador to the pope. While he was at Rome, he discovered some valuable fragments of two of Cicero's orations. He died in 1830. His great work is The History of Rome, which is far superior to most of its rivals.—Davenport.

NIGER; the surname of Simon, (Acts 13: 1.) a prophet and teacher at Antioch, and one who laid his hands on Saul and Barnabas, for the execution of that office to which the Holy Ghost had appointed them. Some believe he is that Simon the Cyrenian, who carried the cross of Christ to mount Calvary; but this opinion is founded only on a similitude of names. Epiphanius speaks of one Niger among the seventy disciples of our Savior.—Calmet.

NIGHT. The ancient Hebrews began their artificial day in the evening, and ended it the next evening; so that the night preceded the day; whence it is said, "evening and morning one day." Gen. 1: 5. They allowed twelve hours to the night, and twelve to the day.

Night is put metaphorically for a time of affliction and adversity: "Thou hast proved mine heart, thou hast visited me in the night, thou hast tried me;" (Psal. 17: 3.) that is, by adversity and tribulation. And "the morning cometh, and also the night;" Isaiah 21: 12. Night is also put for the time of death: "The night cometh, wherein no man can work;" John 9: 4. Children of the day, and children of the night, in a moral and figurative sense, denote good men and wicked men, Christians and Gentiles. The disciples of the Son of God are children of light; they belong to the light, they walk in the light of truth; while the children of the night walk in the darkness of ignorance and infidelity, and perform only works of darkness. "Ye are all the children of the light, and the children of the day; we are not of the night, nor of darkness;" 1 Thess. 5: 5.—Watson.

NIGHT-HAWK; (techemem;) Lev. 11: 16. Deut. 14: 15. That this is a voracious bird seems clear from the import of its name; and interpreters are generally agreed to describe it as flying by night. On the whole, it should seem to be the strix Orientalis, which Hasselquist thus describes: It is of the size of the common owl, and lodges in the large buildings or ruins of Egypt and Syria, and sometimes even in the dwelling-houses. The Arabs settled in Egypt call it "Massasa," and the Syrians "Baou." It is extremely voracious in Syria: to such a degree, that if care is not taken to shut the windows at the coming on of night, he enters the houses and kills the children: the women, therefore, are very much afraid of him.—Watson.

NILE; the river of Egypt, whose fountain is in the Upper Ethiopia. After having watered several kingdoms, the Nile continues its course far into the kingdom of Gouam. Then it winds about again, from the east to the north. Having crossed several kingdoms and provinces, it falls into Egypt at the cataracts, which are waterfalls over steep rocks of the length of two hundred feet. At the bottom of these rocks the Nile returns to its usual pace, and thus flows through the valley of Egypt. Its channel, according to Villamont, is about a league broad. At eight miles below Grand Cairo, it is divided into two arms, which make a triangle, whose base is at the Mediterranean sea, and which the Greeks call the Delta, because of its figure. These two arms are divided into others, which discharge themselves into the Mediterranean, the distance of which from the top of the Delta is about twenty leagues. These branches of the Nile the ancients commonly reckoned to be seven. Ptolemy makes them nine, some only four, some eleven, some fourteen.

Homer, Xenophon, and Diodorus Siculus testify, that the ancient name of this river was Egyptus; and the latter of these writers says, that it took the name Nilus only since the time of a king of Egypt called by that name. The Greeks gave it the name of Melas; and Diodorus Siculus observes, that the most ancient name by which the Grecians have known the Nile was Oceanus. The Egyptians paid divine honors to this river, and called it Jupiter Nilus.

Very little rain ever falls in Egypt, never sufficient to fertilize the land; and but for the provision of this bountiful river, the country would be condemned to perpetual sterility. As it is, from the joint operation of the regularity of the flood, the deposit of mud from the water of the river, and the warmth of the climate, it is the most fertile country in the world; the produce exceeding all calculation. It has in consequence been, in all ages, the granary of the East; and has on more than one occasion, an instance of which is recorded in the history of Joseph, saved the neighboring countries from starvation. It is probable, that, while in these countries, on the occasion referred to, the seven years' famine was the result of the absence of rain, in Egypt it was brought about by the inundation being withheld: and the consternation of the Egyptians, at witnessing this phenomenon for seven successive years, may easily be conceived.

See a most painfully interesting account of a famine occasioned by this cause, in Robinson's Bibl. Repos. for October, 1832.

The origin and course of the Nile being unknown to the ancients, its stream was held, and is still held by the natives, in the greatest veneration; and its periodical overflow was viewed with mysterious wonder. But both of these are now, from the discoveries of the moderns, better understood. It is now known, that the sources, or permanent springs of the Nile, are situated in the mountains of Abyssinia, and the unexplored regions to the west and south-west of that country; and that the occasional supplies, or causes of the inundation, are the periodical rains which fall in those districts. For a correct knowledge of these facts, and of the true position of the source of that branch of the river, which has generally been considered to be the continuation of the true Nile, we are indebted to the intrepid and indefatigable Bruce.

Although the Nile, by way of eminence, has been called "the river of Egypt," it must not be confounded with another stream so denominated in Scripture, an insignificant rivulet in comparison, which falls into the Mediterranean below Gaza.—Watson.

NIMRAH; a city of Gad, or rather of Reuben, east of the Dead sea, Num. 32: 3. Calmet thinks that Nemra, Nimra Nimrim, Nemrim, and Beth-nemra, are the same city. Jeremiah (48: 34.) speaks of Nimrim and its pleasant waters; Isaiah (15: 6.) also mentions the waters of Nimrim. Jerome says, that Nimrim is situated on the Dead sea, and takes name from the bitterness of its waters.—Calmet.

NIMROD. He is generally supposed to have been the immediate son of Cush, and the youngest, or sixth, from the scriptural phrase, "Cush begat Nimrod," after the mention of his five sons, Gen. 10: 8. But the phrase is used with considerable latitude, like "father," and "son," in Scripture, Gen. 10: 8—12. Though the main body of the Cushites was miraculously dispersed, and sent by Providence to their destinations along the sea-coasts of Asia and Africa, yet Nimrod remained behind, and founded an empire in Babylonia, according to Berosus, by usurping the property of the Arphaxadites in the land of Shinar; where "the beginning of his kingdom was Babel," or Babylon, and other towns: and, not satisfied with this, he next invaded Assur, or Assyria, east of the Tigris, where he built Nineveh, and several other towns. The marginal reading of our English Bible, "He went out into Assyria," or to invade Assyria, is here adopted in preference to that in the text, &c.

The meaning of the word Nineveh may lead us to his original name, Nin, signifying "a son," the most celebrated of the sons Cush. That of Nimrod, or "Rebel," was probably a designation given him by the oppressed Shemites, of which we have several instances in Scripture, 2 Kings 18: 4. Nimrod, who first subverted the patriarchal government, introduced also the Zaban idolatry, or worship of the heavenly host; and, after his death, was deified by his subjects, and supposed to be translated into the constellations of Orion, attended by his hounds, Sirius and Canicula, and still pursuing his favorite game, the great bear. And it is highly probable that the Assyrian Nimrod, or Hindoo Bala, was also the prototype of the Grecian Hercules, with his club and lion's skin.

Nimrod is said to have been "a mighty hunter before the Lord;" which the Jerusalem paraphrast interprets of persecution, a sinful hunting after the sons of men, to turn them off from the true religion. But it may be taken in a more literal sense, for hunting of wild beasts; inasmuch as the circumstance of his being a mighty hunter is mentioned with great propriety to introduce the account of his setting up his kingdom; the exercise of hunting being looked upon in ancient times as a means of acquiring the rudiments of war; for which reason, the principal heroes of heathen antiquity, as Theseus, Nestor, &c., were, as Xenophon tells us, bred up to hunting. Besides, it may be supposed, that by this practice Nimrod drew together a great company of robust young men to attend him in his sport, and by that means increased his power. And by destroying the wild beasts, which, in the comparatively defenceless state of society in those early ages, were, no doubt, very dangerous enemies, he might, perhaps, render himself farther popular; thereby engaging numbers to join with him, and to promote his chief design of subduing men, and making himself master of many nations. We incline, however, to the version, "a mighty persecutor in the sight of Jehovah."—Watson.

NINEVEH. This capital of the Assyrian empire could boast of the remotest antiquity. Tacitus styles it, "Vetustissima sedes Assyria;" and Scripture informs us that Nimrod built Nineveh, and several other cities, Gen. 10: 11. Its name denotes "the habitation of Nin," which seems to have been the proper name of "that rebel," as Nimrod signifies; and it is uniformly styled by Herodotus, Xenophon, Diodorus, Lucian &c., "the city of Ninus." And the village of Nunia, opposite Mosul, in its name, and the tradition of the natives, ascertains the site of the ancient city, which was near the castle of Arbela, according to Tacitus, so celebrated for the decisive victory of Alexander the Great over the Persians there; the site of which is ascertained by the village of Arbil, about ten German miles to the east of Nunia, according to Niebuhr's map. Nineveh at first seems only to have been a small city, and less than Resen, in its neighborhood; which is conjectured by Bochart, and not without reason, to have been the same as Larissa, which Xenophon describes as "the ruins of a great city, formerly inhabited by the Medes," and which the natives might have described as belonging la Resen, "to Resen." Nineveh did not rise to greatness for many ages after, until its second founder, Ninus II., about B. C. 1230, enlarged and made it the greatest city in the world.

According to Diodorus, it was of an oblong form, a hundred and fifty stadia long, and ninety broad, and, consequently, four hundred and eighty in circuit or forty eight miles, reckoning ten stadia to an English mile, and major Rennel. And its walls were a hundred feet high, and so broad that three chariots could drive on them abreast; and on the walls were fifteen hundred towers, each two hundred feet high. We are not, however, to imagine that all this vast inclosure was built upon: it contained great parks and extensive fields, and detached houses and buildings, like Babylon, and other great cities of the East even at the present day, as Bassorah, &c. And this entirely corresponds with the representations of Scripture. In the days of the prophet Jonah, about B. C. 800, it seems to have been a "great city, an exceeding great city, of three days' journey" (Jonah 1: 2. 3: 3.) perhaps in circuit. The population of Nineveh, also, at that time was very great. It contained "more than six-score thousand persons that could not discern between their right hand and their left, beside much cattle," Jonah 4: 11. Reckoning the persons to have been infants of two years old and under, and that these were a fifth part of the whole, according to Bochart, the whole population would amount to six hundred thousand souls. The same number Pliny assigns for the population of Seleucia, on the decline of Babylon. This population shows that a great part of the city must have been left open and un-built.

The threatened overthrow of Nineveh within three days, was, by the general repentance and humiliation of the inhabitants, from the highest to the lowest, suspended for near two hundred years, until "their iniquity came to the full;" and then the prophecy was literally accomplished, in the third year of the siege of the city, by the combined Medes and Babylonians; the king, Sardanapalus, being encouraged to hold out in consequence of an ancient prophecy, that Nineveh should never be taken by assault, till the river became its enemy; when a mighty inundation of the river, swollen by continual rains, came up against a part of the city, and threw down twenty stadia of the wall in length; upon which, the king, conceiving that the oracle was accomplished, burnt himself, his concubines, eunuchs, and treasures; and the enemy entering by the breach, sacked and razed the city, about B. C. 606. The complete demolition of such immense piles as the walls and towers of Nineveh, may seem matter of surprise to those who do not consider the nature of the materials of which they were constructed, that is, of bricks, dried or baked in the sun, and cemented with bitumen, which were apt to be "dissolved" by water, or to moulder away by the injuries of the weather. Besides, in the East, the materials of ancient cities have been often employed in the building of new ones in the neighborhood. Thus Mosul was built with the spoils of Nineveh.

The book of Nahum was avowedly prophetic of the destruction of Nineveh; and it is there foretold that "the gates of the river shall be opened, and the palace shall be dissolved. Nineveh of old, like a pool of water, with an overflowing flood he will make an utter end of the place thereof," Nahum 2: 6. 1: 8, 9. The historian describes the facts by which the other predictions of the prophet were as literally fulfilled. He relates that the king of Assyria, elated with his former victories, and ignorant of the revolt of the Bactrians, had abandoned himself to scandalous inaction; had appointed a time of festivity, and supplied his soldiers with abundance of wine; and, that the general of the enemy, apprised, by deserters, of their negligence and drunkenness, attacked the Assyrian army while the whole of them were fearlessly giving way to indulgence, destroyed great part of them, and drove the rest into the city. The words of the prophet were hereby verified: "While they be folded together as thorns, and while they are drunken as drunkards, they shall be devoured as stubble fully dry," Nahum 1: 10. The prophet promised much spoil to the enemy: "Take the spoil of silver, take the spoil of gold; for there is no end of the store and glory out of all the pleasant furniture," Nahum 2: 9. And the historian affirms that many talents of gold and silver, preserved from the fire, were carried to Ecbatana. According to Nahum, (3: 15.) the city was not only to be destroyed by an overflowing flood, but the fire, also, was to devour it; and, as Diodorus relates, partly by water, partly by fire, it was destroyed.

The utter and perpetual destruction and desolation of Nineveh were foretold: "The Lord will make an utter end of the place thereof. Affliction shall not rise up the second time; she is empty, void, and waste," Nahum 1: 8, 9. 2: 10. 3: 17—19. And if now the only spot that bears its name, or that can be said to be the place where it was, be indeed the site of one of the most extensive of cities on which the sun ever shone, and which continued for many centuries to be the capital of Assyria; the principal mounds, few in number, which show neither bricks, stones, nor other materials of building, but are in many places overgrown with grass, and resemble the mounds left by intrenchments and fortifications of ancient Roman camps, and the appearances of other mounds and ruins less marked than even these, extending for ten miles, and widely spread, and seeming to be the wreck of former buildings,—show that Nineveh is left without one monument of royalty; without any token whatever of its splendor or wealth; that their place is not known where they were; and that it is indeed a desolation, "empty, void, and waste," its very ruins perished, and less than the wreck of what it was. Such an utter ruin, in every view, has been made of it; and such is the truth of the divine predictions. See Keith on the Evidence of Prophecy.—Watson.

NINUS; son of Belus the Assyrian, and founder of the Assyrian monarchy, A. M. 2737, about the time of the government of Deborah and Barak in Israel.—Calmat

NISAN; a Hebrew month, partly answering to our March; and which sometimes takes from February or April, according to the course of the moon. It was the seventh month of the civil year; but was made the first month of the sacred year, at the coming out of Egypt, Exod. 12: 2. In Moses it is called Abib. The name Nisan is only since the time of Ezra, and the return from the captivity of Babylon. See the JEWISH CALENDAR.—Calmet.

NISROCH, or NESROCH; a god of the Assyrians, 2 Kings 19: 37. The LXX. call him Nesrach; Josephus, Araxes; and the Hebrew of Tobit, published by Munster, Dagon.—Calmet.

NITRE; (nether.) Prov. 25: 20. Jer. 2: 22. This is not the same that we call nitre, or saltpetre, but a native salt of a different kind, distinguished among naturalists by the name of natrum. The natrum of the ancients was an earthy alkaline salt. It was found in abundance separated from the water of the lake Natron, in Egypt. It rises from the bottom of the lake to the top of the water, and is there condensed by the heat of the sun into the hard and dry form in which it is sold. This salt thus sublimed off is the same in all respects with the Smyrna soap earth. Pliny, Nattholus, and Agricola have described it to us; Hippocrates, Galen, Dioscorides, and others, mention its uses. It is also found in great plenty in Sudy, a province in the inner part of Asia, and in many other parts of the East; and might be had in any quantities.

The learned Michaëlis plainly demonstrates, from the nature of the thing and the context, that this fossil and natural alkali must be that which the Hebrews called nether. Solomon must mean the same when he compares the effect which unseasonable mirth has upon a man in affliction to the action of vinegar upon nitre; (Prov. 25: 20.) for vinegar has no effect upon what we call nitre, but upon the alkali in question has a great effect, making it rise up in bubbles with much effervescence. It is of a soapy nature, and was used to take spots from clothes, and even from the face. Jeremiah alludes to this use of it, 2: 22.—Watson.

NO, or NO-AMMON; a city of Egypt. (See NONH.)—Calmet.

NOACHIDÆ; a name given to the children of Noah, and in general, to all men not of the chosen race of Abraham.—Calmet.

NOAH, (repose or rest.) son of Lamech, was born A. M. 1056. Amidst the general corruption of mankind, he found favor in the eyes of the Lord, and received a divine command, to build an ark for the saving of his house from the general deluge which the Lord was about to bring upon the earth. Influenced by faith and religious fear he obeyed. (See ARK, and DELUGE.) After having left the ark, Noah offered as a burnt-sacrifice to the Lord one of all the pure animals that had been preserved. His sacrifice was accepted, and the Lord promised to bring no more a deluge over the earth; of which promise the sign he gave to Noah was the rainbow.

Noah seems, in the first instance at least, to have taken up his residence in the vicinity of mount Ararat, inasmuch as no notice is taken of his journeying thence prior to his commencement of husbandry. And this idea is strengthened by the fact of the existence of a city or town at the foot of that mountain at this very day, denominated "The Place of Descent;" which city appears, from this circumstance, to have been founded by Noah himself. In the opinion of some, he spent the remainder of his days at the place above mentioned; but others suppose that he emigrated from thence to China. We will briefly consider this subject.

Mankind are represented as journeying from the East, when they found the plain of Shinar. Now mount Ararat, in Armenia, is northerly from Shinar. It follows, therefore, that the mountain now denominated Ararat is not the Ararat near which Noah settled after the deluge; or, that the posterity of Noah must have wandered in their journeyings a great distance from that place, in order to bring them to a position whence, by journeying westward, they would reach Shinar. Waiving, therefore, the consideration of the question where the real Ararat is situated, we are driven to the conclusion that the great body of mankind were, some time previous to their arriving at Shinar, eastward of that country.

Noah lived till after the period of the confusion of tongues. Had he accompanied his posterity to Shinar, it is morally certain that a person of his eminence, and of his relation to them, must have figured conspicuously among them. But as no mention is made of him in connexion with the journeying from the East, and the dispersion at Babel, we conclude that he either continued where he first settled, viz. at the base of mount Ararat, or else that he journeyed in some other direction with a portion of his descendants, while the remainder journeyed west to Shinar. The latter is the more probable supposition.

"Two hundred and fifty years before Nimus," says Portius Cato, "the earth was overflowed with waters, and mankind began again in Saga Scythia." Saga Scythia is in the same latitude with Bactria, between the Caspian sea and Imaus, north of mount Parapanisus. Noah might have continued his journey to Saga Scythia, and formed a settlement there, if the ark did not rest in that quarter at the subsiding of the waters; and hence there is nothing in the foregoing fragment of Portius Cato inconsistent with the idea, that Ararat is in Armenia. That he and some of his posterity did actually separate from the main body, is rendered still further probable by the Chaldean tradition which we have already adduced, viz. that after Xisuthrus, his wife, his daughter, and the pilot had left the ark, and sacrificed to the gods, they disappeared and were seen no more; although the voice of Xisuthrus could be still distinguished in the air, admonishing those who remained to pay due respect to the gods, and directing them to make their way to Babylonia.

From the foregoing consideration it seems clear, that Noah and some of his posterity separated from the rest; the former journeying eastward, the latter westward, before the confusion of tongues at Babel, and the subsequent dispersion of mankind.

But whither went Noah and his party? Most probably to China. The language, the literature, the policy, and the history of the Chinese, combine to sustain this idea. Their language appears not to have changed from its primitive character by the confusion of tongues at Babel. Their literature is as ancient as any whatever. Their government retains the patriarchal character. And their history evidently reaches back to the time of Noah.

The first king of China was Fohi, who was undoubtedly the same person as Noah. The Chinese say Fohi had no father. So Noah, being the great progenitor of the post-diluvians, stands in relation to them as did Adam to the antediluvians—fatherless. Fohi's mother is said to have conceived him, encompassed by a rainbow; an evident allusion to the token of the rainbow in the case of Noah. Fohi is said carefully to have bred seven kinds of creatures, which he used to sacrifice to the Supreme Spirit of heaven and earth. Noah took into the ark clean beasts and fowls by sevens; of which he offered burnt-offerings to the Deity on the subsiding of the deluge. Add to this the circumstance heretofore brought into view, that the Chou'king represents the monarch of China as occupied in drawing off the waters which had deluged the earth; and little doubt indeed can remain, that Noah must have been the founder of the Chinese empire. If, however, any confirmation of this supposition were wanting, it could be found in the history of the world in the early ages, which shows that those eastern regions were as early peopled as the land of Shinar. For in the days of Nimus and Semiramis, several hundred years after the dispersion, the dispersed nations attacked the inhabitants of the East with their combined forces, but found the nations about Bactria, and the parts where we have supposed Noah finally settled, able to repulse them.

Noah lived, after the deluge, three hundred and fifty years; his whole life being nine hundred and fifty years. He died A. M. 2006, leaving three sons, Shem, Ham, and Japheth, (see those articles,) among whom he divided the whole world, giving to Shem Asia, to Ham Africa, and to Japheth Europe. (See DIVISION OF THE EARTH.)

Peter calls Noah a preacher of righteousness, (2 Pet. 2: 5.) because, before the deluge, he was incessantly declaring, not only by his discourses, but by his unblamable life, and by building the ark, in which he was employed one hundred and twenty years, the coming of the wrath of God, Matt. 24: 37. The passage in 1 Pet. 3: 18—20. has been the theme of much controversy. Several of the ancient fathers took the words literally; as if Christ after his death had really preached to those men, who before the deluge were disobedient to the preaching of Noah. But it is certain, that the term "he went and preached," may signify only "he preached;" as in Eph. 2: 15. "he came and preached peace to you who were afar off;" not in person; but by his agents, his apostles. In this sense Noah, in his day, was an agent of Christ, being actuated by his Spirit. It is probable, also, that as fallen angels are described as being held in chains of darkness, unto judgment, so disobedient human spirits may be described as being in prison, that is, reserved to future judgment. Comp. Job 26: 5, as usually understood. (See HELL, CHRIST'S DESCENT INTO.)

Several learned men have observed, that the pagans confounded Saturn, Deucalion, Ogyges, the god Cælus or Uranus, Janus, Prometheus, Vertumnus, Bacchus, Osiris, Vadimon, and Xisuthrus, with Noah.

The fable of Deucalion and his wife Pyrrha is manifestly derived from the history of Noah. Deucalion, by the advice of his father, built an ark, or vessel of wood, in which he stored all sorts of provisions necessary for life, and entered it, with his wife Pyrrha; to secure themselves from a deluge, that drowned nearly all Greece. All the people almost of this country were destroyed; none escaped but those who took refuge on the tops of the highest mountains. When the flood was over, Deucalion came out of his ark, and found himself on mount Parnassus. There he offered sacrifices to Jupiter, who sent Mercury to him, to know what he desired. He requested that he might become the restorer of mankind, which Jupiter granted to him. He and Pyrrha were ordered to cast stones behind them, which immediately became so many men and women. The name Nuraito given to the wife of Noah by the Syro-Chaldee; is derived from the Syriac, nura, which signifies fire; hence Pyrrha (fire) is, by the Greeks, said to have been the name of the wife of Deucalion; and so far the Grecian story rests on authority more Oriental than itself. Epiphanius has a reference to this derivation: he calls her "Noria, said to be the wife of Noah, whose name is, by interpretation, Pyrrha." There is, also, much allegory couched under the names of Deucalion's father, Prometheus, (foresight,) by whom he was advised to build a vessel, and Pyrrha's father, Epimetheus, whose wife was Pandora, accomplished by gifts from all the gods, with her box of evils, in which, when opened, remained only Hope, &c.—Calmet.

NOB; a sacerdotal city of Benjamin or Ephraim, not far from Diospolis. When David was driven away by Saul he came to Nob, the priests of which city were slain by Saul, 1 Sam. 22: 9, &c. 21: 6, &c.—Calmet.

NOBLEMAN, John 4: 46. This was probably an officer of Herod's court, and of considerable distinction; not an hereditary nobleman. The word baskileos signifies a servant of the king; as the Syriac and Arabic versions render it. Many have conjectured that this nobleman, or royal servant, was Chuzai, Herod's steward, whose wife is thought to have been converted on this occasion, and afterwards to have become an attendant on Jesus, Luke 8: 3.—Calmet.

NOD, (LAND OF;) the country to which Cain withdrew after the murder of Abel. As the precise situation of this country cannot possibly be known, so it has given rise to much ingenious speculation. All that we are told of it, is that it was "on the east of Eden," or, as it may be rendered, "before Eden;" which very country of Eden is no sure guide for us, as the situation of that also is disputed. But, be it on the higher or lower Euphrates, (see EOEN;) the land of Nod, which stood before it with respect to the place where Moses wrote, may still preserve the curse of barrenness passed on it for Cain's sake, namely, in the deserts of Syria or Arabia. The Chaldee interpreters render the word Nod, not as the proper name of country, but as an appellative applied to a Cain himself, signifying a vagabond or fugitive, and read, "He dwelt a fugitive in the land." But the Hebrew reads expressly, "He dwelt in the land of Nod."—Watson.

NOETIANS; Christian heretics in the third century, followers of Noetius, a philosopher of Ephesus, who pretended that he was another Moses, sent by God, and that his brother was a new Aaron. His heresy consisted in affirming that there was but one person in the Godhead; and that the Word and the Holy Spirit were but external denominations given to God in consequence of different operations; that, as Creator, he is called Father; as incarnate, Son; and as descending on the apostles, Holy Ghost. (See SABELLIANS.)—Hend. Buck.

NOGAROLE, (ISOTTA,) a lady of Verona, of a family celebrated for the wisdom, piety, and beauty of its women, was born in 1128. She was a great philosopher and divine, mistress of several languages, and of an eloquence surpassing all the orators of Italy. She made a most elaborate speech at the council of Mantua, convened by pope Pius II., that all Christian princes might enter into a league against the Turks. She wrote eloquent epistles not only to him, but to his predecessor, Nicholas V., and a Dialogue, in which she disputed, which was most guilty, Adam or Eve. Some of her works coming to the sight of cardinal Bessarion, that illustrious patron of literature was so taken with her genius, that he made a journey from Rome to Verona, purely to pay her a visit. She died in 1446, aged thirty-eight.—Betham.

NON-CONFORMISTS; dissenters from the church of England; but the term applies more particularly to those ministers who were ejected from their livings by the act of uniformity in 1662; the number of whom, according to Dr. Calamy, was nearly two thousand; and to the laity who adhered to them. The celebrated Mr. Locke says, "Bartholomew-day (the day fixed by the act of uniformity) was fatal to our church and religion, by throwing out a very great number of worthy, learned, pious, and orthodox divines, who could not come up to this and other things in that act. And it is worth your knowledge, that so great was the zeal in carrying on this church affair, and so blind was the obedience required, that if you compare the time of passing the act with the time allowed for the clergy to subscribe the Book of Common Prayer thereby established, you shall plainly find, it could not be printed and distributed, so as one man in forty could have seen and read the book before they did so perfectly assent and consent thereto."

By this act, the clergy were required to subscribe, ex animo, their "assent and consent to all and every thing contained in the Book of Common Prayer," which had never before been insisted on, so rigidly as to deprive them of their livings and livelihood. Several other acts were passed about this time, very oppressive both to the clergy and laity. In the preceding year, 1661, the Corporation act incapacitated all persons from offices of trust and honor in a corporation, who did not receive the sacrament in the established church. The Conventicle act, in 1663 and 1670, forbade the attendance at conventicles; that is, at places of worship other than the establishment, where more than five adults were present beside the resident family; and that under penalties of fine and imprisonment by the sentence of magistrates, without a jury. The Oxford act of 1663 banished non-conforming ministers five miles from any corporate town sending members to parliament, and prohibited them from keeping or teaching schools. The Test act of the same year required all persons, accepting any office under government, to receive the sacrament in the established church.

Such were the dreadful consequences of this intolerant spirit, that it is supposed that near eight thousand died in prison in the reign of Charles II. It is said that Mr. Jeremiah White had carefully collected a list of those who had suffered between Charles II. and the revolution, which amounted to sixty thousand. The same persecutions were carried on in Scotland; and there, as well as in England, numbers, to avoid the persecution, left their country. But, notwithstanding all these dreadful and furious attacks upon the dissenters, they were not extirpated. Their very persecution was in their favor. The infamous character of their informers and persecutors; their piety, zeal, and fortitude, no doubt, had influence on considerate minds; and, indeed, they had additions from the established church, which several clergymen in this reign deserted as a persecuting church, and took their lot among them. King William coming to the throne, the famous Toleration act passed, by which they were exempted from suffering the penalties above mentioned, and permission was given them to worship God according to the dictates of their own consciences. In the reign of George III., the act for the protection of religious worship superseded the act of toleration, by still more liberal provisions in favor of religious liberty; and in the reign of George IV., the Test and Corporation acts were repealed.

Fletcher, and Dobson on Non-conformity.*—Watson; Hend. Buck.

NON-CONFORMITY; a relative term, which supposes some previously existing system of observances, established either by political authority or general consent, and denotes a practical secession or non-communication, on grounds conceived by the parties to require and justify it. Like the term Protestantism, it is general and comprehensive. It applies to the various grounds of secession from a national establishment of religion, and includes different systems of ecclesiastical polity. No wise man would choose to differ from those around him, in reference to matters either civil or religious, unless, in his own estimation, he had good reasons for that difference; and in such cases it is the obvious dictate of duty to investigate the questions at issue, with calmness and deliberation; that conviction and not enmity, principle and not passion, may regulate the inquiry and form the decision.

Many regard the non-conformist controversy as a very unattractive subject, a mere debate about words and names and questions, which gender strife rather than godly edifying. Assuming either that there is no authority or standard in such matters, or that the authority of certain ecclesiastical superiors ought to be submitted to without murmuring or disputing, they pronounce their disapprobation on all discussions of such subjects, and on the parties who engage in them. High-churchmen are offended that the doctrine of conformity should be called in question at all. Those who profess high spirituality, look on the subject as unworthy of their regard, and as fit for such as mind the carnal things of the kingdom of God. Dissenters, as well as others, frequently speak of it as being among non-essential matters, and scarcely deserving of profound consideration; and while they luxuriate in the privileges which their forefathers purchased for them at so dear a rate, almost pity and condemn the measures which procured them.

It is impossible for any one to form a correct view of English history for nearly three hundred years, without an acquaintance with this controversy, and with the characters and principles of the men who engaged in it. It is almost coeval with the English Reformation; and the great questions then started cannot be considered as yet finally settled. The Puritans, under the Tudors, became non-conformists under the Stuarts, and dissenters under the family of Hanover. They have been men of the same principles substantially throughout. In maintaining the rights of conscience they have contributed more than any other class of persons to set limits to the power of the crown, to define the rights of the subjects, and to secure the liberties of Britain. They have wrested a rod of iron from the hand of despotism, and substituted in its place a sceptre of righteousness and mercy. They have converted the divine right of kings into the principles of a constitutional government, in which the privileges of the subject are secured by the same charter which guards the throne. The history of the principles of such a body ought not, therefore, to be regarded as unimportant by any friends of British freedom.

The non-conformist controversy contributed greatly to ascertain the distinct provinces of divine and human legislation; to establish the paramount and exclusive authority of God, and of the revelation of his will, over the conscience of man; and to define the undoubted claims of civil government to the obedience of its subjects in all matters purely civil. To the same controversy we are indebted for the correct and scriptural sentiments which are now extensively entertained respecting the unsecular nature of the kingdom of Christ. The intermixture of heavenly and earthly things does indeed still prevail, and its pernicious tendency is yet imperfectly estimated by many; but considerable progress has been made towards the full discovery of the entire spirituality of Messiah's kingdom. Its independence of secular support and defence; its resources both of propagation and maintenance; its uncongeniality with the principles, spirit, and practice of earth-born men, are now much more generally admitted than they once were. In fact the ablest defenders of ecclesiastico-civil establishments have now entirely abandoned the doctrine of divine right, and boldly avow that they are no part of Christianity, but only a human expedient for its propagation. Orme's Life of Baxter, vol. ii. p. 254; Memoir of Roger Williams.—Hend. Buck.

NON-JURORS; those who refused to take the oaths to the English government, and who were in consequence under certain incapacities, and liable to certain severe penalties. It can scarcely be said that there are any non-jurors now in that kingdom; and it is well known that as well in Scotland as in England, all penalties have been removed both from papists and Protestants, formerly of that denomination. The members of the Episcopal church of Scotland have long been denominated non-jurors; but perhaps they are now called so improperly, as the ground of their difference from the establishment is more on account of ecclesiastical than political principles.—Hend. Buck.

NON-RESIDENCE; the act of not residing on an ecclesiastical benefice. Nothing can reflect greater disgrace on a clergyman of a parish, than to receive the emoluments without ever visiting his parishioners, and being unconcerned for the welfare of their souls; yet this, in England, has been a reigning evil, and proves that there are too many who care little about the flock, so that they may but live at ease. Let such remember what an awful account they will have to give of talents misapplied, time wasted, souls neglected, and a sacred office abused.—Hend. Buck; Am. Bap. Mag. for 1832.

NOON; the middle time of the day, when the sun is highest in his daily course; in modern language, when he is direct south, on the meridian of any place, 1 Kings 18: 27. Psal. 55: 17. This time of the day being the brightest, is made a subject of comparison in several places of Scripture, Job 5: 14. Psal. 37: 6. The apostle Paul says the brightness in which he beheld the Lord Jesus, was superior to that of the sun at noon, Acts 26: 13.—Calmet.

NOPIH; a city of Egypt, (Isa. 19: 13. Jer. 2: 16. 41: 1. 46: 14. Ezek. 30: 13, 16.) generally believed to have been the same with Moph, the Menouf of the Copts and Arabs; that is, Memphis. Memphis is the Greek form of the Egyptian name, which, according to Plutarch, signifies the port of the good.

The situation of Memphis, formerly the capital of Egypt, has been a subject of considerable dispute, and has afforded materials for long and laborious investigation by the learned. Bruce's Travels; the Fragments to Calmet, no. 546; and the Modern Traveller, (Egypt, vol. i. p. 339—352,) will supply the necessary information.

Memphis was the residence of the ancient kings of Egypt, till the times of the Ptolemies, who commonly resided at Alexandria. The prophets, in the places above referred to, foretell the miseries Memphis was to suffer from the kings of Chaldea and Persia, and they threaten the Israelites who should retire into Egypt, or should have recourse to the Egyptians, that they should perish in that country. In this city they fed the ox Apis; and Ezekiel says, that the Lord will destroy the idols of Memphis, chap. 30: 13, 16. Memphis retained its splendor till it was conquered by the Arabians, in the eighteenth or nineteenth year of the Hegira, A. D. 641. Amrou-Ben-As, who took it, built another near it, which was called Eus-thath, from the general's tent, which had long occupied that place. The Fatimite caliphs, becoming masters of Egypt, added another city, which they named Caherah, "the victorious," the present Grand Cairo, which is built on the eastern shore of the Nile.—Calmet.

NOPHET, in Josh. 17: 11, and elsewhere, is taken for a district, or province. It is often joined to Dor, as Nophet-dor, (Josh. 11: 2. 12: 23.) the district round the city Dor, on the Mediterranean, south of mount Carmel, and north of Cæsarea of Palestine. Two-thirds of it was possessed by Zebulun, and one-third by Manasseh.—Calmet.

NORRIS, (JOHN,) one of the founders of the theological seminary in Andover, was for many years a respectable merchant in Salem, Massachusetts. March 21, 1808, he gave ten thousand dollars towards establishing the institution at Andover. This was a day of unequalled inutility, for on the same day Messrs. Brown and Bartlet, merchants of Newburyport, gave towards the same object, the former ten thousand, and the latter twenty thousand dollars. Mr. Norris lived to see the seminary opened, on September 28th. He died December 22, 1808, aged fifty seven.

His widow, Mary Norris, died at Salem, in 1811, bequeathing thirty thousand dollars to the theological seminary at Andover, and the same sum to trustees, for the benefit of foreign missions to the heathen.

In such esteem was Mr. Norris held by his fellow-citizens, that he was for several years elected a member of the senate of Massachusetts. Obtaining, through the divine blessing upon his industry, an ample fortune, he considered himself as the steward of God, and his abundant liberality flowed in various channels. Extreme self-diffidence prevented him from making a public profession of religion; yet his house was a house of prayer, in which the morning and evening sacrifice ascended to the mercy-seat; and he once said in a solemn manner, "I would not relinquish my hope that I am a child of God for a thousand worlds."—Allen.

NORTH. As it was customary for the Hebrews to consider the cardinal points of the heavens in reference to a man whose face was turned toward the East, the north was consequently to his left hand. The north wind dissipates rain, (Prov. 25: 23.) but this must depend on the situation of a place; as, in different places the same wind has different effects.—Calmet.

NORTON, (JOHN,) an eminent minister of Boston, was born in Hertfordshire, England, in 1606, and educated at the university of Cambridge. A lecture was at this time supported at Starford by a number of pious ministers, and through their labors Mr. Norton, who was himself a preacher, though like many others ignorant of his own character, and unacquainted with the truth as it is in Jesus, was impressed with a sense of his sin, and by the agency of the Holy Spirit was brought to repentance. The view of his own heart and life, compared with the holy law of God, almost overwhelmed him with despair; but a length the promises of the gospel administered to him inexpressible joy. His attention had been hitherto occupied in literary and scientific pursuits, but he now devoted himself exclusively to the study of theology; and being by his own experience acquainted with repentance, and faith, and holiness, he preached upon these subjects with zeal and effect. He soon became eminent. He adopted the creed and practice of the Puritans, and in 1635 emigrated to New England. He was first settled in the ministry at Ipswich, but was afterwards prevailed on to remove to Boston. In 1662, he was appointed one of the two agents of the colony to address king Charles on his restoration, but they did not fully succeed in the objects of their mission. He died in 1663, aged fifty-six. In his natural temper Mr. Norton was somewhat irascible, but, being taught by the grace of God to govern his passions, his renewed heart rendered him meek, courteous, and amiable. Still a mistaken zeal for the truth made him, as it made his contemporaries, friendly to persecution. His theological works were numerous, and he published several political tracts.—Davenport; Elliot; Allen.

NOSE. The Hebrews commonly place the strongest manifestation of anger in the nose: "There went up a smoke out of his nostrils," 2 Sam. 22: 9. Psal. 18: 8.

Deut. 29: 20. Job 41: 21. The ancient Greek and Latin authors speak much after the same manner.

Solomon alludes to the custom of women wearing golden rings in their nostrils, when he says, (Prov. 11: 22.) "As a jewel of gold is a swine's snout, so is a fair woman without discretion." And Ezekiel, (16: 12.) "I will put a jewel on thy forehead, [Heb. nose,] and ear-rings in thine ears, and a beautiful crown upon thine head." They also put rings in the nostrils of oxen and camels, to guide them by: "I will put my hook in thy nose, and my bridle in thy lips," 2 Kings 19: 28. See also Job 41: 2.—Calmet.

NOTES OF THE CHURCH; certain marks or characteristics to which the Roman Catholics appeal in support of their pretensions, that the church of Rome is the only true church. Their writers generally mention four: viz. unity, holiness, catholicity, and apostolicity; but Bellarmine lays down the following as more fully determining the point: catholicity, antiquity, duration, amplitude, episcopal succession, apostolical agreement, unity, sanctity of doctrine, efficacy of doctrine, holiness of life, miracles, prophecy, admissions of adversaries, unhappy end of enemies, temporal felicity. It may be fairly left with the reader to compare the history of the church of Rome in reference to these points, with the primitive apostolic church, as depicted in the New Testament, in order to his satisfactorily deciding on the validity of the claims in question. (See NOVATIANS.)—Hend. Buck.

NOTHING. Idols are often called nothings, non-entities. "Ye which rejoice in a thing of nought," Amos 6: 13. And Esther, (Apoc. 14: 11.) "O Lord, give not thy sceptre unto them that be nothing;" deliver not over thy people to those gods that are nothing. Paul says, "We know that an idol is nothing in the world," 1 Cor. 8: 4.—Calmet.

NOURISH. (1.) To furnish with food, Gen. 47: 12. Acts 12: 20. (2.) Kindly to bring up, Acts 7: 21. (3.) To care, or use all proper means to make to grow, Isa. 44: 14. And to be nourished in the word of faith and good doctrine, is to be affectionately and carefully instructed in the true principles of the gospel, and well experienced in its power, for the edification, progress in holiness, and spiritual comfort of the soul, 1 Tim. 4: 6. Jesus Christ, and his fulness, as exhibited in the doctrines and promises of the gospel, and applied by the Holy Ghost, are the nourishment by which the saints are delightfully instructed, comforted, and strengthened to every good word and work, Col. 2: 19.—Brown.

NOVATIANS; a numerous body of Protestant Dissenters from the church of Rome, in the third century, who, notwithstanding the representations of their adversaries, have some just claims to be regarded as the pure, uncorrupted, and apostolic church of Christ. They called themselves Cathari, that is, the pure; but they received their name of Novatians from their adversaries, after their distinguished leader, Novatian, who, in the year 251, was ordained the pastor of a church in the city of Rome, which maintained no fellowship with the (so called) Catholic party.

Those who are in any tolerable degree conversant with theological controversy, will scarcely need be apprised how much caution is necessary to guard against being misled by the false representations which different parties give of each other's principles and conduct. Novatian's said to have refused to receive into the communion of the church any of those persons, who, in the time of persecution, had been induced through fear of sufferings or death to apostatize from their profession, and offer sacrifices to the heathen deities; a principle which he founded upon a mistaken view of Heb. 6: 4—6. We may readily conceive how interesting and difficult a subject this must have been to all the churches of Christ in those distressing times, and the danger that must have arisen from laying down any fixed rule of conduct that should apply to all cases that would come before them; or even verging towards an extreme on either side of this question.

This is certain, as Dr. Muenscher observes, that "the Novatians declared their community to be the only true church," and required such as came over to them from the Catholics and other sects to be baptized anew; because all others had become corrupt, by receiving formal and lapsed professors to fellowship. Yet, the Novatians did not deny but a person falling into any sin, how grievous soever, might obtain pardon by repentance; for they themselves recommended repentance in the strongest terms.

The following is the account of Novatian, given by the late Mr. Robinson, in his Ecclesiastical Researches, p. 126. No one who knows the lax principles of Mr. Robinson on Christian doctrine and communion, can, for a moment, suspect him of an undue predilection for the principles of Novatian. "He was," says he, "an elder in the church of Rome, a man of extensive learning, holding the same doctrine as the church did, and published several treatises in defence of what he believed. His address was eloquent and insinuating, and his morals irreproachable. He saw with extreme pain the intolerable depravity of the church. Christians within the space of a very few years were caressed by one emperor and persecuted by another. In seasons of prosperity, many persons rushed into the church for base purposes. In times of adversity, they denied the faith, and reverted again to idolatry. When the squall was over, away they came again to the church, with all their vices, to deprave others by their examples. The bishops, fond of proselytes, encouraged all this; and transferred the attention of Christians from the old confederacy for virtue to vain shows at Easter, and other Jewish ceremonies, adulterated too with paganism. On the death of bishop Fabian, Cornelius, a brother elder, and a violent partizan for taking in the multitude, was just in nomination. Novatian opposed him; but, as Cornelius carried his election, and he saw no prospect of reformation, but, on the contrary, a tide of immorality pouring into the church, he withdrew, and a great many with him. Cornelius, irritated by Cyprian, who was just in the same condition, through the remonstrance of virtuous men at Carthage, and who was exasperated beyond measure with one of his own elders, named Novatus, who had quitted Carthage, and gone to Rome to espouse the cause of Novatian, called a council and got a sentence of excommunication passed against Novatian. In the end, Novatian formed a church, and was elected bishop. Great numbers followed his example, and all over the empire Puritan churches were constituted and flourished through the succeeding two hundred years. Afterwards, when penal laws obliged them to lurk in corners, and worship God in private, they were distinguished by a variety of names, and a succession of them continued till the Reformation." (See WALDENSES, and MENNONITES.)

The same author, afterwards adverting to the vile calumnies with which the Catholic writers have in all ages delighted to asperse the character of Novatian, thus proceeds to vindicate him: "They say Novatian was the first anti-pope; and yet there was at that time no pope in the modern sense of the word. They tax Novatian with being the parent of an innumerable multitude of congregations of Puritans all over the empire; and yet he had no other influence over any than what his good example gave him. People everywhere saw the same cause of complaint, and groaned for relief; and when one man made a stand for virtue, the crisis had arrived; people saw the propriety of the cure, and applied the same means to their own relief. They blame this man and all the churches for the severity of their discipline; yet this severe discipline was the only coercion of the primitive churches, and it was the exercise of this that rendered civil coercion unnecessary."

Novatian appears to have been possessed of superior talents;—Mosheim terms him "a man of uncommon learning and eloquence;"—and he wrote several works, of which only two are now extant. One of them is upon the subject of the Trinity. It is divided into thirty-one sections; the first eight relate to the FATHER, and treat of his nature, power, goodness, justice, &c., with the worship due to him. The following twenty sections relate to CHRIST; the Old Testament prophecies concerning him; their actual accomplishment; his nature; how the Scriptures prove his divinity; confutes the Sabellians; shows that it was Christ who appeared to the patriarchs, Abraham, Jacob, Moses, &c. The twenty-ninth section treats of the HOLY SPIRIT; how promised; given by Christ; his offices and operations on the souls of men and in the church. The last two sections recapitulate the arguments before adduced. The work appears to have been written in the year 257, six years after his separation from the Catholic church. The other tract is upon the subject of "Jewish Meats," addressed in the form of a letter to his church, and written either during his banishment or retreat in the time of persecution. It opens up the typical law of Moses, and while he proves its abolition, is careful to guard his Christian brethren against supposing that they were therefore at liberty to eat of things sacrificed to idols.

The doctrinal sentiments of the Novatians appear to have been very scriptural, and the discipline of their churches strict, perhaps, to an extreme.

Dr. Lardner, in his Credibility of the Gospel History, (ch 47.) has been at considerable pains in comparing the various and contradictory representations that have been given of Novatian and his followers, and has exonerated them from a mass of obloquy, cast upon them by the Catholic party. Though Novatian and his principles were condemned by that party, he still continued to be supported by a numerous body in various places, separated from the Catholic church. They had among them persons of considerable note, and of eminent talents. Among these were Agelius, Acesius, Sisinnius, and Marcian, all of Constantinople. Socrates mentions one Mark, bishop of the Novatians in Scythia, who died in the year 439. In fact, the pieces written against them by a great variety of authors of the Catholic church, such as Ambrose, Pacian, and others, the notice taken of them by Dionysius, Basil, and Gregory Nazianzen, and the accounts given of them by Socrates and Sozomen, in their ecclesiastical histories, are proofs of their being numerous, and that churches of this denomination were to be found in most parts of the world in the fourth and fifth centuries. "The vast extent of this sect," says Dr. Lardner, "is manifest from the names of the authors who have mentioned them, or written against them, and from the several parts of the Roman empire in which they were found."

The Novatians suffered severely by persecution, both from the Catholics on the one hand, and by the Arians on the other, as each of the rival parties rose to power. Socrates, the historian, who seems to have been intimately acquainted with the affairs of the Novatians, says that the toleration which this class of Christians at length obtained of Valens, the Arian emperor, in 370, they owed under providence to one Marcian, a presbyter of their church in Constantinople, a man of learning and piety, who tutored two daughters of the emperor. This historian particularly mentions the liberality and kindness which the Novatians exercised towards such of the orthodox party as were the subjects of persecution, while they themselves were tolerated; a trait in their history which even Milner is obliged to admit "reflects an amiable lustre on the character of these Dissenters;" and for showing which benevolence, they actually incurred the displeasure of the reigning party. (See WALDENSES.)—Jones' History of the Christian Church; Mosheim; Milner; Muencher's Dogmatic History.

NOVICE. (See NEOPHYTE.)

NOVIATIE; a year of probation appointed by the monastic orders for the trial of religious, whether or no they have a vocation, and the necessary qualities for living up to the rule, the observation whereof they are to bind themselves to by vow. The novitiate lasts a year at least; in some houses more. It is esteemed the bed of the civil death of a novice, who expires to the world by profession.—Hend. Buck.

NOWELL, (ALEXANDER, D. D.,) a learned divine of the sixteenth century, was born at Read, Lancashire, (Eng.) in 1511, and educated at Cambridge. He early distinguished himself for learning, piety, and zeal for reformation. At Westminster school he trained up youth in Protestant principles. In 1550 he was made prebendary of Westminster, by Edward VI.; but on the accession of queen Mary, he was marked as a victim, and with difficulty escaped to Frankfort, Germany, in 1577. On the accession of Elizabeth he was the first of the English exiles who returned home, and subsequently enjoyed many preferments. He was a zealous writer, and frequent preacher; for thirty years together he preached in Lent the first and last sermons, before the queen, with whom he is said to have dealt faithfully. In the disputes with the Puritans he took moderate ground. He was chosen principal of Brazen-Nose college, Oxford, in 1595, but resigned his office in a few months. He died February 13, 1601-2, at the age of ninety, retaining the perfect use of his senses and faculties to the last.

Besides several pieces of controversy with the Romanists; dean Nowell published, at the request of the secretary Cecil, a much esteemed catechism of the doctrine of the church of England, which received the sanction of the convocation; and in which, says bishop Cooper, "you may see all the parts of true religion received, the difficulties expounded, the truth declared, and the corruptions of the church of Rome rejected."—Middleton, ii. p. 304.

NUMBER; (1.) A reckoning of persons or things, whether they be few or many, Gen. 34: 30. (2.) A society or company, Luke 22: 3. Acts 1: 17. So Matthias was numbered, that is, by suffrages he was added to the society of the apostles, Acts 4: 26. The number of the Antichristian beast is six hundred and sixty-six. The numeral letters contained in his Greek name, Lateinos, Latin, or in his Hebrew one, Romith, or Romish, or in Sethua, which signifies mystery, when added together amount to just six hundred and sixty-six. God numbered Belshazzar's kingdom, and finished it; allowed it to continue for the years he had determined, and not one day more, Dan. 5: 26. He numbers men to the slaughter when he sets them apart by his providence to destruction and death, as a shepherd does his sheep to be slain, Isa. 65: 12. We number our days when we seriously consider how frail, and short and uncertain our life is; how great the necessity and business of our souls; and what hinderances of it are in our way, Ps. 90: 12.—Brown.

NUMBERS; a canonical book of the Old Testament, being the fourth of the Pentateuch, or five books of Moses; and receives its denomination from the numbering of the families of Israel by Moses and Aaron, who mustered the tribes, and marshalled the army, of the Hebrews in their passage through the wilderness.

A great part of this book is historical, relating several remarkable events which happened in that journey, and also mentioning various of their journeyings in the wilderness. This book comprehends the history of about thirty-eight years, though the greater part of the things recorded fell out in the first and last of those years; it does not appear when those things were done which are recorded in the middle of the book. (See PENTATEUCH.)—Watson.

NUN; in Roman Catholic countries, a woman, who devotes herself, in a cloister or nunnery, to a religious life. (See the article MONK.)

There were women, in the ancient Christian church, who made public profession of virginity, before the monastic life was known in the world, as appears from the writings of Cyprian and Tertullian. These, for distinction's sake, are sometimes called ecclesiastical virgins, and were commonly enrolled in the canon, or matricula of the church. They differed from the monastic virgins chiefly in this, that they lived privately in their fathers' houses, whereas the others lived in communities; but their profession of virginity was not so strict as to make it criminal for them to marry afterwards, if they thought fit.

As to the consecration of virgins, it had some things peculiar in it: it was usually performed publicly in the church by the bishop. The virgin made a public profession of her resolution, and then the bishop put upon her the accustomed habit of sacred virgins. One part of this habit was a veil, called the sacrum velamen; another was a kind of mitre or coronet worn upon the head. At present, when a woman is to be made a nun, the habit, veil, and ring of the candidate are carried to the altar; and she herself, accompanied by her nearest relations, is conducted to the bishop, who, after mass and an anthem, (the subject of which is, "that she ought to have her lamp lighted, because the bridegroom is coming to meet her,") pronounces the benediction; then she rises up, and the bishop consecrates the new habit, sprinkling it with holy water. When the candidate has put on her religious habit, she presents herself before the bishop, and sings on her knees Ancilla Christi sum, &c., "The bride of Christ I am," &c.; then she receives the veil, and afterwards the ring, by which she is married to Christ; and, lastly, the crown of virginity. When she is crowned, an anathema is denounced against all who shall attempt to make her break her vows.

In some few instances, perhaps, it may have happened that nunneries, monasteries, &c., may have been useful as well to morality and religion as to literature; in the gross, however, they have been highly prejudicial; and however well they might be supposed to do when viewed in theory, in fact they are unnatural and impious. It was surely far from the intention of providence to seclude youth and beauty in a cloister, or to deny them the innocent enjoyment of their years and sex. (See MONASTERY.)—Hend. Buck.

NUNCIOS; persons sent by the pope on foreign missions relative to ecclesiastical affairs. They were dispatched to provincial synods and foreign courts when subjects of great importance were to be agitated; they presided at the synods; they convoked, and gave decisions in the most important ecclesiastical affairs. England freed herself from this intrusion in the twelfth century, by having the archbishop of Canterbury declared perpetual legate. At the time of the Reformation, four permanent nunciatures were forced upon the Germans; and, in spite of the struggles and opposition of the clergy, pope Pius VI. established one at Munich as late as 1785.—Hend. Buck.

NURSE. The nurse in an eastern family is always an important personage. Modern travellers inform us, that in Syria she is considered as a sort of second parent, whether she has been foster-mother or otherwise. She always accompanies the bride to her husband's house, and ever remains there an honored character. Thus it was in ancient Greece. This will serve to explain Gen. 24: 59: "And they sent away Rebekah their sister, and her nurse." In Hindostan the nurse is not looked upon as a stranger, but becomes one of the family, and passes the remainder of her life in the midst of the children he has suckled, by whom she is honored and cherished as a second mother. In many parts of Hindostan are mosques and mausoleums, built by the Mohammedan princes, near the sepulchres of their nurses. They are excited by a grateful affection to erect these structures in memory of those who with maternal anxiety watched over their helpless infancy; thus it has been from time immemorial. ## O.

OAK. The religious veneration paid to this tree, by the original natives of Britain in the time of the druids, is well known to every reader of British history. We have reason to think that this veneration was brought from the East; and that the druids did no more than transfer the sentiments their progenitors had received in oriental countries. It should appear that the patriarch Abraham resided under an oak, or a grove of oaks, which our translators render the plain of Mamre; and that he planted a grove of this tree, Gen. 13: 18. In fact, since in hot countries nothing is more desirable than shade, nothing more refreshing than the shade of a tree, we may easily suppose the inhabitants would resort for such enjoyment to

Where'er the oak's thick branches spread
A deeper, darker shade.

Oaks, and groves of oaks, were esteemed proper places for religious services; altars were set up under them; (Josh. 24: 26.) and, probably, in the East as well as in the West, appointments to meet at conspicuous oaks were made, and many affairs were transacted or treated of under their shade, as we read in Homer, Theocritus, and other poets. It was common among the Hebrews to sit under oaks, Judg. 6: 11. 1 Kings 13: 14. Jacob buried idolatrous images under an oak; (Gen. 35: 4.) and Deborah, Rebe-kah's nurse, was buried under one of these trees, Gen. 35: 8. See 1 Chron. 10: 12. Abimelech was made king under an oak, Judg. 9: 6. Idolatry was practised under oaks, Isa. 1: 29. 57: 5. Hos. 4: 13. Idols were made of oaks, Isa. 44: 14. (See BAAL, DRUIDS, and GROVES.)—Watson.—OAKES, (URIAN,) president of Harvard college, was born in England, in 1631, and brought to America in his childhood. A sweetness of disposition exhibited itself early and remained with him through life. He was graduated at Harvard college, in 1649. He soon went to England, and was settled in the ministry at Titchfield, in Hampshire.

Such was his celebrity for learning and piety, that the church and society of Cambridge, on the decease of Mr. Mitchell, in 1668, sent a messenger to England to invite him to become their minister. He was also placed at the head of Harvard college, April 7, 1675, still however retaining the pastoral care of his flock. But February 2, 1680, the corporation appointed him president, and persuaded him to be inaugurated, and to devote himself exclusively to this object. He died July 25, 1681, aged forty-nine.

Mr. Oakes was a man of extensive erudition and distinguished usefulness. He excelled equally as a scholar, as a divine, and as a Christian. By his contemporaries he was considered as one of the most resplendent lights that ever shone in this part of the world. With all his greatness, he was very humble, like the full ear of corn, which hangs near the ground. In the opinion of Dr. Mather, America never had a greater master of the true, pure, Ciceronian Latin, of his skill in which language a specimen, from one of his commencement orations, is preserved in the Magnalia. He published an artillery election sermon, entitled, The Unconquerable, All-conquering, and more than Conquering Christian Soldier, 1672; election sermon, 1673; a sermon at Cambridge on the choice of their military officers; a fast sermon; and an Elegy on the Death of Rev. Mr. Shepard, of Charlestown, 1677, pathetic and replete with imagery. Holmes' History of Cambridge; Belknap; Elliot.—Allen.

OATH; a solemn invocation of a superior power, admitted to be acquainted with all the secrets of our hearts, with our inward thoughts as well as our outward actions, to witness the truth of what we assert, and to inflict his vengeance upon us if we assert what is not true, or promise what we do not mean to perform. Almost all nations, whether savage or civilized, whether enjoying the light of revelation or led only by the light of reason, knowing the importance of truth, and willing to obtain a barrier against falsehood, have had recourse to oaths, by which they have endeavored to make men fearful of uttering lies, under the dread of an avenging Deity. Among Christians, an oath is a solemn appeal for the truth of our assertions, the sincerity of our promises, and the fidelity of our engagements, to the one only God, the Judge of the whole earth, who is everywhere present, and sees, and hears, and knows, whatever is said, or done, or thought, in any part of the world. Such is the Being whom Christians, when they take an oath, invoke to bear testimony to the truth of their words, and the integrity of their hearts. Surely, then, if oaths be a matter of so much moment, it well behoves us not to treat them with levity, nor ever to take them without due consideration. Hence we ought, with the utmost vigilance, to abstain from mingling oaths in our ordinary discourse, and from associating the name of God with low or disgusting images, or using it on trivial occasions, as not only a profane levity in itself, but tending to destroy that reverence for the Supreme Majesty which ought to prevail in society, and to dwell in our own hearts.

"The forms of oaths," says Dr. Paley, "like other religious ceremonies, have in all ages been various; consisting, however, for the most part of some bodily action, and of a prescribed form of words." Among the Jews, the juror held up his right hand towards heaven, Ps. 144: 8. Rev. 10: 5. The same form is retained in Scotland still. Among the Jews, also, an oath of fidelity was taken by the servant's putting his hand under the thigh of his lord, Gen. 24: 2. Among the Greeks and Romans, the form varied with the subject and occasion of the oath: in private contracts, the parties took hold of each other's hands, while they swore to the performance; or they touched the altar of the god by whose divinity they swore: upon more solemn occasions, it was the custom to slay a victim; and the beast being struck down, with certain ceremonies and invocations, gave birth to the expression, ferre pactum; and to our English phrase, translated from this, of "striking a bargain." The form of oaths in Christian countries is also very different; but in no country in the world worse contrived, either to convey the meaning or impress the obligation of an oath, than in our own. The juror with us, after repeating the promise or affirmation which the oath is intended to confirm, adds, "So help me God;" or, more frequently, the substance of the oath is repeated to the juror by the magistrate, who adds in the conclusion, "So help you God." The energy of this sentence resides in the particle so: So, that is, hæc lege, upon condition of my speaking the truth, or performing this promise, and not otherwise, may God help me! The juror, whilst he hears or repeats the words of the oath, holds his right hand upon a Bible, or other book containing the gospels, and at the conclusion kisses the book.

This obscure and elliptical form, together with the levity and frequency of them, has brought about a general inadvertency to the obligation of oaths, which, both in a religious and political view, is much to be lamented; and it merits public consideration, whether the requiring of oaths upon so many frivolous occasions, especially in the customs, and in the qualification of petty offices, has any other effect than to make such sanctions cheap in the minds of the people. A pound of tea cannot travel regularly from the ship to the consumer, without costing half a dozen oaths at least; and the same security for the due discharge of their office, namely, that of an oath, is required from a petty constable and the chief justice of the United States.

Oaths, however, are lawful; and, whatever be the form, the signification is the same. Historians have justly remarked, that when the reverence for an oath began to diminish among the Romans, and the loose Epicurean system, which discarded the belief of providence, was introduced, the Roman honor and prosperity from that period began to decline. The Quakers refuse to swear upon any occasion, founding their scruples concerning the lawfulness of oaths upon our Savior's prohibition, "Swear not at all," Matt. 5: 34. But it seems our Lord there referred to the vicious, wanton, and unauthorized swearing in common discourse, and not to judicial oaths; for he himself answered, when interrogated, upon oath, Matt. 26: 63, 64. Mark 14: 61. The apostle Paul also makes use of expressions which contain the nature of oaths, Rom. 1: 9. 1 Cor. 15: 31. 2 Cor. 1: 18. Gal. 1: 20. Heb. 6: 13—17.

The administration of oaths supposes that God will punish false swearing with more severity than a simple lie, or breach of promise; for which belief there are the following reasons: 1. Perjury is a sin of greater deliberation. 2. It violates a superior confidence. 3. God directed the Israelites to swear by his name; (Deut. 6: 13. 10: 20.) and was pleased to confirm his covenant with that people by an oath; neither of which, it is probable, he would have done, had he not intended to represent oaths as having some meaning and effect beyond the obligation of a bare promise. (See PERJURY, and NAME OF THE LORD.—Watson.)

OBADIAH, the prophet, is thought to have been the same as the governor of Ahab's house; (1 Kings 18: 3, &c.) and some are of opinion, he was that Obadiah whom Josiah made overseer of the works of the temple, 2 Chron. 34: 12. Indeed, the age in which this prophet lived is very uncertain. Some think that he was contemporary with Hosea, Amos, and Joel; whilst others are of opinion that he lived in the time of Jeremiah and Ezekiel, and that he delivered his prophecy about B. C. 583, soon after the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar.

His book, which consists of a single chapter, is written with great beauty and elegance, and contains predictions of the utter destruction of the Edomites, and of the future restoration and prosperity of the Jews.—Watson.

OBEAH; a species of witchcraft practised among the negroes, the apprehension of which, operating upon their superstitious fears, is frequently attended with disease and death.—Head. Buck.

OBE-EDOM; son of Jeduthan, a Levite, in whose house the Ark of the Lord abode, and brought a blessing with it, 1 Chron. 16: 38. In 2 Sam. 6: 10. he is called the Gittite, probably because he was of Gath Rimmon, a city of the Levites beyond Jordan, Josh. 21: 24, 25.—Calmet.

OBDIANCE; the performance of the commands of a superior. In religion, it must be animated by love.

Obedience to God may be considered, 1. As virtual, which consists in a belief of the gospel, of the holiness and equity of its precepts, of the truth of its promises, and a true repentance of all our sins.—2. Actual obedience, which is the practice and exercise of the several graces and duties of Christianity.—3. Perfect obedience, which is the exact conformity of our hearts and lives to the law of God, without the least imperfection. This last is peculiar to a glorified state, though it should be our aim in this.

The obligation we are under to obedience arises, 1. From the relation we stand in to God as creatures, Ps. 95: 6.—2. From the law he hath revealed to us in his word, Ps. 119: 3. 2 Pet. 1: 5, 7.—3. From the blessings of his providence we are constantly receiving, Acts 14: 17. Ps. 145.—4. From the love and goodness of God in the grand work of redemption, 1 Cor. 6: 20.

As to the nature of this obedience, it must be, 1. Active, not only avoiding what is prohibited, but performing what is commanded, Col. 3: 8, 10.—2. Personal, for though Christ has obeyed the law for us as a covenant of works, yet he hath not abrogated it as a rule of life, Rom. 7: 22. 3: 31.—3. Sincere, Ps. 51: 6. 1 Tim. 1: 5.—4. Affectionate, springing from love and not from terror, 1 John 5: 19. 2: 5. 2 Cor. 5: 14.—5. Diligent, not slothfully, Gal. 1: 16. Ps. 18: 44. Rom. 12: 11.—6. Conspicuous and open, Phil. 2: 15. Matt. 5: 16.—7. Universal; not one duty, but all, must be performed, 2 Pet. 1: 5, 10.—8. Perpetual, at all times, places, and occasions, Rom. 2: 7. Gal. 6: 9.

The advantages of obedience are these: 1. It adorns the gospel, Tit. 2: 10.—2. It is evidential of grace, 2 Cor. 5: 17.—3. It rejoices the hearts of the ministers and people of God, 3 John 2. 2 Thess. 1: 19, 20.—4. It silences gainsayers, 2 Pet. 1: 11, 12.—5. Encourages the saints, while it reproves the lukewarm, Matt. 5: 16.—6. Affords peace to the subject of it, Ps. 25: 12, 13. Acts 24: 16.—7. It powerfully recommends religion, as that which is both delightful and practicable, Col. 1: 10.—8. It is the forerunner and evidence of eternal glory, Rom. 6: 22. Rev. 22: 14. See HOLINESS; SANCTIFICATION; Charnock's Works, vol. xi. p. 1212; Tillotson's Sermons, ser. 122, 123; Saurin's Sermons, vol. i. ser. 4; Ridgley's Body of Divinity, qu. 92; Dwight's Theology; Walker's Sermons; Fuller's Works; Works of Robert Hall.—*Head. OBDIANCE OF CHRIST, is generally divided into active and passive. His active obedience implies what he did; his passive what he suffered. Some divines distinguish these. They refer our pardon to his passive, and our title to glory to his active obedience: though Dr. Owen observes, that it cannot be clearly evinced that there is any such thing, in propriety of speech, as passive obedience: obeying is doing, to which passion or suffering doth not belong.

Of the active obedience of Christ, the Scriptures assure us that he took upon him the form of a servant, and really became one, Isa. 49: 3. Phil. 2: 5. Heb. 8. He was subject to the law of God. "He was made under the law;" the judicial or civil law of the Jews, the ceremonial law, and the moral law, Matt. 17: 24, 27. Luke 2: 22. Ps. 40: 7, 8. He was obedient to the law of nature; he was in a state of subjection to his parents; and he fulfilled the commands of his heavenly Father as it respected the first and second table.

His obedience, 1. Was voluntary, Ps. 40: 6.—2. Complete, 1 Pet. 2: 22.—3. Wrought out in the room and stead of his people, Rom. 10: 4. 5: 19.—4. Well pleasing and acceptable in the sight of God.—5. Followed by a glorious reward, Phil. 2: 9. (See ATONEMENT).—Head. Buck.

OBLATI; lay brothers in monasteries, who offered their services to the church, as bell-ringers, &c. They wore a religious habit, and were admitted by the ceremony of placing the bell-rope round their necks, as indicative of the service they were expected to perform. Broughton's Dict.—Williams.

OBLATION, an offering. (See SACRIFICE.)

OBLIGATION, is that by which we are bound to the performance of any action. 1. Rational obligation is that which arises from reason, abstractedly taken, to do or forbear certain actions.—2. Authoritative obligation is that which arises from the commands of a superior, or one who has a right or authority to prescribe rules to others.—3. Moral obligation is that by which we are bound to perform that which is right, and to avoid that which is wrong. It is a moral necessity of doing actions or forbearing them; that is, such a necessity as whoever breaks through it, is, ipso facto, worthy of blame for so doing. (See MORAL OBLIGATION.) We find, however, that the generality of men are so far sunk in depravity, that a sense of moral obligation is nearly or quite lost. Still, however, their losing the sense of it does not render the obligation less strong. "Obligation to virtue is eternal and immutable, but the sense of it is lost by sin." See Warburton's Legation, vol. i. pp. 38, 46, &c.; Paley's Moral Philosophy, vol. i. p. 54; Witherspoon's Moral Philosophy; Robinson's Preface to the fourth volume of Saurin's Sermons; Mason's Christian Morals, vol. ii. ser. 23, p. 256; Doddridge's Lectures, lect. 52; Grove's Philosophy, vol. ii. p. 66; Mackintosh's Progress of Ethical Philosophy; Dwight's Theology; Fuller's Works; Works of Robert Hall; New Living Temple.—*Head. OBSERVATION. (See MINN.)

OCCAM, or OCKHAM, (WILLIAM), a divine and philosopher, called the Invincible Doctor, was born at Ockham, in Surry, in the fourteenth century; was educated at Merton college, Oxford, under Duns Scotus; became a Franciscan friar, and archdeacon of Stow, but resigned his preferment; wrote boldly against the pope, for which he was excommunicated; and died at Munich in 1347. He is the founder of the scholastic sect of the Nominalists.—Davenport; Mosheim.

OCCOM, (SAMSON), an Indian preacher, was born at Mohegan, on Thames river, near Norwich, Connecticut, about the year 1723. When Occom was a boy, Mr. Jewett, the minister of New London, now Montville, was accustomed to preach once a fortnight at Mohegan. During the religious excitement about 1739 and 1740, several ministers visited these Indians, and the Indians repaired to the neighboring churches. Occom at this period became the subject of permanent religious impressions. From this time he was desirous of becoming the teacher of his tribe. He could then read by spelling, and in a year or two learned to read the Bible. At the age of nineteen he went to the Indian school of Mr. Wheelock, of Lebanon, and remained with him four years. He afterwards, in 1748, kept a school in New London; but soon went to Montauk, on Long Island, where he taught a school among the Indians ten or eleven years, at the same time being the religious teacher of the Indians in their own language, and preaching also to the Skenecock or Yenecock Indians, distant thirty miles. During a revival among the Montauks many became Christians. He was ordained by the Suffolk presbytery, August 29, 1759, and was from this time a regular member of the presbytery.

In 1766, Mr. Wheelock sent him to England with Mr. Whitaker, the minister of Norwich, to promote the interests of Moor's Indian charity school. He was the first Indian preacher who visited England. The houses in which he preached were thronged. Between February 16, 1766, and July 22, 1767, he preached in various parts of the kingdom between three hundred and four hundred sermons. Large charitable donations were obtained, and the school was soon transplanted to Hanover, New Hampshire, and connected with Dartmouth college.

After his return, Occom sometimes resided at Mohegan, and was often employed in missionary labors among distant Indians. In 1786 he removed to Brotherton, near Utica, New York, in the neighborhood of the Stockbridge Indians, who were of the Mohegan root, and who had formerly been under the instruction of Mr. Sergeant and Mr. Edwards. A few of the Mohegans and other Indians of Connecticut, Long Island, and Rhode Island, removed about the same time. The Oneidas gave them a tract of land. In the last years of his life he resided with the Indians at New Stockbridge, near Brotherton, where he died, in July, 1792, aged sixty-nine.

Dr. Dwight says, "I heard Mr. Occom twice. His discourses, though not proofs of superior talents, were decent; and his utterance in some degree eloquent. His character at times labored under some imputations; yet there is good reason to believe, that most, if not all, of them were unfounded; and there is satisfactory evidence, that he was a man of piety." An account of the Montauk Indians, written by Occom, is preserved in the Historical Collections. He published a sermon at the execution of Moses Paul, an Indian, at New Haven, September 2, 1772. Buel's Ordination Sermon; Historical Collections, iv. p. 68; v. 13; ix. 89, 90; x. 105; Dwight's Travels, ii. p. 112.—Allen.

ECOLAMPADIUS, (JOHN), an eminent German reformer, was born, in 1482, at Weinsberg, in Franconia. He was converted to the Protestant faith by reading the works of Luther; became professor of theology at Basil; embraced the opinions of Zuinglius respecting the sacrament; contributed much to the progress of ecclesiastical reform; and died in 1531.

Ecclampadius was of a meek and quiet disposition; in the undertaking of any business he was very circumspect; nor was there any thing more pleasing to him, than to spend his time in reading and commenting. His publications are numerous, consisting chiefly of Annotations on the Holy Scriptures.—Davenport; Hend. Buck.

ECONOMISTS; a sect of infidel French philosophers, of whom Dr. Duquesnai was the founder. He so ingratiated himself with Louis XV. that he used to call him his thinker; and gained the affections of the people, under pretence of promoting economy in the state. According to the abbé Éarruel, however, the real object of the majority of the society was to subvert Christianity, by circulating the writings of Voltaire, Rousseau, and other infidels. This they did by printing extracts from these popular authors, and circulating them through the kingdom by hawkers and pedlers, who had them for little or nothing, that they might undersell all other literature. Their secret meetings, for preparing and revising these tracts, were held at baron Holbach's. In some of these tracts their object was disguised; in others they were so bold as to avow their object under such titles as "Christianity unmasked," &c. They also attempted schools, for the avowed intention of preparing children for trade and mechanic arts, in which the same writings were read and circulated. Among the members of their secret club were D'Alembert, Turgot, Condorcet, Diderot, La Harpe, and La Moignon, keeper of the seals, who, on his dismissal from that office, shot himself. (See ILLUMINATI, and PHILOSOPHISTS.) Sup. to 3d ed. of Ency. Brit., ii. p. 307.—Williams.

ECONOMY. (See COVENANT, and DISPENSATION.)

OFFENCE. The original word, (skandalizo), in our version usually rendered offend, literally signifies to cause to stumble, and by an easy metaphor, to occasion a fall into sin, Matt. 5: 29. It may therefore apply to ourselves as well as to others, Matt. 18: 6—14. Hence the noun, skandalon, signifies not only an offence, in our common use of that word; but also a stumbling-stone, a trap, a snare, or whatever impedes our path to heaven, Matt. 18: 17. Rom. 14: 13. 1 Cor. 10: 32. Sometimes offence is taken unreasonably; men, as St. Peter says, stumble at the word, being disobedient. Hence we read of the offence of the cross, Gal. 5: 11. G. 12. To positive truth or duty we must adhere, even at the hazard of giving offence; but a woe is on us if we give it without necessity of this holy nature. Rom. 14: 13—21. 1 Cor. 8: 9—13.

Offence may be either active or passive. We may give offence by our conduct, or we may receive offence from the conduct of others. We should be very careful to avoid giving just cause of offence, that we may not prove impediments to others in their reception of the truth, in their progress in sanctification, in their peace of mind, or in their general course toward heaven. We should abridge or deny ourselves in some things, rather than, by exercising our liberty to the utmost, give uneasiness to Christians weaker in mind, or weaker in the faith, than ourselves, 1 Cor. 10: 32.

On the other hand, we should not take offence without ample cause; but endeavor, by our exercise of charity, and perhaps by our increase of knowledge, to think favorably of what is dubious, as well as honorably of what is laudable.

It was foretold of the Messiah, that he should be "a stone of stumbling, and a rock of offence." Perhaps predictions of this kind are among the most valuable which providence has preserved to us; as we see by them, that we ought not to be discouraged because the Jews, the natural people of the Messiah, rejected him, and still reject him; since the very offence they take at his humiliation, death, &c., is in perfect conformity to, and fulfilment of, those prophecies, which foretold, that however they might profess to wish for the great deliverer, yet when he came they would overlook him, and stumble at him.—Brown; Calmet; Comprehensive Commentary.

OFFERING, or OBELATION, denotes whatever is sacrificed or consumed in the worship of God. For an account of the various offerings under the law, the reader is referred to the book of Leviticus. (See also SACRIFICE.)—Hend. Buck.

OFFICES OF CHRIST, are generally considered as threefold. 1. A prophet to enlighten, warn, and instruct, John 6: 14. 3: 2.—2. A priest to sympathize, intercede, and make atonement for his people, Isa. 53. Heb. 7.—3. A king to reign in, rule over, protect, deliver, and bless them, Zech. 11: 9. Ps. 2: 6. (See articles INTERCESSION, MEDIATOR, &c.)—Hend. Buck.

OFFICERS, (CHURCH.) (See CHURCH; DEACON; ELDER; BISHOP.)

OG, king of Bashan, was a giant, of the race of the Rephaim. We may judge of his stature by the length of his bed, which was long preserved in Rabbath, the capital of the Ammonites, Deut. 3: 11. (See BEN.)

Og and Sihon were the only kings that withstood Moses, Num. 21: 33. Their country was given to the tribes of Gad, Reuben, and half the tribe of Manasse. (See BASHAN.)—Calmet.

OGILVIE, (JOHN), a Scotch divine and poet, was born in 1733, was educated at the university of Aberdeen, from which he obtained a doctor's degree; was for more than half a century minister of Midmar, in Aberdeenshire; and died in 1814, respected for his piety and talents. His poetical powers were by no means inconsiderable. His chief works are, Sermons; Poems; Britannia, an epic poem; Philosophical and Critical Observations on Compositions; and Examination of the Evidence of Prophecy.—Davenport.

OIL. The Hebrews commonly anointed themselves with oil: they anointed also their kings, prophets, and high-priests with an unction of peculiar richness and sacredness. (See OLIVE; UNCTION; and OINTMENT.) The oil of gladness, (Ps. 45: 7. Isa. 61: 3.) was the perfumed oil with which the Hebrews anointed themselves on days of rejoicing and festivity.

Oil was also used for food and medicine. Moses says (Deut. 32: 13.) that God made his people to suck oil and honey out of the rocks; that is, that in the midst of dreary deserts, he abundantly provided them with all things not only necessary, but agreeable. James directs that the sick should be anointed with oil in the name of the Lord, by the elders of the church, Jam. 5: 14.—Calmet.

OINTMENT. As perfumes are seldom made up among us in the form of ointment, but mostly in that of essence, while ointments are rather medical, we do not always discern the beauty of those comparisons in Scripture, in which ointments are mentioned. "Dead flies, though but small insects, cause the ointment of the apothecary—it should be, the fragrant unguent of the perfumer—to emit a fetid vapor; so does a small proportion of folly, or perverseness, overpower by its fetor the fragrance of wisdom and glory," Eccl. 10: 1. (See FLIES.)

Ointments and oils were used in warm countries after bathing; and as oil was the first recipient of fragrance, probably from herbs, &c., steeped in it, many kinds of unguents not made of oil, (olive oil,) retained that appellation. As the plants imparted somewhat of their color as well as of their fragrance, hence the expression green oil, &c., in the Hebrew. (See ALABASTER.)—Calmet.

OLD; ancient. We say the Old Testament, by way of contradiction from the New. Moses was the minister of the Old Testament, of the old age of the letter; but Christ is the Mediator of the New Testament, or of the new covenant; not of the letter, but of the spirit, Heb. 9: 15-20.

Old age is promised as a blessing by God to those who maintain obedience to his commands; and it is probable that providence did, and still does, watch over and prolong the lives of eminently pious men. It was formerly thought a great blessing to come to the grave in a good old age, or "as a shock of corn fully ripe;" and though "they are not to be heard, who feign that the old fathers did look only for transitory promises," yet we think we may venture to say they did on various occasions expect peculiar mercies from God, even in this life; and that their expectations were not disappointed. Old age was entitled to peculiar honor, and no doubt, when men lived to the age of several hundred years, the wisdom they must needs have acquired, the influence they must needs have possessed over the younger part of the community, must have been much greater than they are among ourselves. Very venerable must have been the personal appearance of a patriarch of three or four hundred years, or even of half that age, in the eyes of his family, and of his descendants, whether immediate or remote.

There is nothing more decidedly recorded than the respect paid among the ancients to old age; of which Grecian story affords highly pleasing proofs; and that it was equal among the Orientals we learn from various allusions in the book of Job, the Proverbs, &c.

Old is spoken of what is decaying; (Isa. 50: 9. Heb. 8: 13.) of what has been destroyed; (2 Pet. 2: 5.) of former times, Lam. 1: 7.

The old man, (Rom. 6: 6.) the old Adam, in a moral sense, is our derived corrupted nature, which we ought to crucify with Jesus Christ, that the body of sin may die in us. In Col. 3: 9. the apostle enjoins us "to put off the old man with his deeds, and to put on the new man, which is renewed in knowledge after the image of him that created him." And in Eph. 4: 22. we are instructed "to put off the old man, which is corrupt according to the deceitful lusts."—Calmet; Brown; Saturday Evening.

QLDCASTLE, (Sir John,) afterwards called lord Cobham, was born in the reign of Edward III. Of his early life, few particulars are known. Marrying the niece and heiress of Henry lord Cobham, he obtained his peerage, and displayed the same virtue and patriotism which his illustrious father-in-law had evinced in opposition to the tyranny of Richard II. The famous statute against provisors having, during the feeble government of Richard, been greatly disregarded, lord Cobham attempted the revival of it: and by his spirited and conclusive arguments, so effectually influenced the parliament, as to secure his object. About two years after, lord Cobham distinguished himself by another important effort in the same cause. In conjunction with Sir Richard Story, Sir Thomas Latimer, and others, he drew up a number of articles, which, in the form of a remonstrance against the corruptions of the clergy, they presented to the house of commons. In addition to these instances of public spirit, he put himself to great expense in collecting, transcribing, and dispersing the works of Wickliffe. He also incurred considerable charges by maintaining itinerant preachers in the dioceses of Canterbury, London, Rochester, and Hereford. These undisguised efforts at reformation drew upon him the resentment of the Romish clergy, to whom he was more obnoxious than any other individual in the kingdom.

Lord Cobham is reported by historians to have been a brave and experienced officer. Bayle says, "In all adventurous acts of worldly manhood, he was ever fortunate, doughty, noble, and valiant." By his military talents he acquired the esteem both of Henry IV. and Henry V. "He was," says Guthrie, "one of the bravest men and best officers in England; he had served with great reputation in France; and the opinion of his valor, joined to that of his honesty and piety, had gained him prodigious popularity."

He was also the first noble author, as well as martyr, in England, in the cause of reformation. In the convocation assembled during the first year of the reign of Henry V., the principal subject of debate was, the growth of heresy. Thomas Arundel, a prelate equally remarkable for zeal and bigotry, was at this time archbishop of Canterbury. Lord Cobham being considered as the head of the Wickliffites, it was presumed, that, if his destruction could be effected, it would strike a salutary terror into his adherents; but as he was known to be in favor with the king, and also highly popular, it was deemed prudent to dissemble for a while. The archbishop, therefore, contented himself, for the present, by requesting his majesty to send commissioners to Oxford, to inquire into the growth of heresy, with which the king complied. The commissioners having made inquiry, reported to the archbishop, who informed the convocation, that the increase of heresy was especially owing to lord Cobham, who encouraged scholars from Oxford, and other places, to propagate heretical opinions throughout the country. The archbishop, accompanied by a large body of the clergy, waited upon Henry, and having laid before him the offence of lord Cobham, begged, in all humility and charity, that his majesty would suffer them, for Christ's sake, to put him to death. To this meek and humane request, the king replied, that he thought such violence more destructive of truth than of error; that he himself would reason with lord Cobham; and, if that should prove ineffectual, he would leave him to the censure of the church.

Henry, having sent for lord Cobham, endeavored to persuade him to retract his errors; but, to the reasoning and exhortation of the king, he returned the following answer:—"I ever was a dutiful subject to your majesty, and I hope ever shall be. Next to God, I profess obedience to my king. But as for the spiritual dominion of the pope, I never could see on what foundation it is claimed, nor can I pay him any obedience. As sure as God's word is true, to me it is fully evident, that he is the great Antichrist foretold in holy writ." This answer so exceedingly displeased the king, that he gave the archbishop leave to proceed against lord Cobham with the utmost extremity; or, as Bayle says, "according to the devilish decrees, which they call the laws of the holy church." On the 11th of September, the day fixed for his appearance, the primate and his associates sat in consistory; when lord Cobham not appearing, the archbishop excommunicated him, and called in the civil power to assist him, agreeably to the late enacted law.

Conceiving himself to be now in danger, Cobham drew up a confession of his faith, which he presented to the king; who coldly ordered it to be given to the archbishop. Being again cited to appear before the archbishop, and refusing compliance, he was committed to the Tower by the king's order. Having remained six months in the Tower, without the archbishop and his clergy coming to any conclusion about him, lord Cobham saved them the trouble of farther deliberation, by escaping from the Tower, and flying into Wales.

In the year 1414, the king set a price of a thousand marks upon the head of Cobham, and promised a perpetual exemption from taxes to any town that should secure him. During four years, lord Cobham continued an exile in Wales; but at length his enemies engaged the lord Powis in their interest, who, by means of his tenants, secured and delivered up the noble fugitive to his mortal enemy, the archbishop of Canterbury.

His fate was now precipitated with all the ardor of ecclesiastical zeal. He received sentence of death, both as a heretic and a traitor. On the day appointed for his execution, he was brought out of the Tower with his arms bound behind him, but with a cheerful countenance. Arrived at the place of execution, he devoutly fell upon his knees, and implored of God the forgiveness of his enemies. He then stood up, and briefly addressing the multitude, exhorted them to continue steadfast in the observance of the laws of God, as contained in the Scriptures; and submitted to his fate with the intrepidity of a hero, and the resignation of a martyr. He was hanged up alive, by the middle, with iron chains, on the gallows which had been prepared; under which a fire being made, he was burned to death.

This perished the illustrious Cobham; his life the or nement, his death the disgrace of his times!—Jones' Chris. Big.; Wimsey's Hist. of the Eng. Baptists.

OLIVE-TREE, (Heb. vit, Gr. klava, Matt. 21: 1. Jam. 3: 12.) Paul, in his epistle to the Romans, (11: 24.) distinguishes two kinds of olive-trees; (1.) the wild and natural, agrielaos; and (2.) those under care and culture.

The cultivated olive-tree is of a moderate height, its trunk knotty, its bark smooth, and ash-colored; its wood is solid and yellowish; the leaves are oblong, almost like those of the willow, of a green color, dark on the upper side, and white on the under side. In the month of June it puts out white flowers that grow in bunches. Each flower is of one piece, widening upwards, and dividing into four parts; the fruit oblong and plump. It is first green, then pale, and when it is quite ripe, black. In the flesh of it is inclosed a hard stone, full of an oblong seed. The wild olive is smaller in all its parts.

Canaan much abounded with olives. It seems almost every proprietor, whether kings or subjects, had their olive-yards. The olive-branch was, from most ancient times, used as the symbol of reconciliation and peace. The sacred writers often use similes taken from the olive.—Watson; Calmet.

OLIVES, (MOUNT OF), is east of Jerusalem, and separated from the city by the brook Cedron, and the valley of Jehoshaphat. Josephus says, it is five stadia (or furlongs) from Jerusalem; Luke says, a Sabbath day's journey; i. e. about eight furlongs, Acts 1: 12. The mount of Olives has three summits, ranging from north to south; from the middle summit our Savior ascended into heaven; on the south summit Solomon built temples to his idols; the north summit is distant two furlongs from the middlemost. This is the highest, and is commonly called Galilee, or Viri Galilæi, from the expression used by the angels, "ye men of Galilee."

In the time of king Uzziab, the mount of Olives was shattered by an earthquake, that half the earth on the western side fell, and rolled four furlongs, or five hundred paces, toward the opposite mountain on the east; so that the earth blocked up the highways, and covered the king's gardens. Joseph. Antiq. lib. ix. cap. 11. and Zech. 14: 5.

The olive is still found growing in patches at the foot of the mount to which it gives its name; and "as a spontaneous produce, uninterruptedly resulting from the original growth of this part of the mountain, it is impossible," says Dr. E. D. Clarke, "to view even these trees with indifference." Titus cut down all the wood in the neighborhood of Jerusalem; but there would seem to have been constantly springing up a succession of these hardy trees. "It is truly a curious and interesting fact," adds the learned traveller, "that, during a period of little more than two thousand years, Hebrews, Assyrians, Romans, Moslems, and Christians, have been successively in possession of the rocky mountains of Palestine; yet, the olive still vindicates its paternal soil, and is found, at this day, upon the same spot which was called by the Hebrew writers mount Olivet and the mount of Olives, eleven centuries before the Christian era," 2 Sam. 15: 30. Zech. 14: 4.

The names of the various districts of this mount deserve attention, as, (1.) Geth-semani, the place of oil-presses; (2.) Bethany, the house of dates; (3.) Bethphage, the house of green figs, and probably other names in different places. The talmudists say, that on the mount of Olivet were shops, kept by the children of Canaan, of which shops some were in Bethany; and that under two large cedars which stood there, were four shops, where things necessary for purification were constantly on sale, such as doves or pigeons for the women, &c. Probably, these shops were supplied by country persons, who hereby avoided paying rent for their sittings in the temple. There was also a collection of water at Bethany, on this mount; which was by some used as a place of purification.

Though this mount was named from its olive-trees, yet it abounded in other trees also. It was a station for signals, which were communicated from hence by lights and flames, on various occasions. They were made of long staves of cedar, canes, pine wood, with coarse flax, which, while on fire, were shaken about till they were answered from other signals.

Towards the south appears the lake Asphaltites, a noble expanse of water, seeming to be within a short ride from the city; but the real distance is much greater. Lofty mountains inclose it with prodigious grandeur. To the north are seen the verdant and fertile pastures of the plain of Jericho, watered by the Jordan, whose course may be distinctly discerned.

"So commanding is the view of Jerusalem afforded in this situation, (says Dr. E. D. Clarke,) that the eye roams over all the streets, and around the walls, as if in the survey of a plan or model of the city. The most conspicuous object in the city is the mosque, erected upon the site and foundations of the temple of Solomon." (See JERUSALEM.) Hence the observation of the evangelist, (Luke 19: 37.) that Jesus beheld the city, and wept over it, acquires additional force.

What is said in Midras Tellim, by rabbi Janna, is extremely remarkable: "The Divine Majesty stood three years and a half on mount Olivet, saying, 'Seek ye the Lord, while he may be found; call on him, while he is near.'" Is this the language of a Jew?—Calmet; Watson. OMEGA; the last letter of the Greek alphabet. (See ALPHA.)

OMEN is a word which, in its proper sense, signifies a sign or indication of some future event, especially of an alarming nature. Against the belief of omens it is observed, that it is contrary to every principle of sound philosophy; and whoever has studied the writings of Paul must be convinced that it is inconsistent with the spirit of genuine Christianity.

We cannot pretend to discuss the subject here, but will present the reader with a quotation on the other side of the question. "Though it be true," says Mr. Toplady, "that all omens are not worthy of observation, and though they should never be so regarded as to shock our fortune, or diminish our confidence in God, still they are not to be constantly despised. Small incidents have sometimes been prelusive to great events; nor is there any superstition in noticing these apparent prognostications, though there may be much superstition in being either too indiscriminately or too deeply swayed by them." Toplady's Works, vol. iv. p. 192.—*Hend. OMNIPOTENCE OF GOD is his almighty power. This is essential to his nature as an infinite, independent, and perfect being. Glorious and awful attribute!

The power of God is divided into absolute, and ordinate, or actual. Absolute, is that whereby God is able to do that which he will not do, but is possible to be done. Ordinate is that whereby he doeth that which he hath decreed to do.

The power of God may be more especially seen, 1. In creation, Rom. 1: 20. Gen. 1: 2. In the preservation of his creatures, Heb. 1: 3. Col. 1: 16, 17. Job 26: 3. In the redemption of men by Christ, Luke 1: 35, 37. Eph. 1: 19. 4. In the conversion of sinners, Ps. 110: 3. 2 Cor. 4: 7. Rom. 1: 16. 5. In the continuation and success of the gospel in the world, Matt. 13: 31, 32. 6. In the final perseverance of the saints, 1 Pet. 1: 5. 7. In the resurrection of the dead, 1 Cor. 15. 8. In making the righteous happy forever, and punishing the wicked, Phil. 3: 21. Matt. 25: 34, &c. OMNIPRESENCE OF GOD, is his ubiquity, or his being present in every place.

This may be argued from his infinity, (Ps. 139.) his power, which is everywhere, (Heb. 1: 3.) his providence, (Acts 17: 27, 28.) which supplies all. As he is a Spirit, he is so omnipresent as not to be mixed with the creature, or divided, part in one place, and part in another; nor is he multiplied or extended, but is essentially present everywhere.

Some striking passages on the ubiquity of the divine presence may be found in the writings of some of the Greek philosophers, arising out of this notion, that God was the soul of the world; but their very connexion with this speculation, notwithstanding the imposing phrase occasionaly adopted, strikingly marks the difference between their most exalted views, and those of the Hebrew prophets on this subject. These defective notions are confessed by Gibbon, a writer not disposed to undervalue their attainments: "The philosophers of Greece deduced their morals from the nature of man, rather than from that of God. They meditated, however, on the divine nature, as a very curious and important speculation; and, in the profound inquiry, they displayed the strength and weakness of the human understanding. Of the four most considerable sects, the Stoics and the Platonicians endeavored to reconcile the jarring interests of reason and piety. They have left us the most sublime proofs of the existence and perfections of the First Cause; but as it was impossible for them to conceive the creation of matter, the workman, in the Stoic philosophy, was not sufficiently distinguished from the work; whilst, on the contrary, the spiritual God of Plato and his disciples resembled more an idea than a substance."

Similar errors have been revived in the infidel philosophy of modern times, from Spinoza down to the later offspring of the German and French schools. The same remark applies also to the Oriental philosophy, which presents at this day a perfect view of the boasted wisdom of ancient Greece, which was "brought to nought" by "the foolishness" of apostolic preaching. But in the Scriptures there is nothing confused in the doctrine of the divine ubiquity. God is everywhere, but he is not every thing. All things have their being in him, but he is distinct from all things; he fills the universe, but is not mingled with it. He is the intelligence which guides, and the power which sustains; but his personality is preserved, and he is independent of the works of his hands, however vast and noble. So far is his presence from being bounded by the universe itself, that, as we are taught in the passage above quoted from the Psalms, were it possible for us to wing our way into the immeasurable depths and breadths of space, God would there surround us, in as absolute a sense as that in which he is said to be about our bed and our path in that part of the world where his will has placed us.

On this, as on all similar subjects, the Scriptures use terms which are taken in their common-sense acceptation among mankind; and though the vanity of the human mind disposes many to seek a philosophy in the doctrine thus announced deeper than that which its popular terms convey, we are bound to conclude, if we would pay but a common respect to an admitted revelation, that, where no manifest figure of speech occurs, the truth of the doctrine lies in the tenor of the terms by which it is expressed. Otherwise there would be no revelation, we do not say, of the modus, (for that is confessedly incomprehensible,) but of the fact. In the case before us, the terms presence and place are used according to common notions; and must be so taken, if the Scriptures are intelligible. Metaphysical refinements are not scriptural doctrines, when they give to the terms chosen by the Holy Spirit an acceptation out of their general and proper use, and make them the signs of a perfectly distinct class of ideas; if, indeed, all distinctness of idea is not lost in the attempt. It is therefore in the popular and just, because scriptural, manner, that we are to conceive of the omnipresence of God.

If we reflect upon ourselves, we may observe that we fill but a small space, and that our knowledge or power reaches but a little way. We can act at one time in one place only, and the sphere of our influence is narrow at largest. Would we be witnesses to what is done at any distance from us, or exert there our active powers, we must remove ourselves thither. For this reason we are necessarily ignorant of a thousand things which pass around us, incapable of attending and managing any great variety of affairs, or performing at the same time any number of actions, for our own good, or for the benefit of others. Although we feel this to be the present condition of our being, and the limited state of our intelligent and active powers, yet we can easily conceive there may exist beings more perfect, and whose presence may extend far and wide: any one of whom, present in what are to us various places, at the same time, may know at once what is done in all these, and act in all of them; and thus be able to regard and direct a variety of affairs at the same instant: and who further being qualified, by the purity and activity of their nature, to pass from one place to another with great ease and swiftness, may thus fill a large sphere of action, direct a great variety of affairs, confer a great number of benefits, and observe a multitude of actions at the same time, or in so swift a succession as to us would appear but one instant. Thus, we may readily believe, do the angels of God excel.

We can further conceive this extent of presence, and of ability for knowledge and action, to admit of degrees of ascending perfection approaching to infinite. And when we have thus raised our thoughts to the idea of a being, who is not only present throughout a large empire, but throughout our world; and not only in every part of our world, but in every part of all the numberless suns and worlds which roll in the starry heavens; who is not only able to enliven and actuate the plants, animals, and men who live upon this globe, but countless varieties of creatures everywhere in an immense universe; yea, whose presence is not confined to the universe, immeasurable as that is by any finite mind, but who is present everywhere in infinite space; and who is therefore able to create still new worlds, and fill them with proper inhabitants, attend, supply, and govern them all: when we have thus gradually raised and enlarged our conceptions, we have the best idea we can form of the universal presence of the great Jehovah, who filleth heaven and earth. All creatures live and move and have their being in him. And the inmost recesses of the human heart can no more exclude his presence, or conceal a thought from his knowledge, than the deepest caverns of the earth.

We cannot, it is true, see him with our bodily eyes, because he is a pure Spirit; yet this is not any proof that he is not present. A judicious discourse, a series of kind actions, convince us of the presence of a friend, a person of prudence and benevolence. We cannot see the present mind, the seat and principle of these qualities; yet the constant regular motion of the tongue, the hand, and the whole body, (which are the instruments of our souls, as the material universe and all the various bodies in it are the instruments of the Deity,) will not suffer us to doubt that there is an intelligent and benevolent principle within the body which produces all these skillful motions and kind actions. The sun, the air, the earth, and the waters, are no more able to move themselves, and produce all that beautiful and useful variety of plants, and fruits, and trees, with which our earth is covered, than the body of a man, when the soul hath left it, is able to move itself, form an instrument, plough a field, or build a house. If the laying out judiciously and well cultivating a small estate, sowing it with proper grain at the best time of the year, watering it in due season and quantities, and gathering in the fruits when ripe, and laying them up in the best manner,—if all these effects prove the estate to have a manager, and the manager possessed of skill and strength,—certainly the enlightening and warming the whole earth by the sun, and so directing its motion, and the motion of the earth, as to produce in a constant useful succession day and night, summer and winter, seed-time and harvest; the watering the earth continually by the clouds, and thus bringing forth immense quantities of herbage, grain, and fruits: certainly all these effects continually produced, must prove that a Being of the greatest power, wisdom, and benevolence is continually present throughout our world, which he thus supports, moves, actuates, and makes fruitful.

Were God to speak to us every month from heaven, and with a voice loud as thunder declare that he observes, provides for, and governs us; this would not be a proof, in the judgment of sound reason, by many degrees so valid: since much less wisdom and power are required to form such sounds in the air, than to produce these effects; and to give, not merely verbal declarations, but substantial evidences of his presence and care over us. In every part and place of the universe, with which we are acquainted, we perceive the exertion of a power, which we believe, mediately or immediately, to proceed from the Deity. For instance: in what part or point of space, that has ever been explored, do we not discover attraction? In what regions do we not find light? In what accessible portion of our globe do we not meet with gravity, magnetism, electricity; together with the properties also and powers of organized substances, of vegetable or of animated nature? Nay, further, what kingdom is there of nature, what corner of space, in which there is any thing that can be examined by us, where we do not fall upon contrivance and design? The only reflection, perhaps, which arises in our minds from this view of the world around us, is, that the laws of nature everywhere prevail; that they are uniform and universal. But what do we mean by the laws of nature, or by any law? Effects are produced by power, not by laws. A law is not self-imposed. A law cannot execute itself. A law refers us to an author and agent. The laws of nature are nothing more nor less than the regular methods of incessant divine operation. In the mineral, vegetable, animal, intellectual, and moral world, God is continually present, working, according to the peculiar constitution and conditions he has assigned to each.

Among metaphysicians, it has been matter of dispute, whether God is present everywhere by an infinite extension of his essence. This is the opinion of Newton, Dr. S. Clarke, and their followers; others have objected to this notion, that it might then be said, God is neither in heaven nor in earth, but only a part of God in each. The former opinion, however, appears most in harmony with the Scriptures; though the term extension, through the inadequacy of language, conveys too material an idea. The objection just stated is wholly grounded on notions taken from material objects, and is therefore of little weight, because it is not applicable to an immaterial substance. That we cannot comprehend how God is fully, and completely, and undividedly present everywhere, need not surprise us, when we reflect that the manner in which our own minds are present with our bodies is as incomprehensible as the manner in which the Supreme Mind is present with every thing in the universe.

From the consideration of this attribute we should learn to fear and reverence God, Psal. 89: 7. To derive consolation in the hour of distress, Isa. 42: 2. Ps. 46: 1. To be active and diligent in holy services, Psal. 119: 168. Buck*; Watson.

OMNISCIENCE OF GOD is that perfection by which he knows all things; and is, 1. Infinite knowledge, Ps. 147: 5. 2. Eternal, generally called foreknowledge, Acts 15: 18. Isa. 46: 10. Eph. 1: 4. Acts 2: 23. 3. Universal, extending to all persons, times, places, and things, Heb. 4: 13. Ps. 50: 10, &c. 4. Perfect, relating to what is past, present, and to come. He knows all, independently, distinctly, infallibly, and perpetually, Jer. 10: 6. 7. Rom. 11: 33. 5. This knowledge is peculiar to himself, (Mark 13: 32. Job 36: 4.) and not communicable to any creature. 6. It is incomprehensible to us; how God knows all things, yet it is evident that he does; for to suppose otherwise is to suppose him an imperfect being, and directly contrary to the revelation he has given of himself, Ps. 139: 6. 1 John 3: 20. Job 28: 21. 21: 22.

This attribute of God is constantly connected in Scripture with his omnipresence, and forms a part of almost every description of that attribute; for, as God is a Spirit, and therefore intelligent, if he is everywhere, if nothing can exclude him, not even the most solid bodies, nor the minds of intelligent beings, then are all things naked and opened to the eyes of him with whom we have to do. Where he acts, he is; and where he is, he perceives. He understands and considers things absolutely, and as they are in their own natures, powers, properties, differences, together with all the circumstances belonging to them. "Known unto him are all his works from the beginning of the world," rather, (ap' aionos), from all eternity known, before they were made, in their possible, and known, now they are made, in their actual, existence.

In Psalm 94, the knowledge of God is argued from the communication of it to men: "Understand, ye brutish among the people; and, ye fools, when will ye be wise? He that planted the ear, shall he not hear? He that formed the eye, shall he not see? He that chastiseth the heathen, shall not he correct? He that teacheth man knowledge, shall not he know?" This argument is as easy as it is conclusive, obliging all who acknowledge a First Cause, to admit his perfect intelligence, or to take refuge in atheism itself. For if God gives wisdom to the wise, and knowledge to men of understanding; if he communicates this perfection to his creatures, the inference must be that he himself is possessed of it in a much more eminent degree than they; that his knowledge is deep and intimate, reaching to the very essence of things, theirs but slight and superficial; his clear and distinct, theirs confused and dark; his certain and infallible, theirs doubtful and liable to mistake; his easy and permanent, theirs obtained with much pains, and soon lost again by the defects of memory or age; his universal and extending to all objects, theirs short and narrow, reaching only to some few things, while that which is wanting cannot be numbered; and therefore, as the heavens are higher than the earth, so, as the prophet has told us, are his ways above our ways, and his thoughts above our thoughts.

On the subject of the divine omniscience, many fine sentiments are to be found in the writings of pagans; for an intelligent First Cause being in any sense admitted, it was most natural and obvious to ascribe to him a perfect knowledge of all things. They acknowledged that nothing is hid from God, who is intimate to our minds, and mingles himself with our very thoughts; nor were they all unaware of the practical tendency of such a doctrine, and of the motive it affords to a cautious and virtuous conduct. But among them it was not held, as by the sacred writers, in connexion with other right views of the divine nature, which are essential to give to this its full moral effect. Not only on this subject does the manner in which the Scriptures state the doctrine far transcend that of the wisest pagan theists; but the moral of the sentiment is infinitely more comprehensive and impressive.

It is connected with man's state of trial; with a holy law, all the violations of which, in thought, word, and deed, are both infallibly known, and strictly marked; with promises of grace, and of a mild and protecting government as to all who have sought and found the mercy of God in forgiving their sins and admitting them into his family. The wicked are thus reminded, that their hearts are searched, and their sins noted; that the eyes of the Lord are upon their ways; and that their most secret works will be brought to light in the day when God the Witness shall become God the Judge. But as to the righteous, the eyes of the Lord are said to be over them; that they are kept by him who never slumbers or sleeps; that he is never far from them; that his eyes run to and fro throughout the whole earth, to show himself strong in their behalf; that foes, to them invisible, are seen by his eye, and controlled by his arm; and that this great attribute, so appalling to wicked men, affords to them, not only the most influential reason for a perfectly holy temper and conduct, but the strongest motive to trust, and joy, and hope, amidst the changes and afflictions of the present life.

Socrates, as well as other philosophers, could express themselves well, so long as they expressed themselves generally, on this subject. The former could say, "Let your own frame instruct you. Does the mind inhabiting your body dispose and govern it with ease? Ought you not then to conclude, that the Universal Mind with equal ease actuates and governs universal nature; and that, when you can at once consider the interests of the Athenians at home, in Egypt, and in Sicily, it is not too much for the divine wisdom to take care of the universe? These reflections will soon convince you, that the greatness of the divine mind is such as at once to see all things, hear all things, be present everywhere, and direct all the affairs of the world." These views are just, but they wanted that connexion with others relative both to the divine nature and government, which we see only in the Bible, to render them influential; they neither gave correct moral distinctions nor led to a virtuous practice; no, not in Socrates, who, on some subjects, and especially on the personality of the Deity and his independence on matter, raised himself far above the rest of his philosophic brethren, but in moral feeling and practice was perhaps as censurable as they. (See PRESCIENCE.) See Charnock's Works, vol. i. p. 271; Abernethy's Sermons, vol. i. pp. 290, 306; Howe's Works, vol. i. pp. 102, 103; Gill's Div., vol. i. p. 85, oct.; Dwight's Theology—Hend. Buck; Watson.

ON, or AVEN; a city of Egypt, situated in the land of Goshen, on the east of the Nile, and about five miles from the modern Cairo. It was called Heliopolis by the Greeks, and Bethshemeth by the Hebrews; (Jer. 43: 13.) both of which names, as well as its Egyptian one of On, imply the city or house of the sun. The inhabitants of this city are represented by Herodotus as the wisest of the Egyptians; and here Moses resided, and received that education which made him "learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians." But, notwithstanding its being the seat of the sciences, such were its egregious idolatries, that it was nicknamed Aven, or Beth-Aven, "the house of vanity," or idolatry, by the Jews.

It was predicted by Jeremiah, (43: 13.) and by Ezekiel, (30: 17.) that this place, with its temples and inhabitants, should be destroyed; which was probably fulfilled by Nebuchadnezzar. (See NOR.) Most of the ruins of this once famous city, described by Strabo the geographer, are buried in the accumulation of the soil; but that which marks its site, and is, perhaps, the most ancient work at this time existing in the world, in a perfect state, is a column of red granite, seventy feet high, and covered with hieroglyphics. Dr. E. D. Clarke has given a very good representation of this column; to whom, also, the curious reader is referred for a learned dissertation on the characters engraved upon it.—Watson.

ONAN; son of Judah, and grandson of the patriarch Jacob. He was given in marriage to Tamar, after the death of his brother Ur, but was destroyed by the Lord, for the criminal mode in which he evaded compliance with the law of the Levirate. (See MARRIAGE, and LEVIRATE.)

The infamous crime of ONAN is to this day stamped with his name. Public attention has recently been drawn to its extensive prevalence and dire effects by the publication of a Treatise on the Diseases of Onanism, which appeared in New York, in 1832, from the press of Collins and Hannay. It is a translation from the French of Tissot; and the American editor, in his preface, affirms, that this crime is more frequently a source of diseases in both sexes than is generally supposed, and from which students at our public seminaries of learning are not always exempt. Those young persons, parents, and guardians, who would learn the real and dreadful evils which arise from the practice of self-pollution, and which stamp upon it the terrible seal of the divine displeasure, are referred for ample evidence to the above-named work.—Calmet.

ONE; (1.) one only, besides which there is no other of the kind; so God is one; and Christ is the one Mediator and Master; but in the phrase God is one, (Gal 3: 20.) it may denote one of the parties to be reconciled, 1 Tim. 2: 5. Eccl. 12: 11. (2.) The same either in substance; so the divine persons are one; (1 John 5: 7. John 10: 30.) or in number; thus all the world had one language after the flood; (Gen. 11: 1.) or in kind; thus one plague was on the Philistines and their lands; (1 Sam. 6: 4.) or in object; so Paul that planted the churches, and Apollus that watered them, were one in their general office and aim as ministers of Christ, 1 Cor. 3: 8. (3.) United together; so Christ and his people are one; they are one by his representing them in the covenant of grace, and are united to him by his Spirit dwelling in them, and by their faith and love to him, their intimate fellowship with him, and their likeness to him: and they are one among themselves. They are all members of his one mystical body, have one Lord, one spirit, one faith, one baptism, one hope; love one another, possess the same privileges, have the same kind of views, aims, and works; (John 17: 21, 23. Rom. 12: 5. Eph. 4: 3—6.) and they are one of one heart, and mind, and mouth, when they ardently love one another as Christians, and have much the same views of divine truth, and much the same profession and manner of speech, Acts 4: 32. Rom. 15: 6. God made but one woman, though, having the residue of the Spirit, he had power to create multitudes, that he might seek a godly seed, have children lawfully produced, and religiously educated, Mal. 2: 15. To have one lot, and one purse, is to be joined in the closest fellowship, Prov. 1: 14.—Brown.

ONESIMUS was a Phrygian by nation, a slave to Philemon, and subsequently a disciple of the apostle Paul. Onesimus having run away from his master, and also having robbed him, (Philem. 5: 18.) went to Rome while St. Paul was there in prison the first time. As Onesimus knew him by repute, (his master Philemon being a Christian,) perhaps from mere curiosity, he sought him out. St. Paul brought him to a sense of the greatness of his crime, instructed him, baptized him, and sent him back to his master Philemon with a letter, inserted among St. Paul's epistles, which is universally acknowledged as canonical. (See PHILEMON.)

This letter had all the good success he could desire. Philemon not only received Onesimus as a faithful servant, but rather as a brother and a friend. A little time after, he sent him back to Rome to St. Paul, that he might continue to be serviceable to him in his prison. And we see that after this, Onesimus was employed to carry such epistles as the apostle wrote at that time. He carried, for example, that which was written to the Colossians, while St. Paul was yet in his bonds. He is said to have died a martyr.—Watson; Calmet.

ONESIPHORUS; one of the primitive Christians, of whom the most honorable mention is made by the apostle Paul, in 2 Tim. 1: 16, and ch. 5: 19. He appears to have been a citizen of Ephesus, and member of the church there; for Paul tells Timothy, that "he knew in how many things he had ministered to him at Ephesus," 2 Tim. 1: 18. Onesiphorus came to Rome in the year of Christ 65, when Paul was a second time imprisoned for the faith, at a moment, too, when almost all the rest of his friends had forsaken him and fled. Here he had a fine opportunity of evincing his attachment to the cause of Christ, by succoring his faithful servant, which he did so nobly and generously, that the affectionate heart of Paul was quite overwhelmed by a sense of his kindness, and he poured it out in the most ardent wishes, "that the Lord would grant mercy to him and his household in the last day," a day in which all the human race will stand in need of mercy; 2 Tim. 1: 18.—Jones.

ONION; (batsal, Num. 11: 5.) a well-known garden plant with a bulbous root. Onions and garlics were highly esteemed in Egypt; and not without reason, this country being admirably adapted to their culture. The allium cepa, called by the Arabs basal, Hasselquist thinks one of the species of onions for which the Israelites longed. He would infer this from the quantities still used in Egypt, and their goodness. "Whoever has tasted onions in Egypt," says he, "must allow that none can be had better in any part of the universe. Here they are sweet; in other countries they are nauseous and strong. Here they are soft; whereas in the northern and other parts they are hard, and their coats so compact that they are difficult of digestion. Hence they cannot in any place be eaten with less prejudice, and more satisfaction, than in Egypt."

The Egyptians are reproached with swearing by the leeks and onions of their gardens. Juvenal, as well as Lucian, ridicules some of these superstitious people who did not dare to eat leeks, garlic, or onions, for fear of injuring their gods:—

*Quis nescit, Volusi Bythynice, qualia demens
Egyptus portenta colit?
Porrum et cepa nefas violare aut frangere morsus;
O sanctas gentes quibus hæc nascuntur in hortis
Numina!* Sat. xv.

"How Egypt, mad with superstition grown,
Makes gods of monsters, but too well is known.
'Tis mortal sin an onion to devour;
Each clove of garlic has a sacred power.
Religious nation, sure! and hest abodes,
Where ev'ry garden is o'errun with gods!"

Hence arises a question, how the Israelites durst venture to violate the national worship, by eating those sacred plants. We may answer, in the first place, that whatever might be the case of the Egyptians in later ages, it is not probable that they were arrived at such a pitch of superstition in the time of Moses; for we find no indications of this in Herodotus, the most ancient of the Greek historians: secondly, the writers here quoted appear to be mistaken in imagining these plants to have been generally the objects of religious worship. The priests, indeed, abstained from the use of them, and several other vegetables; and this might give rise to the opinion of their being revered as divinities: but the use of them was not prohibited to the people, as is plain from the testimonies of ancient authors, particularly of Diodorus Siculus.—Watson.

ONO; a city of Benjamin, 1 Chron. 8: 12. In Neh. 6: 2, we have mention of "the valley of Ono," which probably was not far from the city.—Calmet.

ONYX; (sheham, Gen. 2: 12. Exod. 25: 7. 28: 9, 20. 35: 27. 39: 6. 1 Chron. 29: 2. Job 28: 16. Ezek. 28: 13.) a precious stone, so called from the Greek onux, the naïl, to the color of which it nearly approaches. It is first mentioned with the gold and bdellium of the river Pison in Eden; but the meaning of the Hebrew word is not easily determined. The Septuagint render it, in different places, the sardius, beryl, sapphir, emerald, &c. Such names are often ambiguous, even in Greek and Latin, and no wonder if they are more so in Hebrew.

In 1 Chron. 29: 2, onyx stones are among the things prepared by David for the temple. The author of "Scripture Illustrated" observes, upon this passage, that "the word onyx is equivocal; signifying, first, a precious stone or gem; and, secondly, a marble called in Greek onychites, which Pliny mentions as a stone of Caramania. Antiquity gave both these stones this name, because of their resemblance to the nail of the fingers. The onyx of the high-priest's pectoral was, no doubt, the gem onyx; the stone prepared by David was the marble onyx, or rather onychus; for one would hardly think that gems of any kind were used externally in such a building, but variegated marble may readily be admitted." Harris; Carpenter; Abbott.—Watson.

OPEN. God's eyes and ears being open denotes his exact observation of men's conduct, his regard to his people's case, and his readiness to answer their prayers, Neh. 1: 6. Jer. 32: 19. 1 Pet. 3: 12. His hands and treasures are opened when, by his power and goodness, he liberally confers favors on his creatures, Ps. 104: 28. Deut. 28: 12. God opens his armory when, in his providence, he raises armies, and furnishes them with weapons of war to execute his just wrath on sinners, Jer. 1: 25. He opens his lips against men when, by his word and providence, he, in a plain and powerful manner, convinces them of their guilt, Job 11: 5. He opens the heart when he enlightens the eye of the understanding to discern revealed truths, and thereby determines the will to receive Jesus and his salvation into the soul, Luke 24: 32—45. Acts 26: 18. 16: 14. He opens men's ears when he renders them attentive to his word and providence, Job 36: 10—15. He opens their lips when he gives them encouragement to pray, and reason to praise him; and by his Spirit gives a holy freedom in these exercises, Ps. 51: 15. Under the gospel, men with open face behold the glory of the Lord; they see divine truths clearly, and stripped of ceremonial veils, even as the sight of any thing in a glass is much more distinct and clear than to see them only by their shadows, 2 Cor. 3: 18.—Brown.

OPHEL; the name given to a part of mount Zion, rising higher than the rest; at the eastern extremity, near to the temple, and a little to the south of it, 2 Chron. 27: 3. Neh. 3: 26. 11: 21. It is also mentioned Mic. 4: 8, though our translators have rendered the words, "Thou, O tower of the flock," literally "tower of Ophel." It was naturally strong by its situation, and had a wall of its own, by which it was separated from the rest of Zion. Bishop Lowth's Notes on Isaiah 32: 14.—Jones.

OPHIR; a son of Joktan, whose descendants peopled the district between Mesha and Sephar, a mountain of the East, Gen. 10: 26, 30. Mesha is taken to be mount Masius in Mesopotamia; and Sephar the country of the Sepharvites, or Sapsires, which divided Media from Colchis.—Calmet.

OPHIR; a country much celebrated in Scripture, on account of the immense quantities of gold and precious stones which king Solomon imported from thence for the use of the temple, 1 Kings 9: 28. 10: 11. 2 Chron. 8: 18.

In the same direction with Ophir lay Tarshish; the voyage to both places being accomplished under one, and always, as it would seem, in the same space of time, three years; by which it may be inferred that, notwithstanding the imperfect navigation of the times, they must be at a considerable distance from the ports of Judea.

In what region of the earth we should search for the famous ports of Tarshish and Ophir, is an inquiry which has long exercised the industry of learned men. They were early supposed to be situated in some part of India, and the Jews were held to be one of the nations which traded with that country. But the opinion more generally adopted is, that Solomon's fleets, after passing the straits of Babelmandel, held their course along the south-east coast of Africa, as far as the kingdom of Sofala, a country celebrated for its rich mines of gold and silver, (from which it has been denominated the Golden Sofala, by Oriental writers,) and abounding in all the other articles which composed the cargoes of the Jewish ships. This opinion, which the accurate researches of M. D'Anville rendered highly probable, seems now to be established with the utmost certainty by a late learned traveller, Mr. Bruce; who by his knowledge of the monsoons in the Arabian gulf, and his attention to the ancient mode of navigation, both in that sea and along the African coast, has not only accounted for the extraordinary length of time which the fleets of Solomon took in going and returning, but has shown, from circumstances mentioned concerning the voyage, that it was not made to any place in India. See Dr. Robertson's Ancient India, p. 9; and the article TARSHISH.—Calmet; Watson; Jones.

OPHITES. (See SERPENTINIANS.)
OPHRAH; a city of Benjamin, Josh. 18: 23. 1 Sam. 13: 17. In the prophet Micah, (1: 10.) we have a temple mentioned as the house of Ophrah, where the paranomasia clearly points at dust, as the import of this name: "In the temple of Ophrah (dust) roll thyself in the dust." But this phrase might be adopted by the prophet, by reason of the similarity of sound, though not of sense, between the two words.—Calmet.

OPINION, is that judgment which the mind forms of any proposition, for the truth or falsehood of which there is not sufficient evidence to produce absolute belief.—Essay on the Formation of Opinions; Hend. Bock.

OPPRESSION, is the spoiling or taking away of men's property by constraint, terror, or force, without having any right thereto; working on the ignorance, weakness, or fearfulness of the oppressed. Men are guilty of oppression, when they offer violence to the bodies, property, or consciences of others; when they crush or overburden others, as the Egyptians did the Hebrews, Exod. 3: 9. There may be oppression which maligns the character, or studies to vex another, yet does not affect his life: as there is much persecution, for conscience' sake, which is not fatal, though distressing. God is the avenger of all oppression.—Calmet.

ORACLE, denotes something delivered by supernatural wisdom. The term is also used in the Old Testament to signify the most holy place from whence the Lord revealed his will to ancient Israel, 1 Kings 6: 5, 19—21, 23.

1. Divine Oracles.—When the word occurs in the plural number, as it mostly does, it denotes the revelations contained in the sacred writings, of which the nation of Israel were the depositaries. So Moses is said by Stephen to have received the "lively oracles" to give unto the Israelites. These oracles contained the law, both moral and ceremonial, with all the types and promises relating to the Messiah which are to be found in the writings of Moses. They also contained all the intimations of the divine mind which he was pleased to communicate by means of the succeeding prophets, who prophesied beforehand of the coming and of the sufferings of the Messiah, with the glory that should follow. The Jews were a highly-privileged people in many and various respects; (Rom. 9: 4, 5.) but the apostle Paul mentions it as their chief advantage that "unto them were committed the oracles of God," Rom. 3: 2. "What nation," says Moses,

"is there that hath statutes and judgments so righteous as all this law which I set before you this day?" Deut. 4: 8. The psalmist David enumerates their excellent properties under various epithets; such as the law of the Lord, his testimony, his statutes, his commandments, his judgments, &c. Their properties are extolled as perfect, sure, right, pure, clean, true, and righteous altogether; more to be desired than much fine gold; sweeter than honey and the honey-comb. Their salutary effects are also mentioned; such as their converting the soul, making wise the simple, rejoicing the heart, enlightening the eyes; and the keeping of them is connected with a great reward, Psalm 19. The hundred and nineteenth Psalm abounds with praises of the lively oracles, the word of the living God; it abounds with the warmest expressions of love to it, of delight in it, and the most fervent petitions for divine illumination in the knowledge of it. Such was the esteem and veneration which the faithful entertained for the lively oracles under the former dispensation, when they had only Moses and the prophets; how, then, ought they to be prized by Christians, who have also Christ and his apostles! See Irving on the Oracles of God.

II. Pagan Oracles.—Among the heathen, (where imposture supplied the place of revelation,) the term oracle is usually taken to signify an answer, generally couched in very dark and ambiguous terms, supposed to be given by demons of old, either by the mouths of their idols, or by those of their priests, to the people, who consulted them on things to come. Oracle is also used for the demon who gave the answer, and the place where it was given. Seneca defines oracles to be enunciations by the mouths of men of the will of the gods; and Cicero simply calls them, deorum oratio, the language of the gods. Among the pagans they were held in high estimation; and they were consulted on a variety of occasions, pertaining to national enterprises and private life. When they made peace or war, enacted laws, reformed states, or changed the constitution, they had in all these cases recourse to the oracle by public authority. Also, in private life, if a man wished to marry, if he proposed to take a journey, or to engage in any business of importance, he repaired to the oracle for counsel. Mankind have had always a propensity to explore futurity; and conceiving that future events were known to their gods, who possessed the gift of prophecy, they sought information and advice from the oracles, which, in their opinion, were supernatural and divine communications. The institution of oracles seemed to gratify the prevalent curiosity of mankind, and proved a source of immense wealth, as well as authority and influence, to those who had the command of them. Accordingly, every nation, in which idolatry has subsisted, had its oracles, by means of which imposture practised on superstition and credulity.

1. The principal oracles of antiquity are, that of Abæ, mentioned by Herodotus; that of Amphiaræus, at Oropus in Macedonia; that of the Branchidæ at Didymæum; that of the camps at Lacedæmon; that of Dodona; that of Jupiter Ammon; that of Nabarca, in the country of the Anariaci, near the Caspian sea; that of Trophonius, mentioned by Herodotus; that of Chrysopolis; that of Clarus, in Ionia; that of Amphiloehus at Mallos; that of Petarea; that of Pella in Macedonia; that of Phaselides in Cilicia; that of Sinope in Paphlagonia; that of Orpheus' head at Lesbos, mentioned by Philostatus. But of all oracles, the oracle of Apollo Pythius at Delphi was the most celebrated; this was consulted in the dernier resort by most of the princes of those ages.

2. Most of the pagan deities had their appropriate oracles. Apollo had the greatest number; such as those of Clarus, of the Branchidæ, of the suburbs of Daphne at Antioch, of Delos, of Argos, of Troas, Æolis, &c., of Baïæ in Italy, and others in Cilicia, in Egypt, in the Alps, in Thrace, at Corinth, in Arcadia, in Laconia, and in many other places enumerated by Van Dale. Jupiter, besides that of Dodona and some others, the honor of which he shared with Apollo, had one in Bœotia under the name of Jupiter the Thunderer, and another in Elis, one at Thebes and at Meroe, one near Antioch, and several others. Esculapius was consulted in Cilicia, at Apollonia, in the isle of Cos, at Epidaurus, Pergamus, Rome, and elsewhere. Mercury had oracles at Patras, upon Hæmon, and in other places; Mars, in Thrace, Egypt, and elsewhere; Hercules, at Cadiz, Athens, in Egypt, at Tivoli, in Mesopotamia, where he issued his oracles by dreams, whence he was called Somnialis. Isis, Osiris, and Serapis delivered in like manner their oracles by dreams, as we learn from Pausanias, Tacitus, Arrian, and other writers; that of Amphiloehus was also delivered by dreams; the ox Apis had also his oracle in Egypt. The gods, called Cabiri, had their oracle in Bœotia. Diana, the sister of Apollo, had several oracles in Egypt, Cilicia, Ephesus, &c. Those of Fortune at Præneste, and of the Lots at Antium, are well known. The fountains also delivered oracles, for to each of them a divinity was ascribed: such was the fountain of Castalia at Delphi, another of the same name in the suburbs of Antioch, and the prophetic fountain near the temple of Ceres in Achaia. Juno had several oracles: one near Corinth, one at Nysa, and others at different places. Latona had one at Butis in Egypt; Leucothea had one in Colchis; Mæmnon in Egypt; Machaon at Gerania in Laconia; Minerva had one in Egypt, in Spain, upon mount Ætna, at Mycenæ and Colchis, and in other places. Those of Neptune were at Delphos, at Calauria, near Neocesarea, and elsewhere. The nymphs had theirs in the cave of Corycia. Pan had several, the most famous of which was that in Arcadia. That of the Palici was in Sicily. Pluto had one at Nysa. Saturu had oracles in several places, but the most famous were those of Cumæ in Italy, and of Alexandria in Egypt. Those of Venus were dispersed in several places, at Gaza, upon mount Libanus, at Paphos, in Cyprus, &c. Serapis had one at Alexandria, consulted by Vespasian. Venus Aphacite had one at Aphaca, between Heliopolis and Byblus. Geryon, the three-headed monster, slain by Hercules, had an oracle in Italy near Padua, consulted by Tiberius; that of Hercules was at Tivoli, and was given by lots, like those at Præneste and Antium. The demi-gods and heroes had likewise their oracles; such were those of Castor and Pollux at Lacedæmon, of Amphiraus, of Mopsus in Cilicia, of Ulysses, Amphiloehus, Sarpedon in Troas, Hermione in Macedonia, Pasiphae in Laconia, Chalcas in Italy, Aristeus in Bœotia, Autolyceus at Sinope, Phryxus among the Colchi, Zamolxis among the Getæ, Hephæstion the minion of Alexander, and Antinous, &c. (See Gods.)

3. The responses of oracles were delivered in a variety of ways: at Delphi, they interpreted and put into verse what the priestess pronounced in the time of her furor. Mr. Bayle observes that at first this oracle gave its answers in verse; and that it fell at length to prose, upon people's beginning to laugh at the poorness of its versification. The Epicureans made this the subject of their jests, and said, in raillery, it was surprising enough, that Apollo, the god of poetry, should be a much worse poet than Homer, whom he himself had inspired. By the raileries of these philosophers, and particularly by the Cynics and Peripatetics, the priests were at length obliged to desist from the practice of versifying the responses of the Pythia, which, according to Plutarch, was one of the principal causes of the declension of the oracle of Delphos. At the oracle of Ammon, the priests pronounced the response of their god; at Dolona, the response was issued from the hollow of an oak; at the cave of Trophonius, the oracle was inferred from what the suppliant said before he recovered his senses; at Memphis, they drew a good or bad omen, according as the ox Apis received or rejected what was presented to him, which was also the case with the fishes of the fountain of Lymyra. The suppliants who consulted the oracles were not allowed to enter the sanctuaries where they were given; and, accordingly, care was taken that neither the Epicureans nor Christians should come near them. In several places, the oracles were given by letters sealed up, as in that of Mopsus, and at Mallus in Cilicia. Oracles were frequently given by lot, the mode of doing which was as follows: the lots were a kind of dice, on which were engraven certain characters or words, whose explanations they were to seek on tables made for the purpose. The way of using these dice for knowing futurity was different, according to the places where they were used. In some temples, the person threw them himself; in others, they were dropped from a box; whence came the proverbial expression, "the lot is fallen." This playing with dice was always preceded by sacrifices and other customary ceremonies. The ambiguity of the oracles in their responses, and their double meaning, contributed to their support.

4. Ablancourt observes that the study or research of the meaning of oracles was but a fruitless thing; and that they were never understood till after their accomplishment. Historians relate, that Cræsus was tricked by the ambiguity and equivocation of the oracle.

That delivered to Pyrrhus, which is comprised in this Latin verse, had the same advantage; for, according to the rules of syntax, either of the two accusatives may be governed by the verb, and the verse be explained, either by saying the Romans shall conquer the Æacidae, of whom Pyrrhus was descended, or those shall conquer the Romans. When Alexander fell sick at Babylon, some of his courtiers who happened to be in Egypt, or who went thither on purpose, passed the night in the temple of Serapis, to inquire if it would not be proper to bring Alexander to be cured by him. The god answered, it was better that Alexander should remain where he was. This in all events was a very prudent and safe answer. If the king recovered his health, what glory must Scrapis have gained by saving him the fatigue of his journey! If he died, it was but saying he died in a favorable juncture after so many conquests; which, had he lived, he could neither have enlarged nor preserved. This is actually the construction they put upon the response; whereas had Alexander undertaken the journey, and died in the temple, or by the way, nothing could have been said in favor of Serapis. When Trajan had formed the design of his expedition against the Parthians, he was advised to consult the oracle of Heliopolis, to which he had no more to do but send a note under a seal. That prince, who had no great faith in oracles, sent thither a blank note; and they returned him another of the same kind. By this Trajan was convinced of the divinity of the oracle! He sent back a second note to the god, in which he inquired whether he should return to Rome after finishing the war he had in view. The god, as Macrobius tells the story, ordered a vine, which was among the offerings of his temple, to be divided into pieces, and brought to Trajan. The event justified the oracle; for the emperor dying in that war, his bones were carried to Rome, which had been represented by that broken vine. As the priests of that oracle knew Trajan's design, which was no secret, they happily devised that response, which, in all events, was capable of a favorable interpretation, whether he routed and cut the Parthians in pieces, or if his army met with the same fate. Sometimes the responses of the oracles were mere banter, as in the case of the man who wished to know by what means he might become rich, and who received for answer from the god, that he had only to make himself master of all that lay between Sicyon and Corinth. Another, wanting a cure for the gout, was answered by the oracle, that he was to drink nothing but cold water.

"Credo equidem Æacidas Romanos vincere posse,"

5. There are two points in dispute on the subject of oracles; namely, whether they were human, or diabolical machines; and whether or not they ceased upon the publication or preaching of the gospel. Most of the fathers of the church, it is said, supposed that the devil issued oracles; and looked on it as a pleasure he took to give dubious and equivocal answers, in order to have a handle to laugh at them. Vossius allows that it was the devil who spoke in oracles; but thinks that the obscurity of his answers was owing to his ignorance as to the precise circumstances of events.

Father Balthus, a Jesuit, wrote a treatise in defence of the fathers with regard to the origin of oracles; but without denying the imposture of the priests often blended with the oracles. Dr. Middleton, in his "Examination," &c., thinks himself warranted to pronounce from the authority of the best and wisest of the heathens themselves, and the evidence of plain facts, which are recorded of those oracles, as well as from the nature of the thing itself, that they were all mere imposture, wholly invented and supported by human craft, without any supernatural aid or interposition whatsoever. He alleges, that Cicero, speaking of the Delphic oracle, the most revered of any in the heathen world, declares, that nothing was become more contemptible, not only in his days, but long before him; that Demosthenes, who lived about three hundred years earlier, affirmed of the same oracle, in a public speech to the people of Athens, that it was gained to the interests of king Philip, an enemy to that city; that the Greek historians tell us how, on several other occasions, it had been corrupted by money, to serve the views of particular persons and parties, and the prophetess sometimes had been deposed for bribery and lewdness; that there were some great sects of philosophers, who, on principle, disavowed the authority of all oracles; y agreeably to all which Strabo tells us, that divination in general and oracles had been in high credit among the ancients, but in his days were treated with much contempt; lastly, that Eusebius also, the great historian of the primitive church, declares, that there were six hundred writers among the heathens themselves who had publicly written against the reality of them.

Plutarch alleges two reasons for the ceasing of oracles: the one was Apollo's chagrin; who, it seems, took it in dudgeon to be interrogated about so many trifles. The other was, that in proportion as the genii, or demons, who had the management of the oracles, died, and became extinct, the oracles must necessarily cease. He adds a third and more natural cause for the ceasing of oracles; namely, the forlorn state of Greece, ruined and desolated by wars; for, hence, the smallness of the gains let the priests sink into a poverty and contempt too bare to cover the fraud. That the oracles were silenced about or soon after the time of our Savior's advent, may be proved, says Dr. Leland, in the first volume of his learned work on "The Necessity and Advantage of Revelation," &c., from express testimonies, not only of Christian but of heathen authors. Lucan, who wrote his "Pharsalia" in the reign of Nero, scarcely thirty years after our Lord's crucifixion, laments it as one of the greatest misfortunes of that age, that the Delphian oracle, which he represents as one of the choicest gifts of the gods, was become silent. In like manner, Juvenal says,

*Delphis oracula cessant,
Et genus humanum damnat caligo futuri.*
Sat. vi. 554.

"Since Delphi now, if we may credit fame,
Gives no responses, and a long dark night
Conceals the future hour from mortal sight."
Gifford.

Lucian says, that when he was at Delphi, the oracle gave no answer, nor was the priestess inspired. This likewise appears from Plutarch's treatise, why the oracles cease to give answers, already cited; whence it is also manifest, that the most learned heathens were very much at a loss how to give a tolerable account of it. Porphyry, in a passage cited from him by Eusebius, says, "the city of Rome was overrun with sickness, Æsculapius and the rest of the gods having withdrawn their converse with men; because since Jesus began to be worshipped, no man had received any public help or benefit from the gods."

6. With respect to the origin of pagan oracles, they were probably imitations, first, of the answers given to the holy patriarchs from the divine presence or Shechinah, and secondly, of the responses to the Jewish high-priest from the mercy-seat: for all paganism is a parody of the true religion.

ORAL; delivered by the mouth; not written. (See TRADITION.)—Hend. Buck.

ORANGEMEN; the name given by the Irish Catholics to their Protestant countrymen, on account of their adherence to the house of Orange.—Hend. Buck.

ORATORY; a name given by Christians to certain places of religious worship.

In ecclesiastical antiquity, the term oikoi eukterioi, houses of prayer, or oratories, is frequently given to churches in general, of which there are innumerable instances in ancient Christian writers. But in some canons the name oratory seems confined to private chapels, or places of worship set up for the convenience of private families, yet still depending on the parochial churches, and differing from them in this, that they were only places of prayer, but not for celebrating the communion; for if that were at any time allowed to private families, yet, at least upon the great and solemn festivals, they were to resort for communion to the parish churches.

Oratory is used among the Romanists for a closet, or little apartment near a bedchamber, furnished with a little altar, crucifix, &c. for private devotion.—Hend. Buck.

ORATORY, PRIESTS OF THE. There were two bodies of these; one in Italy, the other in France.

The Priests of the Oratory in Italy had for their founder St. Philip de Neri, a native of Florence, who, in the year 1548, founded at Rome the confraternity of the Holy Trinity. This society originally consisted of but fifteen poor persons, who assembled in the church of St. Saviour, every first Sunday in the month, to practise the exercises of piety described by the holy founder. Afterwards their number increasing by the addition of several persons of distinction to the society, St. Philip proceeded to establish a hospital for the reception of poor pilgrims, who, coming to Rome to visit the tombs of St. Peter and St. Paul, were obliged, for want of a lodging, to lie in the streets and at the doors of churches. For this purpose, pope Paul IV. gave to the society the parochial church of St. Benedict, close by which was built an hospital so large, that in the jubilee year 1600, it received four hundred and forty-four thousand five hundred men, and twenty-five thousand five hundred women, who came in pilgrimage to Rome.

The Priests of the Oratory in France were established on the model of those in Italy, and owe their rise to cardinal Berulle, a native of Champagne, who resolved upon this foundation in order to revive the splendor of the ecclesiastical state, which was greatly sunk through the miseries of the civil wars, the increase of heresies, and a general corruption of manners. To this end he assembled a community of ecclesiastics, in 1611, in the suburb of St. James. They obtained the king's letter patent for their establishment; and, in 1613, pope Paul V. approved this congregation, under the title of the Oratory of Jesus.

This congregation consisted of two sorts of persons; the one, as it were, incorporated; the other only associates; the former governed the houses of this institute; the latter were only employed in forming themselves to the life and manners of ecclesiastics. And this was the true spirit of this congregation, in which they taught neither human learning nor theology, but only the virtues of the ecclesiastical life. It nevertheless contained the philosopher Malebranche, the orientalist Morin, and the celebrated critic, Richard Simon.—Hend. Buck.

ORDER; method; the regular process of performing a thing. Nothing can be more beautiful in religion and morals than order. The neglect of it exposes us to the inroads of vice, and often brings upon us the most perplexing events. Whether we consider it in reference to ourselves, our families, or the church, it is of the greatest importance.

As to the first, order should be attended to as it respects our principles, (Heb. 13: 9. James 1: 8.) our tempers, (Prov. 17: 14. Eph. 4: 31.) our conversation, (Col. 4: 6.) our business, (Prov. 22: 29.) our time, (Ps. 90: 12. Eccles. 3: 1.) our recreations, and our general conduct, Phil. 1: 27. 2 Pet. 1: 5, &c.

2. As it regards our families, there should be order as to the economy or management of its concerns, (Matt. 12: 25.) as to devotion, and the time of it, (Jos. 24: 15.) as to the instruction thereof, Eph. 6: 1. Gen. 18: 19. 2 Tim. 1: 5.

3. In respect to the church, order should be observed as to the admission of members, (2 Cor. 6: 15.) as to the administration of its ordinances, (1 Cor. 14: 33, 40.) as to the attendance on its worship, (Ps. 27: 4.) as to our behavior therein, Col. 1: 10. Matt. 5: 16.

To excite us to the practice of this duty, we should consider that God is a God of order; (1 Cor. 14: 33.) his works are all in the exactest order; (Eph. 1: 11. Ps. 104: 25. Eccl. 3: 11.) heaven is a place of order, Rev. 7: 9. Jesus Christ was a most beautiful example of regularity. The advantages of order are numerous. "The observance of it," says Dr. Blair, "serves to correct that negligence which makes us omit some duties, and that hurry and precipitancy which makes us perform others imperfectly. Our attention is thereby directed to its proper objects. We follow the straight path which Providence has pointed out to us; in the course of which all the different business of life presents itself regularly to us on every side." Ser., vol. ii. p. 23; Works of Hannah More.—Hend. Buck.

ORDERS, by way of eminency, or holy orders, denote a character peculiar to ecclesiastics, whereby they are set apart for the ministry. This the Romanists make their sixth sacrament. In no reformed church are there more than three orders, viz., bishops, priests, and deacons. In the Romish church there are seven, exclusive of the episcopate; all which the council of Trent enjoins to be received and believed on pain of anathema. They are distinguished into petty or secular orders, and major or sacred orders. Orders, the petty or minor, are four, viz., those of door-keepers, exorcist, reader, and acolyth. Sacred, or major, are deacon, priest, and bishop.—Hend. Buck.

ORDERS, (RELIGIOUS), are congregations or societies of monasteries, living under the same superior, in the same manner, and wearing the same habit. Religious orders may be reduced to five kinds, viz., monks, canons, knights, mendicants, and regular clerks. White order denotes the order of regular canons of St. Augustine. Black order denotes the order of St. Benedict. Orders, religious military, are those instituted in defence of the faith, and privileged to say mass, and who are prohibited marriage, &c. Of this kind are the knights of Malta, or of St. John of Jerusalem. Such also were the knights templars, the knights of Calatrave, of St. Lazarus, Teutonic knights, &c.—Hend. Buck.

ORDINANCE; an institution established by lawful authority. Religious ordinances must be instituted by the great institutor of religion, or they are not binding; minor regulations are not properly ordinances. Ordinances once established are not to be varied by human caprice, or mutability.

Human ordinances, established by national laws, may be varied by other laws, because the inconveniences arising from them can only be determined by experience. Yet Christians are bound to submit to these institutions, when they do not infringe on those established by divine authority; not only from the consideration, that if every individual were to oppose national institutions, no society could subsist; but by the tenor of Scripture itself. Nevertheless, Christianity does not interfere with political rights, but leaves individuals, as well as nations, in full enjoyment of whatever advantages the constitution of a country secures to its subjects.

The course of nature is the ordinance of God; its laws are but "the ordinances of heaven;" and every planet obeys that impulse which the divine Governor has impressed on it, Jer. 31: 36.—Calmet.

ORDINANCES OF THE GOSPEL, are institutions of divine authority relating to the worship of God; such as baptism, Matt. 28: 19. 2. The Lord's supper, 1 Cor. 11: 24, &c. 3. Public ministry, or preaching and reading the word, Rom. 10: 15. Eph. 4: 13. Mark 16: 15. 4. Hearing the gospel, Mark 4: 24. Rom. 10: 17. 5. Public prayer, 1 Cor. 14: 15, 19. Matt. 6: 6. Ps. 5: 1, 7. 6. Singing of psalms, Col. 3: 16. Eph. 5: 19. 7. Fasting, James 4: 9. Matt. 5: 15. Joel 2: 12. 8. Solemn thanksgiving, Ps. 50: 14. 1 Thess. 5: 18. See these different articles; also MEANS OF GRACE.—Hend. Buck.

ORDINARY; in the common and canon law, one who has ordinary or immediate jurisdiction in ecclesiastical matters. In England, the bishop of the diocese is commonly the ordinary. The ordinary of assizes and sessions was formerly a deputy of the bishop, appointed to give malefactors the neck-verse; i. e. the verse which was read by a party to entitle him to the benefit of clergy. The ordinary of Newgate is a clergyman who attends on condemned culprits.—Hend. Buck.

ORDINATION; the act of conferring holy orders; of initiating a person into the ministry, or of publicly recognising the relation which has been entered into, by mutual agreement, between a minister and a church.

In the church of England, ordination has always been esteemed the principal prerogative of bishops, and they still retain the function as a mark of their spiritual sovereignty in their diocese. Without ordination, no person can receive any benefice, parsonage, vicarage, &c. A person must be twenty-three years of age before he can be ordained deacon, or have any share in the ministry; and twenty-four before he can be ordained priest, and by that means be permitted to administer the holy communion. A bishop, on the ordination of clergymen, is to examine them in the presence of the ministers, who, in the ordination of priests, but not of deacons, assist him at the imposition of hands; but this is only done as a mark of assent, not because it is thought necessary. In case any crime, as drunkenness, perjury, forgery, &c., is alleged against any one that is to be ordained either priest or deacon, the bishop ought to desist from ordaining him. The person to be ordained is to bring a testimonial of his life and doctrine to the bishop, and to give account of his faith in Latin; and both priests and deacons are obliged to subscribe to the thirty-nine articles. In the Romish discipline there was no such thing as a vague and absolute ordination; but every one was to have a church, whereof he was to be ordained clerk or priest. In the twelfth century they grew more remiss, and ordained without any title or benefice. The council of Trent, however, restored the ancient discipline, and appointed that none should be ordained but those who were provided with a benefice; which practice still obtains in England. The times of ordination are the four Sundays immediately following the Ember weeks; being the second Sunday in Lent, Trinity Sunday, and the Sundays following the first Wednesday after September 14, and December 13. These are the stated times; but ordination may take place at any other time, according to the discretion of the bishop, or circumstances of the case.

2. The reformed generally held the call of the people the only thing essential to the validity of the ministry; and teach that ordination is only a ceremony, which renders the call more august and authentic. Accordingly the Protestant churches of Scotland, France, Holland, Switzerland, Germany, Poland, Hungary, Denmark, &c. have no episcopal ordination. For Luther, Calvin, Bucer, Melancthon, &c., and all the first reformers and founders of these churches, who ordained ministers among them, were themselves presbyters, and no other. And though in some of these churches there are ministers called superintendents, or bishops, yet these are only primi inter pares, the first among equals; not pretending to any superiority of orders. Having themselves no other orders than what either presbyters gave them, or what was given them as presbyters, they can convey no other to those they ordain. On this ground the Protestant Dissenters plead that their ordination, though not episcopal, is the same with that of all the illustrious Protestant churches abroad; and object, that a priest ordained by a popish bishop should be received into the church of England as a valid minister, rightfully ordained; whilst the orders of another, ordained by the most learned religious presbyter which any foreign country can boast, are pronounced not valid, and he is required to submit to be ordained afresh. In opposition to episcopal ordination, they urge that Timothy was ordained by the laying on of the hands of the presbytery; (1 Tim. 4: 14.) that Paul and Barnabas were ordained by certain prophets and teachers in the church of Antioch, and not by any bishop presiding in that city; (Acts 13: 1—3.) and that it is a well-known fact, that presbyters in the church of Alexandria ordained even their own bishops for more than two hundred years in the earliest ages of Christianity. They farther argue, that bishops and presbyters are in Scripture the same, and not denominations of distinct orders or offices in the church, referring to Philip. 1:

1. Tit. 1: 5, 7. Acts 20: 27, 28. 1 Pet. 5: 1, 2. To the same purpose they maintain that the superiority of bishops to presbyters is not pretended to be of divine, but of human, institution; not grounded on Scripture, but only upon the custom or ordinances of this realm, by the first reformers and founders of the church of England; nor by many of the most learned and eminent doctors since. See Stillingfleet's Irenicum, in which the learned author affirms and shows this to be the sentiment of Cramer, and other chief reformers both in Edward VI. and queen Elizabeth's reign, of archbishop Whitgift, bishop Bridges, Lee, Hooker, Sutcliff, Hales, Chillingworth, &c. Moreover, the book entitled the "Institution of a Christian Man," subscribed by the clergy in convocation, and confirmed by parliament, owns bishops and presbyters by Scripture to be the same. Besides, the Protestant Dissenters think it strange, that the validity of orders and ministrations should be derived, as some have contended, from a succession of popish bishops; bishops of a church, which, by the definition of the nineteenth article of the church of England, can be no part of the true visible church of Christ, and bishops, likewise, who consider the Protestant clergy, although ordained by Protestant bishops, as mere common unconsecrated laymen.

3. Among dissenters, ordinations vary. In the establishment of Scotland, where there are no bishops, the power of ordination is lodged in the presbytery. Among the Wesleyan Methodists, the ordination of their ministers is in the annual conference, with a president at its head, and is by prayer without imposition of hands. Among the Calvinistic Methodists, ordination is performed by the sanction and assistance of their own ministers. Among the Independents and Baptists, the power of ordination lies in the suffrage of the people. The qualifications of the candidate are first known, tried, and approved by the church. After which trial, the church proceeds to give him a call to the ministry; which he accepting, the public acknowledgment thereof is signified by ordination, the mode of which is so well known as not to need recital here.

4. Though the dissenters practise ordination, we find they are not agreed respecting it. Some contend for the power of ordination as belonging to the people; the exercise of which right by them constitutes a minister, and confers validity on his public ministrations. Others suppose it belongs to those who are already in office. We shall here give an outline of the arguments on both sides. According to the former opinion, it is argued that the word ordain was originally equal to choose or appoint; so that if twenty Christians nominated a man to instruct them once, the man was appointed or ordained a preacher for the time. The essence of ordination lies in the voluntary choice and call of the people, and in the voluntary acceptance of that call by the person chosen and called; for this affair must be by mutual consent and agreement, which joins them together as pastor and people. And this is to be done among themselves; and public ordination, so called, is no other than a declaration of that Election and ordination are spoken of as the same; the latter is expressed and explained by the former. It is said of Christ, that he ordained twelve; (Mark 3: 14.) that is, he chose them to the office of apostleship, as he himself explains it, John 6: 70. Paul and Barnabas are said to ordain elders in every church, (Acts 14: 23.) or to choose them; that is, they gave orders and directions to every church as to the choice of elders over them: for sometimes persons are said to do that which they give orders and directions for doing; as Moses and Solomon, with respect to building the tabernacle and temple, though done by others; and Moses particularly is said to choose the judges, (Exod. 18: 25.) the choice being made under his direction and guidance. The word that is used in Acts 14: 23, is translated chosen in Cor. 2: 8, 19, where the apostle speaks of a brother, (chéirotônêis), who was chosen of the churches to travel with us, and is so rendered when ascribed to God, Acts 10: 41. This choice and ordination, in primitive times, was made two ways; by casting lots and giving votes, signified by stretching out of hands. Matthias was chosen and ordained to be an apostle in the room of Judas by casting lots: that, being an extraordinary office, required an immediate interposition of the Divine Being, a lot being nothing more nor less than an appeal to God for the decision of an affair. But ordinary officers, as elders and pastors of churches, were chosen and ordained by the votes of the people, expressed by stretching out their hands; thus it is said of the apostles: (Acts 14: 23.) When they had ordained them elders in every church, (cheirotoneōsantes;) by taking the suffrages and votes of the members of the churches, shown by the stretching out of their hands, as the word signifies; and which they directed them to, and upon it declared the elders duly elected and ordained.

Some, however, on this side of the question, do not go so far as to say, that the essence of ordination lies in the choice of the people, but in the solemn and public separation to office by prayer: still, however, they think that ordination by either bishops, presbyters, or any superior character, need not be necessary to make a minister or ordain a pastor in any particular church; for Jesus Christ, say they, would never leave the subsistence of his churches, or the efficacy of his word and sacraments, to depend on the uninterrupted succession of any office or officer; for then it would be impossible for any church to know whether they ever have had any authentic minister; for we could never be assured that such ordinations had been rightly transmitted through seventeen hundred years. A whole nation might be corrupted, and every bishop and elder therein might have apostatized from the faith, as it was in England, in the days of popery. To say, therefore, that the right of ordaining lies in men who are already in office, would drive us to hold the above-mentioned untenable position of uninterrupted succession.

On the other side it is observed, that, although Christians have the liberty of choosing their own pastor, yet they have no power or right to confer the office itself. Scripture represents ordination to be the setting apart of a person to the holy ministry, by the authority of Jesus himself acting by the medium of men in office; and this solemn investing act is necessary to his being lawfully accounted a minister of Christ. The original word (Acts 6: 3) is katastēsomen, which, according to Scapula, and the best writers on the sacred language, signifies to put one in rule, or to give him authority. Now, did this power lodge in the people, how happens it that in all the epistles, not a single word is to be found giving them any directions about constituting ministers? On the other hand, in the epistles to Timothy and Titus, who were persons in office, we find particular instruction given them to lay hands suddenly on no man, to examine his qualifications before they ordain him, and to take care that they commit the office only to faithful men, who shall be able to teach others also, Tit. 1: 5. 2 Tim. 4: 14. Acts 14: 23. Besides, it is said, the primitive Christians evidently viewed this matter in the same light. There is scarcely a single ecclesiastical writer that does not expressly mention ordination as the work of the elders, and as being regarded as a distinct thing from the choice of the people, and subsequent to it.

Most of the foregoing remarks apply chiefly to the supposition that a person cannot be ordained in any other way than as a pastor over a church. But here, also, we find a difference of opinion.

On the one side it is said, that there is no Scripture authority whatever for a person being ordained without being chosen or nominated to the office of a minister by a church. Elders and bishops were ordained in every church, not without any church. To ordain a man originally, says Dr. Campbell, was nothing else but in a solemn manner to assign him a pastoral charge. To give him no charge, and not to ordain him, were perfectly identical.

On the other side it is contended, that from these words, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature; and, lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world," it is evident that missionaries and itinerants must be employed in the important work of the ministry; that as such cannot be ordained over any particular church, there cannot be the least impropriety in ordaining them for the church universal. Allowing that they have all those talents, gifts, and grace, that constitute a minister in the sight of God, who will dare say they should not be designated by their brethren for the administration of those ordinances Christ has appointed in the church? Without allowing this, how many thousands would be destitute of these ordinances? Besides, these are the very men whom God in general honors as the first instruments in raising churches, over which stated pastors are afterwards fixed. The separation of Saul and Barnabas, say they, was an ordination to missionary work, including the administration of sacraments to the converted heathen, as well as public instruction, Acts 13: 1, 3. So Timothy was ordained; (1 Tim. 4: 14. Acts 16: 3.) and there is equal reason, by analogy, to suppose that Titus and other companions of Paul were similarly ordained, without any of them having a particular church to take under his pastoral care. So that they appear to have been ordained to the work of the Christian ministry at large.

On the supposition, however, that they are instrumental in forming a Christian church, they have no right to assume the pastoral office without the consent of the members; and in order to their sustaining that office scripturally, they must be publicly recognised and designated to it. Their original designation did not, and could not invest them with any such office. It merely recognised their appointment to the missionary work generally.

When the pastor of a church resigns his charge, his pastoral relation and character to all intents and purposes ceases. He cannot with the smallest degree of reason or consistency go to any other church, and claim to exercise the pastoral functions among them, (they consenting thereto,) on the ground that he had been publicly ordained to the office over the church which he had left. The case is quite parallel with that of the matrimonial connexion. Because a man has been once married, he is not on this ground to imagine that he may lawfully cohabit with another woman, without previously having the marriage relationship between them recognised. The notion of an indelible official character derived from ordination to the pastoral functions, is a relic of that corruption of primitive truth and simplicity, which for ages overspread the Christian world, and from which we still are far from being delivered by the Protestant Reformation, and the light which has been thrown on such subjects since that important epoch. ORIENTAL PHILOSOPHY. The system which endeavors to explain the nature and origin of all things by the principle of emanation from an eternal fountain of being. (See MAGI.)

Those who professed to believe the Oriental philosophy, were divided into three leading sects, which were subdivided into others. Some imagined two eternal principles, from whence all things proceeded: the one presiding over light, the other over matter; and, by their perpetual conflict, explaining the mixture of good and evil that appears in the universe. Others maintained, that the being which presided over matter was not an eternal principle, but a subordinate intelligence; one of those which the Supreme God produced. They supposed, that this being was moved by a sudden impulse to reduce to order the rude mass of matter which lay excluded from the mansions of the Deity, and at last to create the human race. A third sect entertained the idea of a triumvirate of beings, in which the Supreme Deity was distinguished both from the material evil principle, and from the Creator of this sublunary world.

From blending the doctrines of the Oriental philosophy with Christianity, the Gnostic sects, which were so numerous in the first centuries, derive their origin. Other denominations arose, which aimed to unite Judaism with Christianity. Many of the pagan philosophers, who were converted to the Christian religion, exerted all their art and ingenuity to accommodate the doctrines of the gospel to their own schemes of philosophy. In each age of the church new systems were introduced, till, in process of time, we find the Christian world divided into that variety of heretical sentiment which is exhibited in these pages. Mosheim's Ecl. Hist., vol. ii. pp. 83—85; Enfield's Philos., vol. ii. pp. 136—140.—Williams.

ORIGEN, one of the fathers of the church, was born, in 185, at Alexandria, and studied philosophy under Ammonius, and theology under Clemens Alexandrianus. Being persecuted by his diocesan Demetrius, he went to Cæsarea, and afterwards to Athens. During the persecution of Decius, he was imprisoned and tortured. He died in 253. His great works are, the Hexapla; Commentaries on the Scriptures; and a treatise against Celsus. (See next article.)—Davenport.

ORIGENISTS; the professed followers of Origen, a Christian father of the second century, a man of great talents, and a most indefatigable student; but having a strong attachment to the Platonic philosophy, and a natural turn to mystical and allegorical interpretations, he thereby greatly corrupted the simplicity of the gospel. Three circumstances, however, render it very difficult to ascertain exactly what his real sentiments were. 1. Being a man of unquestionable talents and high character, his genuine works were interpolated, and others written under his name, in order to forge his sanction to sentiments, of which possibly he never heard. 2. There was another Origen in the following age, (Lardner's Credibility, part ii. vol. iii.) of a much inferior fame, a disciple of Ammonias Saccas, (see AMMONIANS,) and possibly the true founder of this sect, which certainly did not arise till after the death of the first Origen. 3. Origen had many enemies, who probably attributed to him various things which he did not believe, in order either to injure his fame or bring his character under censure. The following are, however, the sentiments attributed to this sect, some of which were unquestionably held by him, though others were, no doubt, superadded, either by mistake or design.

1. A pre-existent state of human souls, prior to the Mosaic creation, and perhaps from eternity; which souls were clothed with ethereal bodies suited to their original dignity. (See PRE-EXISTENTS.)

2. That souls were condemned to animate mortal bodies, in order to expiate faults they had committed in a pre-existent state; for no other supposition appeared to him sufficient to account for their residence in these gross material bodies. See John 9: 2, 3.

3. That the soul of Christ was created before the beginning of the world, and united to the Divine Word in a state of pristine glory. See Phil. 2: 5—7. This text, he thought, must be understood of Christ's human soul, because it is unusual to propound the Deity as an example of humility in Scripture.

4. That at the resurrection mankind will be again clothed with ethereal bodies: for the elements of our terrestrial composition are such as most fatally entangle us in vice, passion, and misery. The purer the vehicle the soul is united with, the more perfect is her life and operations. Besides, he who made all things assures us, he made them good at first; and, therefore, his recovery of us to our lost happiness (which is the design of the gospel) must restore us to far better bodies. See 1 Cor. 15: 42. 2 Cor. 5: 1.

5. That after long periods of time, the damned themselves shall be released from their torments, and restored to a new state of probation: for the Deity has such reserves in his gracious providence, as will vindicate his sovereign goodness and wisdom from all disparagement. Though sin has extinguished, or silenced the divine life, yet it has not destroyed the faculties of reason and understanding, consideration and memory, which will serve the life which is most powerful. If, therefore, the vigorous attraction of the sensual nature be abated by a ceaseless pain, these powers may resume the seeds of a better life and nature. (See UNIVERSAL RESTORATIONISTS.)

6. That the earth, after its conflagration, shall become habitable again, and be the mansion of men and other animals, and that in eternal vicissitudes. See Heb. 1: 10—12, where, speaking both of the heavens and earth, the inspired writer says, "as a vesture shalt thou change them, and they shall be changed," &c. The fashion of the world passes away like a turning scene, to exhibit a fresh and new representation of things; and if only the present dress and appearance of things go off, the substance is supposed to remain entire. (See MILLENNIARISMS.)

Origen is also charged with Arianism; and it must be acknowledged, that his expressions were not always correct: yet the orthodox will by no means give him up, but impute those expressions, either to the corruption of heretics, or to his unhappy defect of judgment. "Had the justice of his judgment (says Mosheim) been equal to the immensity of his genius, the fervor of his piety, his indefatigable patience, his extensive erudition, and his other eminent and superior talents, all encomium must have fallen short of his merits." *Mosheim's Ecl. ORIGINAL SIN. (See FALL; SIN.)

ORIGIN OF EVIL. (See SIN.)

ORION; a constellation in the heavens just before the sign Taurus. Chehil signifies, according to the ancient Hebrews, that star of the second magnitude which astronomers call the scorpion's heart. It appears at the beginning of the autumnal equinox, and forebodes cold or frost. Virgil calls it Nimbus Orion. It also marks the west. Hence the LXX. on Job 9: 9, and Theodotion on Amos 5: 8, translate it vesperum.—Calmet.

ORMUZD; the good principle of the Magi, whose symbol was light, and who was the author of all good. (See MAGI).—Hend. Buck.

OROBIO, (Dr. ISAAC;) a learned Spanish physician, who being maliciously accused of Judaism by a Moorish servant, was seized by the papal inquisition, and after being imprisoned three years, was subjected to six different modes of most exquisite torture. These may be found at large described by Fox, in his Book of Martyrs. Orobio lay seventy days before his wounds were healed. He was afterwards banished, and in his exile wrote and published an account of his sufferings.—Fox, p. 137.

OROSIUS, (PAUL,) a Spanish ecclesiastic of the fifth century, was born at Tarragona, and was a disciple of St. Augustine. The place and time of his decease are unknown. His chief work is a History of Human Calamities, in seven books, which was written at the request of St. Augustine, and has had the honor of being translated by Alfred the Great.—Davenport.

ORPAH; a Maabite, wife of Hilon, son of Elimelech and Naomi. (See RUTH).—Calmet.

ORPHAN. The customary acceptance of the word orphans, is well known to be that of "children deprived of their parents;" but the force of the Greek word orphanos, (rendered comfortless in our translation, John 14: 18.) implies the case of those who have lost some dear protecting friend; some patron, though not strictly a father: and in this sense it is used, 1 Thess. 2: 17: "We also, brethren, being taken away from our care over you," aporphanistheutes. Corresponding to this import of the word, it might be used by our Lord in the passage of John's gospel.—Calmet.

ORTHODOXY; (from orthos, right, and doxa, opinion;) soundness of doctrine or opinion in matters of religion. The doctrines which are generally considered as orthodox among us, are such as were generally professed at the time of the Reformation, viz. the fall of man, regeneration, atonement, repentance, justification by free grace, &c.

Some have thought that, in order to keep error out of the church, there should be some human form as a standard of orthodoxy, wherein certain disputed doctrines shall be expressed in such determinate phrases as may be directly levelled against such errors as shall prevail from time to time, requiring those especially who are to be public teachers in the church to subscribe or virtually to declare their assent to such formularies. But, as Dr. Doddridge observes, 1. Had this been requisite, it is probable that the Scriptures would have given us some such formularies as these, or some directions as to the manner in which they should be drawn up, proposed, and received.

2. It is impossible that weak and passionate men, who have perhaps been heated in the very controversy thus decided, should express themselves with greater propriety than the apostles did. 3. It is plain, in fact, that this practice has been the cause of great contention in the Christian church, and such formularies have been the grand engine of dividing it, in proportion to the degree in which they have been multiplied and urged. 4. This is laying a great temptation in the way of such as desire to undertake the office of teachers in the church, and will be most likely to deter and afflict those who have the greatest tenderness of conscience, and therefore (being equal in other respects) best deserve encouragement. 5. It is not likely to answer the end proposed, viz. the preserving an uniformity of opinion; since persons of little integrity may satisfy their consciences, in subscribing what they do not at all believe as articles of peace, or in putting the most unnatural sense on the words. And whereas, in answer to all these inconveniences, it is pleaded, that such forms are necessary to keep the church from heresy, and it is better there should be some hypocrites under such forms of orthodoxy, than that a freedom of debate and opinion should be allowed to all teachers; the answer is plain, that when any one begins to preach doctrines which appear to those who attend upon him dangerous and subversive of Christianity, it will be time enough to proceed to such animadversion as the nature of his error in their apprehension will require, and his relation to them will admit. These remarks however are not applicable to the use of simple confessions or declarations of faith, the object of which is to ascertain and promote Christian fellowship. The design of these is of course only to state the sense in which we interpret and understand the word of God. ORTLIBENSES; an heretical branch of the ancient Waldenses, who denied the Trinity and the resurrection, and were evidently grossly ignorant of the Scriptures. Broughton's Dict., from Gilles's History of the Waldenses.—Williams.

ORTON, (JOB,) author of the "Exposition of the Old Testament," was born at Shrewsbury, in 1717. To his parents, who were the patrons of piety and good men, he was indebted for early instruction in the Christian faith, and imbibed from them the principles of pure religion. In his native town, he acquired a considerable portion of classical learning. In his sixteenth year, he was put under the tuition of Dr. Charles Owen, of Warrington, who had usually with him a few young men designed for the work of the ministry. In 1734, he was sent to Dr. Doddridge's academy, at Northampton; and after going through the ordinary course of studies, he was, in 1739, appointed assistant to the doctor in his academical labors, and discharged the duties of his office with singular ability, prudence and success. In 1741, he was taken from this situation to his native town, by the united voices of the Presbyterian and Independent congregations, which joined to receive him as their pastor. On Dr. Doddridge's decease, he was pressingly invited to succeed him in the academy and congregation; but this, as well as a call to succeed Dr. Hughes in London, (a place which he never saw,) he declined, and continued his labors at Shrewsbury. Before old age arrived, the nervous complaints with which he was frequently troubled, made him conceive himself unable to continue longer in the pastoral office; and, in 1765, while he was but in his forty-eighth year, he resigned his charge. His infirmities gradually increased, and his sufferings becoming at last exceedingly acute, terminated in death, in July, 1783, in the sixty-sixth year of his age.

Few men were more diligent than Mr. Orton, or more conscientious in performing the various duties of his office. He spoke the language of his heart, when he directed the ministers, who were to preach his funeral sermon, in the following words:—"Let them assure my hearers, that serving them in all their interests, especially their best, was the delightful business of my life, and that all my time and studies were directed this way." To the end of his life, his heart was set on doing good; and when he had ceased to preach, conversation, letters, plans of sermons, were sent to his friends, and every private method in his power was resorted to. With the same view, he published books; viz. "Discourses on Eternity, on Zenit, on Christian Worship;" "Meditations for the Sacrament;" and several volumes of Sermons.—His "Life of Dr. Doddridge," which is one of the most useful books to a student and a minister, had been published before. The preacher who has not read it has much pleasure to enjoy, and much benefit to receive. His "Exposition of the Old Testament," in six vols. on the plan of Dr. Doddridge's "Exposition of the New," was not published till after his death.—Jones's Chris. Biog.

OSIANDRIANS; a denomination among the Lutherans, which was founded in the year 1550, by Andrew Oslander, a celebrated German divine, whose doctrine amounted to the following propositions:—

1. That Christ, considered in his human nature only, could not by his obedience to the divine law obtain justification and pardon for sinners; neither can we be justified before God by embracing and applying to ourselves, through faith, the righteousness and obedience of the man Christ. It is only through that eternal and essential righteousness which dwells in Christ, considered as God, and which resides in his divine nature, united to the human, that mankind can obtain complete justification.

2. That a man becomes a partaker of this divine righteousness by faith, since it is in consequence of this uniting principle that Christ dwells in the heart of man with his divine righteousness. Now, wherever this divine righteousness dwells, there God can behold no sin; therefore, when it is present with Christ in the hearts of the regenerate, they are, on its account, considered by the Deity as righteous, although they be sinners. Moreover, this divine and justifying righteousness of Christ excites the faithful to the pursuit of holiness, and to the practice of virtue.—Hend. Buck.

OSSENIANS; a denomination in the first century, which taught that faith may and ought to be dissembled.—Hend. Buck.

OSPREY; (azaniah;) a kind of eagle, whose flesh is forbidden, Lev. 11: 13. It is thought to be the black eagle, perhaps the Nisser Tookoor described by Bruce.—Calm.

OSSIFRAGE; (peres.) Lev. 11: 13. Deut. 14: 12. Interpreters are not agreed on this bird; some read "vulture," others "the black eagle," others "the falcon." The name peres, by which it is called in Hebrew, denotes "to crush, to break;" and this name agrees with our version, which implies "the bone-breaker," which name is given to a kind of eagle, from the circumstance of its habit of breaking the bones of its prey, after it has eaten the flesh: some say also, that he even swallows the bones thus broken. Onkelos uses a word which signifies "naked," and leads us to the vulture: indeed, if we were to take the classes of birds in any thing like a natural order in the passages here referred to, the vulture should follow the eagle as an unclean bird. The Septuagint interpreter also renders vulture: and so do Munster, Schindler, and the Zurich versions.—Watson.

OSTRICH; joneh, in Arabic neamah, in Greek strouthocamelus, the camel-bird, and still in the East, says Niebuhr, it is called thar edsjammel, "the camel-bird," Lev. 11: 16. Deut. 14: 15. Job 30: 29. Isa. 13: 21. 34: 13. 43: 20. Jer. 50: 39. Lam. 4: 3. Mic. 1: 8; rennim, Job 39: 13. The first name in the places above quoted is, by our own translators, generally rendered "owls." But it should be recollected, says the author of "Scripture Illustrated," that the owl is not a desert bird, but rather resides in places not far from habitations, and that it is not the companion of serpents; whereas, in several of these passages, the joneh is associated with deserts, dry, extensive, thirsty deserts, and with serpents, which are their natural inhabitants. Our ignorance of the natural history of the countries which the ostrich inhabits has undoubtedly perverted the import of the above passages; but let any one peruse them afresh, and exchange the owl for the ostrich, and he will immediately discover a vigor of description, and an imagery much beyond what he had formerly perceived.

The Hebrew phrase, bat hainnah, means "the daughter of vociferation," and is understood to be the female ostrich, probably so called from the noise which this bird makes. It is affirmed by travellers of good credit, that ostriches make a fearful, screeching, lamentable noise.

Ostriches are inhabitants of the deserts of Arabia, where they live chiefly upon vegetables; lead a social and inoffensive life, the male associating with the female with connubial fidelity. Their eggs are very large, some of them measuring above five inches in diameter, and weighing twelve or fifteen pounds. These birds are very prolific, laying forty or fifty eggs at a clutch. They will devour leather, grass, hair, stones, metals, or any thing that is given to them; but those substances which the coats of the stomach cannot act upon pass whole. It is so unclean an animal as to eat its own ordure as soon as it voids it. This is a sufficient reason, were others wanting, why such a fowl should be reputed unclean, and its use as an article of diet prohibited.

"On the least noise," says Dr. Shaw, "or trivial occasion, she forsakes her eggs, or her young ones; to which perhaps she never returns; or if she does, it may be too late either to restore life to the one, or to preserve the lives of the others. Agreeably to this account the Arabs meet sometimes with whole nests of these eggs undisturbed: some of them are sweet and good, others are addle and corrupted; others again have their young ones of different growth, according to the time, it may be presumed, they have been forsaken of the dam. The Arabs often meet with a few of the little ones no bigger than well-grown pullets, half starved, straggling and moaning about like so many distressed orphans for their mother. In this manner the ostrich may be said to be hardened against her young ones as though they were not hers; her labor, in hatching and attending them so far, being vain, without fear, or the least concern of what becomes of them afterwards. This want of affection is also recorded: (Lam. 4: 3.) 'the daughter of my people is become cruel, like ostriches in the wilderness;' that is, by apparently deserting their own, and receiving others in return." Natural affection and sagacious instinct are the grand instruments by which providence continues the race of other animals: but no limits can be set to the wisdom and power of God. He preserveth the breed of the ostrich without those means, and even in a penury of all the necessaries of life.

Notwithstanding the stupidity of this animal, its Creator hath amply provided for its safety, by endowing it with extraordinary swiftness, and a surprising apparatus for escaping from its enemy. They, when they raise themselves up for flight, "laugh at the horse and his rider." They afford him an opportunity only of admiring at a distance the extraordinary agility and the stateliness likewise of their motions, the richness of their plumage, and the great propriety there was in ascribing to them an expanded quivering wing. Nothing certainly can be more entertaining than such a sight, the wings, by their rapid but unwearied vibrations, equally serving them for sails and oars; while their feet, no less assisting in conveying them out of sight, seem to be insensible of fatigue.—Watson.

OTHNIEL; son of Kenaz of Judah, Josh. 15: 17. Scripture says, Othniel was brother to Caleb, (Judg. 1: 13.) meaning, probably, near relations, as cousins; for it is not likely they were literally brothers, since Othniel married the daughter of Caleb. See Judges 3; also ACHSAH.—Calmet.

OUCHES; bezails, or sockets for fastening the precious stones in the shoulder pieces of the high-priest's ephod. These ouches, with their stones, served for buttons to fasten the golden chains by which the breastplate was suspended, Exod. 28: 11, 25.—Brown.

OVEN. (See BAKING; and BREAD.)

OWEN, (JOHN, D. D.), a divine of such eminence as to eclipse all the regal honors of his ancient house, was born in 1616, at Stadham, Oxfordshire. His father, descended from the royal line of Wales, was a Puritan minister. An early proficiency in elementary studies admitted John Owen to the university when only twelve years of age. Here he pursued his academical labors with unquenchable ardor, allowing himself only four hours' sleep in a night; though he afterwards confessed, that his sole stimulus to mental exertion was the ambitious hope of rising to some distinguished station in church or state. How often has the eye of Omniscience seen this odious mildew sprinkled over the academic laurels of those who have shone with envied lustre in the world!

Mr. Owen would, doubtless, have carried his point, had not God in mercy convinced him of the sin of aiming at his own glory, called him off from his former pursuits, and induced him to consecrate his future life, with all his talents, to the honor of God and the improvement of his church. This rendered him averse to the superstitious rites which Laud was then introducing into the university; and thus alienated from him all his former friends, who fled from him as one infected with Puritanism; a disease, in their eyes, more dreadful than the plague; so that he was at length obliged to leave the college. He was thus thrown into the hands of the parliamentary party, which so incensed his uncle, who had supported him at the university, that he forever abandoned him, and settled his estate upon another person.

Mr. Owen, now cast upon the providence of God, went to live with a gentleman as his chaplain; but he, though the friend of this Puritan, being a zealous loyalist, went into the king's army, and thus left his chaplain once more to seek a maintenance. He went to London, where he was a perfect stranger, and had to struggle through his temporal difficulties with the additional burden of a troubled spirit; for after he first discovered the evil of sin, this towering genius, who had been the admiration of the university, was so broken down that, for three months, he could hardly speak a word to any one; and, for five years, the anguish of his mind embittered his life. Under this burden, he went, one Lord's day, to hear the Rev. Mr. Calamy, at Aldermanbury church; but, after waiting some time, a country minister, of whom he could never afterwards receive the least information, ascended the pulpit, and preached from Matthew 8: 26: "Why are ye fearful, O ye of little faith!" which happily removed all his doubts, and introduced him to the enjoyment of that sacred peace which, without interruption, blessed all his future days.

His "Display of Arminianism" introduced him to notice and esteem. Induced by the merits of this performance, the committee for ejecting scandalous ministers presented him to the living of Fordham, in Essex, where he labored for a year and a half to the great satisfaction and advantage of the parishioners. But the patron of the living removed him from it, which gave the inhabitants of Coggeshall, about five miles distant, an opportunity to invite him to become their minister; and as the earl of Warwick, the patron, gave him the living, he consented, and preached to a very judicious congregation of two thousand persons, with great success. Here his researches into the Scriptures induced him to abandon the Presbyterian system of church government, and to adopt the principles of the Independents; so that he not only formed a Congregational church, upon the plan which appeared to him to be dictated by Christ, in the New Testament, but became the most able vindicator of those sentiments which so much prevailed among Dissenters.

His name, like a rich perfume, could not be concealed, so that he was now called to preach before the parliament; and on the 29th of April, 1646, delivered to them a discourse on Acts 26: 2. It was a bold and energetic appeal to the wisdom and benevolence of the legislature, in behalf of those parts of the empire which were destitute of the light of evangelical instruction. Those who are only acquainted with the general strain of Dr. Owen's writings, would not suppose him capable of pouring forth that flood of lucid, glowing, popular eloquence, which is displayed in this sermon. The day after the death of Charles I. he was called to the difficult task of preaching before the parliament again; when he chose for his text Jer. 15: 19, 20. Wisdom and fidelity joined to compose this discourse. Mr. Owen shortly after attended Cromwell to Ireland, where he presided in the college, and preached in Dublin upwards of a year and a half. He returned to his charge at Coggeshall, but was soon called to preach again at Whitehall, and afterwards to go into Scotland. The house of commons at length presented him to the deanery of Christ church, Oxford, and soon after he was made doctor in divinity, and chosen vice-chancellor in the university, which honorable post he filled, with singular wisdom and prudence, during five years.

Thus, in the short space of ten years, we are called to witness the most complete revolution in his affairs; and after having seen him persecuted for his conscientious dissent from the church of his fathers, shunned by his former friends, disowned by his relations, disappointed of a good estate, driven from his college, cast upon the wide world, called to struggle with adversity, under the depression of a wounded conscience, which consumed his mental and corporeal vigor, we now behold him in the enjoyment of a peace "which passeth all understanding," exulting in the return of elasticity of mind, with health of body, filling the kingdom with the fame of his literary and religious eminence, introduced to the esteem of the highest characters and authorities in his country, and exalted to the first post which the church of England then knew, by presiding over that university from which he had separated. History has seldom furnished a more effectual antidote against despondency in adverse circumstances, or a more animated exhortation to follow conscience and principle, wherever they may appear to lead.

Dr. Conant being elected vice-chancellor, Dr. Owen took his leave of the university with an address, which presents a singularly beautiful combination of the jealousy which a learned and laborious man feels for his honest fame, with the humility of a Christian, absorbed in the honor and interests of his God. The fortunes and prospects of the university, when first it fell into the hands of the parliament party, are finely depicted, while the improvements which had been made during the five years of his chancellorship are hinted at with much delicacy. He now retired to his own private estate at Stadham, his birthplace; but the persecution, which followed the restoration, compelled him to take refuge in London, where he published his "Animadversions on a Popish Book, entitled Fiat Lux;" which recommended him to the esteem of chancellor Hyde. This celebrated man informed the doctor, that "he had deserved the best of any English Protestant of late years, and that the church was bound to own and advance him;" at the same time offering him advancement if he would accept it; expressing his surprise that a man of such talents and literature should adopt the novel opinion of Independency. Owen offered to prove that the Christian church knew no other system of ecclesiastical polity for several ages after Christ, against any bishop whom his lordship should appoint to argue the question with him. (See INDEPENDENTS.)

This learned man, however, not finding himself comfortable in England, was about to accept the invitation from the Independents in New England, to preside over the college they were establishing, but he was stopped by particular orders from the king; and when he was invited to fill the chair of professor of divinity in the United Provinces, love for his country induced him to waive the honor. He set up a lecture in London, as soon as king Charles' indulgence rendered it practicable; and while many eminent citizens resorted to his oral instruction, the books which he from time to time published gained him the admiration and esteem of the learned and the great, among whom are particularly mentioned the earls of Orrery and Anglesey, lords Willoughby, Wharton, and Berkeley, and Sir John Trevor. The duke of York and king Charles II. sent for him, and conversed with him concerning the Dissenters and liberty of conscience, which the king declared was right; and, as a testimony of his sense of the injustice done to the persecuted, gave the doctor a thousand guineas to be distributed among the sufferers. When he applied to his tutor, Dr. Barlow, bishop of Lincoln, in behalf of good John Bunyan, who was enduring a long and cruel imprisonment, the bishop declined releasing the worthy Baptist, though he had given the Independent an assurance, "that he would deny him nothing that he could legally do." His learned labors procured him the acquaintance and esteem of many eminent foreigners; some of whom took a voyage to England to converse with this distinguished Briton; while others, having read his Latin treatises, learned the English language, that they might be able to read the rest of his works; which, indeed, are sufficiently valuable to repay the labor of acquiring the most difficult language which has been spoken since the confusion of tongues.

When, exhausted by his excessive exertions of body and mind, he was unable to preach, he retired to Kensington, near London; but even here he was incessantly writing, whenever he was able to sit up. He afterwards removed to a house of his own at Ealing; where, employing his thoughts on the glories which were now opening upon his view, he composed his "Meditations on the Glory of Christ." Writing to a friend, at this time, he says, "I am going to him whom my soul has loved, or rather who has loved me with an everlasting love, which is the whole ground of all my consolation. I am leaving the ship of the church in a storm, but whilst the great Pilot is in it, the loss of a poor under-rower will be inconsiderable. Live and pray, and wait and hope patiently, and do not despond; the promise stands invincible, that he will never leave us nor forsake us." He died on Bartholomew day, 24th of August, 1683, in the sixty-seventh year of his age.

He is described as tall in his person, with a grave, majestic, and comely aspect, and the air and deportment of a gentleman. He is said to have been very pleasant and cheerful in his social intercourse, having a great command of his passions, especially that of anger; but in his writings, the irritation of those contentious days sometimes appears. Even Anthony Wood was compelled to acknowledge, that "he was a person well skilled in the tongues, rabbinical learning, and Jewish rites; that he had a great command of his English pen, and was one of the fairest and genteelst writers that appeared against the church of England." His knowledge of ecclesiastical history and polemical theology was profound. The acumen with which he detected the most specious, and the force with which he crushed the most formidable heresies, were, if possible, still surpassed by the accuracy with which he stated and explained the most profound discoveries of revelation, and the sanctity with which he directed every truth to the purification of the heart, and the regulation of the life. In his "Exposition of the Hundred and Thirtieth Psalm," he has developed the wise and benevolent purpose of God, in the mental conflicts which the author endured, and proved himself qualified thereby to guide the trembling steps of the returning sinner to the God of pardon; while his treatises "On the Mortification of Sin in Believers," "On Spiritual Mindedness," and "On the Glory of Christ," prove him equally fitted to guide the Christian in his more advanced stages, and to show him how "to finish his course with joy, so as to obtain an abundant entrance into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ." But his grand work is his "Exposition of the Epistle to the Hebrews." To this, the studies of his life were more or less directed; and, though this epistle may safely be pronounced the most difficult of all the didactic books of Scripture, no part of the sacred writings has received so perfect an elucidation in the English, or perhaps in any other language.

This extraordinary man was as much beyond his age in political as in theological science; for he not only defended the doctrine of toleration, while it was most cruelly violated by the Stuarts; but when the Presbyterians were in the plenitude of their power, he addressed to the parliament a discourse in favor of this truly Christian and divine doctrine; in which he went on as large and generous principles as Mr. Locke afterwards did. Following Roger Williams, he has triumphantly proved that the Moloch, which had shed the blood of so many myriads of saints, founds its boasted rights upon a cloud.

But that which crowns the name of Owen with most resplendent and imperishable honors, is, that possessing a handsome estate, and laboring in the noblest employments of a literary life, he did not feel himself exempt from the duty of preaching the gospel amidst the dangers and inconveniences of persecution; but delivered, with a simple, engaging eloquence, those divine truths from which he derived the solace of his days, and which he adorned by an unblemished life.

His works in folio are, "The Exposition of the Epistle to the Hebrews," in four volumes; "The Perseverance of Saints;" "A Treatise on the Holy Spirit;" and a volume of Sermons and Tracts. Twenty-one publications in quarto, devoted either to the vindication of the Christian doctrines, or to the defence of independent churches. In octavo, there are thirty pieces, some of them of considerable extent, and several of very distinguished excellence. The whole have lately been reprinted in twenty-eight volumes octavo. See Orme's Life of Owen; Bogue and Bennett's History of the Dissenters; and Jones' Christian Biography.—Hend. Buck.

OWEN, (HENRY,) a learned divine of the church of England, was born in 1716. He was educated at the grammar-school of Ruthin, in Denbighshire, whence he was removed to Jesus college, Oxford. His attention was primarily directed towards the medical profession; but, changing his purpose, he took orders, and, after various preferments, became rector of St. Olave, Hart street, and vicar of Edmonton, in Middlesex. He was a learned man, and died in the year 1795, at the age of seventy-nine.

His works are, "Harmonia Trigonometrica;" "The Intent and Propriety of the Scripture Miracles;" "Observations on the Four Gospels;" "Directions to Students in Divinity;" "Inquiry into the State of the Septuagint Version of the Old Testament;" "Critica Sacra; or, a Short Introduction to Hebrew Criticism;" "Collatio Codicis Cottoniani Genesæ, cum editione Romana a viro clarissimo Johanne Ernesto Græbe;" deemed the most ancient manuscript in Europe; "Critical Disquisitions;" "The Modes of Quotation used by the Evangelical Writers." Nichols' Literary Anec.—Jones' Christian Biography.

OWEN, (JOHN,) secretary of the British and Foreign Bible society, was born, about 1765, in London, and was educated at St. Paul's school and Cambridge. Having taken orders, he became a popular preacher, and obtained from bishop Porteus the living of Pagglesham, in Essex, and the curacy of Fulham. On the institution of the British and Foreign Bible society, he became one of the secretaries, and for eighteen years was the most active of its members. He died September 26, 1822. Among his works are, Travels in different Parts of Europe; The Christian Monitor; The Fashionable World displayed; and Vindication of the Bible Society.—Davenport.

OWL. There are several varieties of this species, all too well known to need a particular description. They are nocturnal birds of prey, and have their eyes better adapted for discerning objects in the evening or twilight than in the glare of day.

1. Cus, (Lev. 11: 17. Deut. 14: 16. Psalm 102: 6.) is in our version rendered "the little owl." Dr. Geddes thinks this bird the cormorant; and as it begins the list of water-fowl, and is mentioned always in the same contexts with quat, confessedly a water-bird, his opinion may be adopted.

2. Lushuph, Lev. 11: 17. Deut. 14: 16. Isa. 34: 11. In the two first places our translators render this "the great owl," which is strangely placed after the little owl, and among water-birds. "Our translators," says the author of "Scripture Illustrated," "seem to have thought the owl a convenient bird, as we have three owls in two verses." Some critics think it means a species of night-bird, because the word may be derived from nesheph, which signifies the twilight, the time when owls fly about. But this interpretation, says Parkhurst, seems very forced; and since it is mentioned among water-fowls, and the LXX. have, in the first and last of those texts, rendered it by ibis, we are disposed to adopt it here, and think the evidence strengthened by this, that in a Coptic version of Lev. 11: 17, it is called ip or hip, which, with a Greek termination, would very easily make ibis.

3. Quepin, which occurs only in Isa. 34: 15, is in our version rendered "the great owl." 4. Silit, (Isa. 34: 14.) in our version "the screech-owl." The root signifies night; and as undoubtedly a bird frequenting dark places and ruins is referred to, we must admit some kind of owl.

A place of lonely desolation, where
The screeching tribe and pelicans abide,
And the dun ravens croak mid ruins drear,
And moaning owls from man the farthest hide.

Watson.

OX; (heguer;) the male of horned cattle of the beeve kind, at full age, when fit for the plough. Younger ones are called bullocks. Michaëlis, in his elaborate work on the laws of Moses, has proved that castration was never practised.

The rural economy of the Israelites led them to value the ox as by far the most important of domestic animals, from the consideration of his great use in all the operations of farming. In the patriarchal ages, the ox constituted no inconsiderable portion of their wealth. Thus Abraham is said to be very rich in cattle, Gen. 24: 35. Men of every age and country have been much indebted to the labors of this animal. For many ages the hopes of oriental husbandmen depended entirely on their labors. This was so much the case in the time of Solomon, that he observes, in one of his proverbs, "Where no oxen are, the crib is clean," or rather empty; "but much increase is by the strength of the ox," Prov. 14: 4. The ass, in the course of ages, was compelled to bend his stubborn neck to the yoke, and share the labors of the ox; but still the preparation of the ground in the time of spring depended chiefly on the more powerful exertions of the latter.

When this animal was employed in bringing home the produce of the harvest, he was regaled with a mixture of chaff, chopped straw, and various kinds of grain, moistened with acidulated water. But among the Jews, the ox was best fed when employed in treading out the corn; for the divine law, in many of whose precepts the benevolence of the Deity conspicuously shines, forbade to muzzle him, and, by consequence, to prevent him from eating what he would of the grain he was employed to separate from the husks. The ox was also compelled to the labor of dragging the cart or wagon. The number of oxen commonly yoked to one cart appears to have been two, Num. 7: 3, 7, 8. 1 Sam. 6: 7. 2 Sam. 6: 3, 6.

The wild-ox, (tau, Dent. 14: 5.) is supposed to be the oryx of the Greeks, which is a species of large stag.—Watson; Calmet; Abbott; Carpenter; Dr. Harris.

PACIFICATION, (Edicts of;) certain edicts of the sovereigns of France, tolerating, under certain circumstances, the reformed religion. The first was granted by Charles IX., 1562, and repeated next year at Amboise, and again five years after in the edict of Lonjumeau; but six months after the latter, they were all revoked, and all Protestant ministers were banished. In 1570, he again made peace with them, and yet in two years after ordered the Parisian massacre, and took part in the slaughter. Such are the tender mercies of tyrants.

In 1576, Henry III. made peace with the Protestants by such an edict, which so displeased the Guisssian faction, that they formed a league in defence of popery, and obliged him to revoke it. In 1598, Henry IV. published the famous edict of Nantes, which, being confirmed by Louis XIII. and Louis XIV., was finally destroyed, in 1685, by the latter, who was the glory of despotism and of France! Broughton's Dict.—Williams.

PADAN-ARAM; the plains of Aram. (See ARAM, and MESOPOTAMIA).—Calmel.

PÆDOBAPTISM; (from païs, a child, and baptizo, to immerse;) the baptism of children. (See BAPTISM.)

PÆDOBAPTISTS; those who practise the baptism of children, irrespective of personal faith. (See BAPTISM.)

PAGANISM; the religious worship and discipline of pagans, or the adoration of idols and false gods. (See PAGANS.) The theology of the pagans, according to themselves, as Sævola and Varro, was of three sorts.

The first of these may well be called mythological, or fabulous, as treating of the theology and genealogy of their deities, in which they say such things as are unworthy of deity; ascribing to them thefts, murders, adulteries, and all manner of crimes; and therefore this kind of theology is condemned by the wiser sort of heathens as nugatory and scandalous. The writers of this sort of theology were Sanchoniathus, the Phœnician; and of the Grecians, Orpheus, Hesiod, Pherecyde, &c.

The second sort, called physical, or natural, was studied and taught by the philosophers, who, rejecting the multiplicity of gods, introduced by the poets, brought their theology to a more natural and rational form, and supposed that there was but one Supreme God, which they commonly make to be the sun; at least, an emblem of him, but at too great a distance to mind the affairs of the world; and therefore devised certain demons, which they considered as mediators between the Supreme God and man; and the doctrines of these demons, to which the apostle is thought to allude in I Tim. 4: 1, were what the philosophers had a concern with, and who treat of their nature, office, and regard to men; as did Thales, Pythagoras, Plato, and the Stoics.

The third sort, called political, or civil, was instituted by legislators, statesmen, and politicians: the first among the Romans was Numa Pompilius: this chiefly respected their gods, temples, altars, sacrifices, and rites of worship, and was properly their idolatry, the care of which belonged to the priests; and this was enjoined the common people, to keep them in obedience to the civil state.

Thus things continued in the Gentile world until the light of the gospel was sent among them: the times before were times of ignorance, as the apostle calls them: they were ignorant of the true God, and of the worship of him; and of the Messiah, and salvation by him. Their state is truly described, (Eph. 2: 12.) that they were then "without Christ; aliens from the commonwealth of Israel; strangers from the covenants of promise; having no hope, and without God in the world;" and, consequently, their theology was insufficient for their salvation.

The rites of paganism were as various and absurd as the objects of their worship. In general, they had some idea of the necessity of an atonement for their sins; and that "without shedding of blood there is no remission." In many cases, and on all emergencies, they were apprehensive that the sacrifice must be, at least, of equal dignity with the sinner; and hence, among many nations, both ancient and modern, from the worshippers of Moloch to the South Sea Islanders, the practice (sometimes carried to great enormity) of human sacrifices, which have stained the altars of almost all the nations upon earth.

The peculiarities of many nations and systems have been already noticed in these pages, and others are to follow.

One thing is very remarkable, that as the heathen became more refined, they became more idolatrous. St. Paul says, "The world by wisdom knew not God;" (I Cor. 1: 21.) and it is most certain that their science never led to the unity of God; much less to rational notions of our duty to God, or love to our fellow-creatures, as such considered. So soon as they began to entertain reverential ideas of the Divine Majesty, they supposed him too great to notice us, or for us to notice him; and as to our fellow-creatures, they always confined their love to family, tribe, or country. They "neither feared God, nor regarded man." (See HEATHEN.) The reader will find some admirable reflections on the growth of heathenism among modern Christians, in the third volume of the Rev. W. Jones' Works. (See HEATHEN, INOLATRY, POLTHEISM, Gods).—Hend. Buck; Williams.

PAGANS; the heathen; so called by the early Christians, because, when Constantine and his successors forbade the worship of heathen deities in the cities, its adherents retired to the villages, (pagi, hence pagani, villagers or countrymen,) where they could practise their rites in security.—Hend. Buck.

PAGODA, or PAGON; a name given by the East Indians to their temples, where they worship their gods. "The pagodas in Burmah," says Mr. Boardman, "are the most prominent and expensive of all the sacred buildings. They are solid structures, built of brick, and plastered. Some of them are gilt throughout, whence they are called golden pagodas.

"The largest pagoda in Tavoy is about fifty feet in diameter, and perhaps one hundred and fifty feet high. That which is most frequented is not so large. It stands on a base somewhat elevated above the adjacent surface, and is surrounded by a row of more than forty small pagodas, about six feet high, standing on the same elevated base. In various niches round the central are small alabaster images. Both the central and the surrounding pagodas are gilt from the summit to the base, and each one is surrounded with an umbrella of iron, which is also gilt. Attached to the umbrella of the central pagoda is a row of small bells or jingles, which, when there is even a slight breeze, keep a continual chiming. A low wall surrounds the small pagodas, outside of which are temples, pagodas of various sizes, and other appendages of pagoda worship, sacred trees or thrones, sacred bells to be rung by worshippers, and various figures of fabulous things, creatures, and persons mentioned in the Burman sacred books. Around these is a high wall, within which no devout worshipper presumes to tread without putting off his shoes. It is considered holy ground. Outside this wall are perhaps twenty Zayats, and a kyoung. The whole occupies about an acre of ground.

"The total number of pagodas in Tavoy is immense. Large and small, they probably exceed a thousand. Before leaving America, I used to pray that pagodas might be converted into Christian churches. But I did not know that they were solid monuments of brick or stone, without any cavity or internal apartments. They can become Christian churches only by being demolished and built anew."

The Dagong pagoda at Rangoon is the most magnificent in Burmah. A description of it is given by Mrs. Judson. See her Memoir, and the Christian Offering.

PAIN. (See AFFLICTION.)

PAINE, (THOMAS,) a political writer and deist, was born in Norfolk, England, in 1737; his father, a Quaker, was a staymaker. He followed the same business; and then became an exciseman in Sussex, but was dismissed for misconduct.

He came to Philadelphia in 1774, and in January, 1775, he was employed by Mr. Aitken to edit the Pennsylvania Magazine. After the war commenced, he, at the suggestion of Dr. Rush, wrote his celebrated pamphlet of Common Sense, recommending independence. For this tract the legislature of Pennsylvania voted him five hundred pounds. He was also elected by congress in April, 1777, clerk to the committee on foreign affairs; he chose to call himself "secretary for foreign affairs." At this period he wrote the Crisis. For divulging some official secrets he lost his office in January, 1779. In 1780, he was clerk of the assembly of Pennsylvania; in 1785, congress voted him three thousand dollars, and the state of New York gave him five hundred acres of land, the confiscated estate of Davol, a royalist, at New Rochelle. There was on it a stone house, one hundred and twenty by twenty-eight feet.

In 1787, he went to Paris and London. In answer to Burke's Reflections on the French Revolution he wrote his Rights of Man. In September, 1792, he was a member from Calais of the national convention of France. Voting against the sentence on the king, he offended the Jacobins, and in December, 1793, was thrown into prison for eleven months. His political writings have simplicity, force, and pungency; his theological are shallow, slanderous, and obscene.

He had written the first part of his Age of Reason against Christianity, and committed it to Joel Barlow; the second part was published in 1795, after his release. At this period he was habitually drunk. He returned to America in October, 1802, bringing with him as a companion the wife of De Bonnaville, a French bookseller, having separated from his second wife. He died at New York, June 8, 1809, aged seventy-two.

This unhappy unbeliever died in contempt and misery. His disgusting vices, his intemperance and profligacy, made him an outcast from all respectable society. He is represented as irritable, vain, cowardly, filthy, envious, malignant, dishonest, and drunken. In the distress of his last sickness he frequently called out, "Lord Jesus! help me." Dr. Manley asked him whether, from his calling so often upon the Savior, it was to be inferred that he believed the gospel. He replied at last, "I have no wish to believe on that subject." Mr. Cheetham published an account of his life.—Allen; Erskine; Fuller's Works.

PAINTING THE FACE, 2 Kings 9: 30. (See EYES.) PALESTINE, taken in a limited sense, denotes the country of the Philistines or Palestines; which was that part of the Land of Promise extending along the Mediterranean sea, from Gaza south to Lydda north. Palestine, taken in a more general sense, signifies the whole country of Canaan, as well beyond, as on this side, Jordan; though frequently it is restrained to the country on this side that river: so that in later times the words Judea and Palestine were synonymous. We find also the name of Syria Palestina given to the Land of Promise, and even sometimes this province is comprehended in Cœle-Syria, or the Lower Syria. Herodotus is the most ancient writer known who speaks of Syria Palestina. He places it between Phœnicia and Egypt. (See CANAAN.)—Calmet.

PALEY, (WILLIAM, D. D.,) an eminent divine, the son of a clergyman, was born, in 1745, at Peterborough, and was educated, as a sizer, at Christ college, Cambridge, of which he became a fellow in 1766. For ten subsequent years he resided at the university; but in 1776, he obtained the vicarages of Dalston, in Cumberland, and Appleby, in Westmoreland. Within the next nine years he became a prebendary, archdeacon, and chancellor of Carlisle.

In 1785, he published his "Principles of Moral and Political Philosophy," in two volumes, octavo, with a highly liberal dedication to his episcopal patron. This work is said to stand unrivalled for its simplicity, and the pertinency of its illustrations, as well as for the vigor and discrimination by which it is characterized; and though exceptions have justly been made to certain definitions and principles therein laid down, it could not fail to establish his reputation as an author of the first class.

In 1790, Mr. Paley published his "Horæ Pauline, or the Truth of the Scripture History of St. Paul evinced by a Comparison of the Epistles which bear his name with the Acts of the Apostles, and with one another;" which he dedicated to Dr. Law, then bishop of Killala. It furnishes a line of argument of the highest importance on the subject of the Evidences of Christianity.

He was a great friend to the abolition of the slave-trade; and, in 1789, when the first great discussion in the house of commons was expected, he drew up a short, but appropriate and judicious treatise, entitled, "Comments against the Unjust Pretensions of Slave Dealers and Holders to be indemnified by pecuniary Allowances at the Public Expense, in case the Slave-Trade should be Abolished;" and sent it to the committee. The bishop of Durham, entertaining great respect for him, presented him with the valuable rectory of bishop Wearmouth, worth twelve thousand pounds a year.

In 1794, he published his "View of the Evidences of Christianity," in three volumes, duodecimo, which contains an able, popular view of the historical argument for the truth of the Christian religion. It is drawn up with his usual perspicuity and dialectic skill, and is now generally regarded as the most complete summary on the subject that has ever appeared.

In 1800, Dr. Paley was attacked by a violent nephralgic complaint. During the period of this excruciating disorder, he finished his celebrated work, entitled "Natural Theology, or Evidences of the Existence and Attributes of the Deity, collected from the Appearances of Nature;" a work highly celebrated for the justness of its reflections, and the benevolence, good sense, and piety which it breathes. He still entered into society with his wonted zest, and his conversation was lively and animated, pious and devout. In December, 1804, his friends perceived his valuable life drawing to a rapid close. He died on the 25th of May, 1805.

Among his friends, no man was more highly, or more justly esteemed, than Dr. Paley; and his literary attainments were exceeded only by his many amiable traits of frankness and good humor. In private life, he appears to have exhibited very little of the gravity of the philosopher, being fond of company and amusement. As a writer, Dr. Paley was less solicitous to delight the ear than to inform the understanding; yet few authors have written so pleasingly on similar subjects; and there is, both in his conceptions and language, a peculiarity of manner which marks the native vigor of his mind. After his death, a volume of his sermons was published in octavo, and his entire works have been repeatedly published in various forms, in four, five, or six volumes. Life by Meadley; Jones' Chris. Biog.—Hend. Buck; Davenport.

PALM; a measure of four fingers' breadth, or three inches and six hundred and forty-eight thousandths, Heb. Tophach, Exod. 25: 25. The Heb. Zereth, (Exod. 28: 16.) is often translated palm, though it signifies a half-cubit, and contains three ordinary palms; which ought to be observed, that two measures so unequal may not be confounded. We find in Isa. 40: 12, an expression that proves the Zereth, or palm, to signify the extent of the hand from the end of the thumb to the end of the little finger: "Who hath measured the waters in the hollow of his hand, and meted out heaven with a span?" a zereth.—Calmet.

PALMER, (ELIAB,) a preacher of deism, was graduated at Dartmouth college in 1787. He was the head of the Columbian Illuminati, a deistical company at New York, established about 1801, consisting of ninety-five members. Its professed aim was to promote "moral science;" against religious and political imposture. The Temple of Reason was a weekly paper, of which the principal editor was one Driscoll, an Irishman, who had been a Romish priest, and who removed with his paper to Philadelphia. Mr. Palmer delivered lectures, or preached against Christianity. But, according to Mr. Cheetham, he was "in the small circle of his church more priestly, more fulminating," than Laud and Gardiner of England; "professing to adore reason, he was in a rage if any body reasoned with him." He was blind from his youth. He died three years before Paine, at Philadelphia, in March, 1806, aged forty-two. He published an Oration, July 4, 1797; The Principles of Nature, 1802.—Allen.

PALMER-WORM. Bochart is of opinion that the Hebrew gezem is a kind of locust, furnished with very sharp teeth, with which it gnaws off grass, corn, leaves of trees, and even their bark. The Jews support this idea, by deriving the word from guz, or gazaz, to cut, to shear, to mince; and Pisidas compares a swarm of locusts to a sword with ten thousand edges. But notwithstanding this, the LXX. read kampê, and the Vulgate eruca, or caterpillar, which rendering is supported by Fuller and Michaëlis. Caterpillars also begin their ravages before locusts, which seems to coincide with the nature of the creature here intended: "That which the palmer-worm hath left hath the locust eaten; and that which the locust hath left hath the canker-worm eaten; and that which the canker-worm hath left hath the caterpillar eaten," Joel 1: 4.—Calmet.

PALM-SUNDAY; the Sunday next before Easter; so called from palm branches being strewed on the road by the multitude, when our Savior made his triumphal entry into Jerusalem.—Hend. Buck.

PALM-TREE. This tree is called tamar, from its straight, upright growth, for which it seems more remarkable than any other tree: it sometimes rises to the height of a hundred feet.

The palm is one of the most beautiful trees of the vegetable kingdom. The stalks are generally full of rugged knots, which are the vestiges of the decayed leaves: for the trunk is not solid like other trees, but its centre is filled with pith, round which is a tough bark full of strong fibres when young, which, as the tree grows old, hardens and becomes ligneous. To this bark the leaves are closely joined, which in the centre rise erect; but after they are advanced above the vagina that surrounds them, they expand very wide on every side the stem; and as the older leaves decay, the stalk advances in height. The leaves, when the tree has grown to a size for bearing fruit, are six or eight feet long; are very broad when spread out, and are used for covering the tops of houses, and similar purposes.

Palm-Tree.

The fruit, which is called "date," grows below the leaves in clusters; and is of a sweet and agreeable taste. The diligent natives, says Mr. Gibbon, celebrated, either in verse or prose, the three hundred and sixty uses to which the trunk, the branches, the leaves, and the fruit were skillfully applied. The extensive importance of the date-tree, says Dr. Clarke, is one of the most curious subjects to which a traveller can direct his attention. A considerable part of the inhabitants of Egypt, of Arabia, and Persia, subsist almost entirely on its fruits. They boast also of its medicinal virtues. Their camels feed upon the date stone. From the leaves they make couches, baskets, bags, mats, and brushes; from the branches, cages for their poultry, and fences for their gardens; from the fibres of the boughs, thread, ropes, and rigging; from the sap is prepared a spirituous liquor; and the body of the tree furnishes fuel: it is even said, that from one variety of the palm-tree, the "phœnix farinifera," meal has been extracted, which is found among the fibres of the trunk, and has been used for fuel.

The palm-tree arrives at its greatest vigor about thirty years after transplantation, and continues so seventy years afterwards, bearing yearly fifteen or twenty clusters of dates, each of them weighing fifteen or twenty pounds. After this period, it begins gradually to decline, and usually falls about the latter end of its second century. "To be exalted," or "to flourish like the palm-tree," are as just and proper expressions, suitable to the nature of this plant, as "to spread about like a cedar," Psal. 92: 11.

The root of the palm-tree produces a great number of suckers, which, spreading upward, form a kind of forest. It was under a little wood of this kind, as Calmet thinks, that the prophetess Deborah dwelt between Ramah and Bethel, Judg. 4: 5. And probably to this multiplication of the palm-tree, as he suggests, the prophet alludes, when he says, "The righteous shall flourish like a palm-tree," (Psal. 92: 12. Comp. Psal. 1: 3.) rather than to its towering height, as Dr. Shaw supposes.

Palm branches were also used as emblems of victory, both by believers and idolaters. The reason given by Plutarch and Aulus Gellius, why they were so among the latter, is the nature of the wood, which so powerfully resists incumbent pressure. But, doubtless, believers, by bearing palm branches after a victory, or in triumph, meant to acknowledge the Supreme Author of their success and prosperity, and to carry on their thoughts to the great conqueror over sin and death. Comp. 1 Mac. 13: 51. 2 Mac. 10: 7. John 12: 13. Rev. 7: 9.

This tree was formerly of great value and esteem among the Israelites, and so very much cultivated in Judea, that, in after times, it became the emblem of that country, as may be seen in a medal of the emperor Vespasian upon the conquest of Judea. It represents a captive woman sitting under a palm-tree, with this inscription, "Judea capta;" and upon a Greek coin, likewise, of his son Titus, struck upon the like occasion, we see a shield suspended upon a palm-tree, with a victory writing upon it. Pliny also calls Judea palmis inclita, "renowned for palms." Jericho, in particular, was called "the city of palms," (Deut. 34: 3. 2 Chron. 28: 15.) because, as Josephus, Strabo, and Pliny have remarked, it anciently abounded in palm-trees.

As the Greek name for this tree signifies also the fabulous bird, called the phœnix, some of the fathers have supposed that the Psalmist (92: 12.) alludes to the latter, and on his authority have made the phœnix an emblem of a resurrection. Tertullian calls it a full and striking emblem of this hope. But the tree, also, seems to have been considered as emblematical of the revivification of the human body, from its being found in some burial-places in the East. In the colder climate of England, the yer-tree is substituted in its place.—Calmet; Watson.

PALSY; a disorder which deprives the limbs of sensation or motion, or both, and makes them useless to the patient. When one entire side of the body is affected, it is called hemiplegia. If one half of the body, the upper or lower, it is called paraplegia. If confined to a single limb or set of muscles, it is called simply paralysis.

It is only in the slighter degrees of palsy in which medical aid can hope to afford much relief. In general there is little prospect of a cure. The parts deprived of motion and sense, gradually waste and become withered. When it is a consequence of apoplexy, it ends in death, though the patient may linger for years. Imbecility of mind usually attends it; nor is this to be wondered at, since in all cases its immediate cause is a compression on the brain. (See MEDICINE.)

Our Savior cured several paralytics by his word alone. See Matt. 4: 24. 8: 6. 9: 2. Mark 2: 3, 4. Luke 5: 18. The sick man who was lying near the pool at the sheep-mat for thirty-eight years was a paralytic, John 5: 5.—Calmet; Thomas' Domestic Medicine.

PAMPHYLUS, a Christian martyr under Galerius, was a native of Phœnicia, of such extensive learning, that he was called a second Origen. He was received into the body of the clergy at Caesarea, where he established a library, and lived in the practice of every Christian virtue. He copied most of the works of Origen with his own hand; and, assisted by Eusebius, gave a correct copy of the Old Testament, which had suffered greatly from the ignorance or negligence of former transcribers. He likewise gave lectures on literary and religious subjects in an academy established by him for that purpose, until A. D. 307, when he was apprehended and carried before Urban, the governor of Palestine. Urban, having in vain endeavored to turn him to paganism, ordered him to be tortured severely, and to be imprisoned; which was accordingly done. He was afterwards beheaded.—Fox, p. 56.

PAMPHYLIA; a province of Asia Minor, having Cilicia east, Lycia west, Pisidia north, and the Mediterranean south. It is opposite to Cyprus, and the sea between the coast and the island is called the sea of Pamphylia. The chief city of Pamphylia was Perge, where Paul and Barnabas preached, Acts 13: 13. 14: 24.—Calmet.

PARCRATIUS, or PANCRASS, a Christian martyr, horn at Phrygia, was beheaded at Rome, in the persecution under Galerius.—Fox, p. 56.

PANDECTS; properly a juridical term, signifying a complete collection or digest of laws. It was used, however, by Papias, as a denomination of the Old and New Testaments.—Hend. Buck.

PANTALEON, a Christian martyr under Galerius, was a native of Nicomedia. His father, from whom he received his education, was a pagan; his mother, a Christian. Having applied himself to the study of medicine, he became eminent in his profession, and was appointed physician to the emperor Galerius. He was one of the most benevolent of men, and successful of practitioners. His reputation roused the jealousy of the pagan physicians, who accused him to the emperor. Galerius finding him a Christian, ordered him to be tortured, and then beheaded, which was done, A. D. 305.—Fox, p. 55.

PANTHEISM; a sort of philosophical atheism, which considers the universe as an immense animal,

"Whose body nature is, and God the soul."

This, according to the learned Cudworth, was the system of Orpheus and other early Greeks; for he calls the material world "the body of Jupiter." As, however, this is said in verse, and all poets claim a license for idolatry; and more especially as considerable doubt rests upon the authenticity of the verses ascribed to him, others deny the charge. But, certain it is, that the mysteries of paganism, and the secret doctrines of the philosophers, all leaned this way. From this notion, also, probably arose the doctrine of two first principles in the Oriental philosophy; and from thence the error of the Manichæans and other early heretics; also the notions of the Indian Brahmins and Chinese literati.

The system has in modern times been taken up by Spinoza and Thomas Hobbes; and whether or not Pope himself believed it, he has dressed it up in all the charms of poesy, both in his Essay on Man and Universal Prayer: nor is Thompson's "varied God" easily to be understood on other principles. (See SINGOSISM.) Cudworth's Intellectual System, book iv. ch. 17; Enfield's Philosophy, vol. i. pp. 126-7; Douglas on Errors regarding Religion.—Williams.

PAPAS; (the ancient Greek pappas, papa, father;) the name at present given to the priests of the Greek church: in Russia they are called popes. In the third and fourth centuries, the name was given to all the bishops; but in the ninth, it was appropriated exclusively to the four eastern patriarchs. In the west, however, the bishop of Rome determined to have the exclusive use of the title; but it required the iron hand of Gregory VII. to carry the plan into effect. He assembled some Italian bishops at Rome, in 1073, and formed them into a council, which excommunicated the emperor Henry, and declared that no one had any right to the title of pope but the Roman pontiff.—Hend. Buck.

PAPER-REED; (numet;) Exod. 2: 3. Job 8: 11. Isa. 8: 2. 35: 7. When the outer skin, or bark, is taken off, there are several films, or inner pellicles, one within another. These, when separated from the stalk, were laid on a table artfully matched and flatted together, and moistened with the water of the Nile, which, dissolving the glutinous juices of the plant, caused them to adhere closely together. They were afterwards pressed, and then dried in the sun, and thus were prepared sheets or leaves for writing upon in characters marked by a colored liquid passing through a hollow reed. The best papyrus was called hieraticum, or paper of the priests. On this the sacred documents of Egypt were written. Ancient books were written on papyrus, and those of the New Testament among the rest. In the fourth century, however, these sacred writings are found on skins. This was preferred for durability; and many decayed copies of the New Testament, belonging to libraries, were early transferred to parchment. Finally came paper, the name of which was taken from the Egyptian reed; but the materials of which it was fabricated were cotton and linen. (See BULRUSH, and BOOK.)—Watson.

PAPHOS; a celebrated city of Cyprus, lying on the western coast of the island, where Venus (who from hence took the name of Paphia) had her most ancient and most famous temple; and here the Roman proconsul, Sergius Paulus, resided, whom St. Paul converted to Christianity, Acts 13: 6.—Watson.

PAPIST; one who adheres to the communion of the pope and church of Rome. (See POPE, and POPERY.)—Hend. Buck.

PARABLE; (parabolē, formed from parabalein, to cast side by side, to compare;) an illustration, or allegorical instruction, founded on something real or apparent in nature or history, from which a moral is drawn, by comparing it with some other thing in which the people are more immediately concerned. (See ALLEGORY.) Aristotle defines parable, a similitude drawn from form to form. Cicero calls it a collation; others, a simile. F. de Colonia calls it a rational fable; but it may be founded on real occurrences, as many parables of our Savior were. The Hebrews call it mesel, from a word which signifies either to predominate or to assimilate; the Proverbs of Solomon are by them also called mesalim, parables, or proverbs.

In the New Testament, the word parable is used variously: in Luke 4: 23, for a proverb, or adage; in Matt. 15: 15, for a thing darkly and figuratively expressed; in Heb. 9: 9, &c., for a type; in Luke 14: 7, &c., for a special instruction; in Matt. 24: 32, for a similitude or comparison.

Parable, according to the eminently learned bishop Lowth, is that kind of allegory which consists of a continued narration of a fictitious or accommodated event, applied to the illustration of some important truth. The Greeks call these ainai, allegories, or apologues; the Latins, fabule, or "fables;" and the writings of the Phrygian sage, or those composed in imitation of him, have acquired the greatest celebrity. Nor has our Savior himself disdained to adopt the same method of instruction; of whose parables it is doubtful whether they excel most in wisdom and utility, or in sweetness, elegance, and perspicuity. As the appellation of parable has been applied to his discourses of this kind, the term is now restricted from its former extensive signification to a more confined sense. But this species of composition occurs very frequently in the prophetic poetry, and particularly in that of Ezekiel. If to us they should sometimes appear obscure, we must remember, that, in those early times when the prophetic writings were indited, it was universally the mode throughout all the eastern nations to convey sacred truths under mysterious figures and representations. In order to our forming a more certain judgment upon this subject, Dr. Lowth has briefly explained some of the primary qualities of the poetic parables; so that, by considering the general nature of them, we may decide more accurately on the merits of particular examples.

It is the first excellence of a parable to turn upon an image well known and applicable to the subject, the meaning of which is clear and definite; for this circumstance will give it perspicuity, which is essential to every species of allegory. If the parables of the sacred prophets are examined by this rule, they will not be found deficient. They are in general founded upon such imagery as is frequently used, and similarly applied by way of metaphor and comparison in the Hebrew poetry. Examples of this kind occur in the parable of the deceitful vineyard, (Isa. 5: 1-7.) and of the useless vine; (Ezek. 15: 19: 10-14.) for under this imagery the ungrateful people of God are more than once described, Ezek. 19: 1-9. 31, 16, 23. Moreover, the image must not only be apt and familiar, but it must be also elegant and beautiful in itself; since it is the purpose of a poetic parable, not only to explain more perfectly some proposition, but frequently to give it some animation and splendor. As the imagery from natural objects is in this respect superior to all others, the parables of the sacred poets consist chiefly of this kind of imagery. It is also essential to the elegance of a parable, that the imagery should not only be apt and beautiful, but that all its parts and appendages should be perspicuous and pertinent. Of all these excellencies, there cannot be more perfect examples than the parables that have been just specified; to which we may add the well-known parable of Nathan, (2 Sam. 12: 1-4.) although written in prose, as well as that of Jotham, (Judges 9: 7-15.) which appears to be the most ancient extant, and approaches somewhat nearer to the poetical form. It is also the criterion of a parable, that it be consistent throughout, and that the literal be never confounded with the figurative sense; and in this respect it materially differs from that species of allegory called the continued metaphor, Isa. 5: 1—7.

The wisdom of our Lord is therefore manifest in adopting this mode of instruction. If a degree of obscurity attaches to it, even this is not without its uses. It is just that kind of difficulty which is demanded by human nature, for its trial, exercise, and improvement. It serves to discover who love the truth, and who are indifferent to it; who are willing to search for it as for hid treasure, and to lift up their voice in prayer for understanding, and who are not. It is admirably adapted also to excite attention, to stimulate curiosity, to exercise the judgment, and through the medium of the imagination to lodge truth permanently in the heart.

Messrs. Ballou and Whittemore have published on the Parables, endeavoring to explain them on Universalist principles. It is time that a better work appeared. The field is rich. Christian Soldier for 1833; Works of Hannah More; Proudfit on the Parables.—Watson.

PARABOLIANA, in the ancient Christian church, were certain persons who employed themselves in visiting the sick, the number of which, in the church of Alexandria, amounted to five or six hundred. The Greeks applied a kindred term (paraboli) to those who hired themselves out to fight with wild beasts in the amphitheatre; and this office was considered, especially in times of public pestilence, as a work of similar danger. Broughton's Diet. from Bingham's Antiq.—Williams.

PARACLETE; an advocate or comforter; generally applied to the third person in the Trinity, John 15: 26. (See HOLY GHOST.)—Head. Buck.

PARADISE, according to the original meaning of the term, whether it be of Hebrew, Chaldee, or Persian derivation, signifies "a place inclosed for pleasure and delight." The LXX., or Greek translators of the Old Testament, make use of the word paradis, when they speak of the garden of Eden, which Jehovah planted at the creation, and in which he placed our first parents. There are three places in the Hebrew text of the Old Testament where this word is found, namely, Neh. 2: 8. Cant. 4: 13. Eccl. 2: 5. The term paradis is obviously used in the New Testament as another word for heaven; by our Lord, (Luke 23: 43.) by the apostle Paul, (2 Cor. 12: 4.) and in the Apocalypse, 2: 7. (See EDEN, and ADAM.)—Watson.

PARÆUS, (DAVID, D. D.), a celebrated divine and reformer, was born Dec. 20, 1548, at Franconstein, in Silesia, and educated at Hemsberg and Heidelberg. He entered on his ministry in 1571, at a village called Schlettenbach, which he soon exchanged for Hemsbach, in the diocese of Worms. It was a stormy time, owing to the contests between the papists and Protestants. Lutherans and Calvinists, and in 1577, Paræus lost his place in consequence of being a sacramentarian, or Calvinist. He went first to Frankenthal, and three years after to Witzingen; but in 1584, prince Casimir made him a professor at Heidelberg. In 1586, he commenced authorship by the publication of his Method of the Ubiquitarian Controversy. (See UBICUITARIANS.) In 1589, he published the German Bible, with notes. He rose to the highest professorship in theology, and his fame drew students to the university from the remotest parts of Hungary and Poland. He died June, 1622.

Paræus was willing to yield many things for the sake of peace, yet he was a determined enemy to all innovation. He used to say with Luther of turbulent reformers, "From a vain-glorious doctor, a litigious pastor, and useless questions, may the good Lord deliver his church!" His exegetical works, (among which is his Commentary on Romans, whose anti-monarchical principles gave such offence to king James I., and the university of Oxford,) were published by his son at Frankfort, 1647, in three vols. folio.—Middleton, vol. ii. 401.

PARAN, DESERT OF; a "great and terrible wilderness" which the children of Israel entered after leaving mount Sinai, (Num. 10: 12. Deut. 1: 19.) and in which thirty-eight of their forty years of wandering were spent. It extended from mount Sinai on the south, to the southern border of the land of Canaan on the north; having the desert of Shur, with its subdivisions, the deserts of Etham and Sin, on the west, and the eastern branch of the Red sea, the desert of Zin and mount Seir, on the east. Burckhardt represents this desert, which he entered from that of Zin, or valley of El Araba, about the parallel of Suez, as a dreary expanse of calcareous soil, covered with black flints.—Watson.

PARAPHRASE; an explanation of some text in clearer and more ample terms, wherein more regard is had to an author's meaning than his words. (See COMMENTARY.)—Head. Buck.

PARDON; the act of forgiving an offender, or removing the guilt of sin, that the punishment due to it may not be inflicted.

Of the nature of pardon, it may be observed, that the Scripture represents it by various phrases: a lifting up, or taking away sin, (Ps. 32: 1.) a covering of it, (Ps. 85: 2.) a non-imputation of it, (Ps. 32: 2.) a blotting it out, (Ps. 43: 25.) a non-remembrance of it, Heb. 8: 12. Isa. 43: 25. 1. It is an act of free grace, Ps. 51: 1. Isa. 43: 25. 2. A point of justice, God having received satisfaction by the blood of Christ, 1 John 1: 9. 3. A complete act, a forgiveness of all the sins of his people, 1 John 1: 7. Ps. 103: 2, 3. 4. An act that will never be repealed, Mic. 7: 19.

The author or cause of pardon is not any creature, angel, or man; but God. Ministers preach and declare that there is remission of sins in Christ; but to pretend to absolve men is the height of blasphemy, 1 Thess. 2: 4. Rev. 13: 5, 6. (See ABSOLUTION; INDULGENCES.) There is nothing that man has, or can do, by which pardon can be procured: wealth cannot buy pardon, (Prov. 11: 4.) human works or righteousness cannot merit it, (Rom. 11: 6.) nor can water baptism wash away sin. It is the prerogative of God alone to forgive, (Mark 2: 7.) the first cause of which is his own sovereign grace and mercy, Eph. 1: 7. The meritorious cause is the blood of Christ, Heb. 9: 14. 1 John 1: 7. It is to be sought by prayer.

Pardon of sin and justification are considered by some as the same thing; and it must be confessed that there is a close connexion; in many parts they agree, and it is without doubt that every sinner who shall be found pardoned at the great day, will likewise be justified; yet they have been distinguished thus:—1. An innocent person, when falsely accused and acquitted, is justified, but not pardoned; and a criminal may be pardoned, though he cannot be justified or declared innocent. Pardon is of men that are sinners, and who remain such, though pardoned sinners; but justification is a pronouncing persons righteous, as if they had never sinned. 2. Pardon frees from punishment, but does not entitle to everlasting life; but justification does, Rom. 5. If we were only pardoned, we should, indeed, escape the pains of hell, but could have no claim to the joys of heaven; for these are more than the most perfect works of man could merit; therefore they must be what the Scripture declares—"the gift of God."

After all, however, though these two may be distinguished, yet they cannot be separated; and, in reality, one is not prior to the other; for he that is pardoned by the death of Christ, is at the same time justified by his life, Rom. 5: 10. Acts 13: 38, 39. PARENTS; a name appropriated to immediate progenitors, as father and mother.

The duties of parents to children relate to their health, their maintenance, their education, and morals. Many rules have been delivered respecting the health of children, which cannot be inserted here; yet we shall just observe, that, if a parent wishes to see his progeny healthy, he must not indulge them in every thing their little appetites desire; not give them too much sleep, nor ever give them strong liquors. He must accustom them to industry and moderate exercise. Their food and clothing should be rather light. They should go to rest soon, and rise early; and, above all, should, if possible, be inspired with a love of cleanliness.

As to their maintenance, it is the parent's duty to provide every thing for them that is necessary until they be capable of providing for themselves. They, therefore, who live in habits of idleness, desert their families, or by their negligent conduct reduce them to a state of indigence and distress, are violating the law of nature and of revelation, 1 Tim. 5: 8.

In respect to their education and morals, great care should be taken. As it relates to the present life, habits of courage, application, trade, prudence, labor, justice, contentment, temperance, truth, benevolence, &c., should be formed. Their capacities, age, temper, strength, inclination, should be consulted, and advice given suitable to these. As it relates to a future life, their minds should be informed as to the being of God, his perfections, glory, and the mode of salvation by Jesus Christ. They should be catechised; allured to a cheerful attendance on divine worship; instructed in the Scriptures; kept from bad company; prayed with and for; and, above all, a good example set them, Prov. 22: 6. Eph. 6: 1, 2.

Nothing can be more criminal than the conduct of some parents in the inferior classes of the community, who never restrain the desires and passions of their children, suffer them to live in idleness, dishonesty, and profanation of the Lord's day, the consequence of which is often an ignominious end. So, among the great, permitting their children to spend their time and their money as they please, indulging them in perpetual public diversions, and setting before them awful examples of gambling, indolence, blasphemy, drinking, and almost every other vice. What is this but ruining their children, and "bequeathing to posterity a nuisance?"

But, while we would call upon parents to exercise their authority, it must not be understood that children are to be entirely at their disposal under all circumstances, especially when they begin to think for themselves. Though a parent has a right over his children, yet he is not to be a domestic tyrant, consulting his own will and passions in preference to their interest. In fact, his right over them is at an end when he goes beyond his duty to them. "For parents," as Mr. Paley observes, "have no natural right over the lives of their children, as was absurdly allowed to Roman fathers; nor any to exercise unprofitable severities; nor to command the commission of crimes; for these rights can never be wanted for the purposes of a parent's duty. Nor have parents any right to sell their children into slavery; to shut up daughters and younger sons in nunneries and monasteries, in order to preserve entire the estate and dignity of the family; or to use any arts, either of kindness or unkindness, to induce them to make choice of this way of life themselves; or in countries where the clergy are prohibited from marriage, to put sons into the church for the same end, who are never likely to do or receive any good in it sufficient to compensate for this sacrifice; nor to urge children to marriages from which they are averse, with the view of exalting or enriching the family, or for the sake of connecting estates, parties, or interests; nor to oppose a marriage in which the child would probably find his happiness, from a motive of pride or avarice, of family hostility or personal pique." PARIS, (MATTHEW,) an English historian, was a Benedictine monk at St. Albans, into which order he entered in 1217. He died in 1259. Matthew Paris was an universal scholar, and a man of great probity. His History is a valuable work.—Davenport.

PARISH, (ELIJAH, D. D.,) minister of Byfield, Mass., was born in Lebanon, Conn., Nov. 7, 1762, and graduated at Dartmouth college in 1785. He was ordained in 1787. After being the minister of Byfield nearly forty years, he died, Oct. 14, 1825, aged sixty-two.

He published, besides Sermons, a History of New England, with Dr. Morse, 1804; with Dr. McClure, Memoirs of Eleazer Wheelock, 8vo, 1811; Gazetteer of the Eastern Continent; Modern Geography; Gazetteer of the Bible. A volume of Sermons was published after his death.—Allen.

PARKER, (ABP. MATTHEW,) a learned prelate, was born, in 1504, at Norwich; was educated at Cambridge; and was successively chaplain to Anne Boleyn, dean of Stoke Clare, master of Bennet college, and dean of Lincoln. In the reign of Mary he was in great danger of being brought to the stake. Elizabeth raised him to the see of Canterbury, which he filled with honor to himself. He died in 1575. Parker took a share in the reformed liturgy, and the Bishop's Bible; published editions of some of the old English historians; and wrote De Antiquitate Britannicæ Ecclesiæ, and some works of less importance.

He is spoken of as pious, sober, temperate; extremely modest, but immovable in the distribution of justice, and fearless in what he considered a good cause. In his disposition, he was most generous and charitable; some of his benefactions were most magnificent. His numerous writings give evidence of extensive erudition, and in various other ways he manifested the enthusiasm of a scholar.—Middleton, vol. ii. 171; Davenport.

PARKER, (SAMUEL, D. D.,) bishop of the Protestant Episcopal church in New England, was born at Portsmouth, N. H., in 1745, and was graduated at Harvard college, in 1764. He was afterwards nine years an instructor of youth in Newburyport and other towns. In 1773, he was ordained by the bishop of London, and May 19, 1775, was established as assistant minister at Trinity church, Boston, of which he became the rector in 1779. During the revolutionary war the other Episcopal clergy men quitted the country, but he remained at his post, and his church was saved from dispersion. After the death of bishop Bass he was elected his successor; but he was at the head of the Episcopal churches but a few months. He died suddenly, at Boston, Dec. 6, 1804, aged fifty-nine.

Distinguished for his benevolence, he was in a peculiar manner the friend of the poor, who in his death mourned the loss of a father. He published a Sermon at the election, 1793; before the asylum, 1803; and some other occasional discourses.—Allen.

PARKER, (ISAAC, LL. D.,) chief justice of Massachusetts, was born in Boston, in 1768, and graduated at Harvard college, in 1786. He commenced the practice of law in the district of Maine, and was elected a member of congress. In 1806, he was appointed a judge of the supreme court, and in 1814, chief justice, as the successor of Mr. Sewall, of which office he with high reputation and faithfulness discharged the duties sixteen years. On Sunday, May 25, 1830, he was suddenly attacked with the apoplexy, of which he died the next morning, May 26, aged sixty-two.

He was a distinguished scholar and friend of literature. For eleven years he was a trustee of Bowdoin college, and for twenty years an overseer of Harvard college. He was a man of great moral worth, and a firm believer in the Christian religion. He published a sketch of the character of judge Parsons, 1813.—Allen.

PARKHURST, (JOHN,) a divine, was born, in 1723, at Catesby, in Northamptonshire; was educated at Rugby school, and Clare hall, Cambridge; and died in 1797. He is the author of a Hebrew Lexicon; a Greek Lexicon; an Address to Wesley; and the Divinity and Pre-existence of Christ demonstrated.—Davenport.

PARLOR; that room in a house where the master or his family customarily speak with visitors: but whether the word rendered parlor has always this import in the Hebrew, may be doubtful. Compare Judg. 3: 20. 1 Sam. 9: 22.—Calmel.

PARNELL, (THOMAS,) a divine and poet, was born, in 1679, at Dublin; was educated at Trinity college, in that city; obtained, in 1705, 1713, and 1716, the archdeaconry of Clogher, a prebend in Dublin cathedral, and the vicarage of Finglass; and died at Chester, in 1717. He was the friend of Swift and Pope, the latter of whom gave the works of Parnell to the press.—Davenport.

PARR, (SAMUEL, LL. D.,) one of the most profound of Greek scholars, was born, in 1746, at Harrow on the Hill, and was educated at the grammar-school of that place, and at Emanuel college, Cambridge. Having, in consequence of his youth, been disappointed of becoming head

He later at Harrow, he established a seminary at Stanmore; which, however, he ultimately gave up, and was successively master of Colchester and Norwich grammar-schools. His first church preferment was the rectory of Asterby, which he obtained in 1780; and the following year he received the degree of doctor of laws. He subsequently received the perpetual curacy of Hatton, the living of Graffham, in Huntingdonshire, and a prebend of St. Paul's cathedral.

In curious and elegant classical knowledge, Dr. Parr seems to be entitled to the lead among the scholars of his day. It is to be regretted, however, that he did not exert his literary powers on subjects of adequate and permanent interest; on which account his sermons and tracts, though written with extraordinary vigor and elegance, will fail to secure lasting attention. Though somewhat too much of a politician for a divine, he evinced singular benevolence and benignity in his general deportment. His works, among which are various Sermons, the Preface to Bellendenus, and a Letter from Irenopolis, have been collected since his decease, and published in eight vols. octavo, together with Memoirs of his Life, and Writings, and a selection from his correspondence, by John Johnson, M. D., 1828. He died March 26, 1825, in his seventy-ninth year.—Davenport.

PARRY, (WILLIAM,) some time president and theological tutor at Wymondley academy, Herts, was born in the year 1751, at Abergavenny, in Monmouthshire. He was the eldest of twelve children, most of whom died young. When he was about seven years of age, he removed with his father to London, where he attended the ministry of Dr. Samuel Stennett. It is not ascertained at what period he first felt the importance of religion; but, at the age of seventeen, he publicly professed his attachment to Christianity, by becoming a member of the church at Stepney, then under the pastoral care of Mr. Brewer, by whom, at the age of twenty, he was introduced to the academy at Homerton. Under the instructions of Drs. Condor, Gibbons, and Fisher, Mr. Parry remained during six years, pursuing, with unremitting ardor and persevering industry, the studies to which he had devoted himself. He was ordained at Little Baddow, Essex, in the year 1780. To his suggestion and benevolent activity, while resident at Baddow, may be attributed the formation of "The Benevolent Society, for the Relief of Necessitous Widows and Children of Protestant Dissenting Ministers, in the Counties of Essex and Herts;" also "The Essex Union," whose object is to promote the extension of the gospel in the county. In the year 1791, when an opposition was made to an application of the dissenters, for a repeal of the Test and Corporation acts, more especially by the noblemen, gentlemen, and clergy of the county of Warwick, he animadverted, with great eloquence and force, on their resolutions, in three letters, addressed to the earl of Aylesford. The pamphlet on the Inspiration of the New Testament appeared in the year 1797, and has obtained for its author an extensive reputation.

Shortly after its publication, proposals were made to Mr. Parry, by the trustees of W. Coward, Esq., to become theological tutor in the dissenting academy, which had for some years been conducted at Northampton and Daventry, by Drs. Doddridge and Ashworth. An earnest desire of extended usefulness led Mr. Parry to accept those proposals; and, in the year 1799, he took an affectionate farewell of his beloved flock at Baddow, after having labored amongst them for twenty years, with great acception and fidelity. Mr. Parry entered on his new and important office at Wymondley, (to which place the academy was removed,) with all that intense application which naturally resulted from the high sense he entertained of its responsibility. As a lecturer, Mr. Parry was distinguished by perspicuity and classical simplicity; and, by a happy union of dignity and affection, he secured the love and veneration of the students intrusted to his care.

In undertaking the office of tutor, Mr. Parry did not resign that of a minister of Christ. Immediately after his settlement at Wymondley, a small chapel was erected on the premises, where a congregation was raised, and a church formed, over which he presided as pastor, till the time of his decease. With the exception of a charge delivered at the ordination of one of his students, Mr. Parry appeared but once in the character of an author, after his removal to Wymondley, which was in a work of a controversial kind, with Dr. Williams, of Rotherham, "On the Origin of Moral Evil." It had been his intention to write a History of the Dissenters, a work for which he was well qualified, and for which he had made considerable preparation; but a painful nervous affection coming on, his design was interrupted, and never afterwards resumed. He died in Nov. 1818.

The death-bed of Mr. Parry was one of calm and holy triumph; he rested with unshaken confidence on the rock of ages, and entered with a smile the gloomy valley, which was to conduct him to the regions of everlasting day. He had just closed his sixty-fourth year.

The writings of Mr. Parry are characterized by clearness of conception, with great accuracy and felicity of expression.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

PARSEES. (See GUEBRES.)

PARSIMONY. (See COVETOUSNESS.)

PARSON; (persona ecclesie;) one that hath full possession of all the rights of a parochial church. He is called parson, (persona;) because by his person the church, which is an invisible body, is represented, and he is in himself a body corporate, in order to protect and defend the rights of the church, which he personates. There are in the church of England three ranks of clergymen below that of a dignitary, viz. parson, vicar, and curate. Parson is the first, meaning a rector, or he who receives the great tithes of a benefice. Clergyman may imply any person ordained to serve at the altar. Parsons are always priests, whereas clergymen are often only deacons. (See CLERGY; CURATE.)—Hend. Buck.

PARSONS, (JONATHAN,) minister in Newburyport, Mass., was graduated at Yale college in 1729, having given indications of an uncommon genius. Soon after he began to preach, he was ordained minister of Lyme, Conn., where he continued several years. The last thirty years of his life were spent at Newburyport, in one of the largest congregations in America. His labors were incessant, and he sometimes sunk under his exertions. During his last sickness he enjoyed the peace of a Christian. He expressed his unwavering assurance of an interest in the favor of God through the Redeemer. He died July 19, 1776, aged about sixty-six.

Mr. Parsons was a Presbyterian. As a preacher he was eminently useful. During some of the first years of his ministry his style was remarkably correct and elegant; but after a course of years, when his attention was occupied by things of greater importance, his manner of writing was less polished, though perhaps it lost nothing of its pathos and energy. In his preaching he dwelt much and with earnestness upon the doctrines of grace, knowing it to be the design of the Christian religion to humble the pride of man and to exalt the grace of God. He labored to guard his people both against the giddy wildness of enthusiasm, and the licentious tenets of Antinomian delusion. His invention was fruitful, his imagination rich, his voice clear and commanding, varying with every varying passion, now forcible, majestic, terrifying, and now soft, and persuasive, and melting. His zealous and indefatigable exertions were not in vain. During his ministry at Lyme, at a period of uncommon effusion of God's Spirit of grace, he indulged the belief, that near two hundred of his people were renewed in the dispositions of their minds, and enlightened by the truth as it is in Jesus; and his labors at Newburyport were attended by a happy revival of religion. He was eminent as a scholar, for he was familiar with the classics, and he was skilled in the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew languages. He was accounted a dexterous and masterly reasoner. He published a Sermon at Boston Lecture, 1742; Good News from a far Country, in seven discourses, 1756; Observations, &c., 1757; Manna gathered in the Morning, 1761; Infant Baptism from Heaven, in two discourses, 1765; a Sermon on the Death of G. Whitfield, 1770; Freedom from Civil and Ecclesiastical Tyranny the Purchase of Christ, 1774; sixty Sermons on various subjects, in two volumes, 8vo, 1780. Searl's Sermon on his Death.—Allen.

PARSONS, (THEOPHILUS, LL. D.,) chief justice of Massachusetts, the son of Rev. Moses Parsons, of Byfield, was born Feb. 24, 1750. After graduating at Harvard college, in 1769, he studied law with judge Bradbury, of Falmouth, now Portland, and kept the grammar-school. When the town was burnt by the British, he returned to his father's, and soon opened an office in Newburyport. In 1779, he was a member of the convention which framed the constitution of Massachusetts; he was also in 1789 a member of the state convention, which adopted the constitution of the United States. He removed to Boston in 1800. After an extensive practice of thirty-five years he succeeded chief justice Dana, in 1806. He died at his residence in Boston, Oct. 30, 1813, aged sixty-three. He was not more remarkable for his deep learning, than for the keenness of his wit. His repartees were often very cutting. Not only was he a profound lawyer, but an excellent classical scholar and a skilful mathematician. His political influence, in the party divisions of his day, was very great.

Of his belief in Christianity he made a profession in his last years, joining the church in Boston, of which Dr. Kirkland was the pastor. "I examined," he was accustomed to say to his friends, "the proof, and weighed the objections to Christianity, many years ago, with the accuracy of a lawyer; and the result was so entire a conviction of its truth, that I have only to regret that my belief has not more completely influenced my conduct." Two days before his death, he repeated his strong conviction to Dr. Kirkland in the following terms: "I could as soon doubt the existence of God himself, as the truth of the Christian religion." The judgment of such a man ought to be generally known. The first six volumes of the Massachusetts Reports contain many of his judicial decisions, which were respected not only at home, but in Europe, as pre-eminent in wisdom. In the opinion of judge Parker, had he lived in England, he would have been made lord chancellor, or lord chief justice. Parker's Sketch; Knapp's Biog. Sketches, 37-77; Christian Disciple, vol. ii.—Allen.

PARSONS, (LEVI,) missionary to Palestine, the son of a minister, was born in Goshen, Mass., July 18, 1792. At the age of sixteen he became a Christian, and while he was a member of college he became earnestly desirous to be a missionary. During three revivals of religion his efforts were made extensively useful.

He was graduated at Middlebury in 1814, and studied theology at Andover. After being ordained in Sept. 1817, he was an agent of the Board of Missions. In Nov. 1819, he sailed with Mr. Fisk for Palestine, and arrived at Snyrna in Jan. 1820; after passing half a year at Sco, he proceeded to Jerusalem, where he remained from Feb. to May, 1821. In Dec. he went with Mr. Fisk to Alexandria, where he died in great peace and triumph, Feb. 10, 1822, aged twenty-nine. He was a good scholar, and very amiable and interesting in his manners, and devoted to his benevolent work. His Life was written by his brother-in-law, D. O. Morton, 1824.—Allen.

PART, PORTION, frequently signifies the source of satisfaction, or happiness. "The Lord is the portion of mine inheritance," Psal. 16: 5. 142: 5. "The Lord's portion is his people; Jacob is the lot of his inheritance," Deut. 32: 9. But with this difference; God makes and constitutes the happiness of his people, but his people cannot augment God's happiness or glory.

Part or portion also signifies recompense, or punishment: "This is the portion of a wicked man from God, and the heritage appointed unto him by God," Job 20: 29. Psal. 63: 10. 11: 6. The Lord shall "appoint him his portion with the hypocrites," Matt. 24: 51. "What part hath he that believeth with an infidel?" 2 Cor 6: 15 (See next article).—Calmet.

PARTAKE; to receive a share. The saints are partakers of Christ and of the heavenly calling. By receiving Jesus Christ and his Spirit into their hearts, they possess them and their blessings and influences as their own, and are effectually called to the heavenly glory, Heb. 3: 1—14: 6: 4. They are partakers of God's promises and benefits; they have an interest in all the promises, and shall receive every blessing therein contained, Eph. 3: 6. 1 Tim. 6: 2. They are partakers of the divine nature, and of Christ's holiness, when, through union to Christ and fellowship with him in his righteousness and spirit, their nature is conformed to Christ, 2 Pet. 1: 4. They partake of Christ's sufferings, and of the afflictions of the gospel, when they are persecuted for their adherence to the truth and example of Christ, 1 Pet. 4: 13. 2 Cor. 1: 7. 2 Tim. 1: 8. They partake of the grace of Paul, and other ministers, when they receive spiritual edification from their ministry, Phil. 1: 7. Hypocrites are partakers of the Holy Ghost. Some of them in the apostolic age enjoyed his miraculous gifts and operations; and in every age they receive such convictions, or other influences, as are separable from a state of grace, Heb. 6: 4. Men become partakers in other men's sins, by contriving, consenting, inclining to, rejoicing in, assisting to commit, or sharing the profits or pleasures of their sin; or by occasioning them by an evil example, or offensive use of things indifferent; by provoking or tempting to, or not doing all we can to hinder their sin; or by commanding, exciting, or hiring men to sin; or by defending, extenuating, or commending their sin; by neglecting to reprove, and promote the proper punishment of sin; and by not mourning over and praying against sin, Rev. 18: 4 Eph. 5: 11.—Brown.

PARTHENAI, (ANNE OE,) an accomplished and pious lady, the wife of Anthony de Pons, count of Mareneus, was duchess of Ferrara, daughter of Lewis XII, and one of the brightest ornaments of the court of Reuée de France. She was a protectress of learning, and was herself, on account of her abilities and accomplishments, the delight of every society into which she entered. She understood Greek and Latin, and took great pleasure in conversing with theologians, and reading the Scriptures, which induced her to turn Protestant.—Etham.

PARTHIA is thought to have been originally a province of Media, on its eastern side, which was raised into a distinct kingdom by Arsaces, B. C. 250. It soon extended itself over a great part of the ancient Persian empire, and is frequently put for that empire in Scripture, and other ancient writings. Parthia maintained itself against all aggressors for nearly five hundred years, but in A. D. 226, one of the descendants of the ancient Persian kings united it to the ancient empire, and Persia resumed its ancient name and dynasty.

It is said the Parthians were either refugees or exiles from the Scythian nations. Jews from among them were present at Jerusalem at the Pentecost, Acts 2: 9.—Calmet.

PARTRIDGE, (kra, 1 Sam. 26: 20. Jer. 17: 11; perdir, Eccus. 11: 30.) In the first of these places David says, "The king of Israel is come out to hunt a partridge on the mountains;" and in the second, "The partridge sitteth on eggs, and produceth," or hatcheth, "not; so be that getteth riches, and not by right, shall leave them in the midst of his days, and at his end shall be contemptible." This passage does not necessarily imply that the partridge hatches the eggs of a stranger, but only that she often fails in her attempts to bring forth her young. To such disappointments she is greatly exposed from the position of her nest on the ground, where her eggs are often spoiled by the wet, or crushed by the foot. So that broods over his ill-gotten gains will often find them unproductive; or, if he leaves them, as a bird occasionally driven from her nest, may be despoiled of their possession.

As to the hunting of the partridge, which, Dr. Shaw observes, is the greater, or red-legged kind, the traveller says, "The Arabs have another, though a more laborious method of catching these birds; for, observing that they become languid and fatigued after they have been hastily put up twice or thrice, they immediately run in upon them, and knock them down with their zernattys, or bludgeons as we should call them." Precisely in this manner Saul hunted David, coming hastily upon him, putting him up incessantly, in hopes that at length his strength and resources would fail, and he would become an easy prey to his pursuer. Forskal mentions a partridge whose name in Arabic is kurr; and Latham says, that, in the province of Andalusia in Spain, the name of the partridge is churr; both taken, no doubt, like the Hebrew, from its note.—Watson.

PARVAIM; the name of a region, (2 Chron. 3: 6.) thought to be the same as Ophir.—Colmet.

PASAGINIANS; (Pasagini;) a denomination which arose in the twelfth century, called also The Circumcised. Moshem says the meaning of the term is unknown; but they seem to have been a remnant of the Nazarenes, (which see,) and their distinguishing tenets were:—1. That the observation of the law of Moses, in every thing, except the offering of sacrifices, was obligatory upon Christians. 2. That Christ was no more than the first and purest creature of God, which was the doctrine of the Semi-Arians. They had the utmost aversion to the dominion and discipline of the church of Rome. Mosheim's E. H. vol. iii. pp. 127-8.—Williams.

PASCAL, (BLAISE,) "perhaps the most brilliant intellect that ever lighted on this lower world," was born at Clermont, in the province of Auvergne, on the 19th of June, 1623. He was descended from one of the best families in that province. As soon as Blaise Pascal was able to speak, he discovered marks of extraordinary capacity, which he evinced, not only by the general pertinency and acuteness of his replies, but particularly by the questions which he asked concerning the nature of things, and his reasonings upon them; which were much superior to what is common at his age. His mother having died in 1626, his father, who was an excellent scholar, and an able mathematician, and who lived in habits of intimacy with several persons of the greatest learning and science at that time in France, determined to take upon himself the whole charge of his son's education.

Before young Pascal had attained his twelfth year, two circumstances occurred which deserve to be recorded, as they discovered the turn, and evinced the superiority of his mind. Having remarked one day, at table, the sound produced by a person accidentally striking an earthenware plate with a knife, and that the vibrations were immediately stopped by putting his hand on the plate, he became anxious to investigate the cause of this phenomenon, and employed himself in making a number of experiments on sound, the result of which he committed to writing, so as to form a little treatise on the subject, which was found very correct and ingenious. The other occurrence was his first acquisition, or, as it might not improperly be termed, his invention of geometry. His father, though very fond of the mathematics himself, had studiously kept from him every means of becoming acquainted with them. This he did, partly in conformity to the maxim he had hitherto followed, of keeping his son superior to his task; and partly, from an apprehension that a science so engaging, and at the same time so abstracted, and which was on that account peculiarly suited to the turn of his son's mind, would probably absorb too much of his attention, and stop the progress of his other studies, if he were once initiated into it. But the activity of a penetrating and inquisitive mind is not to be so easily restrained. As from respect to his father's authority, however, he had so far regarded his prohibition as to pursue this study only in private, and at his hours of recreation, he went on for some time undiscovered; but, one day, while he was employed in this manner, his father accidentally entered the room, unobserved by Pascal, who was wholly intent on the subject of his investigation. His father stood for some time unperceived, and observed, with the greatest astonishment, that his son was surrounded with geometrical figures, and was then actually employed in finding out the proportion of the angles formed by a triangle, one side of which is produced; which is the subject of the thirty-second proposition in the First Book of Euclid. His father at length asked him what he was doing. The son, surprised and confused to find his father was there, told him he wanted to find out this and that, mentioning the different parts contained in that theorem. His father then asked how he came to inquire about that. He replied he had found out such a thing, naming some more simple problems; and thus, in reply to different questions, he showed that he had gone on his own investigations, totally unassisted, from the most simple definition in geometry, to Euclid's thirty-second position. His subsequent progress perfectly accorded with this extraordinary elicitation of his talents. Pascal gave his son Euclid's Elements to peruse at his hours of recreation. He read them, and understood them without any assistance. His progress was so rapid that he was soon admitted to the meetings of a society of which his father, Berouval, and some other celebrated mathematicians were members, and from which originated the Royal academy of sciences at Paris.

During Pascal's residence with his father at Rouen, and while he was only in his nineteenth year, he invented his famous arithmetical machine, by which all numerical calculations, however complex, can be made by the mechanical operation of its different parts, without any arithmetical skill in the person who uses it. He had a patent for this invention in 1649. His studies however began to be interrupted when he had reached his eighteenth year by some symptoms of ill health, which were thought to be the effect of intense application, and which never afterwards entirely quitted him, so that he sometimes used to say, that from the time he was eighteen, he had never passed a day without pain. But Pascal, though out of health, was still Pascal; ever active, ever inquiring, and satisfied only with that for which an adequate reason could be assigned. Having heard of the experiments instituted by Torricelli, to find out the cause of the rise of water in fountains and pumps, and of the mercury in the barometer, he was induced to repeat them, and to make others to satisfy himself on the subject.

In 1654, he invented his arithmetical triangle, for the solution of problems respecting the combinations of stakes in unfinished games of hazard; and long after that he wrote his "Demonstrations of the Problems relating to the Cycloid," besides several pieces on other subjects in the higher branches of the mathematics, for which his genius was probably most fitted. Pascal, though not rich, was independent in his circumstances; and as his peculiar talents, his former habits, and the state of his health, all called for retirement, he did well to embrace it. From 1655, therefore, he associated only with a few friends of the same religious opinions with himself, and lived for the most part in privacy in the society of Port Royal.

About that time there were dissensions between the Jansenists and the Jesuits; and as Pascal was a Jansenist, he engaged in the controversy. It was during the agitation of this affair, respecting Arnauld, that Pascal, under the fictitious name of Louis de Montalte, published the first of the "Letters of a Provincial to one of his Friends," in which he ridicules the assemblies that were held on that occasion, with a poignancy of wit and eloquence, of which the French language had at that time furnished no example. In this letter, and the five following, the provincial writes an account to his friend of the visits he has made to various persons, both among the Jansenists and the Jesuits, in order to find out the nature of the dispute, and the meaning of the terms that are employed. The absurdity of several of these, the injustice of the proposed censure, the conformity of Arnauld's sentiments with Scripture and the fathers, and, above all, the duplicity of the jesuitical party, or rather parties, who united in their enmity against him, are admirably exposed. In the next six letters he lays open the false morality of the Jesuits, by the recital of an interview with one of their casuists, who teaches him the maxims and opinions of their most approved writers, in their own words, which he is represented as hearing with astonishment and surprise. The remarks he is represented to make in the course of the conversation, and his additional observations to his friend, contain a complete development of their iniquity with the keenest satire, in language at once elegant, correct, and intelligible to every capacity. The encomiums Voltaire has bestowed on this production, coincide with those of his friend, D'Alembert. Both of them, however, blame Pascal for not equally ridiculing the doctrines of the Jansenists, whom Voltaire falsely represents as being competitors with the Jesuits for political interest and power. (See JESUITS.) Pascal's controversy with the Jesuits was not confined to the Provincial Letters, for he wrote some masterly papers to the curates of Paris and Rouen, and which were called "Factums."

But Pascal's bodily infirmities now increased; and as his health declined, he became more reserved in his intercourse with others, and feeling increasing impressions of the vanity of life, and the obligation of Christians to benevolence, he carried his self-denial to an unusual degree of austerity. In order to check the emotions of a passion to which he felt himself subject, he wore round his body a cincture of iron, set with sharp points, which he used to strike with his hand, when he was conscious of those feelings of pride which he so strongly condemned. It must be, however, observed, that Pascal did not imagine his religion was to consist merely in outward observances; nor did he ascribe to his own merit the changes he had experienced in his disposition.

What may be called the last illness of this great man began in June, 1662, not without suspicion of poison. He was desirous that the sacrament should be administered to him. The last words he uttered were, "May God never forsake me!" and on the 19th of August, 1662, aged thirty-nine years and three months, he expired.

Towards the close of his life, he had occupied himself wholly in religious meditation, committing to writing such pious and moral reflections as occurred to him. These were published after his death, under the title of "Pensées de M. Pascal, sur la Religion, et sur quelques autres Sujets;" that is, "Pascal's Thoughts on Religion, and other Subjects." They are contained in thirty-two chapters, and have been greatly admired by philosophers for their profundity. They have been translated into English, and will well repay the reader's attention. The best edition was published at Edinburgh, about the year 1825, (and republished in the U. S.) edited by Craig, with a life prefixed. The whole of Pascal's works were collected together and published at Paris in 1779, under the superintendance of the abbé Bossuet.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

PASSALORYNCHITES; a branch of the Montanists, (which see,) who held it necessary to observe a perpetual silence; wherefore they are said (no doubt in ridicule) to have kept their finger constantly upon their mouth, and dared not open it even to say their prayers; and from this circumstance arose the denomination, the name of which, according to Broughton, is derived from passalus, a nail, and rin, the nostril, which looks as if they put their finger (or finger nail perhaps) to their nose rather than mouth. It seems, however, that they were a prudent, cautious sect, more ready to hear than to speak. Broughton's Diet.—Williams.

PASSION. This word has several very different significations. First, it signifies the passion or suffering of Christ: "To whom also he showed himself alive after his passion," Acts 1: 3. Secondly, it signifies shameful passions, (Rom. 1: 26.) to which those are given up, whom God abandons to their own desires, Rom. 7: 5. 1 Thess. 4: 5. Thirdly, passion, in its general import, signifies every feeling of the mind occasioned by an extrinsic cause. It is used to describe a violent commotion or agitation of the mind; emotion, zeal, ardor, or even of ease wherein a man can conquer his desires, or hold them in subjection. (See AFFECTIONS.)

As to the number of the passions, Le Brun makes them about twenty: (1.) attention; (2.) admiration; (3.) astonishment; (4.) veneration; (5.) rapture; (6.) joy, with tranquillity; (7.) desire; (8.) laughter; (9.) acute pain; (10.) pains, simply bodily; (11.) sadness; (12.) weeping; (13.) compassion; (14.) scorn; (15.) horror; (16.) terror or fright; (17.) anger; (18.) hatred; (19.) jealousy; (20.) despair. All these may be represented on canvass by the pencil. Some make their number greater, adding aversion, love, emulation, &c. &c.; these, however, may be considered as included in the above list. They are divided by some into public and private; proper and improper; social and selfish passions.

The original of the passions are from impressions on the senses; from the operations of reason, by which good or evil are foreseen; and from the recollections of memory.

The objects of the passions are mostly things sensible, on account of their near alliance to the body; but objects of a spiritual nature also, though invisible, have a tendency to excite the passions; such as the love of God, heaven, hell, eternity, &c.

As to the innocency of the passions: in themselves they are neither good nor evil, but according to the good or ill use that is made of them, and the degrees to which they rise.

The usefulness of the passions is considerable, and were given us for a kind of spring or elasticity to correct the natural sluggishness of the corporeal part. They gave birth to poetry, science, painting, music, and all the polite arts, which minister to pleasure; nor are they less serviceable in the cause of religion and truth. "They," says Dr. Watts, "when sanctified, set the powers of the understanding at work in the search of divine truth and religious duty; they keep the soul fixed to divine things; render the duties of holiness much easier, and temptations to sin much weaker; and render us more like Christ, and fitter for his presence and enjoyment in heaven."

As to the regulation of the passions: to know whether they are under due restraints, and directed to proper objects, we must inquire whether they influence our opinions; run before the understanding; are engaged in trifling, and neglectful of important objects; express themselves in an indecent manner; and whether they disorder our conduct. If this be the case, they are out of their due bounds, and will become sources of trial rather than instruments of good. To have them properly regulated, we should possess knowledge of our duty, take God's word for our rule, be much in prayer and dependence on the Divine Being.

Lastly, we should study the passions. To examine them accurately, indeed, requires much skill, patience, observation, and judgment; but to form any proper idea of the human mind, and its various operations; to detect the errors that arise from heated temperament and intellectual excess; to know how to touch their various strings, and to direct and employ them in the best of all services; I say, to accomplish these ends, the study of the passions is of the greatest consequence.

"Amidst the numerous branches of knowledge," says Mr. Cogan, "which claim the attention of the human mind, no one can be more important than this. What ever most intimately concerns ourselves must be of the first moment. An attention, therefore, to the workings of our own minds; tracing the power which external objects have over us; discovering the nature of our emotions and affections; and comprehending the reason of our being affected in a particular manner, must have a direct influence upon our pursuits, our characters, and our happiness. It may with justice be advanced, that the happiness of ourselves in this department is of much greater utility than abstruser speculations concerning the nature of the human soul, or even the most accurate knowledge of its intellectual powers: for it is according as the passions and affections are excited and directed towards the objects investigated by our intellectual natures, that we become useful to ourselves and others; that we rise into respectability, or sink into contempt; that we diffuse or enjoy happiness, diffuse or suffer misery. An accurate analysis of these passions and affections, therefore, is to the moralist what the science of anatomy is to the surgeon. It constitutes the first principles of rational practice; it is, in a moral view, the anatomy of the heart; it discovers why it beats, and how it beats; indicates appearances in a sound and healthy state; detects diseases with their causes; and it is infinitely more fortunate in the power it communicates of applying suitable remedies."

PASSIVE OBEDIENCE OF CHRIST. (See OBEDIENCE, and SUFFERINGS OF CHRIST.)—Hend. Buck.

PASSIVE POWER; a phrase employed to denote a power of producing change, not actively, but negatively. Dr. Williams, who has revived the use of it in theology, understands by it what some philosophers have denominated malum metaphysicum, by which is meant the immediate cause of defectibility, mutability, or limitation in creatures. Every created being and property must necessarily be limited. Limitation is as essentially an attribute of a creature, as infinity is of the Creator. This limitedness implies defectibility, fallibility, and mutability. It is in this principle, which is entirely of a negative character, that evil is ultimately to be referred. It is not communicated to the creature by his Maker, nor could any act of will or power prevent its connexion with any created nature, any more than such an act of will or power could change the very essence of creatureship, or cause an uncaused being. And, as the principle itself is not communicated, or caused by the Creator, so neither are its results. They can be traced no higher than to the being in whom they are developed. To himself alone must every one ascribe them; to himself as a creature, in relation to the principle; but to himself as sinful in relation to the moral results. Gilbert's Life of Dr. Williams, note c.—Hend. Buck.

PASSIVE PRAYER, among the mystic divines, is a total suspension or ligature of the intellectual faculties, in virtue whereof the soul remains of itself, and, as to its own power, impotent with regard to the producing of any effects. The passive state, according to Fenelon, is only passive in the same sense as contemplation; i. e. it does not exclude peaceable, disinterested acts, but only quiet ones, or such as tend to our own interest. In the passive state the soul has not properly any activity, any sensation of its own. It is a mere flexibility of the soul, to which the feeblest impulse of grace gives motion. (See MYSTIC, and QUIETISM.)—Hend. Buck.

PASSOVER; (Heb. pesach, Gr. pascha;) a solemn festival of the Jews, instituted in commemoration of their coming out of Egypt. The night before their departure, the destroying angel, who put to death the first-born of the Egyptians, passed over the houses of the Hebrews, without entering therein; because they were marked with the blood of the lamb, which was killed the evening before, and which, for this reason, was called the paschal lamb.

The following is what God ordained concerning the passover: the month of the coming out of Egypt (Nisan) was to be the first month of the sacred or ecclesiastical year; and the fourteenth day of this month, between the two evenings, that is, between the sun's decline and its setting; or rather, according to our reckoning, between three o'clock in the afternoon and six in the evening, at the equinox, they were to kill the paschal lamb, and to abstain from leavened bread. The day following, being the fifteenth, reckoned from six o'clock of the preceding evening, was the grand feast of the passover, which continued seven days; but only the first and seventh days were peculiarly solemn. The slain lamb was to be without defect, a male, and of that year. If no lamb could be found, they might take a kid. They killed a lamb or a kid in each family; and if the number of the family was not sufficient to eat the lamb, they might associate two families together. With the blood of the lamb they sprinkled the door-posts and lintel of every house, that the destroying angel at the sight of the blood might pass over them. They were to eat the lamb the same night, roasted, with unleavened bread, and a salad of wild lettuces, or bitter herbs. It was forbid to eat any part of it raw, or boiled; nor were they to break a bone; but it was to be eaten entire, even with the head, the feet, and the bowels. If any thing remained to the day following, it was to be thrown into the fire, Exod. 12: 46. Num. 9: 12. John 19: 36. They who ate it were to be in the posture of travellers, having their reins girt, shoes on their feet, staves in their hands, and eating in a hurry. This last part of the ceremony was but little observed; at least, it was of no obligation after that night when they came out of Egypt. During the whole eight days of the passover no leavened bread was to be used. They kept the first and last day of the feast; yet it was allowed to dress victuals, which was forbidden on the Sabbath day. The obligation of keeping the passover was so strict, that whoever should neglect it was condemned to death, Num. 9: 13. But those who had any lawful impediment, as a journey, sickness, or uncleanness, voluntary or involuntary, for example, those who had been present at a funeral, &c., were to defer the celebration of the passover till the second month of the ecclesiastical year, the fourteenth day of the month Jair, which answers to April and May. We see an example of this postponed passover under Hezekiah, 2 Chron. 30: 2, 3, &c.

It has been thought a famous question, whether our Savior kept the legal and Jewish passover the last year of his life. Some have thought that the supper he ate with his disciples on the evening when he instituted the sacrament of his body and blood, was an ordinary meal, without a paschal lamb. Others, that he anticipated the passover, keeping it on the Thursday evening, while the other Jews kept it on the Friday. Others have advanced that the Galileans kept the passover on Thursday, as Christ did; but that the other Jews kept it on Friday. It is, however, the most general opinion of the Christian church, as well Greek as Latin, that our Savior kept the legal passover on the Thursday evening, as well as the rest of the Jews. The principal difficulty in the way of this opinion is found in the gospel of John, who says that Jesus being at the table with his disciples, "before the feast of the passover, when Jesus knew that his hour was come," John 13: 1. 18: 28. 19: 14, 31. Hence Calmet, in a very elaborate dissertation on our Savior's last passover, has endeavored to show, that our Savior did not celebrate the passover the last year of his life. In this opinion he is supported by several of the ancients. But it has one fatal objection; it contradicts the express language of the evangelists. Hence some of the modern theologians, as Paulus, De Wette, Winer, and Bretschneider, have affirmed that the evangelist John contradicts not only the other evangelists, but himself. But the whole difficulty has been completely cleared up by J. H. Kauch, who, by an accurate comparison of the accounts of Moses, of Josephus, and of the evangelists, has shown that Jesus, according to the law and custom of the Jews, held the paschal meal with his disciples in the first, not the last hour of the 14th of Nisan; (Lev. 23: 5) that is, on Thursday evening, while the festival, or "feast of the passover," which occupied seven days, (Lev. 23: 6—8) did not begin till the Friday evening following. The hour of beginning, and different senses of the word "passover," have not been properly considered by the objectors.

The word pascha, or passover, is taken, (1.) For the passing over of the destroying angel; (2.) For the paschal lamb. (3.) For the meal at which it was eaten. (4.) For the festival instituted in memory of the coming out of Egypt, and the passage of the destroying angel. (5.) For all the victims offered during the paschal solemnity. (6.) For the unleavened bread eaten during the eight days of the passover. (7.) For all the ceremonies of this solemnity.

The modern Jews observe in general the ceremonies practised by their ancestors in the celebration of the passover. Whilst the temple was in existence, the Jews brought their lambs thither, and there sacrificed them; and they offered their blood to the priest, who poured it out at the foot of the altar.

The paschal lamb was an illustrious type of Christ, who became a sacrifice for the redemption of his church from sin and misery; but resemblances between the type and antitype have been strained by many writers into a great number of fanciful particulars. It is enough for us to be assured, that as Christ is called "our passover;" and the "Lamb of God," without "spot," by the "sprinkling of whose blood" we are delivered from guilt and punishment; and as faith in him is represented to us as "eating the flesh of Christ," with evident allusion to the eating of the paschal sacrifice; so, in these leading particulars, the mystery of our redemption was set forth. The paschal lamb therefore prefigured the offering of the spotless Son of God, the appointed "propitiation for the sins of the whole world;" by virtue of which, when received by faith, we are delivered from the bondage of guilt and misery, and nourished with strength for our heavenly journey to that land of rest, of which Canaan, as early as the days of Abraham, became the divinely instituted figure. PASTOR; literally a shepherd; figuratively a stated minister appointed to watch over and instruct a congregation.

Jesus Christ's description of an evangelical pastor, (Matt. 24: 45.) includes two things, faithfulness and prudence. "If a minister be faithful, he deceives not others; and if he be prudent, he is not apt to deceive himself. His prudence suffers not deceivers easily to impose upon him; and his faithfulness will not suffer him knowingly to impose upon his people. His prudence will enable him to discern, and his faithfulness oblige him to distribute wholesome food to his flock. But more particularly.

"1. Ministerial faithfulness includes pure and spiritual aims and intentions for God, Phil. 2: 20, 21. 2. Personal sincerity, or integrity of heart, Neh. 9: 8. 1 Cor. 2: 12. 3. Diligence in the discharge of duty, Matt. 25: 21. 1 Tim. 4: 2. 4. Impartiality in the administrations of Christ's house, 1 Tim. 5: 21. 5. An unshaken constancy and perseverance to the end, Rev. 2: 10. But the Lord's servants must not only be faithful, but prudent, discreet, and wise. Fidelity and honesty make a good Christian; but the addition of prudence to fidelity makes a good steward. Faithfulness will fix the eye upon the right end; but it is prudence must direct to the proper means of attaining it. The use of prudence to a minister is unspeakably great; it not only gives clearness and perspicacity to the mind, by freeing it from passions and corporeal impressions, enabling it thereby to apprehend what is best to be done, but enables it in its deliberations about the means to make choice of the most apt and proper; and directs the application of them in the fittest season, without precipitation by too much haste, or hazard by too tedious delay.

"1. Prudence will direct us to lay a good foundation of knowledge in our people's souls, by catechising and instructing them in the principles of Christianity, without which we labor in vain. 2. Ministerial prudence discovers itself in the choice of such subjects as the need of our people's souls most require. 3. It will not only direct us in the choice of our subjects, but of the language, too, in which we dress and deliver them to the people. 4. It will show us of what great use our own affections are for the moving of others; and will therefore advise us, that, if ever we expect the truths we preach should operate upon the hearts of others, we must first have them impressed on our own hearts, Phil. 3: 18. 5. It will direct us to be careful, by the strictness and gravity of our deportment, to maintain our esteem in the consciences of our people. 6. It will excite us to seek a blessing from God upon our studies and labors, as knowing all our ministerial success entirely depends thereupon," 1 Cor. 3: 7. See Flavel's Character of an Evangelical Pastor, in the second volume of his works, p. 763, fol. ed.; and books under article MINISTER OF THE GOSPEL.—Hend. Buck.

PASTORAL THEOLOGY; that department of theological science which relates to the practical duties of the ministerial office. Lectures on the subject are delivered at universities of Germany, the Dissenting colleges of England, and the theological seminaries of the United States. It has been treated more or less at large in Burwell's and Gerard's Pastoral Care; Baxter's Reformed Pastor; Mason's Student and Pastor; Bridge's Christian Ministry; Miller's Clerical Manners; Robinson's Bibl. Repos. See works under MINISTER OF THE GOSPEL.—Hend. Buck.

PATARA; a maritime city of Lycia, where Paul, going from Philippi to Jerusalem, found a ship bound for Phœnicia, in which he sailed, (Acts 21: 1.) A. D. 58.—Calmet.

PATERNOSTER; 1. The Latin for Our Father, or the Lord's prayer. 2. Every tenth large bead in the rosary which Catholics use at their devotions: at this they repeat the Lord's prayer; but at the intervening small ones, only an Ave Maria, i. e. Hail, Mary! 3. The rosary itself.—Hend. Buck.

PATH; the general course of any moving body. So we say, the path of the sun in the heavens; and to this the wise man compares the path of the just, which is, he says, like daybreak; it increases in light and splendor till perfect day. It may be obscure, feeble, dim, at first, but afterwards it shines in full brilliancy, Prov. 4: 18.

The course of a man's conduct and general behavior is called the path in which he walks, by a very easy metaphor: and as when a man walks from place to place in the dark, he may be glad of a light to assist in directing his steps, so the word of God is a light to guide those in their course of piety and duty, who otherwise might wander, or be at a loss for direction. Wicked men, and wicked women, are said to have paths full of snares. The dispensations of God are his paths, Psal. 25: 10. The precept of God are paths, Psal. 17: 5. 65: 4. The phenomena of nature are paths of God; (Psal. 77: 19. Isa. 43: 16.) and to those depths which are beyond human inspection, the course of God in his providence is likened. If his paths are obscure in nature, so they may be in providence, and in grace too. May he show us, with increasing clearness, "the path of life!" (See CAUSEY.)—Calmet.

PATHROS; (Jer. 44: 1, 15. Ezek. 29: 14. 30: 14.) or of three ancient divisions of Egypt, which answered to the Greek Thebais.—Colmet.

PATIENCE; that calm and unruffled temper with which a good man bears the evils of life.

"Patience," says an eminent writer, "is apt to be ranked by many among the more humble and obscure virtues, belonging chiefly to those who groan on a sick bed, or who languish in a prison; but in every circumstance of life, no virtue is more important both to duty and to happiness. It is not confined to a situation of continued adversity: it principally, indeed, regards the disagreeable circumstances which are apt to occur: but prosperity cannot be enjoyed, any more than adversity supported, without it. It must enter into the temper, and form the habit of the soul, if we would pass through the world with tranquillity and honor."

"Christian patience," says Mason, "is essentially different from insensibility, whether natural, artificial, or acquired. This, indeed, sometimes passes for patience, though it be in reality quite another thing; for patience signifies suffering. Now if you inflict ever so much pain on the body of another, if he is not sensible of it, it is no pain to him; he suffers nothing; consequently calmness under it is no patience. This insensibility is sometimes natural. Some, in the native temperament of their mind and body, are much less susceptible of pain than others are. There are different degrees of insensibility in men, both in their animal and mental frame; so that the same event may be a great exercise of patience to one man, which is none at all to another; as the latter feels little or no pain from that wound inflicted on the body or mind which gives the most exquisite anguish to the former. Again; there is an artificial insensibility, such as is procured by opiates, which blunt the edge of pain; and there is an acquired insensibility, or that which is attained by the force of principles strongly inculcated, or by long custom. Such was the apathy of the Stoics, who obstinately maintained that pain was no evil, and therefore bore it with amazing firmness, which, however, was very different from the virtue of Christian patience, as appears from the principles from which they respectively proceeded; the one springing from pride, the other from humility." Christian patience, then, is something different from all these. "It is not a careless indolence, a stupid insensibility, mechanical bravery, constitutional fortitude, a daring stoutness of spirit, resulting from fatalism, philosophy, or pride—it is derived from a divine agency, nourished by heavenly truth, and guided by scriptural rules."

"Patience," says Mr. Jay, "must be displayed under provocations. Our opinions, reputations, connexions, offices, business, render us widely vulnerable. The characters of men are various; their pursuits and their interests perpetually clash; some try us by their ignorance, some by their folly; some by their perverseness; some by their malice. Here, then, is an opportunity for the triumph of patience. We are very susceptible of irritation; anger is eloquent; revenge is sweet: but to stand calm and collected; to suspend the blow which passion was urgent to strike; to drive the reasons of clemency as far as they will go; to bring forward fairly in view the circumstances of mitigation; to distinguish between surprise and deliberation, infirmity and crime: or if infliction be deemed necessary, to leave God to be both the judge and the executioner; this a Christian should labor after. His peace requires it. People love to sting the passionate: they who are easily provoked, commit their repose to the keeping of their enemies; they lie down at their feet and invite them to strike. The man of temper places himself beyond vexatious interruption. 'He that hath no rule over his own spirit is like a city that is broken down, and without walls,' into which enter, over the ruins, serpents, vagrants, thieves, enemies; while the man who in patience possesses his soul, has the command of himself, places a defence all around him, and forbids the entrance of such unwelcome company to offend or discompose. His wisdom requires it. 'He that is slow to anger is of great understanding; but he that is hasty of spirit, exalteth folly.' Wisdom gives us large, various, comprehensive views of things; the very exercise operates as a diversion, affords the mind time to cool, and furnishes numberless circumstances tending to soften severity. His dignity requires it. 'It is the glory of a man to pass by a transgression.' The man provoked to revenge is conquered, and loses the glory of the struggle; while he who forbears comes off victor, crowned with no common laurels. A flood assails a rock, and rolls off unable to make an impression; while straws and boughs are borne off in triumph, carried down the stream, driven and tossed. Examples require it. What provocations had Joseph received from his brethren? But he scarcely mentions the crime, so eager is he to announce the pardon. David says 'they rewarded me evil for good; but as for me, when they were sick, my clothing was sackcloth.' Stephen, dying under a shower of stones, prays for his enemies: 'Lord, lay not this sin to their charge.' But a greater than Joseph, or David, or Stephen, is here. Go to the foot of the cross, and behold Jesus, suffering for us. Every thing conspired to render the provocation heinous; the nature of the offence, the meanness and obligation of the offenders, the righteousness of his cause, the grandeur of his person; and all these seemed to call for vengeance. The creatures were eager to punish. Peter drew his sword; the sun resolved to shine on such criminals no longer; the rocks asked to crush them; the earth trembles under the sinful load; the very dead cannot remain in their graves. He suffers them all to testify their sympathy, but forbids their revenge; and, lest the Judge of all should pour forth his fury, he cries, 'Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do!'

"2. Patience is to be displayed in suffering affliction. This is another field in which patience gathers glory. Affliction comes to exercise our patience, and to distinguish it. 'The trial of your faith worketh patience,' not only in consequence of the divine blessing, but by the natural operation of things; us makes perfect; the yoke is rendered easy by being worn; and those parts of the body which are most in action are the most strong and solid; and, therefore, we are not to excuse improper dispositions under affliction, by saying, 'It was so trying, who could help it?' This is to justify impatience by what God sends on purpose to make you patient.

"3. Patience is to be exercised under delays. We as naturally pursue a desired good, as we shun an apprehended evil: the want of such a good is as grievous as the pressure of such an evil; and an ability to bear the one is as needful a qualification as the fortitude by which we endure the other. It therefore equally belongs to patience to wait, as to suffer. God does not always immediately indulge us with an answer to our prayers. He hears, indeed, as soon as we knock: but he does not open the door: to stand there resolved not to go without a blessing, requires patience; and patience cries, 'Wait on the Lord; be of good courage, and he shall strengthen thine heart: wait, I say, on the Lord.'"

We have, however, the most powerful motives to excite us to the attainment of this grace. 1. God is a God of patience, Rom 15: 5. 2. It is enjoined by the gospel, Rom. 12: 12. Luke 21: 19. 3. The present state of man renders the practice of it absolutely necessary, Heb. 10: 36. 4. The manifold inconvenience of impatience is a strong motive, Job 4. Psal. 106. 5. Eminent examples of it, Heb. 12: 2. 6: 12. Job 1: 22. 6. Reflect that all our trials will terminate in triumph, James 5: 7, 8. PATIENCE OF GOD, is his long-suffering or forbearance. He is called the God of patience, not only because he is the author and object of the grace of patience, but because he is patient or long-suffering in himself, and towards his creatures. It is not, indeed, to be considered as a quality, accident, passion, or affection in God as in creatures, but belongs to the very nature and essence of God, and springs from his goodness and mercy, Rom. 2: 4. It is said to be exercised towards his chosen people, (2 Pet. 3: 9. Rom. 3: 25. Isa. 30: 18. 1 Tim. 1: 16.) and towards the ungodly, Rom. 2: 4. Eccl. 8: 11. The end of his forbearance to the wicked, is, that they may be without excuse; to make his power and goodness visible; and partly for the sake of his own people, Gen. 18: 32. Rev. 6: 11. 2 Pet. 3: 9. His patience is manifested by giving warnings of judgments before he executes them, Hos. 6: 5. Amos 1: 1. 2 Pet. 2: 5. In long delaying his judgments, Eccl. 8: 11. In often mixing mercy with them. There are many instances of his patience recorded in the Scriptures; with the old world, (Gen. 6: 3.) the inhabitants of Sodom, (Gen. 18.) in Pharaoh, (Exod. 5.) in the people of Israel in the wilderness, (Acts 13: 18.) in the Amorites and Canaanites, (Gen. 15: 15. Lev. 18: 28.) in the Gentile world, (Acts 17: 30.) in fruitless professors, (Luke 13: 6, 9.) in Antichrist, Rev. 2: 21. 13: 6. 18: 8. PATMOS; a small rocky island in the Ægean sea, about eighteen miles in circumference; which, on account of its dreary and desolate character, was used by the Roman emperors as a place of confinement for criminals. To this island St. John was banished by the emperor Domitian; and here he had his revelation, recorded in the Apocalypse. (See APOCALYPSE.)—Watson.

PATRIARCHS; (from the Greek patria, family, and archōn, head, or ruler;) heads of families; a name applied chiefly to those who lived before Moses, who were both priests and princes, without peculiar places fitted for worship, Acts 2: 29. 7: 8, 9. Heb. 7: 4.

Patriarchs, in church history, are ecclesiastical dignitaries, or bishops, so called from their paternal authority in the church. It obtained first among the Jews, as the title of the presidents of the sanhedrim, which exercised a general authority over the Jews of Syria and Persia, after the destruction of Jerusalem. The patriarchate of Tiberias, for the western Jews, subsisted till the year 415; that of Babylon, for the eastern Jews, till 1038. When introduced into the Christian church, the power of patriarchs was not the same in all, but differed according to the different customs of countries, or the pleasure of kings and councils. Thus the patriarch of Constantinople grew to be a patriarch over the patriarchs of Ephesus and Cæsarea, and was called the ecumenical and universal patriarch; and the patriarch of Alexandria had some prerogatives which no other patriarch but himself enjoyed; such as the right of consecrating and approving of every single bishop under his jurisdiction.

The patriarchate has ever been esteemed the supreme dignity in the church: the bishop had only under him the territory of the city of which he was bishop; the metropolitan superintended a province, and had for suffragans the bishops of his province; the primate was the chief of what was then called a diocese, and had several metropolitans under him; and the patriarch had under him several dioceses, composing one exarchate, and the primates themselves were under him. (See CAUCAS, GREEK.)

At present, the Greek church is governed by four patriarchs, viz., those of Constantinople, Jerusalem, Antioch, and Alexandria. The last three are equal and independent, but they acknowledge the superiority of the other, and his authority, in so far that nothing important can be undertaken in the regulation of spiritual affairs without his consent.

The patriarch of Constantinople is elected, by plurality of votes, by the metropolitan and neighboring bishops, and presented to the Sultan for institution. This favor is seldom refused, if he bring with him the usual presents, which have varied, according to the varieties of wealth or avarice, from twenty thousand to thirty thousand dollars. But having conceded this formality in the election, the sultan retains the unmitigated power of deposition, banishment, or execution; and it is needless to add, that even the paltry exaction on institution is motive sufficient for the frequent exertion of that power; and it has sometimes happened, that the patriarch, on some trifling dispute, has been obliged to purchase his confirmation in office. He possesses the privilege (in name, perhaps, rather than reality) of nominating his brother patriarchs: and, after their subsequent election by the bishops of their respective patriarchates, of confirming the election; but the barât of the sultan is still necessary to give authority both to themselves, and even to every bishop whom they may eventually appoint in the execution of their office. The election of the other patriarchs, as they are further removed from the centre of oppression, is less restrained, and their deposition less frequent. But this comparative security is attended by little power or consequence; and two at least of the three are believed to number very few subjects who remain faithful to the orthodox church. The patriarch of Antioch has two rivals who assume the same title and dignity; the one as the head of the Syrian Jacobite church, the other as the Maronite patriarch, or head of the Syrian Catholics. The patriarch of Alexandria, who resides generally at Cairo, has also his cotemporary rival; and the few who are subject to him are chiefly found in the villages or capital of Lower Egypt. The patriarchs of Antioch and Jerusalem reside chiefly at Constantinople, and enjoy very slender and precarious revenues. Elec. Rev. July, 1831.—Head Buck.

PATRICIANS; followers of Patricius, of the same age as the preceding, A. D. 410, 412. These are charged with believing, that the devil made man's body altogether; and that therefore a Christian may kill himself to get rid of it.

These tales, though they originated with the saints and fathers of the church, may seem too ridiculous to be believed in the nineteenth century; and, it is probable, they were founded on hearsay; and yet the recent existence of Muggletonians and Southeastians shows, that nothing is too ridiculous to find credit with some people. Turner's Hist. pp. 188-9.—Williams.

PATRICK, (ΣΤΡΟΝ) bishop of Ely, greatly distinguished for his learning and piety, was born at Gainsborough, in Lincolnshire, 1626. He received his early education in his native place; but at the age of eighteen, was admitted into Queen's college, Cambridge, where he studied with great diligence and unceasing perseverance. At the usual time he took the degrees of master of arts and bachelor of arts, and was chosen fellow of his college; and very shortly after received holy orders from Hall, bishop of Norwich, in his retirement at Heigham, after his ejection from his bishopric. He was soon afterwards received as chaplain into the family of Sir Walter St. John, of Battersea, who gave him that living in 1658. In 1661, he was elected, by a majority of fellows, master of Queen's college, in opposition to a royal mandamus, appointing Mr. Anthony Sparrow to that place; but the affair, being brought before the king and council, was soon decided in favor of Mr. Sparrow; and some of the fellows, if not all, who had formerly agreed with Mr. Patrick, were ejected. His next preferment was the rectory of St. Paul's, Covent garden, given him by the earl of Bedford, in 1662, where he endeared himself to the parishioners by his uniform conduct; by his exemplary piety; by his frequent attendance on them during the dreadful and ravaging plague of 1665; and, above all, by his prayers, his excellent advice, and his anxious concern for the welfare of their immortal souls. In 1666, he received from the university at Oxford the degree of D. D. He was made chaplain in ordinary to the king about the same time.

In the year 1668, he published his "Friendly Debate, between a Conformist and a Non-conformist;" which was answered by the dissenters. In 1672, he was made prebendary of Westminster, and dean of Peterborough in 1679. There he completed and published the "History of the Church of Peterborough." In 1680, the lord chancellor Finch offered him the living of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, but he refused it, and recommended it to Dr. Thomas Tenison. During the reign of James the Second, Dr. Patrick was one of those champions who defended the Protestant religion against the papists. At the revolution, in 1688, great use was made of the dean, who was very active in settling the affairs of the church. He was called upon to preach before the prince and princess of Orange; and soon afterwards was appointed one of the commissioners for the review of the liturgy. In 1689, he was created bishop of Chichester, and employed, with others of the new bishops, to compose the disorders of the church of Ireland. In the year 1691, he was translated to the see of Ely. On the 31st of May, 1707, Dr. Patrick expired, at the advanced age of eighty.

Bishop Patrick was a sincere Christian, an excellent scholar, a judicious commentator, an able writer, and a worthy, honest man. His style of writing was easy and pleasant; his attachment to truth inviolable and active. His works are replete with sound sense and true religion; and his "Sermons," "Tracts against Popery," and "Paraphrases and Commentaries upon the Holy Scriptures," justly entitle him to the eulogy of Burnet, "that he was an honor to the church, and to the age in which he lived." See Life of Patrick.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

PATRIPASSIANS, or PATROPASSIANS; a name applied to the Monarchians, Noetians, Praxeans, Sabellians, and all others, who, believing the Father and Son to be one person, and believing also that the latter suffered and died, are charged with maintaining that the Father himself suffered. For the Trinitarians thus reasoned:—"If the Son suffered, and he was the same person as the Father, then must the Father have also suffered." But their opponents did not admit this: they confined the sufferings of Christ to his human nature, and admitted only, that the Father (or divine nature) suffered by sympathy with the humanity of Jesus. It does not appear, however, that this sentiment created any schism in the church. (See PRAXEANS.) Mosheim's E. H. vol. i. pp. 234-5.—Williams.

PATRISTICS; (theologia patristica;) that branch of historical theology which treats particularly of the lives and doctrines of the fathers of the church. It is at present studied with unusual zeal in Germany, where, at Tubingen, a cheap "Bibliotheca Patrum Latinorum" was published in 1827. (See ANALYSIS OF THEOLOGY.)—Head Buck.

PATRONAGE, or ADWOWSON; a sort of incorporeal hereditament, consisting in the right of presentation to a church, or ecclesiastical benefice. Adwoson signifies the taking into protection, and therefore is synonymous with patronage; and he who has the right of adwoson is called the patron of the church.—Head Buck.

PATTERSON, (ROBERT, LL. D.,) president of the American Philosophical society, was born in the north of Ireland, May 30, 1743. In 1768, he emigrated to Philadelphia. In 1774, he was appointed principal of the academy at Wilmington, Delaware. In the revolutionary war he acted as brigade major. In 1779, he was appointed professor of mathematics in the university of Pennsylvania, and then vice-provost. In 1805, he was appointed director of the mint of the United States. In 1819, he was chosen president of the American Peace society. He died July 22, 1821, aged eighty-one.

A remarkable trait of Mr. Patterson's character, and its crowning excellence, was his fervent piety. It influenced all his conduct from his youth. He was an elder of the Scotch Presbyterian church nearly half a century. In the Transactions of the Philosophical Society he published many papers.—Allen.

PAUL. It has frequently been observed, that the dispensation of the gospel was committed, in the first instance, to men of no rank or reputation in the world. A few persons were selected from the walks of humble life, to be the followers of Jesus Christ; and to them principally was delegated the sacred office of bearing witness to the history of his life, and promulgating the doctrines of salvation. Such was the will of him, who devised the plan of redemption; such was the determination of infinite wisdom. As if to prove, beyond the semblance of a doubt, that the power which gave effect to the preaching of the gospel was the power of God, the foolish things of this world were chosen to confound the wise, and the weak to overturn the mighty.

Yet was not this rule so universally observed as to remain without exception, even in the first ages of the church. Within two or three years after the ascension of our Lord, there was found in the number of the apostles a young man of splendid talents and of uncommon attainments. He was ordained to be a special instrument of Heaven in extending, far beyond the limits of Judea, the doctrines of the cross, and in bringing the Gentiles to the fold of Christ.

When we reflect upon the circumstances of his conversion, the manner in which he was commissioned, and the great end for which he was made a minister of the truth, we must naturally conclude that St. Paul would present a character of singular interest to the members of the church, in every future period of the world. The records of antiquity furnish many proofs of the marked respect, which in those times was paid to his memory. In addition to the minute history of his labors, which, for a certain period, is to be found in the New Testament, many particulars have been transmitted to us, which, if not absolutely certain, have a measure of probability; and if they prove nothing else, may at least be admitted to prove the interest excited by his life and doctrines.

1. Personal infirmities of St. Paul.—He is represented as a man of low stature, and inclining to stoop, of a grave countenance, and a fair complexion: his eyes are said to have possessed a certain suavity of expression, his nose to have been gracefully aquiline, his forehead nearly bald, his beard thick, and, as he advanced in life, like the hair on his head, somewhat silvred by age. He is derided by Lucian, as the high-nosed, bald-pated Galilean. Notwithstanding the abundance of his labors, his constitution is thought to have been firm, and he is mentioned by Jerome as much afflicted with the head-ache. Some writers have imagined that he had a defect in his eyes, and that, when speaking, he was apt to fail either in the command of words, or in the power of articulation; but these are, at the best, only vague conjectures. The passages cited from the epistles in support of them are far from conclusive. His bodily presence is, indeed, said to have been weak, and his speech contemptible: but the charge is of little value, as it came from his enemies; it might possibly be true—it might easily be false. That he had some personal infirmity, which was visible to others, and which exposed him to many trials, may be inferred from his epistle to the Galatians: "Ye know how through infirmity of the flesh I preached the gospel unto you at the first; and my temptation, which was in the flesh, ye despised not nor rejected: but received me as an angel of God, even as Jesus Christ." He doubtless alludes in this place to that thorn in the flesh, mentioned in the second epistle to the Corinthians. Of its nature we can know nothing, for nothing is revealed; and the conjectures of the ancients are of little more account than those of the moderns. The passage which follows the verses just cited, "I bear you record, that, if it had been possible, ye would have plucked out your own eyes, and have given them to me," sufficiently attests the love of the Galatians, but it proves nothing more.

Whatever were the infirmities of this apostle, he possessed certain qualities which, when sanctified by grace, fitted him for the first station in the church of Christ, and he was favored with the peculiar grace and blessing of God. This man of three cubits in height, as Chrysostom tells us, was tall enough to touch the heavens; his conversation was there, and thence he derived those pure lessons of religion and morals, that loftiness of principle, that fervor of feeling, that ardent and inextinguishable hope of immortality, which animated his own conduct, and afforded instruction and consolation to every coming age. If any reader of St. Paul should have discovered nothing of excellence in his character, and nothing to be admired in the counsels which selected this apostle for the defence and propagation of the gospel, let him be assured that he has much to learn. He resembles the heedless traveller, who perceives nothing in his progress but the soil and the pebbles around him. It is to patient research that the scenery unveils its beauties, and spreads the secret treasures of its interior magnificence.

2. Character of St. Paul, before and after his conversion.—The following remarks of Hug on the character of this apostle, are equally just and eloquent: "This most violent man, having such terrible propensities, whose turbulent impulses rendered him of a most enterprising character, would have become nothing better than a John of Gishala, a blood-intoxicated zealot, (εμπροσθον απαίτες και φθονου,) breathing out threatenings and slaughter, (Acts 9: 1.) had not his whole soul been changed. The harsh tone of his mind inclined him to the principles of Pharisaism, which had all the appearance of severity, and was the predominant party among the Jews. Nature had not withdrawn from him the external endowments of eloquence, although he afterwards spoke very modestly of them. Longinus reckons him among the greatest orators of antiquity. At Lystra he was deemed the tutelur god of eloquence. This character, qualified for great things; but not master of himself from excess of internal power, was an extreme of human dispositions, and, according to the natural course, was prone to absolute extremities. His religion was a destructive zeal, his anger was fierceness, his fury required victims. A ferocity so boisterous did not naturally qualify him for a Christian, nor for a philanthropist; but, least of all, for a quietly enduring man. He, nevertheless, became all this on his conversion to Christianity, and each bursting emotion of his mind subsided directly into a well-regulated and noble character. Formerly hasty and irritable, now spirited and resolved; formerly violent, now full of energy and enterprising; once ungovernably refractory against every thing which obstructed him, now only persevering; once fanatical and morose, now only serious; once cruel, now only firm; once a harsh zealot, now fearing God; formerly unrelenting, deaf to sympathy and commiseration, now himself acquainted with tears, which he had seen without effect in others. Formerly the friend of none, now the brother of mankind, benevolent, compassionate, sympathizing; yet never weak, always great; in the midst of sadness and sorrow manly and noble; so he showed himself at his deeply moving departure from Miletus: (Acts 20.) it is like the departure of Moses, like the resignation of Samuel, sincere and heartfelt, full of self-recollection, and in the midst of pain full of dignity.

"His writings are a true expression of this character, with regard to the tone predominant in them. Severity, manly seriousness, and sentiments which ennoble the heart, are interchanged with mildness, affability, and sympathy: and their transitions are such as nature begets in the heart of a man penetrated by his subject, noble and discerning. He exhorts, reproaches and consoles again; he attacks with energy, urges with impetuousness, then again he speaks kindly to the soul; he displays his finer feelings for the welfare of others, his forbearance and his fear of afflicting any body: all as the subject, time, opposite dispositions, and circumstances require. There prevails throughout in them an importuning language, an earnest and lively communication. Rom. 1: 26—32. is a comprehensive and vigorous description of morals. His antitheses, (Rom. 2: 21—24. 2 Cor. 4: 8—12. 6: 9—11. 9: 22—30.) his enumerations, (1 Cor. 13: 4—10. 2 Cor. 6: 4—7. 2 Tim. 3: 1—5. Eph. 4: 4—7. 5: 3—6.) his gradations, (Rom. 8: 29, 30. Tit. 3: 3, 4.) the interrogations, exclamations, and comparisons, sometimes animate his language even so as to give a visible existence to it.

"That, however, which we principally perceive in Paul, and from which his whole actions and operations become intelligible, is the peculiar impression which the idea of a universal religion has wrought upon his mind. This idea of establishing a religion for the world had not so profoundly engrossed any soul, nowhere kindled so much vigor, and projected it into such a constant energy. In this he was no man's scholar; this he had immediately received from the Spirit of his Master; it was a spark of the divine light which enkindled him. It was this which never allowed him to remain in Palestine and in Syria, which so powerfully impelled him to foreign parts. The portion of some others was Judea and its environs: but his mission was directed to the nations, and his allotment was the whole of the heathen world. Thus he began his career among the different nations of Asia Minor, and when this limit also became too confined for him, he went with equal confidence to Europe, among other nations, ordinances, sciences, and customs; and here likewise he finally, with the same indefatigable spirit, circulated his plans, even to the pillars of Hercules. In this manner Paul prepared the overthrow of two religions, that of his ancestors, and that of the heathens."

3. History of St. Paul.—The Scripture history, to which we refer our readers, (Acts 8—28.) ends with the release of St. Paul from his two years' imprisonment at Rome, A. D. 63; and no ancient author has left us any particulars of the remaining part of this apostle's life. It seems probable, that, immediately after he recovered his liberty, he went to Jerusalem; and that afterwards he travelled through Asia Minor, Crete, Macedonia, and Greece, confirming his converts, and regulating the affairs of the different churches which he had planted in those countries. Whether at this time he also preached the gospel in Spain, as some have imagined, is very uncertain. It was the unanimous tradition of the church, that St. Paul returned to Rome, that he underwent a second imprisonment there, and at last was put to death by the emperor Nero. Tacitus and Suetonius have mentioned a dreadful fire which happened at Rome in the time of Nero. It was believed, though probably without any reason, that the emperor himself was the author of that fire; but, to remove the odium from himself, he chose to attribute it to the Christians; and, to give some color to that unjust imputation, he persecuted them with the utmost cruelty. In this persecution St. Peter and St. Paul suffered martyrdom, probably A. D. 65; and if we may credit Sulpitius Severus, a writer of the fifth century, the former was crucified, and the latter beheaded.

He was the principal instrument under Providence of spreading the gospel among the Gentiles; and his labors lasted through many years, and reached over a vast extent of country. (See ILLYRICUM.) Though emphatically styled the great Apostle of the Gentiles, he began his ministry, in almost every city, by preaching in the synagogue of the Jews; and though he owed by far the greater part of his persecutions to the opposition and malice of that proud and obstinate people, whose resentment he particularly incurred by maintaining that the Gentiles were to be admitted to an indiscriminate participation of the benefits of the new dispensation, yet it rarely happened in any place, that some of the Jews did not yield to his arguments, and embrace the gospel. He watched with paternal care over the churches which he had founded; and was always ready to strengthen the faith, and regulate the conduct, of his converts, by such directions and advice as their circumstances might require.

4. His Epistles.—The exertions of St. Paul in the cause of Christianity were not confined to personal instruction: he also wrote fourteen epistles to individuals or churches, which are now extant, and form a part of our canon. (See EPISTLES.) These letters furnish evidence of the soundness and sobriety of his judgment. His morality is everywhere calm, pure, and rational; adapted to the condition, the activity, and the business of social life, and of its various relations; free from the over-scrupulousness and austerities of superstition, and from, what was more perhaps to be apprehended, the abstractions of quietism, and the soarings or extravagancies of fanaticism. His judgment concerning a hesitating conscience, his opinion of the moral indifference of certain actions, yet of the prudence and even the duty of compliance, where non-compliance would produce evil effects upon the minds of the persons who observed it, are all in proof of the calm and discriminating character of his mind; and the universal applicability of his precepts affords strong presumption of his divine inspiration.

What lord Lyttleton has remarked of the preference ascribed by St. Paul to rectitude of principle above every other religious accomplishment, is weighty: "Though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and have not charity, I am become as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal," &c., 1 Cor. 13: 1—3. "Did ever enthusiast prefer that universal benevolence, meant by charity here, (which, we may add, is attainable by every man,) to faith and to miracles, to those religious opinions which he had embraced, and to those supernatural graces and gifts which he imagined he had acquired, nay, even the merit of martyrdom? Is it not the genius of enthusiasm to set moral virtues infinitely below the merit of faith; and of all moral virtues to value that least which is most particularly endorsed by St. Paul, a spirit of candor, moderation, and peace? Certainly, neither the temper nor the opinions of a man subject to fanatic delusions are to be found in this passage. His letters, indeed, everywhere discover great zeal and earnestness in the cause in which he was engaged; that is to say, he was convinced of the truth of what he taught; he was deeply impressed, but not more so than the occasion merited, with a sense of its importance. This produces a corresponding animation and solicitude in the exercise of his ministry. But would not these considerations, supposing them to have been well founded, have holden the same place, and produced the same effect, in a mind the strongest and the most sedate? Here, then, we have a man of liberal attainments, and in other respects of sound judgment, who had dedicated his life to the service of the gospel. We see him, in the prosecution of his purpose, travelling from country to country, enduring every species of hardship, encountering every extremity of danger, assailed by the populace, punished by the magistrates, scourged, beaten, stoned, left for dead; expecting, wherever he came, a renewal of the same treatment, and the same dangers; yet, when driven from one city, preaching in the next; spending his whole time in the employment; sacrificing to it his pleasures, his ease, his safety; persisting in this course to old age, unaltered by the experience of perverseness, ingratitude, prejudice, desertion; unsubdued by anxiety, want, labor, persecutions; unwearied by long confinement; undismayed by the prospect of death. Such was St. Paul; and such were the proofs of apostleship found in him."

5. Style of his writings.—There is a passage in St. Peter which is commonly understood to imply that some parts of St. Paul's epistles are hard to be understood; and this has been advanced again and again, as if every thing he wrote were of dangerous tendency, unless guarded by interpretations and comments. We concede cheerfully that (for reasons hereafter to be assigned) there are difficulties in the writings of St. Paul peculiar to himself; but we must beg leave to affirm that the assertion commonly attributed to St. Peter, never was made by St. Peter. The usual error on this subject arises solely from the want of grammatical accuracy in the translation. The passage correctly translated runs thus: "Even as our beloved brother Paul also, according to the wisdom given unto him, hath written unto you; as also in all his epistles, speaking in them of these things; (i. e. the coming of the last day, the dissolution of the elements, the judgment of the quick and dead, &c.) among which things, (en tois, not en haïs.) are some hard to be understood." The difficulty consists not in Paul's manner of treating the subjects, (1 Cor. 2: 13.) but in the subjects themselves, when compared with the limits of the human understanding.

Paul's powerful and diversified character of mind seems to have combined the separate excellencies of all the other sacred authors: the loftiness of Isaiah; the devotion of David; the pathos of Jeremiah; the vehemence of Ezekiel; the didactic gravity of Moses; the elevated morality and practical good sense, though somewhat more highly colored, of St. James; the sublime conceptions and deep views of St. John; the noble energies and burning zeal of St. Peter. To all these he added his own strong argumentative powers, depth of thought, and intensity of feeling. Yet his style is often abrupt, and sometimes obscure: his reasoning, though generally clear, is, as the best critics allow, sometimes involved, perhaps owing to the suddenness of his transitions, the rapidity of his ideas, the sensibility of his soul. The apostle is often carried away by the impetuous fervor and loftiness of his mind. On such occasions to confine his excursive spirit within the limits of regular argumentation, would be to chain down the ocean in the proudest swelling and grandeur of its waves. But we can scarcely consider this as a defect. It may deter the idle; it may supply an excuse for indolence; but if it invite the more studious to a serious examination of his writings, the result will be beneficial: many passages, apparently involved, will be clearly comprehended, and the order of the reasoning distinctly seen. It was the opinion of Epiphanius, that the alleged complication of St. Paul's discourses was only in appearance; and we will venture to add with our author, that if any of them should remain after all obscure and intricate, yet some lesson of practical wisdom will be the reward of examination; some position of piety, some aphorism of virtue, easy from its brevity, intelligible from its clearness, and valuable from its weight. No person ever yet repented of consulting the pages of St. Paul. They are, as has been justly stated, "a golden mine, in which the diligent workman, the deeper he digs, the more he will discover; the further he examines, the more he will find."—Lytleton on the Conversion of St. Paul; Paley's Evidences, and Ilora Paulina; Hug's Introduction; Hannah More on the Character and Writings of St. Paul; British Review, 1815; Buckminster's Sermons; Saturday Evening; Neander; Watson.

PAULIANISTS; a sect so called from their founder, Paulus Samosatenus, a native of Samosata, elected bishop of Antioch, in 262. His doctrine seems to have amounted to this: that the Son and the Holy Ghost exist in God in the same manner as the faculties of reason and activity do in man; that Christ was born a mere man; but that the reason or wisdom of the Father descended into him, and by him wrought miracles upon earth, and instructed the nations; and, finally, that on account of this union of the divine Word with the man Jesus, Christ might, though improperly, be called God. It is also said that he did not baptize in the name of the Father and the Son, &c.; for which reason the council of Nice ordered those baptized by him to be re-baptized. Being condemned by Dionysius Alexandrinus in a council, he abjured his errors to avoid deposition; but soon after he resumed them, and was actually deposed by another council, A. D. 369. He may be considered as the father of the modern Socinians; and his errors are severely condemned by the council of Nice, whose creed differs a little from that now used under the same name in the church of England. The creed agreed upon by the Nicene fathers, with a view to the errors of Paulus Samosatenus, concludes thus:—"But those who say there was a time when he was not, and that he was not before he was born, the Catholic and apostolic church anathematize."—Hend. Burk.

PAULICIANS; a numerous body of Greek Protestant Dissenters in the sixth and following centuries, so called, it is supposed, from Paulus, a native of Armenia; or, as others believe, on account of their attachment to the doctrines of the apostle Paul, when all was corrupt and degenerate around them. In the seventh century, one Constantine revived this drooping body, which had suffered much from the violence of its adversaries, and was ready to expire under the severity of the imperial edicts, and that zeal with which they were carried into execution. The Paulicians, however, by their number and the countenance of the emperor Nicephorus, A. D. 802, became formidable to all the East. But the cruel rage of persecution, which had for some years been suspended, broke forth with redoubled violence A. D. 811—820, under the reigns of Michael Crotapates, and Leo V., who inflicted capital punishment on such of the Paulicians as refused to return into the bosom of the church. The empress Theodora, tutress of the emperor Michael, in 815, would oblige them either to be converted, or to quit the empire; upon which several of them were put to death, and more retired among the Saracens; but they were neither all exterminated nor banished.

Some of them entered into a league with the Saracens, and choosing for their chief an officer of the greatest resolution and valor, whose name was Carbeus, they declared against the Greeks a war, which was carried on for fifty years with the greatest vehemence and fury. During these sad commotions, the Paulicians, towards the conclusion of this century, spread abroad their doctrines among the Bulgarians: many of them, either from a principle of zeal for the propagation of their opinions, or from a natural desire of flying from the persecution which they suffered under the Grecian yoke, retired about the close of the eleventh century from Bulgaria and Thrace, and formed settlements in other countries. Their first migration was into Italy; whence, in process of time, they sent colonies into almost all the other provinces of Europe, and formed gradually a considerable number of religious assemblies, who adhered to their doctrine, and who were afterwards persecuted with the utmost vehemence by the Roman pontiffs. In Italy they were called Patarini, from a certain place called Patarra, being a part of the city of Milan, where they held their assemblies; and Gathari, or Gazari, from Gazaria, or the Lesser Tartary. In France they were called Albigenses. (See CONSTANTINE SYLVANUS.)

The first religious assembly the Paulicians had formed in Europe, is said to have been discovered at Orleans in 1017, under the reign of Robert, when many of them were condemned to be burned alive. They have been accused of Manichæism; but there is reason to believe this was only a slanderous report raised against them by their enemies; and that they were, for the most part, men who were disgusted with the doctrines and ceremonies of human invention, and desirous of returning to the apostolic doctrine and practice. They refused to worship the virgin Mary and the cross, which was sufficient in those ages to procure for them the name of atheists; and they also refused to partake of the sacraments of the Greek and Roman churches, which will account for the allegation that they rejected them altogether, though it is barely possible that some may, like the Quakers and some other sects, actually have discarded them, as outward ordinances. PAVILION; a royal tent. It is a word which usually gives us the idea of an edifice, small but handsome; it is therefore liable to be misunderstood in 1 Kings 20: 12, 16. "Benhadad and others were drinking in pavilions."—Cabinet.

PAYSON, (EDWARD, D. D.) a distinguished minister of Portland, Maine, was the son of the Rev. Seth Payson, D. D. He was born in Rindge, New Hampshire, July 25, 1783; was graduated at Harvard college in 1803, and for three years was the teacher of an academy at Portland. At this period the death of a brother had a favorable influence on his religious character, and he engaged with a pious zeal, which continued through life, in the cause of Jesus Christ. He was ordained, as the colleague of Mr. Kellogg, Dec. 16, 1807; he afterwards became the sole pastor of a new church. During about twenty years he was exclusively devoted to the work of the ministry with increasing usefulness, being the instrument of the conversion to the Christian faith of hundreds of his hearers. He repeatedly declined invitations to remove to Boston and New York. He died, October 22, 1827, aged forty-four.

In his distressing sickness he displayed, in the most interesting and impressive manner, the power of Christian faith. Smitten down in the midst of his days and usefulness, he was entirely resigned to the divine will, for he perceived distinctly, that the infinite wisdom of God could not err in the direction of events, and it was his joy that God reigneth. His mind rose over bodily pain, and in the strong visions of eternity he seemed almost to lose the sense of suffering.

In a letter to his sister, September 19, 1827, he says, "Were I to adopt the figurative language of Bunyan, I might date this letter from the land of Beulah, of which I have been for some weeks a happy inhabitant. The celestial city is full in my view. Its glories beam upon me, its odors are wafted to me, its sounds strike upon my ears, and its spirit is breathed into my heart. Nothing separates me from it but the river of death, which now appears but as an insignificant rill, that may be crossed at a single step, whenever God shall give permission. The Sun of Righteousness has gradually been drawing nearer and nearer, appearing larger and brighter as he approached, and now he fills the whole hemisphere; pouring forth a flood of glory, in which I seem to float like an insect in the beams of the sun; exulting, yet almost trembling, while I gaze on this excessive brightness, and wondering, with unutterable wonder, why God should deign thus to shine upon a sinful worm. A single heart and a single tongue seem altogether inadequate to my wants: I want a whole heart for every separate emotion, and a whole tongue to express that emotion."

Among his uncommon intellectual powers, a rich, philosophical, and consecrated imagination was the most conspicuous. Without any of the graces of the orator, his preaching had the most vivid eloquence of truth and feeling. In his prayers especially there was a solemnity, fullness, originality, variety, pathos, and sublimity, seldom equalled. His eloquent address to the Bible society has been published as one of the tracts of the American Tract society. He published a discourse on the Worth of the Bible; an Address to Seamen; and a thanksgiving sermon. A memoir of his life, by Asa Cummings, was published, second edition, 1830; a volume of sermons, 8vo, 1828; another volume, 12mo, 1831; another to families, 1833.—Allen.

PEABODY, (OLIVER,) minister of Natick, Massachusetts, and missionary to the Indians, was born in Boxford, in 1698, and graduated at Harvard college, in 1721. He was pious in early life, and while in college was preparing for the ministry.

Employed by the commissioners for propagating the gospel, he preached first at Natick, August 6, 1721. There were then but two families of white people in the town. The Indian church, which the apostolic Eliot had founded, was now extinct, the Indian preacher, Daniel Tahhowom-pait, having died in 1716; and all records were lost. A new church was formed, December 3, 1729, consisting of three Indians and five white persons, and he was ordained at Cambridge, December 17. Through his influence many of the Indians were induced to abandon their savage mode of living, and to attend to husbandry as the means of subsistence; he had the happiness to see many of the Indian families with comfortable houses, cultivated fields, and flourishing orchards. But his chief aim was to teach them the religion of Jesus Christ. There were added to the church in the first year twenty-two persons, several of whom were Indians; in July, 1743, he stated, that in the two preceding years about fifty had been received into the church. Against the vice of intemperance among the Indians he set himself with great zeal and much success. During his residence at Natick he baptized one hundred and eighty-nine Indians, and four hundred and twenty-two whites; and he received to the church thirty-five Indians and thirty whites; and there died two hundred and fifty-six Indians, one of whom was a hundred and ten years old. During one season he went on a mission to the Mohegans. He died in great peace, February 2, 1752, aged fifty-three.

Mr. Peabody was eminently pious, and greatly beloved and lamented. He published Artillery Election Sermon, 1732; on a Good and Bad Hope of Salvation, 1742. Parnassist, vol. vii. pp. 49—56.—Allen.

PEACE; that state in which persons are exposed to no sort of violence to interrupt their tranquillity. 1. Social peace is mutual agreement one with another, whereby we forbear injuring one another, Ps. 34: 14. 132.—2. Ecclesiastical peace is freedom from contentions, and rest from persecutions, Isa. 11: 13. 32: 17. Rev. 12: 14.—3. Spiritual peace is deliverance from sin, by which we were at enmity with God; (Rom. 5: 1.) the result of which is peace in the conscience, Heb. 10: 22. This peace is the gift of God through Jesus Christ, 2 Thess. 3: 16. It is a blessing of great importance, Ps. 119: 165. It is denominated perfect; (Isa. 26: 3.) inexpressible; (Phil. 4: 7.) permanent; (Job 34: 29. John 16: 22.) eternal, Isa. 57: 2. Heb. 4: 9. (See HAPPINESS.)

Peace is a word used in Scripture generally, for quiet and tranquillity, public or private; but often for every kind and degree of prosperity and happiness; as to "go in peace;" to "die in peace;" "God give you peace;" "Peace be within this house;" "Pray for the peace of Jerusalem." Paul in the introduction of his epistles generally wishes grace and peace to the faithful, to whom he writes. Our Savior recommends to his disciples, to have peace with all men, and with each other. God promises his people to water them as with a river of peace, (Isa. 66: 12.) and to make with them a covenant of peace, Ezek. 34: 25. See also Isa. 9: 7.—Hend. Buck; Calmet.

PEACE, RELIGIOUS; a name given to two famous treaties, both in the time of the Reformation: one concluded July 22, 1532, and called the Religious Peace of Nuremberg; the other, concluded September 26, 1555, and called the Religious Peace of Augsburg.—Hend. Buck.

PEACOCK; (tavacium, 1 Kings 10: 22, 2 Chron. 9: 21.) a bird distinguished by the length of its tail, and the brilliant spots with which it is adorned; which display all that dazzles in the sparkling lustre of gems, and all that astonishes in the rainbow. Yet its cry is so harsh and disagreeable, that it has been said to have "the head of a serpent, the train of an angel, and the voice of a devil."

The peacock is a bird originally from India; thence brought into Persia and Media. Aristophanes mentions Persia peacocks; and Suidas calls the peacock the Median bird. From Persia it was gradually dispersed into Judea, Egypt, Greece, and Europe. If the fleet of Solomon visited India, they might easily procure this bird, whether from India itself, or from Persia; and certainly the bird by its beauty was likely to attract attention, and to be brought among other rarities of natural history by Solomon's servants, who would be instructed to collect every curiosity in the countries they visited.—Watson.

PEARCE, (ZACHARY, D. D.) bishop of Rochester, a prelate of distinguished learning and piety, was born in Holborn, London, 1690. He received his education at Westminster grammar-school; after which he was sent to Trinity college, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship through the interest of the lord chief justice Parker, afterwards earl of Macclesfield. The same patronage also procured him a living in Essex, and the vicarage of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, London. In 1739, he was promoted to the vacant deanery of Winchester. Nine years after, the bishopric of Bangor was bestowed on him, not only without solicitation, but contrary to his wishes, which pointed entirely to a private life. Though translated to Rochester, with the deanery of Westminster annexed, in 1756, his anxiety to retire from the high station to which he was thus involuntarily raised, was so sincere, as well as strong, that, at length, in 1768, the government yielded to his repeated request, and allowed him to resign the more valuable appointment, his deanery, in favor of L. Thomas; retaining, however, the bishopric, to the retiring from which there existed some objections of an ecclesiastical nature. He died in 1774.

Bishop Pearce was as distinguished for his charity and munificence, as for his learning. He enriched the widows' college, in the immediate neighborhood of his palace, at Bromley, by a donation of five thousand pounds, while his tracts on theological subjects are numerous and valuable. Of these the principal are, "A Commentary on the Gospels and Acts of the Apostles," in two volumes, quarto; "Letters to Dr. Conyers Middleton, in defence of Dr. Waterland;" "A Reply to Woolston, on the Miracles;" "A Review of the Text of Milton;" an edition of "Longinus on the Sublime," with a Latin translation annexed; and another of Cicero's Offices; also four volumes of sermons, &c. Life prefixed to his Commentary.—Jones's Chris. Biog.

PEARCE, (SAMUEL, A. M.) one of the loveliest exemplifications of Christian character, was born at Plymouth, (Eng.) July 20, 1766. The principles of religion were early instilled into his mind, and at the age of sixteen he became a subject of renewing grace. In 1788, he entered the Baptist academy at Bristol. In 1790, he was ordained pastor of the Cannon-street church, Birmingham, to which he was recommended by the late Rev. Robert Hall, then one of his tutors. His ministry there was blessed with almost one continual revival of religion for eight years.

About the year 1792, the mind of Mr. Pearce became much exercised on the subject of missions. When the Northampton and Leicester Missionary society was formed, he was present, and entered with his whole heart into its interests. In 1794, he offered himself to its committee, to be sent out to India. His soul thirsted for the work; but the committee, after the most serious and mature deliberation, though fully satisfied as to his qualifications, and greatly approving his spirit, were unanimously of opinion that he ought not to go; not merely on account of his connexions at home, but on account of the mission itself, which required his assistance in the station he already occupied. His efforts for the cause at home were indeed assiduous and persevering. He made repeated journeys to increase its funds, and strove in every way to stir up the minds of his brethren to its importance. In these efforts he was very successful, as also in the discharge of his pastoral duties.

Mr. Pearce died of consumption, October 10, 1799. During all his sickness, which was of a year's continuance, and very severe, he was constantly stayed up by the hand of his Lord, and cheered with the most blissful prospects. "Blessed be his dear name," said he, "who shed his blood for me. He helps me to rejoice at times with joy unspeakable. Now I see the value of the religion of the cross. It is a religion for a dying sinner. It is all the most guilty and the most wretched can desire. Yes, I taste its sweetness, and enjoy its fulness, with all the gloom of a death-bed before me; and far rather would I be the poor emaciated and emaciating creature that I am, than be an emperor with every earthly good about him, but without a God."

There have been few men, says Fuller, in whom has been united a greater portion of the contemplative and the active; holy zeal and genuine candor; spirituality and rationality; talents that attracted almost universal applause, and the most unaffected modesty; faithfulness in bearing testimony against evil, with the tenderest compassion to the soul of the evil-doer; fortitude that would encounter any difficulty in the way of duty, without any thing boisterous, noisy, or overbearing; deep seriousness with habitual cheerfulness; and a constant aim to promote the highest degrees of piety in himself and others, with a readiness to hope the best of the lowest; not breaking the bruised reed, nor quenching the smoking flax.

The governing principle in Mr. Pearce, beyond all doubt, was holy love. It is not enough to say of this affectionate spirit, that it formed a prominent feature in his character—it was rather the life-blood that animated the whole system. He seemed, as one of his friends observed, to be baptized in it. It was holy love that gave the tone to his general deportment, as a son, a subject, a neighbor, a Christian, a minister, a pastor, a friend, a husband, and a father. This it was that produced in him that lovely uniformity of character, which constitutes the beauty of holiness.

The Memoir of this excellent man, by Andrew Fuller, (of which it has been said, "it is difficult to tell which is most admirable, the description, or the character described,") has passed through numerous editions both in Europe and America.—Fuller's Memoir of Pearce.

PEARL; a hard, white, shining body, usually roundish, found in a shell-fish resembling an oyster. The oriental pearls have a fine polished gloss, and are tinged with an elegant blush of red. They are esteemed in the East beyond all other jewels.

The Arabians, Persians, and Turks, use the word meoravrida to signify pearls, from which the word margarites, or margarita, used by the Greeks and Latins, seems to be derived. The finest pearls are fished up in the Persian gulf, and on the coast of Bahrein, so called from the city of that name, on the borders of Arabia; and Idumea and Palestine being not far distant, it is not to be wondered at that pearls were well known to Job, and the Hebrews. They are also found in other places; many in America.

Pearls are certainly very different things from precious stones; yet the Greek term, margarites, seems to be used, in a more general sense, for jewels, or splendid gems. So, in Matt. 7: 6, "cast not your pearls." Jewels,—diamonds, if known to the ancients, would answer the import of the passage as well as pearls. So, the parts of a building, pearls; but pearls are unfit things for walls and gates; (Rev. 21.) many kinds of precious stones are more suitable; and perhaps the parable of the merchant seeking goodly pearls, (Matt. 13.) might be understood in a more extensive sense, as importing valuable jewels of whatever kind. Such appears to be the application of the Chaldee and Arabic words, which yet properly signify pearls.—Watson; Calmet.

PEARSON, (JOHN, D. D.) bishop of Chester, a learned and pious prelate of the seventeenth century, was the son of an English divine, rector of Snoring, Norfolk, where he was born in 1612. He was educated at Eton, from whence he proceeded to King's college, Cambridge, and was ordained in 1639, in Salisbury cathedral. He now became chaplain to lord keeper Finch, who presented him to the living of Torrington, Suffolk; but on the success of the parliamentary party, he was one of the ministers ejected on account of their monarchical principles. In 1650, however, he was appointed to St. Clement's, Eastcheap, in the city of London, and after the restoration, became, in succession, lady Margaret professor of divinity, and master of Jesus college, in the university of Cambridge, with the rectory of St. Christopher's, London, and a stall in the cathedral of Ely. In 1662, he was removed to the mastership of Trinity college, and in the course of the same year assisted in the revision of the liturgy; a task for which his previous publications had announced him to be peculiarly well qualified. In 1763, he was raised to the vacant see of Chester, over which diocese he continued to preside till his death, in 1686.

The work by which he is principally known, is his celebrated "Exposition of the Apostles' Creed," originally delivered by him, in a series of sermons or lectures, from the pulpit of St. Clement's. This elaborate and learned work first appeared in 1659, and was republished in folio, 1676, since which time it has gone through at least a dozen editions, and still sustains its reputation. It is used as a text-book at the universities, and is regarded as one of the principal standards of appeal on doctrinal matters in the church of England.—Heud. Buck; Jones' Chris. Biog.

PEIRCE, (JAMES,) a very learned divine, and eminent minister among the Protestant Dissenters, was born in London, 1673. Losing his parents early, he was placed under the care of Mr. Matthew Mead, of Stepney, who had him educated along with his own sons, under his own roof; after which, he went to Utrecht, where he had his first academical institution. He afterwards removed to Leyden, where he studied for some time; and having passed at these two celebrated universities between five and six years, attending the lectures of Witsius, Leydecker, Grevius, Spanheim, and other learned men, he returned to England. On his return, he took up his abode for some time in London, and set up a Sabbath evening lecture at Miles' lane, which he continued for two years, when he accepted an invitation from a congregation of Dissenters at Cambridge to become their pastor. In 1713 he was unanimously invited by the three Dissenting congregations in Exeter, to succeed one of their ministers, lately deceased, the surviving ministers joining the people in the invitation. He accepted the invitation, and accordingly settled in that city, where his residence for the first three years proved exceedingly agreeable to him; and, during this period, he published his "Vindication of the Protestant Dissenters;" but a dispute arising in consequence of his refusing, in conjunction with Mr. Hallett, to subscribe certain articles of belief respecting the doctrine of the Trinity, they were both ejected, and driven to the necessity of building a chapel for themselves. A controversy ensued, in which Mr. Peirce greatly distinguished himself; but he continued his ministry at Exeter to the period of his death, in 1726.

His publications are numerous, amounting in all to about twenty-four. But that by which he is best known is his Continuation of Mr. Hallett's Paraphrase and Notes on the Epistle to the Hebrews, quarto. He also gave to the public a volume containing Fifteen Sermons on Various Occasions, and an Essay on the ancient Practice of giving the Eucharist to Children.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

PELAGIANS; a sect which arose in the fifth century, and opposed with warmth certain received notions respect ing original sin, and the necessity of divine grace. They maintained, it is said, the following doctrines:—1. That Adam was by nature mortal; and, whether he had sinned or not, would certainly have died.—2. That the consequences of Adam's sin were confined to his own person.—3. That new-born infants are in the same situation with Adam before the fall.—4. That the law qualified men for the kingdom of heaven, and was founded upon equal promises with the gospel.—5. That the general resurrection of the dead does not follow in virtue of our Savior's resurrection.—6. That the grace of God is given according to our merits.—7. That this grace is not granted for the performance of every moral act; the liberty of the will and information in points of duty being sufficient.—8. That faith is not an effect, but the cause of election to salvation.

Pelagius was a British monk, of some rank, and very exalted reputation. He, with his friend Celestius, travelled to Rome, where they resided very early in the fifth century. On the approach of the Goths, they retired to Africa, where Celestius remained, with a view of gaining admittance as a presbyter into the church of Carthage. Pelagius proceeded to Palestine, where he enjoyed the favor and protection of John, bishop of Jerusalem.

The Pelagian controversy, which began with the doctrines of grace and original sin, was extended to predestination, and excited continual discord and division in the church. It must however be recollected, that we are acquainted with the sentiments of Pelagius only through the medium of his opponents; and that it is possible they were much misrepresented. (See AUGUSTINE.)

Isidore, Chrysostom, and Augustine strenuously opposed these opinions; and the latter procured their condemnation in a synod held at Carthage in 412. They were, however, favorably received at Rome; and pope Zozimus was at the head of the Pelagian party: but his decision against the African bishops, who had opposed Pelagianism, was disregarded by them, and the pontiff yielded at length to their reasonings and remonstrances, and condemned the men whom he had before honored with his approbation. The council of Ephesus likewise condemned the opinions of Pelagius and Celestius; and the emperor Honorius, in 418, published an edict, which ordained that the leaders of the sect should be expelled from Rome, and their followers exiled.

The followers of Arminius have often been represented as Pelagians, or at least as Semi-Pelagians. It may therefore serve the cause of truth, says Mr. Watson, to exhibit the appropriate reply which the Dutch Arminians gave to this charge when urged against them at the synod of Dort, and which they verified and maintained by arguments and authorities that were unanswerable. In their concluding observations they say, "From all these remarks a judgment may easily be formed at what an immense distance our sentiments stand from the dogmatical assertions of the Pelagians and Semi-Pelagians on the grace of God in the conversion of man. Pelagius, in the first instance, attributed all things to nature: but we acknowledge nothing but grace. When Pelagius was blamed for not acknowledging grace, he began indeed to speak of it, but it is evident that by grace he understood the power of nature as created by God, that is, the rational will: but by grace we understand a supernatural gift. Pelagius, when afterwards pressed with passages of Scripture, also admitted this supernatural grace; but he placed it solely in the external teaching of the law: though we affirm that God offers his word to men, yet we likewise affirm that he inwardly causes the understanding to believe. Subsequently Pelagius joined to this external grace that by which sins are pardoned: we acknowledge not only the grace by which sins are forgiven, but also that by which men are assisted to refrain from the commission of sin. In addition to his previous concessions, Pelagius granted that the grace of Christ was requisite beside the two kinds which he had enumerated; but he attributed it entirely to the doctrine and example of Christ that we are aided in our endeavors not to commit sin: we likewise admit that the doctrine and example of Christ afford us some aid in refraining from sin, but in addition to their influence we also place the gift of the Holy Spirit with which God endues us, and which enlightens our understandings, and confers strength and power upon our will to abstain from sinning. When Pelagius afterwards owned the assistance of divine power inwardly working in man by the Holy Spirit, he placed it solely in the enlightening of the understanding: but we believe, that it is not only necessary for us to know or understand what we ought to do, but that it is also requisite for us to implore the aid of the Holy Spirit that we may be rendered capable of performing, and may delight in the performance of, that which it is our duty to do. Pelagius admitted grace; but it has been a question with some whether he meant only illumination, or, beside this, a power communicated to the will; he admitted grace, but he did this only to show that by means of it man can with greater ease act aright: we, on the contrary, affirm that grace is bestowed, not that we may be able with greater ease to act aright, (which is as though we can do this even without grace,) but that grace is absolutely necessary to enable us to act at all aright. Pelagius asserted, that man, so far from requiring the aid of grace for the performance of good actions, is, through the powers implanted in him at the time of his creation, capable of fulfilling the whole law, of loving God, and of overcoming all temptations: we, on the contrary, assert that the grace of God is required for the performance of every act of piety. Pelagius declared, that by the works of nature man renders himself worthy of grace: but we, in common with the church universal, condemn this dogma. When Pelagius afterwards himself condemned this tenet, he understood by grace, partly natural grace, which is antecedent to all merit, and partly remission of sins, which he acknowledged to be gratuitous; but he added, that through works performed by the powers of nature alone, at least through the desire of good and the imperfect longing after it, men merit that spiritual grace by which they are assisted in good works: but we declare, that men will that which is good on account of God's prevenience or going before them by his grace, and exciting within them a longing after good; otherwise grace would no longer be grace, because it would not be gratuitously bestowed, but only on account of the merit of man."

That many, adds Mr. Watson, who have held some tenets in common with the true Arminians, have been, in different degrees, followers of Pelagius, is well known; but the original Arminians were in truth as far from Pelagian or Semi-Pelagian errors, granting the opinions of Pelagius to be fairly reported by his adversaries, as the Calvinists themselves. This is also the case with the whole body of Wesleyan Methodists, and of the cognate societies to which they have given rise, both in Great Britain and America.

If these last statements of Mr. Watson be correct, then it would seem to follow, that the radical difference between the Arminians and Calvinists is reduced to the single question, Is faith foreseen, the cause, or the consequence of the divine purpose of election to salvation? Or, in other words, is election conditional; or is it perfectly gratuitous? Is it of works? or of grace? But if, as is conceded, the first longing after good is of grace, and every subsequent step in its pursuit, what difference remains?—Hend. Buck; Watson. See also Scott's Synod of Dort.

PELEG, son of Eber, was born A. M. 1757. His father named him Peleg, (division;) because in his time the earth was divided, Gen. 10: 25. 11: 16. Whether Noah had begun to distribute the earth among his descendants, some years before the building of Babel; or, that Peleg was born the year that Babel was begun; or, that Eber, by a spirit of prophecy, named his son Peleg, some years before this time; or, that the name was given to him at a later period of his life, as a commemorative appellation, on recollection, is not certainly known; though it seems most likely that he was not born at the time of the dispersion.—Calmet.

PELICAN; (kaath, a vomiter, Lev. 11: 18. Deut. 14: 17. Ps. 102: 7. Isa. 34: 11. Zeph. 2: 14.) a very remarkable aquatic bird, of the size of a large goose. Its color is a grayish white, except that the neck looks a little yellowish, and the middle of the back feathers are blackish. The bill is long, and hooked at the end, and has under it a lax membrane, extended to the throat, which makes a bag or sack, capable of holding a very large quantity. Feeding her young from this bag has so much the appearance of feeding them with her own blood, that it caused this fabulous opinion to be propagated, and made the pelican an emblem of paternal, as the stork had been before chosen, more justly, of filial affection. The voice of this bird is harsh and dissonant, which some say resembles that of a man grievously complaining. David compares his groaning to it, Ps. 102: 7.—Watson.

PELLA; a city beyond Jordan, placed by Pliny in the Decapolis, and by Stephanus in Cœlo-Syria. There is nothing inconsistent in this, however, nor in what others affirm, that Pella was in Perea, in Batanea, or in the country of Basan. It was situated between Jabesh and Gerasa, six miles from the former.—It was also one of the ten cities of the Decapolis, Matt. 4: 25. Mark 5: 20.

Josephus relates, that under the reign of Alexander Jannæus, the Jews were masters of Pella, and destroyed it, because the inhabitants would not embrace Judaism. The first Christians, having been forewarned by our Savior that Jerusalem should be demolished, took refuge at Pella, as related by Eusebius, as soon as they saw the fire of war against the Romans kindled.—Calmet.

PELLICAN, (CONRADE;) an eminent divine, born at Rubac, in Sweden, 1178. He was kept at school until he was thirteen years of age, when his parents sent him to Heidelberg, where he studied sixteen months; he then entered a monastery. Some time after, he returned to Heidelberg, and thence went to Tubingen, where his success in study commanded great admiration. His proficiency in Hebrew was indeed surprising. Having providentially become the owner of a Bible in that tongue, about the middle of July, he applied with such zeal to its perusal, that, by the end of the October following, he had finished it; selected the roots; and arranged them in the form of a concordance. In the year 1501, he was ordained presbyter. In this year, he lost both his parents; on which occasion he transcribed the seven penitential psalms in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin; to which he subjoined many appropriate prayers. The year following, he received the degree of D. D. at Basil, and was made divinity lecturer at the convent. About this time, he assisted in the preparation of Augustine's works for the press.

While Pellican continued a friar, he was universally esteemed for his learning and integrity; but when it pleased God to convince him of the errors and absurdities of the papal church, and he began publicly to expose them, he was directly made the object of its hate and persecution. About the year 1518, when Luther and Erasmus were promulgating some of their writings, Pellican declared himself of their persuasion. He had once visited Rome itself; and the sight of the stupid and preposterous superstitions which there passed before him, contributed not a little to his conversion. The senate of Basl', observing his great abilities, chose him joint lecturer in divinity with Ecolampadius, in that city. In 1526, having by the desire of Zuinglius gone to Zurich, for the purpose of hearing the lectures of Leo Judæ on Hebrew, he renounced popery, and was soon after married. In 1527, he published an edition of the Hebrew Bible, with the comments of Aben Ezra, and K. Salamon.

He diligently applied himself to the study of the Turkish language, that he might be useful to some who had become his neighbors, by efforts for their conversion to the Christian faith. During thirty years, he was Hebrew professor at Zurich, where he was universally admired for his extensive learning and unwearied labors. He died in 1556, in the seventy-eighth year of his age.

His works consisted principally of lectures and annotations upon the Scriptures; translations from the Greek, Latin, Hebrew, and Chaldee; also, an exposition of several of the books of the Old Testament, together with a translation from Ludovicus Vives, designed to convince the Jews of the truth of Christianity.

The characteristics of Pellican were sincerity, candor, uprightness, and humility, rendering him eminent in public life, and in private most amiable.—Middleton, vol. ii. 60.

PEMBROKE, (ANNE, Countess of,) daughter and sole heir to George Clifford, earl of Cumberland, was born at Skipton castle, in Craven, in 1589. To endowments naturally of a high order, she added all those accomplishments which her high rank and extensive wealth brought within her reach. According to bishop Rainbow, "she could discourse with virtuosos, travellers, scholars, merchants, divines, statesmen, and good housewives in any kind." But she preferred "the study of those noble Berens, and those honorable women, who searched the Scriptures daily; with Mary, she chose the better part of hearing the doctrine of Christ."

She was twice married: her first husband was Richard, earl of Dorset; her second, Philip, earl of Pembroke and Montgomery. She survived the latter forty-five years, during which time she employed herself in a constant series of good works, extensive charities, and generosity to learned men; also in erecting sacred edifices; a noble hospital, and many other stately buildings, both for the honor of her family and for the public good.

While she was very exemplary in her observance of the public duties of religion, she was no less diligent in her private devotions; which she constantly performed in her private oratory three times a day. She was careful also that none of her servants should be remiss or negligent in their religious observances. In her intercourse with others she was condescending, and ever strove to obliterate from their minds any consciousness of inferiority. This great and excellent lady died in 1674, aged eighty-five.—Betham.

PEN; a well known instrument used in writing. Reeds were formerly employed for this purpose, instead of quills. The Arabians, Persians, Turks, Greeks, and other Orientals, still write with reeds.

From the size and general appearance of some of the ancient reeds, as preserved in pictures found at Herculæum, we may perceive how easily the same word, shebeth, might denote the sceptre, or badge of authority, belonging to the chief of a tribe, and a pen for writing. For, although the two instruments are sufficiently distinct among us, yet, where a long rod of cane, or reed, perhaps, was (like a general's truncheon, or baton, in modern days) the ensign of command, and a lesser rod of the same nature was formed into a pen and used as such, they had considerable resemblance. This may account for the phraseology and parallelism, in Judg. 5: 14.

Out of Machir, came down governors: (legislators):
Out of Zebulun, they that hold the shebeth of the scribes.

The ancients also used styles to write on tablets covered with wax. The Psalmist says, (Psal. 45: 1.) "My tongue is the pen of a ready writer." The Hebrew signifies rather a style; which was a kind of bodkin, made of iron, brass, or bone, sharp at one end, the other formed like a little spoon, or spatula. The sharp end was used for writing letters, the other end expunged them. The writer could put out, or correct, what he disliked, and yet no erasure appear, and he could write anew as often as he pleased on the same place. Scripture alludes to this custom; (2 Kings 21: 13.) "I will blot out Jerusalem as men blot out writing from their writing tablets."

Jeremiah says, "The sin of Judah is written with a pen of iron and with the point of a diamond. It is graven upon the table of their heart;" or, engraven on their heart, as on writing tablets. The Hebrew says, with a graver of shamir.—Calmet.

PENANCE; a punishment, either voluntary or imposed by authority, for the faults a person has committed.

Penance is one of the seven sacraments of the Romish church. Besides fasting, alms, abstinence, and the like, which are the general conditions of penance, there are others of a more particular kind; as the repeating a certain number of ave-marias, paternosters, and credos; wearing a hair shirt, and giving one's self a certain number of stripes. In Italy and Spain, it is usual to see Christians almost naked, loaded with chains, and lashing themselves at every step. (See POPERY).—Hend. Buck.

PENFIELD, (THOMAS); a Christian philanthropist of Savannah, Georgia. His benefactions laid the foundation of the Mercer Institute, Green county, Georgia. Another monument of his charity is the Penfield Mariner's church, in Savannah, erected at a cost of eight thousand dollars. He also left a large property to other Christian charities, such as education, foreign and domestic missions, &c.—New York Bap. Repos. 1834.

PENIEL, or PENUEL; a city beyond Jordan, near the ford on the brook Jabbok, where Jacob, on his return from Mesopotamia, rested, and wrestled with an angel, Gen. 32: 30. (See JABBOK).—Calmet.

PENITENCE is sometimes used for a state of repentance, and sometimes for the act of repenting. (See REPENTANCE.) It is also used for a discipline or punishment attending repentance, more usually called penance. It also gives title to several religious orders, consisting either of converted debauchees and reformed prostitutes, or of persons who devote themselves to the office of reclaiming them. (See article PENITENTS).—Hend. Buck.

PENITENTIAL; an ecclesiastical book retained among the Romanists, in which is prescribed what relates to the imposition of penance, and the reconciliation of penitents. There are various penitentials; as the Roman penitential, that of the venerable Bede, that of pope Gregory III., &c.—Hend. Buck.

PENITENTIARY; in the ancient Christian church, a name given to certain presbyters or priests, appointed in every church to receive the private confessions of the people, in order to facilitate public discipline, by acquainting them what sins were to be expiated by public penance, and to appoint private penance for such private crimes as were not proper to be publicly censured.

Penitentiary, also, in the court of Rome, is an office in which are examined and delivered out the secret bulls, dispensations, &c. Penitentiary is also an officer in some cathedrals vested with power from the bishop to absolve in cases referred to him.

The term is also applied among Protestants to such houses as have been established for the reception and reformation of females who have been seduced from the path of virtue; as "The London Female Penitentiary." This most important and useful institution is supported by voluntary contributions, patronized by their majesties, and conducted on truly Christian principles, by means of which numbers of miserable outcasts have not only been recovered to the proprieties of moral conduct, but have given satisfactory evidence of genuine conversion to God.

In the United States it is applied to all those prisons which are constructed on reformatory principles, whether the convicts be men or women. The happiest results have flowed from the efforts of the Prison Discipline Society directed to this point.—Hend. Buck.

PENITENTS; certain fraternities of religious of both sexes among the Roman Catholics. The Male Penitents are distinguished by the color of their garments, white, black, blue, &c. The Black Penitents (called the Brethren of Mercy, instituted 1488) attended criminals to their execution. The Female Penitents are chiefly reformed prostitutes, as the Penitents of St. Magdalen, at Paris and Marseilles, the Converts of the Name of Jesus at Seville, &c. Broughton's Dict.—Williams.

PENN, (WILLIAM), the founder and legislator of Pennsylvania, whom Montesquieu denominates the modern Lycurgus, was the son of admiral Penn; was born, in 1644, in London; and was educated at Christ church, Oxford.

As something remarkable is usually said of all great men in the early part of their lives, so it was said of William Penn, that, while here and alone in his chamber, being then eleven years old, he was suddenly surprised with an inward comfort, and, as he thought, an external glory, in the room, which gave rise to religious emotions, during which he had the strongest conviction of the being of a God, and that the soul of man was capable of enjoying communication with him. He believed, also, that the seal of divinity had been put upon him at this moment, or that he had been awakened or called upon to a holy life. But whatever was the external occasion, or whether any or none, or whatever were the particular notions which he is said to have imbibed at this period, certain it is, that while he was at Chigwell school, his mind was seriously impressed on the subject of religion.

At college he imbibed the principles of Quakerism, which, a few years afterwards, he publicly professed.

Being accidentally on business at Cork, he heard that Thomas Loe (a layman of Oxford, and the person who first confirmed his early religious impressions) was to preach at a meeting of the Quakers in that city. Accordingly he attended. The preacher at length rose, and thus began: "There is a faith which overcomes the world, and there is a faith which is overcome by the world." On this subject he enlarged in so impressive a manner, that William was quite overcome. Penn now became openly a Quaker. He was, in consequence, twice turned out of doors by his father. In 1668, he began to preach in public, and to write in defence of the doctrine, which he had embraced. For this he was thrice imprisoned, and once brought to trial. It was during his first imprisonment that he wrote "No Cross, No Crown." In 1677 he visited Holland and Germany, to propagate his principles. He preached much on the continent, was well received, made many converts to his system, and, a Frankfurt, wrote his "Letter to the Churches of Jesu throughout the World;" and, at Rotterdam, "A Call, or Summons, to Christendom."

In March, 1680-81, he obtained from Charles II. a grant of that territory which now bears the name of Pennsylvania; in lieu of the debt due by the government to his father, and which he was induced to do, from a desire to spread the principles and doctrines of the Quakers; and to raise a virtuous empire in the new land, which should diffuse its example far and wide to the remotest ages. In 1682, he embarked for his new colony; and in the following year he founded Philadelphia.

He also divided his land into counties; laid out towns; reserved a thousand acres for Fox, the founder of the Quakers; received new reinforcements of settlers; appointed sheriffs to the different counties; and issued writs to them for calling assemblies in the ensuing spring. Whilst thus engaged, he was not, however, indifferent to his personal religion. To glorify God was the great object of his life; and he was never so delighted as when he thought that object was most effectually promoted. In 1683, he proceeded in the organization of the settlement. The assembly met; juries were appointed; the erection of Philadelphia was commenced and prosecuted with great vigor, and he made a journey of discovery into the interior of Pennsylvania; and sent to the Free Society of traders the natural history of that settlement. In 1684, having received accounts of fresh persecutions in England, he determined on repairing thither to use his influence with the court to stop them. In the mean time he settled the system of discipline for his own religious societies at Pennsylvania; held conferences, and made treaties with the Indians; forwarded the building of his city; wrote a farewell epistle to his friends; provided for the government in his absence, and then embarked for England, where he arrived in health and safety. So much was he in favor with James II., that, after the revolution, he was more than once arrested on suspicion of plotting to restore the exiled monarch; but he at length succeeded in establishing his innocence. He visited America for the last time in 1699, and returned in 1701. The rest of his life was passed in tranquillity. He died July 30, 1718. His works have been collected in two folio volumes. Memoirs by Clarkson.—Davenport; Head, Buck.

PENNY; (denarius;) a Roman coin, equal in value to seven-pence three farthings, sterling, or twelve and one half cents. As this was a single coin, perhaps we should do well, in translating, to express it by a coin of our own, as near to it in value as possible; say, for instance, a shilling.—Calmet.

PENTATEUCH, (from pente, five, and teuchos, an instrument or volume,) signifies the collection of the five instruments or books of Moses, which are Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy. (See MOSES.)

Some modern writers, among whom is Gesenius, have asserted that Moses did not compose the Pentateuch, because the author always speaks in the third person; abridges his narration, like a writer who collected from ancient memoirs; sometimes interrupts the thread of his discourse; (for example, Gen. 4: 23.) and gives an account of the death of Moses at the end, &c. It is alleged, also, of the text of the Pentateuch, that there are some places that are defective; (for example, in Exod. 12: 8.) Lastly, they think they observe certain strokes in the Pentateuch which can hardly agree with Moses, who was born and bred in Egypt; as what he says of the earthly paradise, of the rivers that watered it and ran through it; of the cities of Babylon, Erech, Resen, and Calneh; of the gold of Pison; of the bellium, of the stone of Sohem, or onyx stone, which was to be found in that country. Add to these what he says concerning the ark of Noah, of its construction, of the place where it rested, of the wood wherewith it was built, of the bitumen of Babylon, &c. These particulars, observed with such curiosity, seem to them to prove that the author of the Pentateuch lived beyond the Euphrates. They therefore would allow it to higher date than about the time of the Babylonian captivity; thus denying not only its divine inspiration, but even its authenticity. On these, and similar grounds, Dr. Cooper, of South Carolina, assails it, in his Letter to professor Silliman.

But in answer to these objections, it is justly observed, that these books are, by the most ancient writers, ascribed to Moses, and it is confirmed by the authority of heathen writers themselves, that they are his writing; besides this, we have the unanimous testimony of the whole Jewish nation ever since Moses' time. Innumerable texts of the Pentateuch imply that it was written by him; and the book of Joshua, and the other succeeding parts of Scripture, furnish the fullest corroboration, especially the positive testimony of our Lord. It is probable, however, that Ezra published a new edition of the books of Moses, in which he added those passages that Moses did not write. (See BIBLE; MOSES, BOOKS OF; INSPIRATION.) The reader will find this whole question discussed with ample learning and ability in the North American Review for April, 1826; and the Biblical Repository for October, 1832. Also an admirable article in the American Baptist Magazine for 1832.

The legislator of the Jews, then, was the author of the Pentateuch, an immortal work, wherein he paints the marvels of his reign with the majestic picture of the government and religion which he established! Who before our modern infidels ever ventured to obscure this incontestable fact? Who ever sprang a doubt about this among the Hebrews? What greater reasons have there ever been to attribute to Momammed his Alcoran, to Plato his Republic, to Zenophon his Anabasis, or to Herodotus his History? Rather let us say, What work in any age ever appeared more truly to bear the name of its real author? It is not an ordinary book, which, like many others, may be easily hazarded under a fictitious name. It is a sacred book, which the Jews have always read with a veneration that remains after seventeen hundred years' exile, calamities, and reproach. In this book the Hebrews included all their science; it was their civil, political, and sacred code; their only treasure, their calendar, their annals; the only title of their sovereigns and pontiffs; the alone rule of polity and worship; by consequence it must be formed with their monarchy, and necessarily have the same epoch as their government and religion, &c. Moses speaks only truth, though infidels charge him with imposture. But what an impostor must he be, who first spoke of the Divinity in a manner so sublime, that no one since, during almost four thousand years, has been able to surpass him! What an impostor must he be whose writings breathe only virtue; whose style, equally simple, affecting, and sublime, in spite of the rudeness of those first ages, openly displays an inspiration altogether divine! PENTECOST; a solemn festival of the Jews; so called, because it was celebrated on the fiftieth day after the sixteenth of Nisan, which was the second day of the passover. The Hebrews call it the feast of weeks, because it was kept seven weeks after the passover. They then offered the first-fruits of the wheat-harvest, which was then completed; besides which, they presented at the temple seven lambs of that year, one calf, and two rams for a burnt-offering; two lambs for a peace-offering; and a goat for a sin-offering, Lev. 23: 15, 16. Exod. 34: 22. Deut. 16: 9, 10.

The feast of Pentecost was instituted among the Israelites, first, to oblige them to repair to the temple of the Lord, there to acknowledge his absolute dominion over the whole country, by offering him the first-fruits of the harvest; and, secondly, to commemorate and give thanks to God for the law which he had given them from Sinai, on the fiftieth day after their coming out of Egypt.

The modern Jews celebrate the Pentecost for two days. They deck the synagogues, where the law is read, and their own houses, with garlands of flowers. They hear an oration in praise of the law, and read from the Pentateuch and prophets lessons which have a relation to this festival, and accommodate their prayers to the same occasion. It was on the feast of Pentecost that the Holy Ghost descended in the miraculous manner, related Acts 2. It fell on the first day of the week.—Watson.

PEOR, or PHOOR; a famous mountain beyond Jordan, which Eusebius places between Heshbon and Livias. The mountains Nebo, Pisgah, and Peor, were near one another, and probably of the same chain of mountains. It stood very favorably for a distant prospect; "a prospect station in an open place," Num. 23: 28. We may say the same of Beth Peor, (Deut. 3: 29.) which appears to have been on an eminence; as the valley in which Israel abode was over against it, chap. 4: 46. It was a temple, we may suppose, with a village at least around it.—Calmet.

PEPÜTIANS. (See MONTANISTS.)

PERCY, (THOMAS,) an eminent prelate, related to the Northumberland family, was born, in 1728, at Bridgenorth, in Shropshire; was educated at Christ church, Oxford; became chaplain to the king in 1769, dean of Carlisle in 1778, and bishop of Dromore in 1782. He died in 1811. Of his works the principal are, The Hermit of Warkworth, a poem; a new Translation of Solomon's Song; and the Reliques of English Poetry.—Davenport.

PEREA, (from Gr. peran, beyond.) signifies the country beyond Jordan, or east of that river, especially on the south. Josephus says that it had its limits, at Philadelphia east, the Jordan west, Macheron south and Pella north. Sometimes the word Perea is taken in a more extensive signification, for the whole country beyond Jordan. It was inclosed on the east by mountains, which divided it from Arabia Deserta.—Calmet.

PEREANS. (See EUPHRATESIANS.)

PEREZ-UZZA; the breach of Uzzah, 2 Sam. 6: 8. 1 Chron. 13: 11.

PERFECTION; that state or quality of a thing, in which it is free from defect or redundancy. According to some, it is divided into physical or natural, whereby a thing has all its powers and faculties; and moral, or an eminent degree of goodness and piety.

The term perfection, says the great Witsius, is not always used in the same sense in the Scriptures. 1. There is a perfection of sincerity, whereby a man serves God without hypocrisy, Job 1: 1. Is. 38: 3. 2. There is a perfection of parts, subjective with respect to the whole man, (1 Thess. 5: 23.) and objective with respect to the whole law, when all the duties prescribed by God are observed, Ps. 119: 128. Luke 1: 6. 3. There is a comparative perfection ascribed to those who are advanced in knowledge, faith, and sanctification, in comparison of those who are still infants and untaught, 1 John 2: 13. 1 Cor. 2: 6. Phil. 3: 15. 4. There is an evangelical perfection. The righteousness of Christ being imputed to the believer, he is complete in him, and accepted of God as perfect through Christ, Col. 2: 10. Eph. 5: 27. 2 Cor. 5: 21. 5. There is also a perfection of degree, by which a person performs all the commands of God, with the full exertion of all his powers, without the least defect. This is what the law of God requires, but what the saints do not attain to in this life, though we willingly allow them all the other kinds above mentioned, Rom. 7: 24. Phil. 3: 12. 1 John 1: 8.

The Son of God commands his disciples (Matt. 5: 48.) to be perfect, even as their Father in heaven is perfect. Not that we can ever attain His perfection, but we ought constantly to be making advances towards it: we ought always to propose it to ourselves as our pattern, in the exercise of all virtue, and especially his mercy and charity. Hence Luke says in the parallel passage, "Be ye therefore merciful, as your Father also is merciful," Luke 6: 36. In Matt. 19: 21, our Savior says, that he who would be perfect must forsake all and follow him; and in Luke 6: 40, that the disciple who would arrive at perfection must become like his master. Paul often exhorts his disciples to be perfect; that is, to acquire the perfection of Christianity, both in theory and practice, to be convinced of the excellence of it, and to press on toward its attainment, 1 Cor. 1: 10. 14: 10, &c.

PERFECTIONISTS; a term sometimes applied to the followers of Mr. Wesley, who hold it possible to attain perfection, in a certain sense, in the present life. (See METHODISTS.)—Williams.

PERFECTIONISTS; a modern sect in New England, who believe that every individual action is either wholly sinful, or wholly righteous; and that every being in the universe, at any given time, is either entirely holy or entirely wicked. Consequently, they unblushingly maintain that they themselves are free from sin. In support of this doctrine they say that Christ dwells in and controls believers, and thus secures their perfect holiness; that the body of Christ, which is the church, is nourished and guided by the life and wisdom of its head. Hence they condemn the greatest portion of the religion in the world named Christianity, as the work of Antichrist. "All the essential features of Judaism," they say, "and of its successor, popery, may be distinctly traced in nearly every form of Protestantism; and although we rejoice in the blessings which the Reformation has given us, we regard it as rightly named, the Reformation, it being an improvement of Antichrist, not a restoration of Christianity." This last opinion, which has some foundation in truth, has been long held, variously modified, in different parts of the Christian world.

An attempt has recently been made to propagate the views of this sect through the medium of a paper published at New Haven, Connecticut, and entitled, The Perfectionist.

PERFECTIONS OF GOD. (See ATTRIBUTES OF GOD.)
PERFUMES. The use of perfumes was common among the Hebrews, and the Orientals generally, before it was known to the Greeks and Romans. Moses also speaks of the art of the perfumer, in Egypt, and gives the composition of two perfumes, (Exod. 30: 25.) of which one was to be offered to the Lord, on the golden altar; and the other (Exod. 30: 34, &c.) to be used for anointing the high-priest and his sons, the tabernacle, and the vessels of divine service, Exod. 30: 23. (See INCENSE; CENSER.)

The Hebrews had also perfumes for embalming their dead. The composition is not exactly known, but they used myrrh, aloes, and other strong and astringent drugs, proper to prevent infection and corruption. (See OINTMENT; EMBALM.)

In addition to these perfumes, there are others noticed in Scripture. Those, for example, which king Hezekiah preserved in his repositories. Judith perfumed her face when she was to appear before Holofernes; and they prepared the virgins which were to appear before the kings of Persia, for six months together, by the use of oil of myrrh, and for six other months, by various perfumes, and sweet-scented oils, Esth. 2: 12. The spouse in the Canticles commends the perfumes of her lover; who in return says, that the perfumes of his spouse surpass the most excellent odors. He names particularly the spike-nard, the cana aromatica, cinnamon, myrrh, and aloes, as composing these perfumes. These instances show the taste of the ancient Hebrews, which was, and still is, the taste of the Orientals, who made much use of scents and perfumes. They prove also, that both men and women used them. It may also be observed, that to abstain from perfumes, scents, and unctions, was esteemed a part of mortification. See Esth. 11: 2. Dan. 10: 3. (See SAVOR, and TRIUMPH.)—Calmet.

PERGA; a city of Pamphylia, Acts 13: 14. This is not a maritime city, and Paul must have gone up the river Caystrus to it, or else must have gone on foot. It was one of the most considerable cities in Pamphylia; and when that province was divided into two parts, this city became the metropolis of one part, and Sidé of the other. There was, on a neighboring mountain, a very famous temple of Diana, surnamed Pergæa, from the city.—Calmet.

PERGAMUS; a city of Troas, very considerable in the time of John the evangelist, Rev. 2: 12, 13. This city was, for the space of one hundred and fifty years, the capital of a kingdom of the same name founded by Philetæus, B. C. 283; who treacherously made use of the treasures committed to his care by Lysimachus after the battle of Ipsus, and, seizing on Pergamus, established an independent kingdom. After Philetæus were five kings of the same race; the last of whom, Attalus Philopater, left his kingdom, which comprehended Mysia, Æolis, Ionia, Lydia, and Caria, to the Roman empire; to which it belonged when the first Christian church was established there. This church early became corrupted by the Nicolaitans, for which it was reprovèd by St. John, and charged quickly to repent, Rev. 2: 14—16.

Pergamus, now called Bergamo, like most other places which have been cursed by the presence of the Turks, is reduced to comparative decay, containing a poor population, who are too indolent or too oppressed to profit by the richness of their soil and the beauty of the climate. The number of inhabitants, however, is still said to amount to thirty thousand, of whom three thousand are Greek Christians. Many remains of former magnificence are still to be found; amongst which are those of several Christian churches. It is about sixty miles north of Smyrna. The celebrated physician Galen was a native of this place.—Watson.

PERIPATETICS. (See ARISTOTELIANS.)

PERKINS, (WILLIAM,) an eminent divine of the church of England, was born at Maton, in Warwickshire, England, 1558. He was educated in Christ college, Cambridge. In his early life, he gave proofs of great genius and philosophic research; but in his habits was exceedingly wild and profligate. After his conversion, he was distinguished for his tender sympathy, and skill in opening the human heart; so that he became the instrument of salvation to many.

At the age of twenty-four, he was chosen fellow of Christ college, and entered into holy orders. He was soon after chosen rector of St. Andrew's parish, in Cambridge, where, in all his efforts, he displayed a mind admirably adapted to his station. While his discourses were suited to the capacity of the common people, the pious scholar could not but admire them. They were said to be "all law, and all gospel;" so well did he unite the characters of a Boanerges and a Barnabas. He was an able casuist; and was resorted to by afflicted consciences far and near.

So far was he from considering his field of effort circumscribed, he improved every opportunity to do good. On one occasion, perceiving a young man who was about to ascend the ladder to be executed exceedingly distressed, he endeavored to console him; but to no effect. He then said, "Man, what is the matter with thee? art thou afraid of death?" "Ah! no," said the malefactor; "but of a worse thing." "Then come down," said Mr. Perkins, "and thou shalt see what the grace of God can do to strengthen thee." Mr. Perkins then took him by the hand, and kneeling down with him at the foot of the ladder, so fervently acknowledged sin, its aggravations, and its terrible desert, that the poor culprit burst into tears of contrition. He then proceeded to set forth the Lord Jesus Christ, as the Savior of every believing penitent; which he was enabled to do with such success, that the poor creature continued indeed to shed tears; but they were now tears of love, gratitude, and joy, flowing from a persuasion that his sins were cancelled by the Savior's blood. He afterwards ascended the ladder with composure, while the spectators lifted up their hands and praised God for such a glorious display of his sovereign grace.

Mr. Perkins died in 1602, in the forty-fourth year of his age. During his last sickness, which was very severe, he was remarkably patient. Having heard a friend pray for the mitigation of his pains, he cried out, "Hold! hold! do not pray so; but pray the Lord to give me faith and patience, and then lay on me just what he please."

His works, which were numerous, were published in two volumes folio. Many of them were translated into a variety of foreign languages.—Middleton, vol. ii. p. 322.

PERJURY, is the taking of an oath, in order to tell or confirm a falsehood. This is a very heinous crime, as it is treating the Almighty with irreverence; denying, or at least discarding his omniscience; profaning his name, and violating truth. It has always been esteemed a very detestable thing, and those who have been proved guilty of it, have been looked upon as the pests of society. (See OATH.)—Hend. Buck.

PERIZZITES, or PERESÆI; ancient inhabitants of Palestine, who had mingled with the Canaanites, or were themselves descendants of Canaan. Having no fixed habitations, and living sometimes in one country, and sometimes in another, they were called Perizzites, which signifies scattered or dispersed. There were some of them on each side of the river Jordan, in the mountains, and in the plains, Gen. 13: 7. Josh. 17: 15. 1 Kings 9: 20. 2

Chron. 8: 7. The Perizzites are mentioned by Ezra, after the return from Babylon; and several Israelites had married wives from among them, Ezra 9: 1.—Calmet.

PERMISSION OF SIN. (See SIN, and PATIENCE OF GOD.)

PERPETUA, (VIVEA;) a Christian martyr under the persecution of Severus, at the beginning of the third century. She was a lady of Carthage, of high rank, and at the time when she was accused, about twenty-two years of age. In her martyrdom, she afforded an illustrious example of Christian fortitude. She was married, and had an infant son; she was the favorite child of a pagan father, who importuned her to turn from the Christian faith, and to whom her constancy appeared but absurd obstinacy; every entreaty, every threat was employed; she encountered the terrors of a crowded court, in which certain conviction awaited her; she was scourged, and imprisoned; the tenderest feelings of filial and maternal love were appealed to; but in vain. "God's will must be done," was her language, and she remained immovable. Nor was she less firm in the final scene, when in a crowded amphitheatre, together with Felicitas, she was thrown to a mad bull. By his attack she was stunned; but the fatal stroke was left to an unskilful gladiator, whose trembling hand she herself, with a martyr's courage, guided to her throat. Felicitas suffered with her.—Beitham; Fox, p. 23.

PERSECUTION, is any pain or affliction which a person designedly inflicts upon another; and, in a more restrained sense, the sufferings of Christians on account of their religion.

Persecution is threefold. 1. Mental, when the spirit of a man rises up and malignantly opposes another. 2. Verbal, when men give hard words and deal in uncharitable censures. 3. Actual or open, by the hand; such as the dragging of innocent persons before the tribunal of justice, Matt. 10: 18. The unlawfulness of persecution for conscience' sake must appear plain to every one that possesses the least degree of thought or of feeling. "To banish, imprison, plunder, starve, hang, and burn men for religion," says the shrewd Jortin, "is not the gospel of Christ; it is the gospel of the devil. Where persecution begins, Christianity ends. Christ never used any thing that looked like force or violence except once; and that was to drive bad men out of the temple, and not to drive them in."

We know the origin of it to be from the prince of darkness, who began the dreadful practice in the first family on earth, and who, more or less, has been carrying on the same work ever since, and that almost among all parties.

The Quakers, Moravians, and Baptists claim a glorious exception. Roger Williams has the honor of being the first in modern times, who took the right ground in regard to liberty of conscience. It was he who, in 1642, cleared the subject from the subtleties of a thousand years of darkness, and held up to Christian abhorrence in all its forms the "Bloody Tenet," (as he justly called it,) of persecution for conscience' sake. John Owen, John Milton, John Locke, and a host of later writers have followed in his steps. (See RELIGIOUS LIBERTY, and TOLERATION.)

"Persecution for conscience' sake," says Dr. Doddridge, "is every way inconsistent; because, 1. It is founded on an absurd supposition, that one man has a right to judge for another in matters of religion. 2. It is evidently opposite to that fundamental principle of morality, that we should do to others as we could reasonably desire they should do to us. 3. It is by no means calculated to answer the end which its patrons profess to intend by it. 4. It evidently tends to produce a great deal of mischief and confusion in the world. 5. The Christian religion must, humanly speaking, be not only obstructed, but destroyed, should persecuting principles universally prevail. 6. Persecution is so far from being required or encouraged by the gospel, that it is most directly contrary to many of its precepts, and indeed to the whole of it."

The great part who have fallen a prey to this diabolical spirit have been Christians; a short account of whose sufferings we shall here give, as persecuted by the Jews, by heathens, and by those of the same name.

1. Persecution of Christians by the Jews.—Here we need not be copious, as the New Testament will inform the reader more particularly how the first Christians suffered for the cause of truth. Jesus Christ himself was exposed to it in the greatest degree. The four evangelists record the dreadful scenes, which need not here be enlarged on. After his death, the apostles suffered every evil which the malice of the Jews could invent, and their mad zeal execute. They who read the Acts of the Apostles, will find that, like their Master, they were despised and rejected of men, and treated with the utmost indignity and contempt.

II. Persecution of Christians by the Heathen.—Historians usually reckon ten general persecutions, thus stated by Mr. Broughton:—1. Under Nero, A. D. 64—68. 2. Under Domitian, 95, 96. 3. Under Trajan, 97—116. 4. Under Antoninus Pius, 136—156. 5. Under Severus, 199—211. 6. Under Maximinus, 235. 7. Under Decius, 249—251. 8. Under Valerian, 257—260. 9. Under Aurelian, 273—275. 10. Under Diocletian, 302—312. Others reckon them somewhat differently. In the above reckoning there are some omissions. The Christians were persecuted under Adrian from 118 to 126, and again in 129; under Marcus Aurelius, from 161 to 174: and, in short, for two hundred and sixty years from the death of Christ, they had but short intervals of rest from persecution; for when the emperors themselves were not sanguinary, there were always inferior magistrates, who, under some pretence or other, harassed the poor inoffensive Christians. It is supposed three millions perished in three centuries. (See TOLERATION.)

The first persecution was under the emperor Nero, thirty-one years after our Lord's ascension, when that emperor, having set fire to the city of Rome, threw the odium of that execrable action on the Christians. First: Those were apprehended who openly avowed themselves to be of that sect; then by them were discovered an immense multitude, all of whom were convicted. Their death and tortures were aggravated by cruel derision and sport; for they were either covered with the skins of wild beasts, and torn in pieces by devouring dogs, or fastened to crosses, and wrapped up in combustible garments, that, when the daylight failed, they might, like torches, serve to dispel the darkness of the night. For this tragical spectacle Nero lent his own gardens; and exhibited at the same time the public diversions of the circus; sometimes driving a chariot in person, and sometimes standing as a spectator, while the shrieks of women, burning to ashes, supplied music for his ears. 2. The second general persecution was under Domitian, in the year 95, when forty thousand were supposed to have suffered martyrdom. 3. The third began in the third year of Trajan, in the year 100, and was carried on with great violence for several years. 4. The fourth was under Antoninus, began in 136, when the Christians were banished from their houses, forbidden to show their heads, reproached, beaten, hurried from place to place, plundered, imprisoned, and stoned. 5. The fifth began in the year 199, under Severus, when great cruelties were committed. In this reign happened the martyrdom of Perpetua and Felicitas, and their companions. (See PERPETUA.) 6. The sixth began with the reign of Maximinus, in 235. 7. The seventh, which was the most dreadful ever known, began in 250, under the emperor Decius, when the Christians were in all places driven from their habitations, stripped of their estates, tormented with racks, &c. 8. The eighth began in 257, under Valerian. Both men and women suffered death; some by scourging, some by the sword, and some by fire. 9. The ninth was under Aurelian, in 273; but this was inconsiderable, compared with the others before mentioned. 10. The tenth began in the nineteenth year of Diocletian, 302. In this dreadful persecution, which lasted ten years, houses filled with Christians were set on fire, and whole droves were tied together with ropes, and thrown into the sea. It is related that seventeen thousand were slain in one month's time; and that during the continuance of this persecution, in the province of Egypt alone, no less than one hundred and forty-four thousand Christians died by the violence of their persecutors; besides seven hundred thousand that died through the fatigues of banishment, or the public works to which they were condemned.

III. Persecution of Christians by those of the same name.—This began almost as soon as the corrupt alliance of the Catholic church (so called) with the state. Christianity, primitive and pure, gave no countenance to it whatever.

Numerous were the persecutions inflicted on the Cathari or Pure, and different sects, from Constantine's time to the Reformation; but when Martin Luther arose, and opposed the errors and ambition of the church of Rome, and the sentiments of this good man began to spread, the pope and his clergy joined all their forces to hinder their progress. A general council of the clergy was called; this was the famous council of Trent, which was held for near eighteen successive years, for the purpose of establishing popery in greater splendor, and preventing the Reformation. The friends to the Reformation were anathematized and excommunicated, and the life of Luther was often in danger, though at last he died on the bed of peace. From time to time innumerable schemes were suggested to overthrow the reformed church, and wars were set on foot for the same purpose. The Invincible Armada, as it was vainly called, had the same end in view. The Inquisition, which was established in the twelfth century against the Waldenses, (see INQUISITION,) was now more effectually set to work. Terrible persecutions were carried on in various parts of Germany, and even in Bohemia, which continued about thirty years, and the blood of the saints was said to flow like rivers of water. The countries of Poland, Lithuania, and Hungary, were, in a similar manner, deluged with Protestant blood. In and in the Low Countries, for many years the most amazing cruelties were exercised under the merciless and unrelenting hands of the Spaniards, to whom the inhabitants of that part of the world were then in subjection. Father Paul observes, that these Belgic martyrs were fifty-thousand; but Grotius and others observe, that there were one hundred thousand who suffered by the hand of the executioner. Herein, however, Satan and his agents failed of their purpose; for, in the issue, great part of the Netherlands shook off the Spanish yoke, and erected themselves into a separate and independent state, which has ever since been considered as one of the principal Protestant countries of the universe.

HOLLAND,

FRANCE.

No country, perhaps, has ever produced more martyrs than this. After many cruelties had been exercised against the Protestants, there was a most violent persecution of them in the year 1572, in the reign of Charles IX. Many of the principal Protestants were invited to Paris under a solemn oath of safety, upon occasion of the marriage of the king of Navarre with the French king's sister. The queen dowager of Navarre, a zealous Protestant, however, was poisoned by a pair of gloves before the marriage was solemnized. Coligni, admiral of France, was basely murdered in his own house, and then thrown out of the window to gratify the malice of the duke of Guise: his head was afterwards cut off, and sent to the king and queen-mother; and his body, after a thousand indignities offered to it, hung by the feet on a gibbet. After this, the murderers ravaged the whole city of Paris, and butchered in three days above ten thousand lords, gentlemen, presidents, and people of all ranks. A horrible scene of things, says Thuanus, when the very streets and passages resounded with the noise of those that met together for murder and plunder; the groans of those who were dying, and the shrieks of such as were just going to be butchered, were everywhere heard; the bodies of the slain thrown out of the windows; the courts and chambers of the houses filled with them; the dead bodies of others dragged through the streets; their blood running through the channels in such plenty, that torrents seemed to empty themselves in the neighboring river: in a word, an innumerable multitude of men, women with child, maidens, children, were all involved in one common destruction, and the gates and entrances of the king's palace all besmeared with their blood. From the city of Paris the massacre spread throughout the whole kingdom. In the city of Meaux they threw above two hundred into gaol; and after they had ravished and killed a great number of women, and plundered the houses of the Protestants, they executed their fury on those they had imprisoned; and calling them one by one, they were killed, as Thuanus expresses, like sheep in a market. In Orleans, they murdered above five hundred men, women, and children, and enriched themselves with the spoil. The same cruelties were practised at Angiers, Troyes, Bourges, La Charité, and especially at Lyons, where they inhumanly destroyed above eight hundred Protestants; children hanging on their parents' necks; parents embracing their children; putting ropes about the necks of some, dragging them through the streets, and throwing them, mangled, torn, and half dead, into the river. According to Thuanus, above thirty thousand Protestants were destroyed in this massacre; or, as others affirm, above one hundred thousand. But what aggravates these scenes with still greater wantonness and cruelty, was the manner in which the news was received at Rome. When the letters of the pope's legate were read in the assembly of the cardinals, by which he assured the pope that all was transacted by the express will and command of the king, it was immediately decreed that the pope should march with his cardinals to the church of St. Mark, and in the most solemn manner give thanks to God for so great a blessing conferred on the see of Rome and the Christian world; and that, on the Monday after, solemm mass should be celebrated in the church of Minerva, at which the pope, Gregory XIII., and cardinals were present; and that a jubilee should be published throughout the whole Christian world, and the cause of it declared to be, to return thanks to God for the extirpation of the enemies of the truth and church in France. In the evening the cannon of St. Angelo were fired to testify the public joy; the whole city illuminated with bonfires; and no one sign of rejoicing omitted that was usually made for the greatest victories obtained in favor of the Roman church!

But all these persecutions were, however, far exceeded in cruelty by those which took place in the time of Louis XIV. It cannot be pleasant to any man's feelings, who has the least humanity, to recite these dreadful scenes of horror, cruelty, and devastation; but to show what superstition, bigotry, and fanaticism are capable of producing, and for the purpose of holding up the spirit of persecution to contempt, we shall here give as concise a detail as possible. The troopers, soldiers, and dragoons, went into the Protestants' houses, where they marred and defaced their household stuff; broke their looking-glasses and other utensils; threw about their corn and wine; sold what they could not destroy; and thus, in four or five days, the Protestants were stripped of above a million of money. But this was not the worst: they turned the dining-rooms of gentlemen into stables for horses, and treated the owners of the houses where they quartered with the greatest cruelty, lashing them about, not suffering them to eat or drink. When they saw the blood and sweat run down their faces, they sluiced them with water, and, putting over their heads kettle-drums turned upside down, they made a continual din upon them, till these unhappy creatures lost their senses. At Negreplisse, a town near Montauban, they hung up Isaac Favin, a Protestant citizen of that place, by his armpits, and tormented him a whole night by pinching and tearing off his flesh with pinners. They made a great fire round about a boy, twelve years old, who, with hands and eyes lifted up to heaven, cried out, "My God, help me!" and when they found the youth resolved to die rather than renounce his religion, they snatched him from the fire just as he was on the point of being burnt. In several places the soldiers applied red-hot irons to the hands and feet of men, and the breasts of women. At Nantes, they hung up several women and maids by their feet, and others by their armpits, and thus exposed them to public view stark naked. They bound mothers that gave suck to posts, and let their sucking infants lie languishing in their sight for several days and nights, crying and gasping for life. Some they bound before a great fire, and being half roasted, let them go; a punishment worse than death. Amidst a thousand hideous cries, they hung up men and women by the hair, and some by their feet, on hooks in chimneys, and smoked them with wisps of wet hay till they were suffocated. They tied some under the arms with ropes, and plunged them again and again into wells: they bound others, put them to the torture, and with a funnel filled them with wine till the fumes of it took away their reason, when they made them say they consented to be Catholics. They stripped them naked, and, after a thousand indignities, stuck them with pins and needles from head to foot. If any, to escape these barbarities, endeavored to save themselves by flight, they pursued them into the fields and woods, where they shot at them like wild beasts, and prohibited them from departing the kingdom (a cruelty never practised by Nero or Diocletian) upon pain of confiscation of effects, the galleys, the lash, and perpetual imprisonment. With these scenes of desolation and horror the popish clergy feasted their eyes, and made only matter of laughter and sport of them!!!

ENGLAND

has also been the seat of much persecution. Though Wickliffe, the first reformer, died peaceably in his bed, yet such was the malice and spirit of persecuting Rome, that his bones were ordered to be dug up, and cast upon a dunghill. The remains of this excellent man were accordingly dug out of the grave, where they had lain undisturbed four-and-forty years. His bones were burnt, and the ashes cast into an adjoining brook.

In the reign of Henry VIII., Bilney, Baymaa, and many other reformers, were burnt; but when queen Mary came to the throne, the most severe persecutions took place. Hooper and Rogers were burnt in a slow fire. Saunders was cruelly tormented a long time at the stake before he expired. Taylor was put into a barrel of pitch, and fire set to it. Eight illustrious persons, among whom was Ferrar, bishop of St. David's, were sought out, and burnt by the infamous Bonner, in a few days. Sixty-seven persons were this year, A. D. 1555, burnt, amongst whom were the famous Protestants, Bradford, Ridley, Latimer, and Philpot. In the following year, 1556, eighty-five persons were burnt. Women suffered; and one, in the flames, which burst her womb, being near her time of delivery, a child fell from her into the fire, which being snatched out by some of the observers more humane than the rest, the magistrate ordered the babe to be again thrown into the fire and burnt. Thus even the unborn child was burnt for heresy. O God, what is human nature when left to itself! Alas, dispositions ferocious as infernal then reign and usurp the heart of man!

The queen erected a commission court, which was followed by the destruction of near eighty more. Upon the whole, the number of those who suffered death for the reformed religion in this reign, were no less than two hundred and seventy-seven persons; of whom were five bishops, twenty-one clergymen, eight gentlemen, eighty-four tradesmen, one hundred husbandmen, laborers, and servants, fifty-five women, and four children. Besides these, there were fifty-four more under prosecution, seven of whom were whipped, and sixteen perished in prison.

Nor was the reign of Elizabeth free from this persecuting spirit. If any one refused to consent to the least ceremony in worship, he was cast into prison, where many of the most excellent men in the land perished. Two Protestant Baptists were burnt, and many banished. She also, it is said, put two Brownists to death; and though her whole reign was distinguished for its political prosperity, yet it is evident that she did not understand the rights of conscience; for it is said that more sanguinary laws were made in her reign than in any of her predecessors, and her hands were stained with the blood both of papists and Puritans.

James I. succeeded Elizabeth: he published a proclamation, commanding all Protestants to conform strictly, and without any exception, to all the rites and ceremonies of the church of England. Above five hundred clergy were immediately silenced, or degraded, for not complying. Some were excommunicated, and some banished the country. The Dissenters were distressed, censured, and fined, in the Star-Chamber. Two persons were burnt for heresy, one at Smithfield, and the other at Litchfield. Worn out with endless vexations, and unceasing persecutions, many retired into Holland, and from thence to America. It is witnessed by a judicious historian, that, in this and some following reigns, twenty-two thousand persons were banished from England by persecution, to America.

In Charles I.'s time arose the persecuting Laud, who was the occasion of distress to numbers. Dr. Leighton, for writing a book against the hierarchy, was fined ten thousand pounds, perpetual imprisonment, and whipping. He was whipped, and then placed in the pillory; one of his ears cut off; one side of his nose slit; branded on the cheek with a red-hot iron, with the letters S. S.; whipped a second time, and placed in the pillory. A fortnight afterwards, his sores being yet uncured, he had the other ear cut off, the other side of his nose slit, and the other cheek branded. He continued in prison till the long parliament set him at liberty. About four years afterwards, William Prynne, a barrister, for a book he wrote against the sports on the Lord's day, was deprived from practising at Lincoln's Inn, degraded from his degree at Oxford, set in the pillory, had his ears cut off, imprisoned for life, and fined five thousand pounds.

Nor were the Presbyterians, when their government came to be established in England, free from the charge of persecution. In 1645 an ordinance was published, subjecting all who preached or wrote against the Presbyterian directory for public worship to a fine not exceeding fifty pounds; and imprisonment for a year, for the third offence, in using the Episcopal book of common prayer, even in a private family. In the following year the Presbyterians applied to parliament, pressing them to enforce uniformity in religion, and to extirpate popery, prelacy, heresy, schism, &c., but their petition was rejected; yet in 1648 the parliament, ruled by them, published an ordinance against heresy, and determined that any person who maintained, published, or defended the following errors, should suffer death. These errors were, 1. Denying the being of a God. 2. Denying his omnipresence, omniscience, &c. 3. Denying the Trinity in any way. 4. Denying that Christ had two natures. 5. Denying the resurrection, the atonement, the Scriptures. In New England, at the same time, persecuting principles were avowed, defended, and acted upon, by the Congregationalists. Laws were passed against the Quakers and Baptists, and many of both sects were imprisoned, fined, whipped, and banished. Among the latter was the illustrious Roger Williams. Two Quakers were put to death.

In Charles II.'s reign the act of uniformity passed, by which two thousand clergymen were deprived of their benefices. Then followed the conventicle act, and the Oxford act, under which, it is said, eight thousand persons were imprisoned and reduced to want, and many to the grave. In this reign also, the Quakers were much persecuted, and numbers of them imprisoned.

Thus we see how England has bled under the hands of bigotry and persecution; nor was toleration enjoyed until William III. came to the throne, who showed himself a warm friend to the rights of conscience. The accession of the present royal family was auspicious to religious liberty; and as their majesties have always befriended toleration, the spirit of persecution has been long curbed.

IRELAND

has likewise been drenched with the blood of the Protestants, forty or fifty thousand of whom were cruelly murdered in a few days in different parts of the kingdom, in the reign of Charles I. It began on the 23d of October, 1641. Having secured the principal gentlemen, and seized their effects, they murdered the common people in cold blood, forcing many thousands to fly from their houses and settlements naked into the bogs and woods, where they perished with hunger and cold. Some they whipped to death, others they stripped naked, and exposed to shame, and then drove them, like herds of swine, to perish in the mountains: many hundreds were drowned in rivers, some had their throats cut, others were dismembered. With some the execrable villains made themselves sport, trying who could hack the deepest into an Englishman's flesh; wives and young virgins abused in the presence of their nearest relations; nay, they taught their children to strip and kill the children of the English, and dash out their brains against the stones. Thus many thousands were massacred in a few days, without distinction of age, sex, or quality, before they suspected their danger, or had time to provide for their defence.

SCOTLAND, SPAIN, &c.

Besides the above-mentioned persecutions, there have been several others carried on in different parts of the world. Scotland, for many years together, has been the scene of cruelty and blood-shed, till it was delivered by the monarch at the revolution. Spain, Italy, the valleys of Piedmont, and other places, have been the seats of much persecution. Popery, we see, has had the greatest hand in this mischievous work. It has to answer, also, for the lives of millions of Jews, Mohammedans, and barbarians. When the Moors conquered Spain in the eighth century, they allowed the Christians the free exercise of their religion; but in the fifteenth century, when the Moors were overcome, and Ferdinand subdued the Moriscos, the descendants of the above Moors, many thousands were forced to be baptized, or burnt, massacred, or banished, and their children sold for slaves; besides innumerable Jews, who shared the same cruelties, chiefly by means of the infernal courts of the Inquisition. A worse slaughter, if possible, was made among the natives of Spanish America, where fifteen millions are said to have been sacrificed to the genius of popery in about forty years. It has been computed that fifty millions of Protestants have at different times been the victims of the persecutions of the papists, and put to death for their religious opinions. Well, therefore, might the inspired penman say, that at mystic Babylon's destruction "was found in her the blood of prophets, of saints, and of all that was slain upon the earth!" Rev. 18: 24.

To conclude this article, who can peruse the account here given without feeling the most painful emotions, and dropping a tear over the madness and depravity of mankind? Does it not show us what human beings are capable of when influenced by superstition, bigotry, and prejudice? Have not these baneful principles metamorphosed men into infernals; and entirely extinguished all the feelings of humanity, the dictates of conscience, and the voice of reason? Alas! what has sin done to make mankind such curses to one another! Merciful God! by thy great power suppress this worst of all evils, and let truth and love, meekness and forbearance, universally prevail! PERSEVERANCE, is the continuance in any design, state, opinion, or course of action. The perseverance of the saints is their continuance in a state of grace to a state of glory. This doctrine has afforded considerable matter for controversy between the Calvinists and Arminians. We shall briefly here state the arguments and objections.

And, first, the perfections of God are considered as strong arguments to prove this doctrine. God, as a Being possessed of infinite love, faithfulness, wisdom, and power, can hardly be supposed to suffer any of his people finally to fall into perdition. This would be a reflection on his attributes, which are all pledged for their good, as a father of his family. His love to his people is unchangeable, and, therefore, they cannot be the objects of it at one time and not at another, John 13: 1. Zeph. 3: 17. Jer. 31: 3. His faithfulness to them and to his promise is not founded upon their merit, but his own will and goodness; this, therefore, cannot be violated, Mal. 3: 6. Num. 23: 19. His wisdom foresees every obstacle in the way, and is capable of removing it, and directing them into the right path. It would be a reflection on his wisdom, after choosing a right end, not to choose right means in accomplishing the same, Jer. 10: 6, 7. His power is insuperable, and is absolutely and perpetually displayed in their preservation and protection, 1 Pet. 1: 5.

2. Another argument to prove this doctrine, is their union to Christ, and what he has done for them. They are said to be chosen in him, (Eph. 1: 4.) united to him, (Eph. 1: 23.) the purchase of his death, (Rom. 8: 34. Tit. 2: 14.) the objects of his intercession, Rom. 5: 10. 8: 34. 1 John 2: 1, 2. Now if there be a possibility of their finally falling, then this choice, this union, his death and intercession may all be in vain, and rendered abortive; an idea as derogatory to the divine glory, and as dishonorable to Jesus Christ, as possibly can be.

3. It is argued from the work of the Spirit, which is to communicate grace and strength equal to the day, Phil. 1: 6. 2 Cor. 1: 21, 22. If, indeed, divine grace were dependent on the will of man, if by his own power he had brought himself into a state of grace, then it might follow that he might relapse into an opposite state, when that power at any time was weakened; but as the perseverance of the saints is not produced by any native principles in themselves, but by the agency of the Holy Spirit, enlightening, confirming, and establishing them, of course, they must persevere, or otherwise it would be a reflection on this Divine Agent, Rom. 8: 9. 1 Cor. 6: 11. John 4: 14. 16: 14.

4. Lastly, the declarations and promises of Scripture are very numerous in favor of this doctrine, (Job 17: 9. Psal. 94: 14. 125. Jer. 32: 40. John 10: 28. 17: 12. 1 Cor. 1: 8, 9. 1 Pet. 1: 5. Prov. 4: 18.) all which could not be true, if this doctrine were false.

There are objections, however, to this doctrine, which we must state. 1. There are various threatenings denounced against those who apostatize, Ezek. 3: 20. Heb. 6: 3, 6. Psal. 135: 3—5. Ezek. 18: 24. To this it is answered, that some of these texts do not so much suppose the falling away of a truly good man; and to all of them it is said, that they only show what would be the consequence if such should fall away; but cannot prove that it ever in fact happens.

2. It is foretold as a future event that some should fall away, Matt. 24: 12, 13. John 15: 6. Matt. 13: 20, 21. To the first of these passages it is answered, that their love might be said to wax cold without totally ceasing; or there might have been an outward zeal and show of love where there never was a true faith. To the second it is answered, that persons may be said to be in Christ only by an external profession, or mere members of the visible church, John 15: 2. Matt. 13: 47, 48. As to Matt. ch. 13: 20, 21, it is replied, that this may refer to the joy with which some may entertain the offers of pardon, who never, after all, attentively considered them.

3. It is objected that many have in fact fallen away, as David, Solomon, Peter, Alexander, Hymenæus, &c. To which it is answered, that David, Solomon, and Peter's fall, were not total; and as to the others, there is no proof of their ever being true Christians.

4. It is urged that this doctrine supersedes the use of means, and renders exhortations unnecessary. To which it may be answered, that perseverance itself implies the use of means, and that the means are equally appointed as well as the end; nor has it ever been found that true Christians have rejected them. They consider exhortations and admonitions to be some of the means they are to attend to in order to promote their holiness: Christ and his apostles, though they often asserted this doctrine, yet reprov'd, exhorted, and made use of means. (See EXHORTATION; MEANS.)

5. Lastly, it is objected that this doctrine gives great encouragement to carnal security and presumptuous sin. To which it is answered, that this doctrine, like many others, may be abused by hypocrites, but cannot be so by those who are truly saints, it being the very nature of grace to lead to righteousness, Tit. 2: 10, 12. Their knowledge leads to veneration; their love animates to duty; their faith purifies the heart; their gratitude excites to obedience; yea, all their principles have a tendency to set before them the evil of sin, and the beauty of holiness. PERŠIA; an ancient kingdom of Asia, bounded on the north by Media, on the west by Susiana, on the east by Carmania, and on the south by the Persian gulf. The Persians became very famous from the time of Cyrus, the founder of the Persian monarchy. Their ancient name was Elamites, and in the time of the Roman emperors they went by the name of Parthians; but now Persians. (See CYRUS; DARIUS; ANABASERUS; and for the religion of the ancient Persians, MAGI.)—Watson.

PERŠIAN CHRISTIANS. That the gospel was early planted in Persia, we have the most unequivocal evidence in the terrible persecution of Christians which began there in A. D. 330, whereby, in forty years, about two hundred and fifty of the clergy, and sixteen thousand others, of both sexes, were martyred in the cause of Christ, though many of them have been considered as heretics by the church of Rome, being of the Nestorian and Jacobite communions. In the seventh century, they fell under the scourge of Mohammedan tyranny and persecution, whereby many were driven to seek a refuge in India, particularly on the coasts of Travancore, while the great mass of the population apostatized to Mohammed; a circumstance that Mr. Yeates very naturally attributes to their not having the Scriptures in their own language till very recently.

In the middle of the last century, a version of the gospels was made by order of Nadir Shah, who, when it was read to him, treated it with contempt and ridicule; but since the commencement of the present century, the Rev. H. Martyn has translated the whole New Testament. It was completed in the year in which he died; (1812; and has been presented to the king of Persia by the British ambassador, and favorably received. Notwithstanding both persecution and apostasy, the number of Christians in Persia is said to be still very considerable, and to comprise Georgians, Armenians, Nestorians, Jacobites, and Romish Christians.

"The number of these (Persian) Christians amounts to about ten thousand. They have an archbishop and three bishops. The former resides at Mossil; one of the bishops at Chosrabad; another at Merdeen; and the third at Diarbekir. By the Mohammedans they are called Nazarenes, and Syrians by the Arabs; but among themselves Ebrians, or Beni Israel, which name denotes their relation to the ancient Jewish Christian church, as does also their present language, being very like the Hebrew. They have no connexion whatever with either Greek or Roman churches.

"They hold the doctrine of the Trinity in Unity; and declare Jesus Christ to be 'the way, the truth, and the life'; and that through him alone they are delivered from the wrath to come, and are made heirs of eternal life. They acknowledge only the two sacraments, but both in the full sense and import of the Protestant church.

"They have at Chosrabad a large church, nearly of the size and appearance of the Scotch kirk at Madras, which is a fine building. Through fear of the Mohammedans, who insult and oppress them, they assemble for divine worship between the hours of five and seven on Sunday mornings; and in the evenings between six and eight. There are also daily services at the same hours. The women and men sit on opposite sides of the church."

Of the native Mohammedan inhabitants we shall only remark, that they are Schüttes, of the sect of Ali, and have among them some remains of the ancient Magi; (see GADRES, MAGI, and PARSEES;) with a sect of modern infidels, called SOOFRES, to which the curious reader may also turn. Buchanan's Researches, pp. 167—176; Yeates' Indian Church History, pp. 40—47; *Life of the Rev. PERŠON; one who exercises the functions of a rational, intelligent nature. Some have been offended at the term, applied to the Trinity, as unwarrantable. The term person, when applied to Deity, is certainly used in a sense somewhat different from that in which we apply it to one another; but when it is considered that the Greek words hypostasis and prosōpon, to which it answers, are, in the New Testament, applied to the Father and Son, (Heb. 1: 3. 2 Cor. 4: 6.) and that the personal pronouns are used by our Lord, (John 14: 26.) it can hardly be condemned as unscriptural and improper. There have been warm debates between the Greek and Latin churches about the words hypostasis and persona: the Latin, concluding that the word hypostasis signified substance or essence, thought that to assert that there were three divine hypostases, was to say that there were three Gods. On the other hand, the Greek church thought that the word person did not sufficiently guard against the Sabellian notion of the same individual Being sustaining three relations; whereupon each part of the church was ready to brand the other with heresy, till, by a free and mutual conference in a synod at Alexandria, A. D. 362, they made it appear that it was but a mere contention about the grammatical sense of a word; and then it was allowed by men of temper on both sides, that either of the two words might be indifferently used. PERSUASION; the act of influencing the judgment and passions by arguments or motives. It is different from conviction. Conviction affects the understanding only; persuasion the will and practice. It is more extensively used than conviction, which last is founded on demonstration, natural or supernatural. But all things of which we may be persuaded are not capable of demonstration. Eloquence is but the art of persuasion. (See ELOQUENCE.) Blair's Rhetoric; Campbell; Whately; Mauzy's Principles of Eloquence; Pulpit Orator.—Hend. Buck.

PESTALOZZI, or PESTALUZ, (HENRY,) celebrated for having introduced a new method of education, was born, in 1745, at Zurich, in Switzerland. After having studied theology and jurisprudence, he relinquished his views with respect to the church and the bar, to cultivate his own small property. Witnessing the wretchedness of the peasantry, he became anxious to ameliorate their situation by cultivating their mental faculties on Christian principles. In the pursuit of his benevolent purpose he published several works, and considerably injured his fortune. It was not till 1798, however, that his plans were patronized by the Helvetic government. Under that patronage he for several years conducted an institution, which has acquired extensive celebrity. He died February 27, 1827.—Davenport.

PESTILENCE, or plague, generally is used by the Hebrews for all epidemic or contagious diseases. The prophets usually connect together sword, pestilence, and famine, being three of the most grievous inflictions of the Almighty upon a guilty people, 2 Sam. 24: 12. (See DISEASES, and PLAGUE.)—Watson.

PETER, the great apostle of the circumcision, was the son of Jona, and born at Bethsaida, a town situated on the western shore of the lake of Genesareth; but in what particular year we are not informed, John 1: 42, 43. His original name was Simon or Simeon, which his divine Master, when he called him to the apostleship, changed for that of Cephias, a Syriac word, signifying a stone or rock; in Latin, petra, from whence is derived the term Peter.

He was a married man, and had his house, his mother-in-law, and his wife, at Capernaum, on the lake of Genesareth, Matt. 8: 14. Mark 1: 29. Luke 4: 38. He had also a brother of the name of Andrew, who had been a disciple of John the Baptist, and was called to the knowledge of the Savior prior to himself. Andrew was present when the venerable Baptist pointed his disciples to Jesus, and added, "Behold the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world;" and meeting Simon shortly afterwards, said, "We have found the Messiah," and then brought him to Jesus, John 1: 41. When the two brothers had passed one day with the Lord Jesus, they took their leave of him, and returned to their ordinary occupation of fishing industry. This appears to have taken place in the thirtieth year of the Christian era.

Towards the end of the same year, as Jesus was one morning standing on the shore of the lake of Genesareth, he saw Andrew and Peter engaged about their employment. The miracle he then wrought, was no doubt intended for a sign to the four disciples of what success should afterwards follow their ministry in preaching the doctrine of his kingdom; and therefore Jesus said unto them, "Follow me, and I will make you fishers of men;" on which they quitted their boats and nets, and thenceforth became the constant associates of the Savior, during the whole of his public ministry, Luke 18: 28. From this instant we find St. Peter on almost every occasion evincing the strength of his faith in Jesus as the Messiah, and the most extraordinary zeal in his service, of which many examples are extant in the gospels.

When Jesus in private asked his disciples, first, what opinion the people entertained of him; next, what was their own opinion; "Simon Peter answered and said, Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God," Matt. 16: 16. Having received this answer, Jesus declared Peter blessed on account of his faith; and in allusion to the signification of his name, added, "Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church; and I will give thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven, and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth," &c. Many think these things were spoken to St. Peter alone, for the purpose of conferring on him privileges and powers not granted to the rest of the apostles. But others, with more reason, suppose that, though Jesus directed his discourse to St. Peter, it was intended for them all; and that the honors and powers granted to St. Peter by name were conferred on them all equally. For no one will say that Christ's church was built upon St. Peter singly: it was built on the foundation of all the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner-stone. As little can any one say that the power of binding and loosing was confined to St. Peter, seeing it was declared afterwards to belong to all the apostles, Matt. 18: 18. John 20: 23. To these things add this, that as St. Peter made his confession in answer to a question which Jesus put to all the apostles, that confession was certainly made in the name of the whole; and, therefore, what Jesus said to him in reply was designed for the whole without distinction; excepting this, which was peculiar to him, that he was to be the first who, after the descent of the Holy Ghost, should preach the gospel to the Jews, and then to the Gentiles: an honor which was conferred on St. Peter in the expression, "I will give thee the keys," &c.

St. Peter was one of the three apostles whom Jesus admitted to witness the resurrection of Jairus' daughter, and before whom he was transfigured, and with whom he retired to pray in the garden the night before he suffered. He was the person who, in the fervor of his zeal for his Master, cut off the ear of the high-priest's slave, when the armed band came to apprehend him.

Yet this same Peter, a few hours after that, denied his Master three different times in the high-priest's palace, and that with oaths. In the awful defection of the apostle on this occasion we have melancholy proof of the power of human depravity even in regenerate men, and of the weakness of human resolutions when left to ourselves. St. Peter was fully warned by his divine Master of his approaching danger; but, confident in his own strength, he declared himself ready to accompany his Lord to prison and even to death. After the third denial, "Jesus turned and looked upon Peter;" that look pierced him to the heart; and, stung with deep remorse, "he went out, and wept bitterly." St. Peter, however, obtained forgiveness; and when Jesus had risen from the dead, he ordered the glad tidings of his resurrection to be conveyed to St. Peter by name: "Go, tell my disciples and Peter," Mark 16: 7. He afterwards received repeated assurances of his Savior's love, (John 21: 1—22.) and from that time uniformly showed the greatest zeal and fortitude in his Master's service, Acts 1: 15. 2: 14—13. 3: 1—26. 4: 8. 5: 1—42. 8: 14. 9: 32—43. 10: 1—48. 11: 1—30. 12: 1—25. 15: 7.

In the Acts of the Apostles, no mention is made of St. Peter after the council of Jerusalem. But from Gal. 2: 11. it appears that after that council he was with St. Paul at Antioch. He is likewise mentioned by St. Paul, 1 Cor. 1: 12. 3: 22. It is generally supposed that after St. Peter was at Antioch with St. Paul, he returned to Jerusalem. What happened to him after that is not told in the Scriptures; but Eusebius informs us that Origen wrote to this purpose: St. Peter is supposed to have preached to the Jews of the dispersion in Pontus, Galatia, Bithynia, Cappadocia, and Asia; and, at length, coming to Rome, was crucified with his head downwards.

If the reader wishes to see the evidence from antiquity, on which Peter's having been at Rome rests, he will find it fully set forth by Lardner, who concludes his inquiry as follows: "This is the general, uncontradicted, disinterested testimony of ancient writers in the several parts of the world, Greeks, Latins, Syrians. As our Lord's prediction concerning the death of Peter is recorded in one of the four gospels, it is very likely that Christians would observe the accomplishment of it, which must have been in some place. And about this place, there is no difference among Christian writers of ancient times. Never any other place was named, besides Rome; nor did any other city ever glory in the martyrdom of St. Peter. It is not for our honor, nor for our interest, either as Christians or Protestants, to deny the truth of events, ascertained by early and well-attested tradition. If any make an ill use of such facts, we are not accountable for it. We are not, from a dread of such abuses, to overthrow the credit of all history, the consequences of which would be fatal."

2. We are indebted to this apostle for two epistles, which constitute a valuable part of the inspired writings. The first epistle of St. Peter has always been considered as canonical; and in proof of its genuineness we may observe that it is referred to by Clement of Rome, Hermas, and Polycarp; that we are assured by Eusebius, that it was quoted by Papias; and that it is expressly mentioned by Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, Origen, and most of the later fathers. The authority of the second epistle of Peter was for some time disputed, as we learn from Origen, Eusebius, and Jerome; but since the fourth century it has been universally received, except by the Syrian Christians. It is addressed to the same persons as the former epistle, and the design of it was to encourage them to adhere to the genuine faith and practice of the gospel. Leighton on Peter.—Watson; Calmet.

PETER-PENCE, was an annual tribute of one penny, paid at Rome, out of every family at the feast of St. Peter. Thus Ina, the Saxon king, when he went in pilgrimage to Rome, about the year 740, gave it to the pope, partly as alms, and partly in recompense of a house erected in Rome for English pilgrims. It continued to be paid generally until the time of king Henry VIII., when it was enacted, that henceforth no persons shall pay any pensions, Peter-pence, or other impositions, to the use of the bishop and see of Rome.—Hend. Buck.

PETER THE HERMIT, memorable as having been the author of the Crusades, was born at Amiens, about the middle of the eleventh century. He quitted the profession of arms to become a hermit, in which capacity he made, about 1093, a pilgrimage to the Holy Land. Indignant at the insults to which the Christians were subjected, he originated the plan of expelling the infidels from Palestine. History has recorded the success with which he preached it after his return to Europe. He led the first irregular band of crusaders, but he displayed little talent, and most of his followers were destroyed. He died, in 1115, abbot of New Montier, in the territory of Liege.—Davenport.

PETERS, (HUGH,) minister of Salem, Massachusetts, a celebrated preacher of the seventeenth century, was the son of a Cornish merchant; was educated at Trinity college, Cambridge; and, after having been on the stage and in the church, became, in 1635, a resident in America. After a very active ministry of five years at Salem, he returned to England. There he supported the cause of the parliament, for which he was executed in 1660. He wrote Discourses; and a Last Legacy to his Daughter.—Allen; Davenport.

PETHOR; a city of Mesopotamia, of which the prophet Balaam was a native. The Hebrews call this city Pethura. Ptolemy calls it Pachora; and Eusebius, Pathara. He places it in the Upper Mesopotamia.—Watson.

PETITION, according to Dr. Watts, is the fourth part of prayer, and includes a desire of deliverance from evil, and a request of good things to be bestowed. On both these accounts petitions are to be offered up to God, not only for ourselves, but for our fellow-creatures also. This part of prayer is frequently called intercession. (See PRAYER.)—Hend. Buck.

PETROBRUSSIAN; the followers of Peter de Bruis, (or Bruys,) a reformer in Languedoc and Provence, in the early part of the eleventh century. He is said to have taught, 1. That no persons were to be baptized before they came to the full use of their reason; that is, he rejected infant baptism. 2. That it was an idle superstition to build churches (i. e. superb and expensive buildings) for the service of God, who will accept of a sincere worship wherever it is offered; and that such churches had no peculiar sanctity attached to them by consecration. 3. That crucifixes should be destroyed, as instruments of idolatry and superstition. 4. That the real body and blood of Christ were not in the eucharist; but were only represented in that holy ordinance by the elements, as figures and symbols. 5. That the oblations, prayers, and good works of the living, could be in no respect advantageous to the dead. (See BRUIS, PETER DE.) Mosheim's Eccles. Hist., vol. iii. p. 116; Haweis' Church Hist., vol. ii. p. 224.—Williams.

PETROJOANNITES, were followers of Peter John, or Peter Joannis; that is, Peter the son of John, who flourished in the twelfth century. His doctrine was not known till after his death, when his body was taken out of his grave, and burnt. His opinions were, that he alone had the knowledge of the true sense wherein the apostles preached the gospel; that the reasonable soul is not the form of man; that there is no grace infused by baptism; and that Jesus Christ was pierced with a lance on the cross before he expired.—Hend. Buck.

PETZELIANS, or PÖSCHELIANS; a modern sect, so called from Petzel, or Pöschel, a priest of Brennau, who was their founder. They appear to have adopted the political principles of the Spenceans, and probably their infidelity. They are charged with sacrificing a number of men, and some females, particularly a girl of thirteen, on Good Friday. They are said to have congregations in various parts of Upper Austria, and many have been arrested, but we are not aware how punished. A similar sect seems to have broken out in Switzerland, who are charged with the like enormities. Philanthropic Gazette for 1817, pp. 150, 172, 188, 303; also for 1823, p. 126.—Williams.

PHARAOH; a common name of the kings of Egypt. We meet with it as early as Gen. 12: 15. Josephus says, that all the kings of Egypt, from Minæus, the founder of Memphis, who lived several ages before Abraham, always had the name of Pharaoh, down to the time of Solomon, for more than three thousand three hundred years. He adds, that in the Egyptian language the word Pharaoh means king, and that these princes did not assume the name until they ascended the throne, at which time they quitted their former name.—Watson.

PHARISEES; the most celebrated of all the Jewish sects, which is supposed to have subsisted above a century before the appearance of our Savior. They derived the name of their sect from the Hebrew pharash, which means separated, because they separated themselves, not only from the Gentiles, but from all other Jews; but their separation consisted chiefly in certain distinctions respecting food and religious ceremonies; and does not appear to have interrupted the uniformity of religious worship, in which the Jews of every sect united. The dissensions between the schools of Hillel and Shammai, a little before the Christian era, increased the number and power of the Pharisees. Hillel and Shammai were two great and eminent teachers in the Jewish schools. Hillel was born one hundred and twelve years before Christ. Having acquired profound knowledge of the most difficult points of the law, he became master of the chief school in Jerusalem, and laid the foundation of the Talmud. Shammai, one of the disciples of Hillel, deserted his school, and formed a college, in which he taught doctrines contrary to his master. He rejected the oral law, and followed the written law only in its literal sense. (See CARAITES.) These schools long disturbed the Jewish church by violent contests: the party of Hillel was at last victorious.

The Pharisees, by their apparent sanctity of manners, had rendered themselves extremely popular among the multitude; and the great, who feared their artifice, were obliged to court their favor. Hence they obtained the highest offices, both in the state and priesthood, and had great weight, both in public and private affairs. It appears, from the frequent mention which is made by the evangelists of the scribes and Pharisees in conjunction, that the greater number of Jewish teachers (for they were the scribes) were at that time of this sect.

The principal doctrines of the Pharisees are as follow:—That the oral law, which they suppose God delivered to Moses by an angel on mount Sinai, and which was preserved by tradition, is of equal authority with the written law. (See RABBINISTS.) That by observing both these laws, a man may not only obtain justification with God, but perform meritorious works of supererogation. That fasting, almsgiving, ablutions, and confessions, are a sufficient atonement for sin. That thoughts and desires are not sinful, unless they are carried into action. They believed in predestination, acknowledged the immortality of the soul, future rewards and punishments, the existence of good and evil angels, and the resurrection of the body. (See ΜΕΤΕΜΨΩΧΟΣΙΣ.)

It is a well known fact, that the resurrection of the body was commonly believed among the Jews, even in the most degenerate period of their history. This is manifest from the story of the seven brethren, who, with their mother, were put to death by Antiochus Epiphanes in one day; (2 Mac. 7. 12: 43, 44.) to which story the writer of the epistle to the Hebrews, in chap. 11: 35, clearly alludes, saying, "Others were tortured, not accepting deliverance, that they might obtain a better resurrection." And when Martha, the sister of Lazarus, was told that her brother should rise again, she answered, "I know that he shall rise again in the resurrection at the last day," (John 11: 23, 24.) which implies, that this doctrine was at that time a well-known and acknowledged truth. Luke also says expressly, that the Pharisees confess the resurrection, Acts 23: 3. And Paul, speaking before Felix of his hope towards God, says, "Which they themselves (the Pharisees) also allow, that there shall be a resurrection, both of the just and unjust, Acts 24: 15. If the doctrine of the resurrection, as held by the Pharisees, had been nothing more than the Pythagorean transmigration, it is beyond all credibility that such testimony would have been borne of it.

The state of future felicity in which the Pharisees believed, however, was very gross: they imagined that men in the next world, as well as in the present, were to eat and drink, and enjoy the pleasures of love, each being reunited to his former wife. Hence the Sadducees, who believed in no resurrection, and supposed our Savior to teach it as a Pharisee, very shrewdly urged the difficulty of disposing of the woman who in this world had been the wife of seven husbands. Had the resurrection of Christianity been the Pharisæical resurrection, this difficulty would have been insurmountable; and accordingly we find the people, and even some of the Pharisees themselves, struck with the manner in which our Savior removed it.

The peculiar manners of this sect are strongly marked in the writings of the evangelists, and confirmed by the testimony of the Jewish authors. According to the latter, they fasted the second and fifth days of the week, and put thorns at the bottom of their robes, that they might prick their legs as they walked. They lay upon boards covered with flint-stones, and tied thick cords about their waists. They paid tithes as the law prescribed, and gave the thirtieth and fiftieth part of their fruits; adding voluntary sacrifices to those which were commanded. They were very exact in performing their vows. The talmudic books mention several distinct classes of Pharisees, among whom was the Truncated Pharisee, who, that he might appear in profound meditation, as if destitute of feet, scarcely lifted them from the ground; and the Mortar Pharisee, who, that his contemplations might not be disturbed wore a deep cap in the shape of a mortar, which would only permit him to look upon the ground at his feet. Thus did they study to captivate the admiration of the vulgar; and under the veil of singular piety, they often disguised the most licentious manners. Calmet's Dict. by Taylor; Stackhouse's History of the Bible, vol. v. pp. 122, 413; Jennings's Jewish Antiq., book i. chap. 10; Horne's Introduction, vol. i. pp. 166—170.—*Hend. PHARPAR. (See ABANA.)

PHEBE; a Christian female of the port of Corinth, called Cenchrea, Rom. 16: 1, 2. It is thought that, in quality of deaconess, she was employed by the church in some ministrations suitable to her sex and condition; as to visit and instruct the Christian women, and attend them in their sickness, and distribute alms to them in their necessities.—Watson.

PHENICIA; a province of Syria, the limits of which have been differently represented. Sometimes it has been defined as extending from north to south, from Orthosia as far as Pelusium. At other times its southern limit is said to have been mount Carmel and Ptolemais. It is certain that, from the conquest of Palestine by the Hebrews, its limits were narrow, containing no part of the country of the Philistines, which occupied all the coast from mount Carmel along the Mediterranean, as far as the borders of Egypt. It had also very little extent on the land side, because the Israelites, who possessed all Galilee, confined it to the coast of the Mediterranean sea. The chief cities of Phenicia were Sidon, Tyre, Ptolemais, Ecdippe, Sarepta, Berythe, Biblos, Tripoli, Orthosia, Simira, Aradus. They formerly had possession of some cities in Libanus: and sometimes the Greek authors comprehend all Judea under the name Phenicia.

Phenicia may be considered as the birth-place of commerce, if not also of letters and the arts. It was a Phenician who introduced into Greece the knowledge and the use of letters. Phenician workmen built the temple of Solomon; Phenician sailors navigated his ships; Phenician pilots directed them: and before other nations had ventured to lose sight of their own shores, colonies of Phenicians were established in the most distant parts of Europe, Asia, and Africa. These early advantages were owing, doubtless, in part to their own enterprising character, and in part also to their central situation, which enabled them to draw into their own narrow territory all the commerce between the East and the West. Bochart has labored to show that they sent colonies to almost all the isles and coasts of the Mediterranean sea; but the most famous of all their colonies was that of Carthage.—Watson.

PHIBESETH; a town of Egypt, Ezek. 30: 17. The Seventy call it Bubastus, which was situate on the Pelusiac branch of the Nile.—Calmet.

PHILADELPHIA; (brotherly love;) a city of Lydia, in Asia Minor, and one of the seven churches of Asia. It derived its name from Attalus Philadelphus, its founder; and was seated on an arm of mount Tmolus, by the river Cogamus, about twenty-five miles south-east of Sardis, and seventy, in nearly the same direction, from Smyrna. It suffered greatly, in common with all this part of Asia, in the terrible earthquake during the reign of Tiberius, and in the seventeenth year of the Christian era. It was, however, retained a better fate than most of its neighbors; for under the name of Alahsher, or the city of God, it is still a place of some repute, chiefly supported by trade, it being in the route of the caravans to Smyrna.

"Among the Greek colonies and churches of Asia," says Gibbon, "Philadelphia is still erect, a column in a scene of ruins." Thus the sceptical historian himself bears witness to the fulfilment of prophecy. See Rev. 3: 10. Although this city is now in the possession of the Turks, it has about a thousand Christian inhabitants, chiefly Greeks; who have five churches, with a resident bishop, and inferior clergy.—Watson.

PHILADELPHIAN SOCIETY; a sect or society of the seventeenth century, so called from an English female, whose name was Jane Leadly. (See LEADLYANS.)—Hend. Buck.

PHILANTHROPY; compounded of philos and anthrōpos, which signify the love of mankind. It differs from benevolence only in this, that benevolence extends to every being that has life and sense, and is of course susceptible of pain and pleasure; whereas philanthropy cannot comprehend more than the human race. It differs from friendship, as this affection subsists only between a few individuals, whilst philanthropy comprehends the whole human species. It is a calm sentiment, which in most men hardly ever rises to the warmth of affection, and certainly not to the heat of passion. (See LOVE.)—Hend. Buck.

PHILEMON; a rich citizen of Colosse, in Phrygia, who, Calmet thinks, was converted to the Christian faith, with Apphia his wife, by Epaphras, a disciple of Paul; but, as Mr. Taylor remarks, it would appear from the expression in Philem. verse 19, "thou owest to me even thy own self besides," that Philemon was really a convert of Paul; unless we could admit that the apostle had formerly been the means of saving his life; for which we have no warrant. Some have supposed that Archippus was son to Philemon; and as the apostle terms him "our fellow-soldier," it is possible, that the connexion had been of long standing, and consequently, much intercourse might have taken place between Paul and Philemon, distinct from any reference to Philemon's situation at Colosse. Lightfoot has this thought; and Michaëlis adopts it; but, if Archippus were fellow-soldier of Paul the aged, he was too old to be son to Philemon: not to insist, that no reason can be assigned why this son is distinguished from the rest of Philemon's family. He might be brother to Philemon, (or, to Apphia,) and living with him, is placed after Apphia; but before the young folks of the family, to whom he was uncle. This conjecture seems to be the most probable; and it agrees with the supposable time of life at which Archippus had (lately) been chosen to an office of deaconship. Or was he a young preacher?

Though it is usually said that Paul had converted and baptized Onesimus, the run-away slave of Philemon, (see ONESIMUS,) at Rome; yet from the phrase, (Col. 4: 9.) "who is one of you," Mr. Taylor infers that Onesimus had professed Christianity before his elopement; (so Epaphras is called one of themselves, ch. 1: 7.) otherwise, he could be no member of the church at Colosse: and very likely, this transgression of a professor had not only mortified Philemon extremely, but had scandalized the church, and had become publicly notorious among the heathen also. But it may here mean only "of your city."

Philemon was undoubtedly a man of property; and, like Gaius, the lady Electa, and Phebe, he exercised great hospitality towards Christian brethren, especially evangelists. But, from the direction of the apostle "to prepare him a lodging" (comp. Macknight, et al. in loc.) in a hired house, in the city, where he might receive all visitors, it appears that Philemon's premises were not very extensive.

Philemon might have been a deacon in one of the churches at Colosse, but the term "fellow-laborer" is not sufficient to prove that he was a bishop; though it implies a previous personal knowledge, and perhaps much confidential communication, between the parties. If we might add a personal knowledge of Philemon, by those also who salute him in Paul's letter—Timothy, Epaphras, Mark, Aristarchus, Demas, Luke—it would greatly heighten our conception of this good man's character, and suggest a variety of occasions on which he might have rendered the brethren services equally extensive and important.—Calmet.

PHILIP, or HEROD-PHILIP; (Mark 6: 17. Luke 3: 19. Matt. 14: 3.) son of Herod the Great. (See AGRIPPA; HEROD; and HERODIAS.)—Calmet.

PHILIP, the apostle, was a native of Bethsaida in Galilee. Jesus Christ having seen him, said to him, "Follow me," John 1: 43. 44. Philip followed him; he was present at the marriage of Cana in Galilee. Philip was called at the beginning of our Savior's mission. He is mentioned, Luke 6: 13. Matt. 10: 3. John 6: 5—7. Some Gentiles having a curiosity to see Jesus a little before his passion, addressed themselves to Philip, (John 12: 21, 22.) who mentioned it to Andrew, and these two to Christ. At the last supper Philip desired the Savior to show them the Father, John 14: 8—10. This is all that we find concerning Philip in the gospel.

2. PHILIP, the second of the seven deacons, (Acts 6: 5.) was, some say, of Caesarea in Palestine. It is certain his daughters lived in that city, Acts 21: 8, 9. After the death of Stephen, all the Christians, except the apostles, having left Jerusalem, and being dispersed in several places, Philip went to preach at Sebaste or Samaria, where he performed several miracles, and converted many persons, Acts 8: 1—3, &c. He baptized them; but informed the apostles at Jerusalem that Samaria had received the word of God, that they might come and communicate the Holy Ghost to them. Peter and John came thither for that purpose. Philip was, probably, at Samaria, when an angel commanded him to go on the road that leads from Jerusalem to Old Gaza. Philip obeyed, and there met with an Ethiopian eunuch, belonging to Candace, queen of Ethiopia, whom he converted and baptized, Acts 8: 26. Being come out of the water, the Spirit of the Lord took away Philip, and the eunuch saw him no more.—Watson.

PHILIPPISTS; a sect or party among the Lutherans, the followers of Philip Melancthon. He had strenuously opposed the Ubiquitists, who arose in his time; and the dispute growing still hotter after his death, the university of Wittenberg, who espoused Melancthon's opinion, were called by the Flacians, who attacked it, Philippists.—Hend. Buck.

PHILIPPI; a city of Macedonia, so called from Philip, king of Macedonia, who repaired and beautified it: whence it lost its former name of Dathos.

Paul here introduced the gospel, A. D. 52. In Acts 16: 12, Luke says, "We came to Philippi, which (say our translators) is the chief city of that part of Macedonia, and a colony;" but this translation requires correction, to this effect: "Philippi, a city of the first part of Macedonia" or Macedonia Prima. The province of Macedonia had undergone several changes, and had been divided into various portions, which had received various names. Mr. Taylor has produced a medal which reads MAKEDONON PROTOS, "of the first part of Macedonia," which is a complete justification of the evangelist's description of this district. Amphipolis was (or had been) the chief city of the district in which Philippi stood. (Livy, lib. xiv. c. 29.) Further, the sacred writer says, Philippi was "a colony;" intending, no doubt, a Roman colony; but, as this was a favor Philippi seems to have had little reason to expect, having formerly opposed the interest of the Cæsarean imperial family, the learned have been embarrassed by the title here given it. However, after long perplexities among the critics, Providence brought to light some coins, in which it is recorded under this character: and one of which makes express mention, that Julius Cæsar himself had bestowed the dignity and advantages of a colony on the city of Philippi, which Augustus afterwards confirmed and augmented. The inscription is, COLONIA AVGVSTIA IVLIA PHILIPPI. This corroborates the character given to Philippi by Luke; and proves that it had been a colony for many years, though no author but himself, whose writings have reached us, has mentioned it under that character; or has given us reason to infer at what time it might be thus honorably distinguished. (See LYDIA.) Paul and Silas, notwithstanding the shameful persecution they here experienced, founded a flourishing church. This church was at first left by Paul and Silas under the ministrations and direction of Luke, whose age and experience qualified him for that difficult office. He continued there a long while, probably several years, though he modestly omits all mention of his services. Comp. Acts 16: 11. et seq. with chap. 20: 6.

2. The converted Philippians were always full of gratitude for the faith they had received from God, by the ministry of Paul. They assisted him on several occasions; (Phil. 4: 16.) sent him money while in Achaia; and being informed that he was a prisoner at Rome, they sent a deputation to him by Epaphroditus, one of their bishops, (Phil. 1: 1. 4: 12, 18. A. D. 61.) who went a second time, and carried with him the epistle which is still remaining; and in which the apostle opens his whole heart, opens the glory of the gospel as the means of holiness, and highly commends their liberality.—Calmet.

PHILISTINES, or PULISTIM; a people who are commonly said to have descended from Castuhim, the son of Mizraim or Mizr, who peopled Egypt. The Philistines, it is probable, continued with their progenitors in Egypt until they were sufficiently numerous and powerful to stretch themselves along the coast of Canaan; doubtless by driving out that portion of the family of Ham. It is certain that, in the time of Abraham, the Canaanites were in possession of the rest of the land, to which they gave their name: but the extreme south of Philistia, or Palestine, was even then possessed by the Philistines, whose king, Abimelech, reigned at Gerar. After this, in the time of Joshua, we find their country divided into five lordships or principalities; namely, Gaza, Askelon, Ashdod, Gath, and Ekron; giving sometimes also, as it appears, the title of king to their respective rulers; Achish being termed king of Gath, 1 Sam. 21: 10. The time of their coming to Palestine is unknown; but they had been long in Canaan when Abraham came thither, in the year of the world 2053. The name Philistine is not Hebrew. The Septuagint generally translate it hallophuloi, strangers. The Pelethites and Cherethites were also Philistines; and the Septuagint sometimes translate Cherethim, Kretai, Cretes. They were not of the cursed seed of Canaan. However, Joshua did not forbear to give their land to the Hebrews, and to attack them by command from the Lord, because they possessed a country promised to Israel. But these conquests of Joshua must have been ill maintained, since, under the judges, under Saul, and at the beginning of the reign of David, the Philistines had their kings, and their lords, whom they called Sazemim; since their state was divided into five little kingdoms, or satrapies; and since they oppressed the Israelites during the government of the high-priest Eli, and of Samuel, and during the reign of Saul, for about a hundred and twenty years, from A. M. 2848 to A. M. 2960. True it is, that Shamgar, Samson, Samuel, and Saul, opposed them and killed some of their people, but did not reduce their power. They continued independent till the time of David, who subdued them, (2 Sam. 5: 17. 8: 1, 2, &c.) though they often revolted in succeeding reigns, 2 Chron. 21: 16. 26: 6, 7. 28: 18. 2 Kings 18: 8.

Esar-haddon, successor to Sennacherib, besieged Ashdod, or Azoth, and took it by the arms of his general Thasthan, or Tartan. Psammetichus, king of Egypt, took the same city after a siege of twenty-nine years, according to Herodotus. During the siege of Tyre, which held out thirteen years, Nebuchadrezzar used part of his army to subdue the Ammonites, the Moabites, the Egyptians, and other nations bordering on the Jews. There is great probability that the Philistines could not withstand him, but were reduced to his obedience, as well as the other people of Syria, Phenicia, and Palestine. Afterwards, they fell under the dominion of the Persians; then under that of Alexander the Great, who destroyed the city of Gaza, the only city of the Phenicians that dared to oppose him. After the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes, the Asmoneans took by degrees several cities from the country of the Philistines, which they subjected. Tryphon, regent of the kingdom of Syria, gave to Jonathan, the Asmonean, the government of the whole coast of the Mediterranean, from Tyre to Egypt; consequently, all the country of the Philistines.

2. The land of the Philistines bordered on the west and south-west of Judea, and lies on the south-east point of the Mediterranean sea. The country to the north of Gaza is very fertile; and, long after the Christian era, it possessed a very numerous population, and strongly fortified cities. No human probability, says Keith, could have existed, in the time of the prophets, or at a much more recent date, of its eventual desolation. But it has belied, for many ages, every promise which the fertility of its soil, and the excellence both of its climate and situation, gave for many preceding centuries of its permanency, as a rich and well-cultivated region. And the voice of prophecy, which was not silent respecting it, proclaimed the fate that awaited it, in terms as contradictory, at the time, to every natural suggestion, as they are descriptive of what Philistia now actually is. "I will stretch out my hand upon the Philistines, and destroy the remnant of the sea-coasts," Ezek. 25: 16. Jer. 47: 5. "Thus saith the Lord, For three transgressions of Gaza, and for this fourth, I will not turn away the punishment thereof. I will send a fire upon the wall of Gaza, which shall devour the palaces thereof. And I will cut off the inhabitant from Ashdod, and him that holdeth the sceptre from Ashkelon; and I will turn my hand against Ekron; and the remnant of the Philistines shall perish, saith the Lord God," Amos 1: 6, 7, 8. Zeph. 2: 4—6. Zech. 9: 5.

The land of the Philistines partakes of the general desolation common to it with Judea and other neighboring states. But its aspect presents some existing peculiarities, which travellers fail not to particularize, and which, in reference both to the state of the country and the fate of its different cities, the prophets fail not to discriminate as justly as if their description had been drawn both with all the accuracy which ocular observation, and all the certainty which authenticated history, could give. Volney, (though, like one who in ancient times was instrumental to the fulfilment of a special prediction, "he meant not so, neither did his heart think so,") from the manner in which he generalizes his observations, and marks the peculiar features of the different districts of Syria, with greater acuteness and perspicuity than any other traveller whatever, is the ever ready purveyor of evidence in all the cases which come within the range of his topographical description of the wide field of prophecy: while, at the same time, from his known, open, and zealous hostility to the Christian cause, his testimony is alike decisive and unquestionable: and the vindication of the truth of the scriptural predictions may safely be committed to this redoubted champion of infidelity. "The ruins of white marble, sometimes found at Gaza, prove that it was formerly the abode of luxury and opulence. It has shared in the general destruction; and, notwithstanding its proud title of the capital of Palestine, it is now no more than a defenceless village, peopled by, at most, only two thousand inhabitants. The sea-coast, by which it was formerly washed, is every day removing farther from the deserted ruins of Ashkelon. Amidst the various successive ruins, those of Edzond," Ashdod, "so powerful under the Philistines, are now remarkable for their scorpions."

There is yet another city which was noted by the prophets, the very want of any information respecting which, and the absence of its name from several modern maps of Palestine, while the sites of other ruined cities are marked, are really the best confirmation of the truth of the prophecy that could possibly be given. "Ekron shall be rooted up," Zeph. 2: 4—6. It is rooted up. It was one of the chief cities of the Philistines; but, though Gaza still exists, and while Ashkelon and Ashdod retain their names in their ruins, the very name of Ekron is missing. Keith on the Evidence of Prophecy.—Watson.

PHILLIPS, (SAMUEL,) minister of Andover, Mass., was born in Salem, in 1690. He was graduated at Harvard college in 1708; began to preach in the south and new parish of Andover, April 30, 1710; and was ordained Oct. 17th. He continued faithfully to discharge the duties of the sacred office for sixty years, till his death, June 5, 1771, aged eighty-one. Being sincerely attached to those views of religious truth which were embraced by the first fathers of New England, he could not quietly see the efforts that were made to pervert the faith, which he was persuaded was once delivered to the saints. He exerted himself both by his preaching and his writings to guard his people against the intrusion of error.

He published a Word in Season, or the duty of a people to take the oath of allegiance to a glorious God, 1727; Advice to a Child, 1729; the History of the Savior; the Orthodox Christian, or a child well instructed, 1738; a Minister's Address to his People, 1739; Artillery Election Sermon, 1741; Living Water to be had for asking; Election Sermon, 1750; the Sinner's Refusal to come unto Christ reproved; the Necessity of God's drawing in order to men's coming unto Christ; Convention Sermon, 1753; at the ordination of N. Holt; at the instalment of S. Chandler, 1759; Seasonable Advice to a Young Neighbor, 1761; Address to Young People, in a dialogue; a Sermon to Young People, 1763; on Justification, 1766; Sin of Suicide contrary to nature, 1767.—Allen.

PHILLIPS, (JOHN, LL. D.) founder of the academy in Exeter, New Hampshire, was born in Andover, Massachusetts, 1719. He was graduated at Harvard college, in 1735. For several years he was a member of the council of New Hampshire. April 21, 1778, he, with his brother, Samuel Phillips of Andover, founded and liberally endowed the academy in that town, which was incorporated in 1780. In 1789, he farther gave to this institution twenty thousand dollars. The academy, called Phillips' Exeter academy, of which he was the sole founder, was incorporated in 1781, with a fund of fifteen thousand pounds. He died in April, 1795, aged seventy-six, bequeathing to this academy two-thirds of all his estate, and one-third of the residue to the seminary at Andover, particularly for the benefit of pious youth. Mr. Phillips was an orthodox professor. Morse's Geog.; Holmes' Annals, ii. 404; Constitut. of Andover Theolog. Seminary—Allen.

PHILLIPS, (SAMUEL, LL. D.,) lieutenant governor of Massachusetts, was born at Andover, in 1751, and graduated at Harvard college, in 1771. He was a member of the provincial congress in 1775, and of the house of representatives till the year 1780, when he assisted in framing the constitution of Massachusetts. On its adoption, he was elected a member of the senate, and was its president from 1785 to 1801. Being appointed justice of the court of common pleas for Essex in 1781, he held his office till 1797, when his declining health induced his resignation. He was chosen lieutenant governor in 1801, and died February 10, 1802, aged fifty.

Such was his superiority to the pride of wealth and of power, and such his benevolence and humility, that when honored with public applause and raised to eminence, he would frequently spend the interval between the morning and evening services of the Sabbath in the house of God, for the purpose of reading some pious book to those whose distant habitations prevented them from returning home. He was careful to impart religious instruction to his family, and he led its daily devotions with humility, fervor, and eloquence. He appeared to be continually governed by love to the Supreme Being, and by the desire of imitating his benevolence and doing good. His deep views of evangelical doctrine and duty, of human depravity and mediatorial mercy, formed his heart to humility, condensation, and kindness, and led him continually to depend on the grace of God through the atonement of his Son.

He projected the academy at Andover, and was much concerned in establishing that, as well as the academy at Exeter, which were founded by his father and uncle. To these institutions he was a distinguished benefactor. His exertions to effect their establishment bring him the highest honor, for he was the natural heir of the founders.

After his death, his widow, Phebe Phillips, and his son, John Phillips of Andover, evinced the same attachment to the interests of learning and religion, by uniting with Samuel Abbot, and three others of a most liberal and benevolent spirit, in founding the theological seminary in Andover, which was opened in September, 1808. By such acts of most honorable munificence has the family which bears the name of Phillips proved to the world, that the blessing of wealth may fall into hands which shall employ it for the best of purposes. Tappan's Fun. Serm.—Allen.

PHILLIPS, (WILLIAM,) lieutenant governor of Massachusetts, and a Christian philanthropist, was born April 10, 1750, being an only son. His feeble health prevented his receiving a public education. He engaged in mercantile pursuits with his father, on whose death a large fortune came into his hands. In 1772, he made a profession of religion; in 1794, he was chosen a deacon of the Old South church, where he officiated until his death. For several years, while Strong and Brooks were governors, he was the lieutenant governor of the state. He died May 26, 1817, aged seventy-seven.

Deacon Phillips was an active member of many charitable societies. He was, at the time of his decease, president of the Massachusetts Bible Society. For a series of years, his charities had been from eight to eleven thousand dollars annually. Many widows and fatherless children were by him rescued from want. He bequeathed to Phillips' academy fifteen thousand dollars; to the theological institution at Andover, ten thousand; to the society for propagating the gospel among the Indians, the Massachusetts Bible Society, the Foreign Mission Board, the Congregational Society, the Education Society, and the Massachusetts General Hospital, each five thousand; to the Medical Dispensary, three thousand; to the Female Asylum, and the Asylum for Boys, each two thousand; in all, sixty-two thousand dollars.—Allen.

PHILOSOPHISTS; a name given to several persons in France who entered into a combination to overturn the religion of Jesus, and eradicate from the human heart every religious sentiment. The man more particularly to whom this idea first occurred, was Voltaire, who, being weary (as he said himself) of hearing people repeat that twelve men were sufficient to establish Christianity, resolved to prove that one might be sufficient to overturn it. Full of this project, he swore, before the year 1730, to dedicate his life to its accomplishment; and, for some time, he flattered himself that he should enjoy alone the glory of destroying the Christian religion. He found, however, that associates would be necessary; and from the numerous tribe of his admirers and disciples, he chose D'Alembert and Diderot as the most proper persons to co-operate with him in his designs. But Voltaire was not satisfied with their aid alone. He contrived to embark in the same cause Frederick II., king of Prussia, who wished to be thought a philosopher, and who, of course, deemed it expedient to talk and write against a religion which he had never studied, and into the evidence of which he had probably never deigned to inquire. This royal adept was one of the most zealous of Voltaire's coadjutors, till he discovered that the philosophists were waging war with the throne as well as with the altar. This, indeed, was not originally Voltaire's intention. He was vain; he loved to be caressed by the great; and, in one word, he was, from natural disposition, an aristocrat, and an admirer of royalty. But when he found that almost every sovereign but Frederick disapproved of his impious projects, as soon as he perceived their issue, he determined to oppose all the governments on earth rather than forfeit the glory, with which he had flattered himself, of vanquishing Christ and his apostles in the field of controversy.

He now set himself, with D'Alembert and Diderot, to excite universal discontent with the established order of things. For this purpose they formed secret societies, assumed new names, and employed an enigmatical language. Thus Frederick was called Luc; D'Alembert, Protagoras, and sometimes Bertrand; Voltaire, Raton; and Diderot, Platon, or its anagram Tompla; while the general term for the conspirators was Cacouc. In their secret meetings they professed to celebrate the mysteries of Mythra; and their great object, as they professed to one another, was to confound the wretch, meaning Jesus Christ. Hence their secret watchword was Ecrasez l'Infame, "Crush the Wretch." If we look into some of the books expressly written for general circulation, we shall there find the following doctrines; some of them standing alone in all their naked horrors, others surrounded by sophistry and meretricious ornaments, to entice the mind into their net before it perceives their nature. "The Universal Cause, that God of the philosophers, of the Jews, and of the Christians, is but a chimera and a phantom. The phenomena of nature only prove the existence of God to a few prepossessed men: so far from bespeaking a God, they are but the necessary effects of matter prodigiously diversified. It is more reasonable to admit, with Manes, of a twofold God, than of the God of Christianity. We cannot know whether a God really exists, or whether there is the smallest difference between good and evil, or vice and virtue. Nothing can be more absurd than to believe the soul a spiritual being. The immortality of the soul, so far from stimulating man to the practice of virtue, is nothing but a barbarous, desperate, fatal tenet, and contrary to all legislation. All ideas of justice and injustice, of virtue and vice, of glory and infamy, are purely arbitrary, and dependent on custom. Conscience and remorse are nothing but the foresight of those physical penalties to which crimes expose us. The man who is above the law, can commit, without remorse, the dishonest act that may serve his purpose. The fear of God, so far from being the beginning of wisdom, should be the beginning of folly. The command to love one's parents is more the work of education than of nature. Modesty is only an invention of refined voluptuousness. The law which condemns married people to live together, becomes barbarous and cruel on the day they cease to love one another." These extracts from the secret correspondence and the public writings of these men, will suffice to show us the nature and tendency of the dreadful system they had formed.

The philosophists were diligently employed in attempting to propagate their sentiments. Their grand Encyclopædia was converted into an engine to serve this purpose. Voltaire proposed to establish a colony of philosophists at Cleves, who, protected by the king of Prussia, might publish their opinions without dread or danger; and Frederick was disposed to take them under his protection, till he discovered that their opinions were anarchical as well as impious, when he threw them off, and even wrote against them. They contrived, however, to engage the ministers of the court of France in their favor, by pretending to have nothing in view but the enlargement of science, in works which spoke indeed respectfully of revelation, while every discovery which they brought forward was meant to undermine its very foundation. When the throne was to be attacked, and even when barefaced atheism was to be promulgated, a number of impious and licentious pamphlets were dispersed (for some time none knew how) from a secret society formed at the hotel d'Holbach, at Paris, of which Voltaire was elected honorary and perpetual president. To conceal their design, which was the diffusion of their infidel sentiments, they called themselves Economists. (See ILLUMINATI.)

The books, however, that were issued from this club, were calculated to impair and overturn religion, morals, and government; and which, indeed, spreading over all Europe, imperceptibly took possession of public opinion. As soon as the sale was sufficient to pay the expenses, inferior editions were printed and given away, or sold at a very low price; circulating libraries of them formed, and reading societies instituted. While they constantly denied these productions to the world, they contrived to give them a false celebrity through their confidential agents and correspondents, who were not themselves always trusted with the entire secret. By degrees they got possession nearly of all the reviews and periodical publications; established a general intercourse, by means of hawkers and pedlars, with the distant provinces; and instituted an office to supply all schools with teachers: and thus they acquire unprecedented dominion over every species of literature, over the minds of all ranks of people, and over the education of youth, without giving any alarm to the world. The lovers of wit and polite literature were caught by Voltaire; the men of science were perverted, and children corrupted in the first rudiments of learning, by D'Alembert and Diderot; stronger appetites were fed by the secret club of baron Holbach; the imaginations of the higher orders were set dangerously afloat by Montesquieu; and the multitude of all ranks was surprised, confounded, and hurried away by Rousseau. Thus was the public mind in France completely corrupted, and which, no doubt, greatly accelerated those dreadful events which have since transpired in that country.—Hend. Buck.

PHILOSOPHY, (from philos and sophia,) properly denotes the love, or desire of wisdom. Pythagoras was the first who devised this name, because he thought no man was wise, but God only; and that learned men ought rather to be considered as lovers of wisdom, than really wise. 1. Natural philosophy is that science which leads us to contemplate the nature, causes, and effects of the material works of God. (See MAN.)—2. Moral philosophy is the science of manners, the knowledge of our duty and felicity. The various articles included in the latter are explained in their places in this work.—3. Mental philosophy is the science of mind, or of the different mental powers, affections, and associations. 4. Divine philosophy is the higher science of theology; especially the divine plan of salvation by Christ, 1 Cor. 2: 6—16. 1 Pet. 1: 10—12.

Milton has eloquently described the nature and influence of the latter study.

How charming is DIVINE PHILOSOPHY;
Not harsh, and crabbed, as dull fools suppose,
But musical as is Apollo's lute,
And a perpetual feast of nectared sweets,
Where no crude surfeit reigns.

A knowledge of the animal, vegetable, and mineral kingdoms, or the science of natural history, was always an object of interest. We are informed that Solomon himself had given a description of the animal and vegetable kingdoms, 1 Kings 4: 33. Traces of philosophy, strictly so called, that is, the system of prevailing moral opinions, may be found in the book of Job, in the thirty-seventh, thirty-ninth, and seventy-third Psalms; also in the books of Proverbs and Ecclesiastes, but chiefly in the apocryphal book of Wisdom, and the writings of the son of Sirach. During the captivity, the Jews acquired many new notions, particularly from the Mahetani, and appropriated them, as occasion offered, to their own purposes. They at length became acquainted with the philosophy of the Greeks, which makes its appearance abundantly in the book of Wisdom. After the captivity, the language in which the sacred books were written was no longer vernacular. Hence arose the need of an interpreter on the sabbatic year, a time when the whole law was read, and also on the Sabbath in the synagogues, which some think had been recently erected, in order to make the people understand what was read. These interpreters learned the Hebrew language at the schools. The teachers of these schools, who, for the two generations preceding the time of Christ, had maintained some acquaintance with the Greek philosophy, were not satisfied with a simple interpretation of the Hebrew idiom, as it stood, but shaped the interpretation so as to render it conformable to their philosophy. Thus arose contentions, which gave occasion for the various sects of Pharisees, Sadducees, and Essenes.

Anciently, learned men were denominated among the Hebrews hekmon, as among the Greeks they were called sophoi, wise men. In the time of Christ, the common appellation for men of that description was grammateus, a scribe. They were addressed by the honorary title of rabbi, "great," or "master." The Jews, in imitation of the Greeks, had their seven wise men, who were called rabbini. Gamaliel was one of the number. They called themselves the children of wisdom; expressions which correspond very nearly to Greek philosophos, Matt. 11: 19. Luke 7: 35. The heads of sects were called "fathers;" the disciples were denominated "sons," or "children;" Matt. 12: 27. 23: 1—9. The Jewish teachers, at least some of them, had private lecture-rooms; but they also taught and disputed in synagogues, in temples, and, in fact, wherever they could find an audience. The method of these teachers was the same with that which prevailed among the Greeks. Any disciple who chose might propose questions, upon which it was the duty of the teachers to remark and give their opinions, Luke 2: 46. The teachers were not invested with their functions by any formal act of the church, or of the civil authority: they were self-constituted. They received no other salary than some voluntary present from the disciples, which was called an "honorary," (time, honorarium, 1 Tim. 5: 17.) They acquired a subsistence, in the main, by the exercise of some art or handicraft. That they took a higher seat than their auditors, although it was probably the case, does not follow, as is sometimes supposed, from Luke 2: 46. According to the talmudists, they were bound to hold no conversation with women, and to refuse to sit at table with the lower class of people, Matt. 9: 11. John 4: 27. The subjects on which they taught were numerous, commonly intricate, and of no great consequence; of which there are abundant examples in the Talmud.

St. Paul bids the Colossians beware lest any man should spoil them "through philosophy and vain deceit;" that is, a vain and deceitful philosophy, such as was popular in that day, and had been compounded out of all preceding systems, Grecian and Oriental. An explanation of this philosophy is given under CABALA, and Gnostics.

But popular as this sort of philosophy may have been, we may say with truth, that the scheme which flattered the vanity of human wisdom, and which strove to conciliate all opinions, has died away, and is forgotten; while the gospel, the unpresuming, the uncompromising doctrine of the gospel, aided by no human wisdom, and addressing itself not merely to the head, but to the heart, has triumphed over all systems and all philosophers; and still leads its followers to that true knowledge which some have endeavored to teach "after the tradition of men, after the rudiments of the world, and not after Christ." (See, also, the articles PHILOSOPHERS; and NEOLOGY.)

It ought to be remarked, however, that the progress of true science, on the principles of the Baconian philosophy, by observation, experiment, and induction, is found in the end always to correspond with, and corroborate the truth of the Scriptures. One philosophical objection after another, raised during the crude state of the several sciences, has in turn disappeared as the science became perfected, and its crudities purged away. Between true science and true Christianity the harmony is perfect. PHILPOT, (Jons,) a very learned English divine and martyr under Edward VI. and Mary, was born near Winchester. He was educated at New college, Oxford. After leaving Oxford, he travelled through Italy, where, on account of his religion, he was brought into danger. On returning to England, he received the preferment of archdeacon of Winchester. During the time of Edward, his labors were abundant and successful. He was well furnished, both by nature and grace, for his calling, and he devoted himself with an uncompromising zeal to the advancement of pure and undefiled religion. For both learning and piety, he was esteemed as among the foremost of the English reformers.

But he was soon called to stem the current of papal tyranny and corruption. On the accession of Mary, a convocation of bishops and dignitaries was held, for the purpose of changing the established religion from Protestantism to popery. The learned archdeacon, and a few others, bore a noble testimony against the design. For his exertions, notwithstanding the promised freedom of debate, he was imprisoned a year and a half. He was then sent to bishop Bonner, and other commissioners, who confined him in the bishop's coal-house. He here met with every insult; was once confined from morning till night in the stocks; was examined some fifteen or sixteen times; and though he firmly and unanswerably defended his cause, was met only with taunts and abusive epithets. Yet, in all this persecution, the consolations of the Holy Spirit were abundantly administered to him; inasmuch that on one occasion Bonner said to him, "I marvel that you are so merry in prison, singing in your naughtiness," &c.

After his condemnation, he suffered many indignities in Newgate. But he was soon brought to the stake. He kissed the wood, and said, "Shall I disdain to suffer at this stake, when my Lord and Savior refused not to suffer a most vile death upon the cross for me?" When he was bound to it, he repeated the hundred and sixth, seventh, and eighth Psalms, and prayed most fervently; till at length, in the midst of the flames, with great meekness and joy, he gave up his spirit to God.—Middleton, vol. i. p. 428.

PHINEHAS, son of Eleazar, and grandson of Aaron, was the third high-priest of the Jews, (A. M. 2571, to about A. M. 2590,) and is particularly commended in Scripture for zeal in vindicating the glory of God, when the Midianites had sent their daughters into the camp of Israel, to tempt the Hebrews to fornication and idolatry, Num. 25: 7.

For his conduct upon this occasion the Lord promised the priesthood to Phinehas by a perpetual covenant; evidently including this tacit condition, that his children should continue faithful and obedient. It continued in the race of Phinehas, down to the high-priest Eli, for about three hundred and thirty-five years, when it passed into the family of Ithamar; and again reverted to the family of Eleazar under the reign of Saul, who, having put to death Abimelech and the other priests of Nob, gave the high-priesthood to Zadok, of the race of Phinehas. The priesthood continued in his family until after the captivity of Babylon, and even to the destruction of the temple.—Calmet.

PHOCAS, bishop of Pontus, a Christian martyr of the third century, under Trajan, for refusing to sacrifice to Neptune, was put to death by being first cast into a hot lime-kiln, and afterwards thrown into a scalding bath.—Fox, p. 16.

PHOTINIANS; a sect in the fourth century, who denied the divinity of our Lord. They derive their name from Photinus, their founder, who was bishop of Sermium, and a disciple of Marcellus. Photinus published, in the year 343, his notions respecting the Deity, which were repugnant both to the orthodox and Arian systems. He asserted that Jesus Christ was born of the Holy Ghost and the virgin Mary; that a certain divine emanation, which he called the Word, descended upon him; and that, because of the union of the divine Word with his human nature, he was called the Son of God, and even God himself; and that the Holy Ghost was not a person, but merely a celestial virtue proceeding from the Deity.—Head. Buck.
